The evidence of regional thought and action observable in the Mountain States promises well for the future development of the region and the nation. Yet, at present, Rocky Mountain regionalism is still in the infant stage of growth. Many problems are yet to be solved. Regional organization is still embryonic and the problem of inter-regional relationships scarcely recognized. What, for example, is the relationship of the Mountain States to the larger West, and particularly to the three great states of the West Coast? This is a vital question, but so far little consideration has been given it by either the Mountain or Pacific States. Yet the Mountain States are drawn to the coast by the problems of a Western steel industry, by air transport and by a common interest in irrigation and public power. Obviously what we in the West need is a regional organization to give our common interests expression and our views unity and cohesion. We need a Western States Council, organized on a permanent basis, to carry on a continuing program of regional research and to formulate policies for Western development. Through its agency we could plan for the optimum use of our vast resources. Without it we shall miss many a golden opportunity.

Public Power in The Pacific Northwest

BY PAUL J. RAVER

Portland, September 15

THE Pacific Northwest's hardiest political perennial is the public power movement. The region's geography has made this inevitable. When new growth has supplanted the last stand of old growth timber and the last possible arable acre has been reclaimed, the Columbia river will still, in all probability, be the source of a continuing development of hydro power and power-using industry.

PAUL J. RAVER is Administrator of the Bonneville Power Administration.

Hydro power is a primary resource in the states of Washington, Oregon, Idaho and in western Montana. As with all major resources, it has become a bone of tremendous contention: Who'll develop it? Granted that its development will mean profits, who will get them?

There is not much doubt as to the final answer. The facts of public development, federal and local, speak for themselves. Even most old-time utility company managers will admit privately that, all things being equal, the risk capital required for full power development of an entire river, not to speak of multi-purpose projects such as those undertaken by the federal government, and the public advantage to be gained from non-profit operation, are beyond the scope and abilities of a privately held monopoly. Public power is in the Pacific Northwest for keeps. The public power battle has been, rather, in terms of "how fast and how far?"

There are now about 50 city power operations in Oregon, Washington and Idaho, and about 65 cooperatives. The first city system was organized in McMinnville, Oregon in 1889.

Although the public power movement in the northwest is more than 40 years old, the first several decades were in slow motion but the last 15 have seen rapidly increasing momentum.

The New Deal gave the movement great impetus. Global war slowed it down. Currently, the question is: Now that the war is over, will it pick up again or will a resurgent conservatism hold it in check for a while longer?

Regardless of the ultimate outcome, a slowdown in the march of public ownership means much to power company management. Specifically, it means two, five, ten or 15 years more of excess profits payable on common stocks. It means a better bargaining position and a higher price for inflated values if and when the time comes to sell out.

It means an opportunity to "cash in" on the tremendous potential profit in selling power still to be developed by the federal government in future dams on the Columbia river. Such advantages are worth fighting for. The utility companies have some of the best fighters in American business.

The battle is joined principally in the states of Oregon and Washington. Every local or national election and every session of the state legislatures is a skirmish ground. The initiative and referendum are employed by both sides.

Basic tools of public power in the two states are the two state public utility district (PUD) laws. These statutes permit the formation of utility districts, by a vote of the elctorate, as municipal corporations with powers of eminent domain.

Both laws were passed in the early thirties. The Washington law is more liberal, in that it permits Washington PUDs, once formed, to issue revenue bonds by vote of the three district commissioners, for the purpose of acquiring power distribution systems.

Under this law, 32 utility districts have been created in the state of Washington's 39 counties. Twenty-nine of these are countywide in extent.

But with the difficulties posed by condemnation suits, the intervention of war, and similar factors, 16 of the state's 29 PUDs so far have been unable to get into business after formation.

The Oregon PUD law is much less flexible than its Washington counterpart. A succession of conservative legislatures has restricted it until it is almost impossible for an Oregon PUD to organize or sell power. A case in point is that of the Union County, Oregon, PUD which worked out an agreement with a local power company for the purchase of its properties. Although there were a willing buyer and a willing seller, the stringency of the Oregon law made it easy for minority opponents to stop the sale.

In Oregon's 36 counties, there are only 12 PUDUs. Of these, only two thus far have managed to get into business. Four others have been absorbed by cooperatives organized by consumers in their service areas.

With all their shortcomings, however, the PUD laws, plus the growth of the cooperative movement, have resulted in tremendous advantages to Northwest power consumers during the past few years.

The formation of public utility districts and cooperatives reached a high point in the years just before the war—1939, 1940, and 1941. In this period practically all private power companies operating in Oregon and Washington made heavy and rapid rate reductions, apparently in an effort to stem the pressure on the part of the people for ownership of their own distribution agencies.

According to figures from records in the offices of the Oregon and Washington Utility Commissioners, in the period from 1935 to and including the first four months of 1946, company rate reductions to customers totaled $13,224,508. More than $7,000,000, or slightly over half of the ten year total reduction was made in the three years of most intense public power activity. Cumulatively these savings have thus far amounted to about $51,000,000 to company customers. Most of them can be laid to public ownership competition which, in turn, was facilitated by the anti-monopoly language of the Bonneville Act.

In spite of this rate war, lowest retail rates in the region are still found on the public power systems. These systems have methodically extended service to sparsely settled communities to which private operators had denied service.

The public power movement has also taken out of business most of the poorly financed and poorly equipped private utility operations.

The few remaining large operators still have the cream of the business, and are still fighting vigorously. Every PUD election is hotly contested. In some cases, four or five elections are held in a single county before the public utility group makes its cause stick. The war has given the private companies a "war chest" in profits to wage a strong newspaper, radio and door to door anti-public power campaign. Currently they are attempting a merger program to further consolidate financial and political strength.

An example, typical in many ways of this grass roots fight for public ownership, is that of Linn County in Oregon. Economically, Linn is a typical Northwest community—farms and forests are its bread and butter.

The Linn County public ownership committee has put a public utilities district proposal on the local ballot four times during the past 10 years. The first time it was beaten 4,464 to 2,760. The second time it was defeated 3,863 to 3,008. On the third and fourth attempts, the last of which occurred in the May elections of this year, the margin decreased still further with a spread of less than 600 votes in each case.

On this last election, the Mountain States Power Company spent $13,929 or $4.42 for every vote cast in Linn County against public power. The public power people spent $3,206 or $1.30 for every vote cast for public power.

The farmers and business men on public power committees figure election campaigns are about the only way they have to educate the voters. As this is written the Linn County measure is scheduled to appear on the November ballot for a fifth time. They believe they should be able to beat the power company this time.

This year there are four such local public power elections on the November ballot already scheduled for the state of Oregon. Probably two or three more will appear before the ballots are closed.

In the state of Washington, the November public power fight is over Initiative No. 166, a "let the people vote" proposal which bears many hallmarks of power company origin. Initiative No. 166 would hedge the Washington PUD law in such a way that it would be very difficult for the commissioners of any PUD to acquire a power distribution system.

Without going into details, this Initiative might be broadly described as a measure which requires voter ratification on every major business move which might be undertaken by the directors of a public utility system. It would be as though the Congress were forced to submit every major bill it passes to a vote of the people. Nobody can run a business effectively on this basis, but the slogan "The The People Vote" sounds fair and democratic. Proponents of Initiative No. 166 have great hopes for it.

What the outcome of the November elections will show on this and the other public power proposals is one of the many puzzles of this politically puzzling year.

So much for the grass roots.

Now where does the federal government fit into this picture? The policy of Congress for a number of years has been toward the encouragement of public power in the Pacific Northwest through federal development of hydroelectric resources. There are many federal statutes, both organic and for appropriations, supporting this policy.

Legislation which affects the Northwest most vitally, and which has given the greatest single impetus to the public power movement, is the Bonneville Act, passed in 1937.

It provides that power generated at the Army's Bonneville dam, 40 miles from Portland on the Columbia river, shall be delivered to the Bonneville Administrator, an agent of the Department of the Interior, for sale at the lowest possible cost and over the widest possible area, in such a way as to prevent its monopoly by "limited groups," and in such a way as will particularly benefit rural and domestic consumers.

In order to carry out this purpose, the Bonneville Administrator is given a mandate to construct a transmission system to carry the power from its remote origins to market. The act further tells the Administrator that he is to sell power at wholesale to retail distributors, and that he must give publicly-owned distributors preference over privately-owned distributors.

Pursuant to that act, during the past seven years a large scale transmission system has been built, which carries about 2,000,000 horsepower from Bonneville and Grand Coulee dams to the consuming centers of the Northwest region.

The war and particularly preparation for it gave a tremendous boost to this federal portion of the public power program. Bonneville and Grand Coulee provided a munificent supply of electricity at very low cost—just at a period when most of the rest of the world could scarcely obtain power, let alone get it at a reasonable figure.

The light metals industry was a particular beneficiary of all this. Huge supplies of Columbia river power were delivered over the federal transmission system to new aluminum and other plants which supplied the raw metal for a third of the nation's planes and brought a spanking new basic industry to the Northwest.

But the war worked a hardship on the non-federal part of the public power program. The little power distributors, the PUDs, the municipal systems and the cooperatives, the "rural and domestic consumers" specifically blessed in the Bonneville Act could get no materials for the extension of their systems. Columbia River power, originally dedicated to the rural and domestic consumer and the small publicly-owned distributor, went instead into war ships, war planes and the large enterprise which produced them.

Mindful of the preference in the statute however, the federal government throughout the war made conscious provision for these small public agencies. No war industry was allowed to go without power. No utility was forced to "short" its war customers. But the Bonneville Administration refused to sign long-term contracts with any private utility company. Demand was made, time after time, for five, ten or twenty-year power contracts, but the Administration refused to execute such contracts unless the companies on their side agreed to keep the channels of public ownership open and pass on to the consumers the benefits of low cost hydro power made available to them. None of the companies would sign contracts containing effective provisions to make this possible. They have preferred to make a political fight against the federal transmission line program in the hope that the grass roots public power movement would be killed thereby.

As a result the companies got power on a day-to-day understanding only, but sufficient for their needs. They are still operating on such a basis without long term contracts.

When the war was over, Bonneville's heavy industrial power load was cut back for a few months. Government-owned light metals plants, the heaviest users, were shut down until they could be disposed of to new operators. This meant a temporary surplus of power supply at Bonneville and Grand Coulee dams.

By mid-summer of 1946, however, the defense plants began re-opening. As this is written, in September, the surplus at the two dams has all but disappeared and customers now in sight and under contract threaten to wipe it out entirely within a year and create what may amount to a severe shortage.

Just how serious this shortage of federal power will be depends pretty largely on a number of factors: new demands now unforseen; next season's precipitation; the extent to which oil burning generator plants can be operated (the Northwest has no local supply of oil).

Such a shortage will, of course, be bad for the region. Without adequate power supplies the Northwest's current industrial boom may be seriously slowed.

More particularly, the shortage will work a hardship on the private power companies. Under the Bonneville statute, the publicly-owned agencies have first chance at whatever power is available. The law makes them preferred customers. The large power-using industries, with which the Bonneville Administration has direct supply contracts on a long-term basis, will have the second preference.

The power companies, which have no long-term contracts, and which now get their supplies on a day-to-day basis only, are at the bottom of the list. If there is not enough federal power to go around, the power companies must run their own less economical standby steam generating plants and perhaps even add to their generating capacity with new construction.

The importance of the region's federal power supply, as distinct from privately generated power, is significant. Bonneville and Grand Coulee dams, through the Bonneville Power Administration, furnish roughly half of the power produced and used in Oregon, Washington, Idaho and western Montana. There is hardly a power company or other utility which does not depend in considerable measure upon the federal system. A few utilities can carry their own consumer load in a pinch; but to do so requires burning expensive oil or coal or scarce wood chips. During the war years they have come to depend, as a matter of course, upon hydro power from the two big federal dams. Like it or not, the Bonneville Administration has become, by common consent and sheer force of fact, the power supplier for the region.

It is apparent that from here on, for the federal government, there will be no escaping this responsibility. Even the largest private enterprise must think several times before it takes on the risk of constructing hydro dams at $100,000,000 or better apiece, or major transmission lines at four or five million dollars apiece.

Although the power companies in the early days often objected to construction of new dams as "subsidized power," they have less objection to the subsidy if they are the beneficiaries. Any utility, public or private, likes a large, dependable source of cheap electricity which can be had without grief or capital investment on its part.

This thrusting of responsibility for the region's supply upon the Bonneville administration makes any shortage of federal power—any delay in the construction of supply facilities by the Congress or the Administration—a serious matter.

It is worth repeating that a power shortage is a bad thing for the entire region—for development, industry, business, employment. The point to be made here is that it will be particularly bad for the utility companies.

All these factors are well recognized on both sides of the public power battlefield. They will add to the bitterness of the fight at the polls in November.

Meantime, ceretain aspects of the public power movement have attracted wide attention in neighboring western states. California has shown great interest in the number of industries attracted to her northern neighbors by low-cost power. The development of Shasta dam in the Central Valley Project has pointed up the public power issue there. Without a liberal statute, such as the Bonneville Act, there appears to be a poorer chance in the Central Valley for the type of low-cost power development which has meant so much in the Pacific Northwest. The huge private utility monopoly which dominates central and northern California, has, with considerable success, fought off the construction by the federal government of transmission lines which would assure delivery of Shasta power to California markets on a non-profit basis.

In spit of these factors, the Bonneville-Grand Coulee Development cannot help but have considerable bearing upon California's economic situation.

Both the Bureau of Reclamation, which operates the Central Valley project, and the Bonneville Administration are aware of numerous possible advantages to be served by a high capacity interconnection between the Columbia river system and the federal power supply at Shasta Dam.

On a long term basis, and regardless of local community rivalries, there is no question but that the economics of the Pacific Northwest and California are one and the same—the economics of the newer, relatively immature western coastal region which needs a broader industrialized economic base—economic opportunities to utilize its vast resources and provide full employment for its growing population.

Bonneville's research engineers have determined it is economically feasible to increase the transmission range of central station power from around 300 miles to around 500 miles. This would make it possible to send Bonneville and Grand Coulee power into northern California—a distinct advantage for both regions. The benefits of seasonal diversity thus obtained through interconnection would mean augmentation of northern California's inadequate power supply at a cost of only a small portion of the bountiful Pacific Northwest hydro resource which in turn would be firmed up at its transmission extremities by new southerly capacity.

A further point to be considered with the relationship between the states is the fact that river basins do not recognize state lines. The Klamath river basin in southern Oregon drains into the Pacific in California; yet, the people who live in the Klamath basin are more susceptible to benefit by Columbia river power than by Shasta power. Incidentally, the Klamath basin has important power prospects of its own to develop, which ultimately may provide a further linking of Pacific northwest and California power resources.

It is too soon to evaluate the full significance of these factors, but both California and Northwestern business leaders and government executives know they must be reckoned with before long.

The states of Idaho and Montana also have been eying the Columbia river development with steadily growing interest.

Western Montana, for many years, fought for approval of the Hungry Horse dam on the south fork of the Flathead river. As an isolated projejct, it was repeatedly termed as financially infeasible. But three years ago it became apparent that if Hungry Horse power were integrated with the Bonneville-Grand Coulee transmission system it could be made to pay out by providing much needed up-stream storage while assuring substantial down-stream power plant backing for broadening the transmission system into western Montana and in the Pacific northwest as a whole. This story was made to stick with the national administration in 1945, with the result that Hungry Horse dam is now authorized and has an appropriation for beginning construction. The Bonneville Administration has been made the marketing agent for Hungry Horse hydro power.

Other dams have also been authorized as the result of the early success of the Columbia river public power program. Preliminary work has already begun on McNary dam, on the main stem of the Columbia above Bonneville. Foster Creek dam, some distance downstream from Grand Coulee, also has been authorized. The Bonneville administration has been made the power marketing agent for these projects. In Idaho, four dams on the Snake river, the Columbia's principal tributary, also have been approved by the Congress, and the Bonneville administration has been made the marketing agent for power developed at these projejcts, as well as those to be developed in the great upper Snake basin.

Support for the expansion of this basin-wide development has come from many conservatives who, while distrusting "social planners" have been fascinated and convinced by the array of "banker facts," which shows that the program "pays out" in the best traditional business sense.

One key to the financial feasibility of such enormous undertakings on the part of the federal government is revealed in the payout formula developed for the Columbia basin project, the Bonneville project and the Bonneville Power Administration. A study made last year, based upon cost allocation reports for each of the projects and upon an independent commercial audit of the accounts of the Bonneville Power Administration, demonstrates conclusively that not only will the reimbursable portion of the entire investment be returned to the government within a prescribed fifty year period, but that the present "postage-stamp" wholesale rate of $17.50 per kilowatt year is fully adequate to meet all obligations.

The $17.50 rate (effective in all parts of the region), it was shown, will cover, with interest, all operation and maintenance expenses and reimbursable construction costs, including replacements, allocated to power. Construction costs allocated to irrigation will be returned within 50 years after water is first made available to each block of land in the Columbia basin project.

Revenues from the sale of Bonneville and Grand Coulee power by the power administration under existing regulations are required to repay (1) nearly $59,000,000 of the estimated completed cost of approximately $86,000,000 for Bonneville dam, (2) all of the cost of the Bonneville-Grand Coulee transmission system, representing a current investment of more than $83,000,000 and an estimated completed investment of $168,332,747 and (3) $382,547,068 of the $596,459,180 estimated ultimate cost of the Columbia Basin project. The Columbia Basin project amount of $382,547,068 includes $228,404,676 of irrigation costs to be repaid by power revenues and $35,519,577 for river regulation benefits to future downstream hydroelectric plants.

The Administration's power revenues of an estimated $1,863,000,000 over the repayment period will provide 93.07 per cent of the total funds required to repay reimbursable construction costs and operating costs, including interest and a reasonable margin of $160,000,000 for contingencies, on the Columbia river basin program embracing Bonneville dam, Grand Coulee dam and irrigation works and the transmission system.

The proposed billion dollar construction program by the Federal government spells the permanency of public power in the Northwest region. It provides a basic impetus to the public distribution of electricity in the grass roots communities.

The pace at which this last step in public ownership will travel, and the extent to which private utility operation survives, depends wholly upon the people themselves, on their awareness of their great stake in regional resource development, in their economic and political perspective and on their interest and their action at the polls.

Race Relations on The West Coast

BY LAURENCE I. HEWES, JR.

San Francisco, September 21

A FEW weeks ago in Vancouver, British Columbia, I participated at a Workshop on Interracial Problems, held under the joint auspices of the University of British Columbia and the Institute of Interracial Friendship of Vancouver. There, over one hundred Vancouver citizens, white and colored, from all kinds of professions and occupations, were at work on the task of raising the level of relations between the white population of British Columbia and its Chinese, Japanese, Negro, and native Indian population.

My trip to British Columbia from San Francisco began the day after a report was completed on some of the minority group problems in San Diego, California, principally those arising between whites and Negroes, Mexicans, and Chinese residents. Interwoven with this work were consultations and conferences with volunteer citizen groups in Los Angeles concerning housing for returning evacuees of Japanese ancestry and discussions with similar groups in San Francisco about two California general election proposals affecting minorities. Also at hand as part of the current day's work was a referral from a citizen interracial group at Spokane, requesting advice about general organizational problems. In addition, there were requests for aid from other Northwest communities, varying from invitations to speak, to questions on how to prepare and carry through an FEPC campaign. In addition, groups in Seattle and Oakland were negotiating for the conduct of an in-service training program on race relations for police officers. Meanwhile, time had to be found to help prepare and present a course of discussion on minority group relations for five hundred college students from California, Nevada, and Hawaii, at the Pacific Southwest Area YMCA-YWCA Conference at Asilomar, California. Thus, it is not hard to see that the awareness of the regional race relations interests and activities of the Pacific Coast is a natural result of my day's work.

LAURENCE I. HEWES, JR., formerly with the Farm Security Administration, is nowadays Regional Director on the West Coast for the American Council on Race Relations.

I feel that the causes for this intensive activity can only in part be considered as a Canadian, a North American, or even a Northern and Western trend toward a change in older patterns of race relations. In its drive and vigor the movement reflects influences peculiar to the Pacific Coast. In a larger sense, of course, the Pacific Coast interest in race relations has its roots deep in American tradition, and possibly the chief differences with other sections are of degree rather than of kind. Yet, there are real distinctions between the characteristic problems here and those of the East, South, and Midwest. For example, in addition to problems of Negro-white relations and of anti-Semitism, which are found throughout the country, there are on the Pacific Coast very specific issues affecting Japanese, Chinese, Armenians, Filipinos, native Indians, and Mexicans.

It is too soon to predict—awareness of chaotic conditions in national and international affairs and a drift toward reaction everywhere, plus native caution, preclude it—that under favorable conditions the entire Pacific Coast, from British Columbia to Mexico, an area two thousand miles long, with a population of over twelve million people, could achieve an integrated, regional program for racial justice, based on voluntary citizen effort. Nevertheless, there does exist today in Oregon, California, Washington, and British Columbia, the makings of such a program.

Partly this movement is only a manifestation of an underlying feeling of regional solidarity, which probably results from geographical location and a sense of separation from the Eastern portions of this continent. In other words, we feel that we cannot depend on New York or Chicago stimuli for social action. We have to generate our own impulses.

Of course too, we generate a good many native race baiters. In this respect, it is fortunate that we are not a very subtle people. We have not yet completely learned the arts of indirection and dissimulation. So, in a way, the race baiters among us on the West Coast, as the war came near, helped the development of an aggressive and militant program for improving race relations by "declaring themselves." Their program of race hatred was never cleverly disguised—the leaders, by their acts and statements, made the issue clear. Perhaps it had never occurred to them that the white supremacy doctrine had any important opposition. At any rate, they gave fair warning and an opportunity to plan and execute resistance. Their proposals were so irresponsible and extreme as to terrify and alienate some people, and to stimulate others into seeking means to defeat them. Frankly, many of us were frightened when we found that many fellow citizens sincerely identified "Americanism" and "democracy" with white supremacy and keeping weaker people "in their place." We were shocked to learn that in this concept, whites who held different views were promptly discounted as "nigger lovers," "Jap lovers," and Communists, even by some responsible union, business, and community leaders. The contribution of Carey McWilliams in clearly delineating and analyzing this aspect of our Pacific Coast culture was of great service to many of us. He showed us why and how these negative attitudes developed and gave us clues for counteraction.

These race baiting groups, to which we had paid so little heed, took the opportunity presented by Pearl Harbor to unite in persecuting the West Coast Japanese. We reaped the evil harvest of our negligence in the spring and summer of 1942. In frozen silence and in numb unbelief, we saw over 100,000 of our fellow residents hauled off under military guard to detention camps for the duration, solely because of their color and ancestry. Almost simultaneously (August, 1942) a group of young Mexican boys in Los Angeles were outrageously mistreated by law enforcement officers and later railroaded to prison under charges of murder. The violent racial bias of the police, and even members of our judiciary, overrode a professional sense of responsibility and respect for democratic tradition. A ranking member of the Southern California law enforcement force went so far as to publish a rationalization of anti-Mexican prejudice as a pseudo-official document. Again, in June, 1943, we witnessed the spectacle of several days of rioting in Los Angeles in which the police and some of the daily press gave at least tacit approval to the manhandling of young Mexican "zoot suiters." We were advised, at about the same time, of police brutality against young Mexicans and Negroes in San Diego.

Along with these events was the shaping up of the entire West Coast as a vast war industrial and military area. New relations and new social patterns literally swamped, by their speed and the impact of the human mass, local social relations, and even the pattern of municipal government, in community after community. Villages of 1500 became towns of 15,000, and in some places, where 15,000 people had lived, 40,000 attempted to reside. Workers from all over the country came to man war industries. Among them were Negroes.

Negroes before the war, except for a group of less than 50,000 in Los Angeles, were represented by very small groups in Pacific Coast cities. Less than five thousand Negroes lived in San Francisco, and Portland had about 1800. The San Francisco Negro population had jumped, by 1943, to above 18,000. Portland, Seattle, Tacoma, Oakland, and other communities experienced similar increases. Naturally social friction and a rising racial tension marked these changes. More conservative whites discussed the introduction of Southern, segregated institutions, while more liberal groups favored an opportunity to provide the country with a demonstration of new and more equitable patterns of Negro-white relations in American communities.

It should be noted that within the newcomer group were able and sophisticated Negro spokesmen. For the first time, the colored minority groups of the West Coast had spokesmen who clearly envisaged the problem of racial discrimination and were able to express their ideas in speech and writing without a language handicap. It is to their credit that they did not confine their interest to Negroes alone, but in a sense became spokesmen and advocates for the entire colored, minority group.

But these events might have remained as local community changes had it not been for the regionalizing influence of elements of the West Coast labor movement, chiefly the CIO. This organization's favorable policy toward interracial solidarity was in contrast to the white supremacy doctrine which many segments of Pacific Coast organized labor have upheld since 1870. In the more skilled trades, particularly the metal trades of the AFL, an exclusionist policy toward minority groups had been traditional. The CIO completely reversed this policy and vigorously maintained the right to work regardless of race, creed, or color. This national policy was transmitted with unusual effectiveness from San Diego Bay to Vancouver Harbor. While undoubtedly good business for the CIO, this was also important in developing a regional interchange, among labor and liberal groups, of experience and methods for improving minority-majority group relations. In any analysis of the present regional tempo of race relations work, the war and post-war efforts of the CIO and some AFL units on the Pacific Coast in behalf of racial solidarity should be ranked as important influences.

To the influences making for a regional structure should be added the work of the regional staff of the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practice. Labor unions, race relations groups, military officials, and employers were all affected by the work of this agency. In the case of the larger war plants with units scattered widely on the Coast, the public FEPC hearings involved several communities on the Coast. Thus, one hearing recited incidents of racial discrimination and community action covering a number of other communities. For example, the two Kaiser Company hearings in Portland, Oregon, in November, 1943, and October, 1944, also concerned shipyards at Richmond, California, and Los Angeles. The International Association of Boilermakers held contracts at the same places. In addition, several regional policies of the Federal Government were involved. Consequently, the public at Portland, while sitting in on a discussion of Portland incidents, were also exposed to a recital of similar situations elsewhere on the Coast.

A recapitulation of the specific West Coast influences which might in part explain the regional interconnectedness of the efforts in behalf of tolerance and justice for minority groups would include (1) generally held feelings of regional solidarity, (2) a reaction against Axis racist propaganda and local race baiting, (3) shame and guilt over the Japanese evacuation, (4) reaction to the anti-Mexican excesses of the police, the judiciary, and the press of Southern California in connection with the Sleepy Lagoon murder case and the "zoot suit" incidents, (5) the impact of a region-wide war industrial expansion and the in-migration of large numbers of Negroes, (6) the region-wide efforts of the CIO in behalf of equal treatment on the job regardless of race, creed, color, or national origin, and (7) the work of the West Coast Regional Staff of the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practice. All these directly and indirectly tended to create a common, regional impulse among progressive people to raise the level of minority-majority group intercourse.

It might be said that this impulse was the incidental and fortuitous result of a combination of factors. It might have "just happened that way" out here on the Coast. Hence, the story would not be complete without a discussion of the planned and directed work of groups and agencies deliberately seeking to create the instrument of organization for the promotion of a better pattern of human relations.

Organization

If we distinguish between racial organizations and interracial organizations, then the organized interracial activities of the Pacific Coast and the public interest in it were at a low ebb in 1942. Some work of an intercultural and interracial character was carried on, particularly among religious groups and social welfare agencies. A similar situation was even more true of the San Francisco International Institute. The American Friends Service Committee was active in this field in several communities. The Pacific Coast branches of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People carried on work in all the principal communities, but due to the failure of white participation, a good deal of their work was of a strictly racial character. Racial welfare work was carried on among Negroes by Urban League branches in Los Angeles and Seattle. The Japanese American Citizens League had branches throughout California and the Northwest, which disappeared at the time of the Japanese evacuation. Filipino and Chinese organizations were almost exclusively confined to their own people. The Mexican group had practically no organizations whatever, although some efforts were made to achieve this by the Southern California Council on Inter-American Affairs, and in 1942, an organization called the Mexican American Movement was created in Los Angeles.

Beginning late in 1943, startling changes occurred. Voluntary citizens groups sprang up in a number of large communities. The San Francisco Bay Area created a Bay Area Council Against Discrimination. Early in 1944, official committees on race relations began to be appointed by mayors and boards of supervisors in Seattle, Los Angeles, Los Angeles County, San Francisco, Oakland, San Diego, and Fresno. In Los Angeles and San Francisco, Councils for Civic Unity, composed of interested groups and citizens, were established. Urban League chapters were established in Portland, Oregon, and San Francisco in 1945. A list of a few other representative cities and towns in the region where citizen groups have joined in this work should include both Vancouver and Victoria, British Columbia; Vancouver, Tacoma, and Spokane, Washington; Santa Rosa, Berkeley, Oakland, Sacramento, Stockton, Monterey, Long Beach, San Bernardino, Santa Ana, San Diego, Riverside, and Pasadena in California. The year 1945 saw the development of a mass organization—the Los Angeles Mobilization for Democracy—which conducted a militant program of agitation against Gerald L. K. Smith and assisted in conducting a successful recall election against a City Council member who publicly espoused the Smith cause.

The universities and colleges of the area have provided workshops, institutes, and group discussion facilities on race relations, in conjunction with such professional groups as the Bureau for Intercultural Education and the American Council on Education. These have been held in 1944, 1945, and 1946, at the University of California, Stanford University, and Mills College, among others. San Francisco and Portland volunteer groups have initiated and helped to produce valuable, published, research materials: (1) The Negro War Worker in San Francisco, with a research staff under the direction of Dr. Charles S. Johnson of Fisk University, (2) The Negro in Portland, by a committee of the Portland City Club. The public school systems of Portland, Los Angeles, and San Diego have been stimulated to introduce intercultural training for both teachers and pupils.

Along with these organization developments are several related events significant of the region's general attitude. After a long fight, the Supreme Court of California forbade the establishment of discriminatory Jim Crow locals by trade unions in the James vs. Marinship Case (January, 1945). Again, in the fall of 1944, the California Appellate Court reversed the conviction of twelve Mexican American youths found "guilty" of murder in the Sleepy Lagoon case, but only after they had spent long months in prison. Both these events were preceded by much public discussion and agitation. In San Diego, over vigorous opposition, a qualified Negro was appointed to teach school in a predominantly white neighborhood. The ubiquitous real estate restrictive covenant has been widely condemned. With wide citizen support, successful resistance by colored property owners to restrictive covenant litigation has been accomplished in San Francisco and Los Angeles. Liberal government officials have achieved a degree of non-segregation in public housing, notably in Seattle, Berkeley (California), and Los Angeles, although citizen pressure has failed to bring housing officials to this policy in other localities, notably in San Francisco and Portland. Active campaigns have been conducted, and with considerable success, against "White trade only" practices by storekeepers, restaurants, soda fountains, and bars. On several occasions, metropolitan police officials have had to make lengthy explanations of their actions when colored offenders have been unfairly or brutally treated. Nevertheless, in some communities, police injustice and brutality to minority group members still continues. The dilatory tactics of courts and police officials in several cases of outrage against persons of Japanese ancestry in 1945 were brought to official notice by citizen groups, and remedial action was had in some instances.

Today public officials on the Pacific Coast, except in the smaller rural communities, cannot hope to escape challenge if a suspicion of racial bias colors their official acts or statements. This contrasts distinctly with much of the earlier history of our region. Several school officials have recently been so challenged in efforts to create or to operate segregated public schools. The same challenge has been encountered by editors of important metropolitan journals. Some have adopted a more progressive editorial policy; others have taken the opposite tack.

Political developments have had an important bearing on race relations on the West Coast. These include the presentation of State Fair Employment Practice Legislation to the Legislatures of Oregon, Washington, and California. These measures were defeated, but only after a thorough airing of the issues. Again, efforts were made during 1945 in Seattle, San Francisco, and Los Angeles to obtain passage of a Fair Employment Practice city ordinance. These were defeated. Again, in each of the three Western states, the issue of the racial attitude of the candidates for election has been raised, notably in the 1944 and 1946 campaigns and in several instances with good effect.

Insistence by citizen groups on the importance of sound government racial policies has met ready response from a considerable number of public figures. Senator Wayne Morse of Oregon and Attorney General Robert Kenny of California have met the challenge of race baiters in public statements and official acts. Congresswoman Helen Gahagan Douglas of Los Angeles recently named a Negro as a candidate for appointment to West Point. Also, at her own expense, she distributed a splendid statement analyzing the work of minority groups in the armed forces during the war. Representative Hugh DeLacy of Seattle has made repeated efforts and statements in favor of racial justice. Several other political leaders and elected officials have good records in this respect. They have received commendation and valuable support for this policy.

Regional Planning

The recital of these events, even in conjunction with a description of underying regionalizing influences, lacks completeness as an explanation of the developing regional awareness of race problems. These, in part, have also been the result of deliberate planning.

Among efforts to create solid regional opinion favorable to minority groups was the outstanding work of the Pacific Coast Committee on American Principles and Fair Play, formed in January, 1943, in San Francisco, to disseminate on the West Coast factual information about the Japanese, who had been evacuated from the Pacific Coast. This voluntary organization recruited its membership, solicited its sponsorship, and distributed its literature widely throughout Oregon, Washington, and California. Its leaders visited major communities as spokesmen for tolerance and understanding of the former Japanese residents. Local organizations, affiliated with the regional organization, were created. Other groups soon found their efforts and effectiveness was reinforced by the maintenance of this affiliation. In the fall of 1944 and the spring of 1945, these efforts were aided by a specific organizing drive in the smaller communities of California. This was conducted jointly by the Pacific Coast Fair Play Committee and the American Council on Race Relations. New chapters were created, and a considerable framework of organization resulted. These groups did yeomen work in defending the returning Japanese against race-baiting outrages and hostile local authorities.

Since the Fair Play Committee had only limited objectives—those of preparing the Pacific Coast for the return of the Japanese at the end of war—its existence terminated on December 31, 1945. It had demonstrated that the work of community groups could be greatly strengthened if the services of a central clearing house nature were available. Many local organizations, particularly in their initial stages, needed encouragement and advice at the regional level.

Another agency, the American Council on Race Relations, opened a Pacific Coast Regional office at San Francisco in March, 1944. Its purpose was to provide communities, citizen groups, and govenment agencies on the Coast with a technical and professional consulting service in all kinds of racial matters. It also proposed to develop a Pacific Coast Clearing House for community organizations with similar interests in interracial problems.

In view of parallel interests, the Fair Play Committee and the American Council on Race Relations cooperated in plans for a successor organization to the Fair Play Committee. The new organization was to be broadened to include all types of interracial and intercultural relations. Consultations were held with many local community organizations. Finally, in February, 1946, at Fresno, The California Council for Civic Unity was created. Later incorporated under California law, this state-wide, interracial organization was established by and for citizen groups in communities all over California. The CCU now serves about fifty groups in all the major communities of the state and in many of its smaller cities and towns. The member groups cooperate in maintaining the state organization and receive service from it. An important function is the exchange of information about techniques and methods. While The California Council for Civic Unity confines its work to California, the work of the American Council on Race Relations extends throughout the region. A large amount of its work is likewise of a clearing house nature, including advice on techniques, informational materials, and personal consultation.

An example of this work was the development of techniques for training law enforcement officers in race relations. This field was first subjected to research investigation in a project carried on jointly at Chicago by the American Council on Race Relations and The International City Managers Association in 1944. Subsequently, in 1945, the American Council on Race Relations was invited by the City of Richmond, California, to conduct a race relations training program for its police officers. Such a program was carried on in September, 1945. Out of this experience, the American Council, in cooperation with Attorney General Kenny of California, proposed a training manual for police officers. From this developed an official publication of the California Department of Justice, A Guide to Race Relations for Police Officers, published in the spring of 1946. Based on this experience and material, the American Council on Race Relations has undertaken a national program of police training.

There is now no reason for any law enforcement agency to resort, through ignorance, to the old-fashioned, brutal methods of dealing with minority groups. Furthermore, the constituent citizen groups in communities throughout the Pacific Coast—members of The California Council for Civic Unity and of the Pacific Coast Clearing House of the American Council on Race Relations—are prepared to make, and have made, suggestions to law enforcement groups as to specific methods of handling minority-majority group problems.

All our experience is so recent, so untried, and so tentative in many respects that we cannot yet say this region is a happy or secure place for minority groups to live. Part of the challenge of our life here is that social patterns are not fixed. No one group has achieved full control, nor has any group yet accepted a socially inferior position. Change and transition are the constant social factors.

The liberal forces of California have succeeded, after two defeats at the hands of an ineffective State Legislature, in placing the issue of Fair Employment Practice squarely before the voters on the November, 1946, general election ballot. This was achieved by obtaining nearly 300,000 signatures on a state-wide initiative petition, by volunteer workers.

The voters of California at last will have the opportunity of expressing themselves on a crucial issue involving minority groups. After this decision has been reached, it will perhaps be possible to forecast modestly the outlines of race relations on the Pacific Coast and to form a still tentative judgment of the more permanent value of the foregoing activities and organizations.

Population and Politics in California

BY VARDEN FULLER

San Francisco, September 21

FOR every three Democrats in California there are only two Republicans. But in the June primaries, California Democrats nominated as their gubernatorial candidate not Robert W. Kenny, the party's choice and a registered Democrat, but Earl Warren, the Republican national keynoter for 1944. Having cross-filed and won the nomination on both major party tickets, incumbent Warren is assured of election for his second term. How did this happen? Do Democrats characteristically vote Republican in California?

The question is larger than the 1946 primaries for the governorship. It is part of a bigger question—a question of control over state politics, control of one of the largest Congressional delegations, and state and local legislation of far-reaching significance.

A Shifting Political Structure

California was not always Democratic. In 1924 and 1928, when there were approximately two million registered voters in California, roughly two-thirds were Republicans. Between 1928 and 1932 the Republican party lost in margin of registration but still held slightly over half of the total in 1932. By 1936 the Democrats had gained the majority and held 58% of the total registration. Since 1936 the picture has remained one of a clear-cut Democratic majority in which the Democratic and Republican registrations have remained approximately in the ratio of three to two. Minor parties in California have never held any signicant proportion of the total registration and the proportion of voters declining to state a party affiliation has also been relatively small. The issue of control is therefore clearly between the two major parties.

In more complete detail the proportional structure of political party affiliation in California is as follows (percentage of total registered voters) :

Year	Democratic	Republican	Minor Parties	Declining to state
1924	22	65	2.5	10.5
1928	25.5	67.5	1.5	5.5
1932	40	54	1	5
1936	58	38	.5	3.5
1940	60	36	1	3
1944	58.5	37.5	.5	3.5
1946	58	37	.5	4.5

This remarkable shift from a Republican to a Democratic majority is the more striking when looked at in another way. Between 1924 and 1944 (while the population of California approximately doubled), Republican registration increased only about 30% while Democratic registration increased by six times. Such a spectacular shift in political affiliation cannot, of course, be attributed to a change in attitude on the part of a stabilized citizenry. Rather, this shift is closely correlated with the rapid growth of the California population and its changing composition and characteristics.

The Population Growth and Its Sources

California has always had a dynamic population. It is a population to which ideas and attitudes, some homogenous, some conflicting, have been added by newcomers migrating into the state. The political response of such a population is inevitably different from that of a stable population in which political preconceptions, ideas, and loyalties are handed from father to son. As result of its rapid growth, California has risen from the twenty-first most populous state in 1900 to eighth in 1920, fifth in 1940, and third today As indicated by the following figures, the number of people in California doubled between 1900 and 1920 and doubled again between 1920 and 1940.

Year	Population (In millions)
1920	3.4
1930	5.7
1940	6.9
1945*	8.8

*Excluding armed forces overseas.

This rapid growth in population has meant that in each presidential election somewhere between one-tenth and one-third of the participating voters were voting in California for the first time.

In each decade since 1900 only 15% of the population growth has been attributable to the excess of births over deaths; the principal source of population growth which accounts for approximately 85% is migration into the state. Back in the 1870's, New York was the principal state from which California's migrants came; thereafter, until 1930, the center of origin shifted to Illinois and surrounding states. Since 1930 the center of origin of migration to California has shifted southward and westward. Oklahoma contributed more people to California during the '30's than did any other state. The southwest area, extending from Missouri through Texas and including Oklahoma, has continued through the war period to supply the major portion of the migration to California.

Notwithstanding the popular concept of California as being a place of retirement, young adults, particularly those in their twenties and thirties, have always been numerically much more important. During the war it was the able-bodied young worker who was most able to pick up and move to a war job in California. Likewise the depression and drought refugee migration of the '30's brought with it largely the young who were mobile and adaptable. Since the war, migration to California has continued and it is apparently made up, to a very large extent, of ex-service men who are attracted to the state because of favorable experiences during their military service.

Migrants to California have always settled principally in the urban areas. This was particularly true of its wartime population growth. California is now one of the most urban states in the nation.

Migration and Political Affiliation

It can scarcely be questioned that the drastically changed balance of power between the two major parties is peculiarly and directly related to rapid growth through migration. This was recognized by the Chamber of Commerce in 1938. In its publication, "California, Magazine of the Pacific" appeared an article entitled "Migrants Are Becoming Voters—And What Will They Vote For? More Relief, More Pensions." The article concludes: " 'Looks to me,' said a valley business man, 'as if someone, somewhere, was packing our relief rolls and our voting lists with white trash. Most of them come from safely Democratic states; in spite of the summer's registration, California is still to be classed as doubtful. Add two and two under those conditions and you don't get merely four—you get 1940.' " An earlier article had concluded: "for before long the newcomers will be voters in this state—voters with perhaps a balance of power for even more relief than they can get today. That's something to think about.' "

The increase in number of people would in itself probably have caused a considerable re-grouping of political strength, but the origin and characteristics of the migrants have intensified the changes that might have otherwise occurred through population growth alone. A rapid increase in population means, first of all, that political leaders must be alert to recruit new support at each election. The origin of California's migrants, particularly during the past decade, is traditionally Democratic territory. The change in ratios of Democratic and Republican registration indicates that these migrants continue to register in the name of their traditional party. The challenging question is why, after having traditionally registered, the political behavior of these new citizens becomes so untraditional.

These Democratic newcomers are not necessarily thorough-going liberals. They were overwhelmingly behind Roosevelt and his efforts and programs to aid the common man and they will support any program which they can understand and which promises aid to common people. Certainly their ideals and objectives are not the same as those of the Republican party leadership in California. Regardless of recent political behavior, this group unquestionably constitutes a large mass of embryonic or potential liberals.

For many years prior to 1938, California had Republican governors, largely Republican Congressional delegations, and was sometime found in the Republican column at presidential elections. The Republicans to a very large degree were able to utilize successfully their own majority in party affiliation. In contrast to this, the recent years of a pronounced Democratic majority have been years of political confusion and irregularity.

With so marked a majority in Democratic registration, it is clear that in any state-wide election no Republican could be elected to office solely on his own ticket; any Republican elected to office in a state-wide election has to be elected by Democrats. By what means do California Republicans persuade Democrats to elect Republicans?

Disenfranchisement by Confusion

When such a large proportion of the voters participating in any major election are new voters, the opportunities for developing fixed relations, alliances, and machines should be considerably less than in a stable population where the only new voters are those who come of age. The advantage of incumbency should therefore be at a minimum in California. This should be true not only because political affiliations built up in one campaign cannot carry through to the newly arrived contingent voting in a succeeding election, but also because "standing on one's record" should be unpersuasive to a voter who has lived in Oklahoma, Missouri, or Illinois while most of the "record" was made. But in California, as elsewhere, incumbents usually stand on their records, and challengers, lacking the skill or imagination to draw incumbents into constructive analyses of the real problems of today and tomorrow, also campaign largely on the incumbent's record. The newly arrived voter, finding in campaigns based upon the past little that is real or vital to him, is confused and will be inclined to refrain from voting or will vote indifferently.

The above discussion may seem to offer the conclusion that new voters, not being offered a realistic and informed choice either of candidates or platform, will manifest their confusion or indifference by merely voting traditionally. If such were the case the Democrats would have a very substantial advantage. But the political structure or California is well equipped to take care of any such possibility. This is done by means of a keen-edged tool of confusion. And that is cross-filing in primary elections. Cross-filing and its claimed advantages and unsuspected results could well be the subject of an informed analysis; however, here we shall have to be content merely to note that by means of this political technique such confusions are made possible as occurred in June when Earl Warren, Republican keynoter of 1944, appeared at the top of the Democratic primary ballot designated merely EARL WARREN, GOVERNOR OF CALIFORNIA. ROBERT W. KENNY, ATTORNEY GENERAL, appeared in different locations on the two ballots. Even for this major office and for these two well-known men, this device meant the influencing of many votes. For less important offices and less well-known men, many newcomers to California will vote for the first candidate listed on the ballot and this may prove decisive. The primary election in California may be headed toward about the same decisiveness that it has in the South, though for a very different reason.

Cross-filing on the ticket of the opposing party is effected simply by obtaining the endorsements of a mere handful of registered voters of that party. Such a meager requirement to qualify as a candidate of both parties thereafter entitles the would-be office holder throughout the primary election to represent himself as a non-partisan or as the choice of both major parties. Thus by confusion and misrepresentation virtually all of the normal advantages of incumbency are attained.

By methods supplementary to those discussed above, the vested-interest minority in California has found numerous clever ways of retaining a goodly measure of political control even in the face of an unsympathetic majority among the electorate. Business men in California, no less and perhaps more than elsewhere, try to influence political action, for they know that political power and economic power are only different aspects of the same force.

While one not in the confidence of the politico-business inner circle can only speculate on the strategy as developed by them, a definite pattern seems clear from their observable actions. That everyone among the privileged business group was a party to the maneuvering of political opinion, or that many were even aware of what was going on, or that a plan was formally adopted and followed without error, is not asserted; but it does seem evident beyond reasonable doubt that there was a general political strategy among the Big Business community, and that definite plans were formulated and followed with fair success.

A first and basic tactic is the basis of electing State Senators, which Paul Taylor describes more fully elsewhere in this issue. By this means, an effective veto power is placed in the hands of a small minority of the electorate. This minority includes little representation of organized labor or of urban groups who might be able effectively to influence elections. By narrowing down the number of people who must be influenced, and by excluding organized groups from among them, Big Business considerably simplified its problem of control. The organization of the State Senate in California has led to the curious situation of urban Big Business trying—and fairly successfully—to control rural politics. And it has lead to urban-rural alliances of entrenched economic interests opposing labor unions and unorganized rural people, rather than to a pronounced urban-rural split such as exists in Illinois or New York.

The vested-interest minority has not hesitated to support a reactionary candidate, irrespective of party affiliation. In California, as in other states, the Democrats contain many diverse groups and interests. This, together with the cross-filing system, produces a situation which is ideal for candidates professing one set of views and actually holding holding another.

There is only one regulary liberal major newspaper in California, plus a few others liberal on some issues. The "slanting" of news is clever and interesting for a sophisticated observer to watch, but wholly confusing to the uninformed. The "job" done on Bob Kenny in 1946 by the conservative press in California was truly clever and highly effective. Without ever getting libelous, it surely left no doubt in the unsophisticated mind that he was getting his daily orders direct from the Kremlin. Many people in radio are liberal, and there are a few thoroughly liberal stations, but the majority of radio station management is no more liberal than most of the newspapers.

And so are employed the various techniques of confusion and opinion formation. By their employment and the failure of progressive challengers to offset them by consolidation of the liberal majority on programs affecting vital problems of the day, the vested-interest minority retains effective control. A substantial segment of the California electorate is disenfranchised by a deliberate policy of confusion. True, these voters are allowed at the polls, but they are deprived the opportunity to cast an intelligent ballot.

Continued migration into California is in prespect. Such migration will undoubtedly help to retain a substantial Democratic majority. But the Democratic party will have to adopt more effective strategy if the potentialities of this Democratic majority and of the determinative block of inherently liberal votes which it represents are to be realized.

Political Trends in Colorado

BY CHARLES A. GRAHAM AND DUNCAN CLARK

Denver, September 20

DEAN M. GILLESPIE, Denver's Republican, rotund and reactionary representative in Congress, should have eaten a less-than-hearty breakfast on the morning of last Sept. 11. The big news that morning was that John A. Carroll, liberal Democratic attorney who stands for just about everything that Gillespie dislikes, had won a smashing victory in the primary the day before and was ready for the main event against Gillespie himself. Gillespie, who came back from Bikini with the remark that the atomic bomb was a "helluva thing," should have considered Carroll's primary victory somewhat in the same vein.

Carroll's strong showing in the primary meant several things. It was the first strong indication that a liberal Democratic upsurge, comparable to that which provided backing for the state's greatest senator, the late Edward P. Costigan, is at work in Colorado—a state which has not had a Democratic governor since 1938 and which returned a majority of about 50,000 for Dewey in 1944.

CHARLES A. GRAHAM, formerly regional director of the War Labor Board in Denver, was the Democratic nominee for Congress in the Denver district in 1944. He is an outstanding Colorado liberal. DUNCAN CLARK is a newspaper reporter in Denver.

It meant the Carroll, a liberal Democrat, has a good chance of beating a Gillespie, a conservative Republican, in the race for Congress, and that W. Lee Knous, another liberal Democrat who is the Democratic candidate for governor, has a good chance of beating Leon Lavington, a conservative Republican. In Colorado, where the only Democrats who have been able to stay in office are hard to distinguish from Republicans, that's news.

But something is stirring in Colorado. New forces are at work, and new people are beginning to count. A lot of Coloradans, from the industrial worker in Denver to the dirt farmer on the Eastern plains or the stockman on the fertile Western Slope, are sick and tired of the fumbling, inept record of the GOP state administration during the past four years. Veterans have come home to find the state making no effort to solve their problems. In Denver, where the industrial population is concentrated, few people have forgotten Gillespie's opposition to price control and federal housing and his support of the Hobbs and Case bills.

Although the race between Carroll and Thomas W. Nevin was the only important contest in the Sept. 10 primary, the election was significant. Carroll was opposed by strong machine elements in districts where the heaviest Democratic vote occurs. But a new political element, composed principally of veterans, Young Democrats and union members, got out the vote.

The primary also indicated that a smear campaign won't work in the general election in November. Nevin attempted to pin a Communist label on the Carroll campaign, but too many Denverites knew Carroll's record in public life and in two wars to believe he is a Communist or anything like one.

Carroll, one of the group of Young Democrats who formed the nucleus of the Costigan movement more than a decade ago, recently returned from service as an AMG major in Africa, Italy, Corsica and France. He is a former assistant U. S. attorney, Denver district attorney and regional OPA attorney. He stands on the general Roosevelt program, and is pledged for civilian control of atomic energy, continuance of OPA, veteran's housing and protection of the rights of labor.

Knous, the Democratic candidate for governor, is a canny politician who combines liberal principles with a strong sense of political realism. During his term on the State Supreme Court, he has served as arbiter in several national labor disputes, gaining a wide reputation for acumen and impartiality. He hails from the Western Slope, where good roads are a livelier issue than international co-operation and where Denver sometimes is viewed with distrust as an effete Eastern metropolis. Knous knows the problems of the predominantly Republican areas outside of Denver, and his knowledge will bring him votes.

One of the strongest assets of both Carroll and Knous, however, is the Republican record during the two administrations of the incumbent governor, John C. Vivian.

Vivian writes pleasant light verse for the "Conning Tower" in the Chicago Tribune, but his political actions have failed to scan. In a state accustomed to action and color in politics, he has fiddled and fumbled with every issue, even when inaction added to his troubles.

GOP bigwigs repudiated Vivian when it became apparent that he was one of the party's greatest liabilities. Shortly after he was snubbed by being given only second-high designation at the state Republican assembly, Vivian withdrew. This left the high designee, State Treasurer Leon Lavington, with a clear field in the primary.

GOP leaders hope by this strategy to be able to forget Vivian's record along with Vivian. Colorado voters, however, need some time to forget the inadequacies of Vivian's administration, and Democrats, on the other hand, are hammering hard on the theme that Lavington is "another Vivian."

Lavington, while he probably is a stronger candidate and better administrator than Vivian, seems to be cut from the same political cloth. Already he has made a bad blunder in what began as a laudable attempt to build some kind of a platform from the platitudes produced by the state assembly. The platform won't be adopted until late in September, and Democratic wags have jabbed where it hurts by explaining that GOP now means "Guess Our Platform." Some Republican office-seekers have been miffed at secrecy concerning formation of the platform. Republicans also offended labor by the appointment of State Sen. Arthur H. Laws, a strong supporter of the "Labor Peace" bill, as chairman of the platform committee's sub-committee on labor. This appointment was hastily withdrawn, but withdrawal did not make amends for the original mistake.

While troubles have beset the usually close-knit Republican organization, the Democratic party, for several years bedeviled by conflict between liberal and conservative elements, has attained a surprising degree of working unity. Sen. Ed Johnson, who has displayed a terrific survival value for a Democrat in a Republican state, has cleared the political atmosphere by his recent announcement that he will not seek re-election at the end of his present term.

Few Democrats believe that Big Ed is out of politics. Even if his office-seeking days are over, which is far from certain despite his projected retirement, he will remain a power in the state.

Johnson and Eugene Cervi, the liberal and outspoken state chairman of the Democratic party, have carried on a vocal and bitter feud for years, but now they appear to have an at least temporary peace treaty. Despite the present amity, their beliefs are poles apart and each loves a good rough-and-tumble political fight.

Even though Johnson and Cervi, and the elements they represent, may collide again in the future, Johnson has announced he will stump the state for Knous this fall. His influence will be great. An if the collision comes, a stronger liberal Democratic wing should be prepared to tackle Ed Johnson on his own ground.

Denver normally is Democratic. Despite Gillespie's strength with business elements, he can be beaten in a heavy election characterized by party unity. Two new organizations—a lively group of Young Democrats and a group of educators, scientists and other professional men forming the Rocky Mountain Council for Social Action—already have an organization reaching down into most of the city's 407 precincts. These two organizations have provided a rallying point for liberals who heretofore have felt almost without a party in the state, and also have attracted to the political arena a number of persons whose previous interest in politics was largely academic.

Coloradans are disturbed by the state's disgraceful health record, spotlighted by the current polio epidemic. They are tired of bouncing along on an outmoded highway system. They aren't pround of the fact schools are closed in many rural towns because of lack of funds and low pay scales prevailing throughout the state. These state issues have given Democrats a readymade platform and a fistful of ammunition to use against the GOP.

There won't be any Democratic landslide in Colorado this year. Incumbent Republican congressmen in districts outside of Denver may well stay in office, and the state legislature probably will remain predominantly Republican. Election of Carroll and Knous, however, would mean a major victory for liberal Democrats in the state.

Whatever happens in November, there is no doubt that forces buried for more than a decade are gaining strength in Colorado. Industrialization has rocked the complacency of Denver and added a new element to the population. Veterans, bitter because of lack of housing and economic opportunity, are tired of being paid off in promises. The state, proud of its Western independence but still dominated by Eastern interests, still weak in labor organization but with a history of bitter struggle for labor's rights, may be entering a new phase in its political and social development.

Report on Utah Politics

BY FRANK H. JONAS

Logan, Utah, September 14

EARLIER in the year it seemed that the three members of Utah's four-man congressional delegation who are up for reelection would find some tough sledding. An effort was made to hold these men—Senator Abe Murdock, and Congressmen Walter Granger and J. Will Robinson—responsible for the loss of Bushnell Hospital, a twelve-million dollar white elephant located in Granger's First District. But the sale of the giant Geneva steel plant to its war-time operator, U. S. Steel, has caused the voters to forget about the loss of Bushnell Hospital and has helped to pull the incumbent liberal Democrats out of a potentially bad hole.

Operation of the Geneva steel plant will add significantly to the labor vote in Utah in the future. Already important, the labor vote has been growing by leaps and bounds in four counties: Weber (food processing, livestock, and transportation in Ogden); Salt Lake City (with about one-third of the state's population); Provo, with its iron and steel mills; and Tooele, with its nearby mines and smelters. The entire Utah delegation has had the labor vote since 1932 and will retain it in the coming election.

DR. FRANK H. JONAS, a member of the faculty of Utah State College, has written an interesting account of Mormonism.

Labor has had rough going in Utah, for the most part, and only came into its own during the New Deal. Interpreting its democratic principle of "free agency" in an undemocratic manner to mean the open shop, the Mormon Church has frowned on labor unions. As a result, it has lost much of its influence and has indirectly aided labor in solidifying its ranks. It is significant that the Mormon Church has not exercised a vital influence in Utah politics since 1932. The hierarchy of the church, about 90 per cent Republican, has tended to ally the church with the big financial and industrial interests at the top of the production scale rather than with the working man and his weekly pay check. It should be noted, however, that the church still retains considerable influence in local politics in the rural districts. Even this influence is not as great as it was in former years. Repudiated by the church authorities in 1940, Governor Maw derives his greatest strength from this rural districts by emphasizing old-age pensions and anti-utility legislation.

Utah's political situation is geographically somewhat different from that of its neighboring states. Salt Lake City is the center of political activity for the state. Utah's physical geography is dominated by the Wasatch Range, running from southern Idaho to the southern boundary of Utah near Cedar City. In the pockets of this range are to be found the typical Mormon villages and towns. With its pleasant valleys and all-important streams, this range forms a natural physio-geographical area and constitutes the basis for the cultural unity, stamped with a singularly religious character, of the region. Since modern transportation facilities have only accentuated the roads that lead to Salt Lake City, no diversions have thus far succeeded in breaking this unity. In Utah political lines of influence and control run to the capitol—lines with their early marks of religious implications, backgrounds, and traditions.

While Geneva will do much for Utah industrially, and labor will profit from it, the liberal forces in the state must recognize that water still constitutes the basis for a sound economy. Additional water must somehow be brought to the farming districts. The great water and hydro-electric potential of the Colorado and the Green Rivers must be developed. With the power that might thus be generated, the great phosphate deposits and other mineral resources could be brought into use for the farmer and the manufacturer. Someday another TVA must be brought to Utah.

In brief, present indications point to the re-election of Senator Abe Murdock and Messrs. Granger and Robinson. Labor will support them and labor holds the balance of voting power in Utah politics today. While the veterans are restive, they are not organized politically and will support the incumbents in about the ratio of the total Democratic and Republican vote. While the Mormon Church may wish for a change, to vindicate the authority of the hierarchy, it will be powerless to effect it.

Voices off The Air

BY EMIL CORWIN

Hollywood, September 14

IF WHAT is happening to liberal commentators on the West Coast is indicative of a trend, the nation is in for the most intensive barrage of reactionary propaganda in the history of radio—and there will be few voices left on the air to combat it.

Here in Hollywood, radio's second biggest center, progressives in radio have been blitzed to the point of annihilation. It has been a rather noiseless coup. This normally demonstrative community, which less than two years ago blew its top over the arbitrary dismissal of half a dozen commentators from Station KFI, has not yet reacted to the even more drastic developments of recent weeks.

Six popular progressive minded commentators—Sam Balter, Averill Berman, John B. Hughes, Bill Pennell, John Dehner, and Peter de Lima—have either been dropped by their sponsors, switched to other departments, broadcasting on sharply curtailed schedules or fired outright by the station.

Why?

One station manager bluntly admitted, "It is not good business to have liberal commentators."

An advertising executive representing commentators, wrote last June, "During the past few months reactionary pressure has been brought to bear in unprecedented volume to force liberal voices off the air. Sponsors of liberal commentators have received everything from veiled threats to outright boycotts by certain groups and individuals."

One of the discharged commentators explains, "There are simply not enough forces to fight the swing to the Right. People are fearful of going against the swim."

That the currents are running swiftly and subtly against liberal expression on the air is clearly seen in recent experiences of the above mentioned commentators.

Averill Berman, young and versatile protagonist of labor and price control, was fired without explanation from a leading independent station and is now hanging grimly on to a spot on one of the city's least effective stations.

Bill Pennell, squeezed out of his sponsored daily commentaries for speaking in behalf of the Fair Employment Practices Commission and against anti-labor legislation, is now perfectly harmless broadcasting movie gossip once each week.

John Dehner, who two weeks ago lashed out against Gerald L. L. Smith on the occasion of that demagogue's triumphant re-entry to Los Angeles, has been given his notice.

And then there is Sam Balter. The loss of Balter's voice in itself would be a major catastrophe for liberalism in any community. This quietspoken champion of the peoples' rights, whose calm and dignified broadcasts have earned him a higher listener rating than every other Pacific Coast commentator and most network commentators, has just been dropped as a daily newscaster on KLAC. Sponsored for the past two and one half years, Balter, high rating notwithstanding, has no takers. He has been removed from the field of controversy and eased into the safe harbor of sports announcing, a development which will doubtlessly come as good news to anti-liberal forces. Not so long ago Balter was a network commentator with a nationwide audience of millions. Now only one spot remains open to him—a Sunday morning broadcast over American Broadcasting Company's Hollywood outlet, KECA. When this spot goes (and the chances are even it will be gone by the time this goes to press) the West Coast will lose its most respected liberal voice.

Such is the fate of men who have spoken fearlessly and consistently for the masses of the people, for racial and religious equality, for world unity, for humanitarian causes.

On the other hand, disruptionists like Upton Close are riding the crest. On his August 20 broadcast, Close, the sweetheart of the reactionary press, was able to crow, "The tide is turning. Editors ask me to say the things they would not publish before. I am far more outspoken over the air than I could be but recently." Close, twice fired from radio for making irresponsible statements, is currently enjoying a boom on the Mutual Network, the very same that kicked Balter off a few years back for daring to attack Colonel Robert R. McCormick of the Chicago Tribune.

It's all very confusing until you pause to consider the recent attitudes, predelictions and behavior of some of the men who run our radio stations—the most powerful media for mass information in the world. Let's examine a few instances of station policy or, rather, the men behind it, in this city of the Angels. It's very educational.

One station is owned by a man who interviewed a prospective commentator by asking, among other things, the following questions: What instructions do you get from Moscow? If a union threatens to strike, isn't that duress? You are a Red, aren't you?

There is another station owner in town whose antics, described by Dixon Wecter (Atlantic Monthly, June, 1945), seemed too fantastic to believe. But I have since obtained corroboration, and additional information to boot.

Wecter wrote, "We hear reliably of one station owner who frequently sends snippets from Hearst editorials up to his newsroom ordering that they be read on every newcast that day; who commanded that Henry Wallace's name never be mentioned over the air; who sent his music department an order 'not to play anything by that damned Communist choir,' referring to the Cossack Male Chorus, and banned songs by Paul Robeson, who offended both on the score of politics and of race. When one of his commentators interviewed on the air an officer sent by the Navy, a Commander Goldberg, the owner administered a tongue-lashing. 'Next time,' he growled, 'tell the Navy to send us somebody named Casey.' It is worth remark that in the past three years he has fired seven successive news editors—the last one for answering a query about his politics by saying, 'When I'm in this newsroom, Mr. R—, I have no sympathies either for or against the President'."

I have also been reliably informed that this same station owner instructed his news announcer to "smear" the head of the War Relocations Authority, Mr. Dillon Meyer, on the charge that he was "coddling" relocated Japanese. "The thing for you to do," the station owner instructed one of his announcers, "is plug our great men. You can't say too many good things about the way MacArthur has fought for America. He's one of our greatest examples of Americanism." It was only by the Grace of God, according to the station owner, that the nation escaped getting that Communist, Henry Wallace, as President.

It is interesting to note, in passing, that this station last summer conducted a contest in which prizes of a new car and cash awards were offered for the best letters on the theme, "I believe in free speech because . . ." And oh yes, the station was granted a power increase by the Federal Communications Commission in August, making it one of the most powerful on the Coast.

Not the most powerful, though. That distinction belongs to KFI, 50,000 watt clear channel station owned and operated by Earl C. Anthony, Packard Motor Car Distributor for Southern California and former president of the National Association of Broadcasters. In February, 1945, Mr. Anthony fired six sponsored news commentators, among them liberals Alvin Wilder, Sam Balter, and Peter de Lima. No charges were preferred against the six. They were not permitted to give any explanation to their audiences. Under the new station policy only newcasters on the station's payroll, under its control, could henceforth broadcast over its facilities.

KFI's action was protested at great mass meetings, in Congress, and in the California Legislature, where a resolution condemning the policy of censorship on KFI was overwhelmingly passed. Former Congressman Tom Ford became chairman of the effective "Emergency Commitee on KFI" which badgered the station owner for more than a year, reminding him in their pamphlets, "You Have a Problem, Mr. Anthony."

KFI and Mr. Anthony refused to meet with citizens delegations, debate the issue or acknowledge protests. It was not until June of this year, when Anthony testified at an FCC hearing on his application for a television license, that the reasons behind his action were smoked out.

The charge that Anthony dismissed all his commentators in order to get rid of liberals whose views he abhorred, seems borne out in his FCC testimony, Mr. Anthony's motives are revealed for the first time, in this cross examination:

FCC COUNSEL: Do you recall approximately a year or so ago there was quite a fuss made in Los Angeles about KFI—

ANTHONY: I thought that was coming up.

FCC: —dropping five commentators.

ANTHONY: Yes, we did.

FCC: Who made the decision? Whose idea was it?

ANTHONY: I got sore at them.

FCC: At whom?

ANTHONY: The agencies that had announcers on the line on a side payroll and tried to go and monkey with politics, so we just called them all off.

FCC: What is your policy now?

ANTHONY: News.

FCC: Are all commentators paid by the station itself?

ANTHONY: We don't use commentators.

FCC: How many network commentators?

ANTHONY: That is something we can't help. The only one we have got on there, when it comes, is Kaltenborn.

FCC: Don't you think that if a commentator was on a network line and took an attitude that you thought was not proper in the public interest that the station could refuse the program?

ANTHONY: The station can refuse, if it is not in public interest or to the station interest.

FCC (Presiding Officer): I wasn't clear as to one statement you made. You said you got sore and I don't know whether you indicated you got sore at the commentator or the station.

ANTHONY: At the way they were being handled. We all get upset over the thing and we did get upset because one afternoon they would turn around and say that a certain politician was perfectly swellelegant and should be reelected and all that, and the next afternoon the same man would come out there and just pan hell out of him because he couldn't get news from him. So we did away with all of them . . .

FCC: Had Mr. Kaltenborn been one of those commentators instead of the network, would he have been removed, too?

ANTHONY: He was a commentator—in order to make it unanimous I think he would.

FCC: You feel pretty strongly on this commentator issue, do you?

ANTHONY: I feel pretty vicious about it, because we can't control what they are going to say and the station can get in dutch.

FCC: You don't feel strong enough to ask the network to take it off?

ANTHONY: As a matter of fact, I don't think Kaltenborn—of course, I know him personally, that is all right. He is a swell egg. I don't think he is really a commentator. I think he is more of a news analyst, analyzing the news, because he never expresses opinions, political or the other way. Kaltenborn is a very clever news analyst.

FCC: What is the difference between a news analyst and a commentator?

ANTHONY: Oh a lot. Because wait a minute. You get this much tape that comes down through from the Associated Press, we will say, off the machines, and then somebody goes down through and picks out the top lines and the middles lines and analyzes the news. But they don't comment on it or give their opinions on what goes on.

FCC: Was one of the commentators who was dropped, as you recall, Sam Balter?

ANTHONY: Yes.

FCC: Suppose Sam Balter were on a network and not Kaltenborn. Would you feel there was a sufficient difference between Kaltenborn and Sam Balter so you wouldn't carry Sam Balter?

ANTHONY: I would. I wouldn't take it.

FCC: I wanted to make sure you understood what I asked you. I asked you if Sam Balter were on the NBC network, let us say, instead of Kaltenborn, then you wouldn't carry the boardcast, is that correct?

ANTHONY: No, because Kaltenborn is not bought and Sam Balter, we know, is.

FCC: Isn't Kaltenborn on a sponsored program?

ANTHONY: I don't know.

FCC (Presiding Officer): By "being bought," you weren't referring to sponsorship. You were referring to their views, is that it?

ANTHONY: That's what I'm talking about.

It is ironical that Mr. Anthony, who fired his commentators on the unsubstantiated charge they monkeyed with politics, should have been the only station owner in the entire NBC network who refused to carry one of the Fireside Chats of the late President Roosevelt.

For a man who operates one of the most powerful stations in the United States, Mr. Anthony's views on commentators are not particularly well informed. In one place he calls Kaltenborn a commentator; a little later he is not a commentator. Kaltenborn, according to Anthony, is an analyst who "never expresses opinions," a relevation which will be startling news to the ranks of organized labor and those seeking unity with our wartime Allies.

Despite the fact the KFI case made national news, Mr. Anthony's testimony last June was strangely overlooked by the press and even the trade papers. But if it escaped the notice of some people, Sam Balter was not among them. Anthony's charge that Balter could be "bought," brought the commentator to the FCC hearings two days later to reply to his former boss. Over interruptions and objections of KFI counsel, Balter had his say.

"Who is it, I would like to know, who has bought me," Balter asked. "The sponsor and the agency which hired me, will testify that never at any time did I advance any views other than my own. You don't like the views of some men who use your facilities, so you take everybody off in order to get rid of them. You limit listeners to the opinions of the UP and AP men (and don't let anybody tell you they don't have opinions). You invent a distinction that doesn't exist between two words: analyst and commentator. Because you are fed up with controversy! You! So the people must be too! Where would this country be if there had been no exchange of views, no differences of opinion, no rebellion against the status quo, no change? What are our amendments to the constitution but slow and ordered change growing out of controversy?"

After describing his experience as commentator, three "bouncings" in two years, Balter went on to say:

"I say that it is a lamentable state of affairs that spokesmen of division and disruption encounter nothing but lush new contracts and earnest assistance by the promotion departments of the radio corporations, while those who speak for the masses of the people encounter nothing but trouble and a never-ending fight to stay on the air. It is because I think, sometimes, that the American way of life is in terrible jeopardy if only those who speak for one strata of the people are given voice, and no other, that I am deeply concerned over KFI's action in this city, and the general situation in all of radio where men who speak for the liberal cause and the humanitarian cause, run into nothing but repression and bickering and insults from those who own and operate radio situations."

Balter has summed it up. The American way of life is in jeopardy. The liberal viewpoint is in danger of being squeezed off the air unless labor and progressive organization fight relentlessly against it. Pressure must be resisted by pressure. Stations are obliged to present a fair balance of opinion under terms of the FCC's Mayflower Decision. It is up to the people to see that this balance is maintained. This is the challenge that faces liberals in 1946.

What Southern California Thinks of Truman

BY ROBERT C. BROWNELL

Los Angeles, September 21

AS political reporter on a Los Angeles metropolitan daily newspaper I talked with President Truman twice before he became President—first, while he was on tour with his estimable Senate committee investigating war production, and then later when he came to Los Angeles in the course of his vice presidential campaign.

I was impressed. I liked his forthright manner, the efficient way he handled his committee, the kind and gentle way he treated a green girl newspaper photographer, the apparent honesty with no cards up his sleeve. Forthrightness and refusal to hedge on searching or tricky questions are refreshing qualities to find in a politician.

After Truman became president, I defended him whenever I could against all the superficial criticisms that popped up during his first months in office, most of them obviously more a reaction to Roosevelt's death than to any shortcomings on the untested new President's part. But my own opinion has undergone a lot of change and so I thought it would be interesting to try to find out, first hand, what other people hereabouts are thinking.

I would question public officials on both sides of the fence as well as those astride it. I would talk to "the housewife," to labor leaders, "the ordinary citizen," and anybody else I could think of to make my rather unscientific survey more reliable.

In almost two days of pretty steady questioning, almost nobody said anything remarkable or searching bearing on the President. The comments I got were responses immediately recognizable as not being the product of personal thought or reflection or strong feeling. I quickly learned that whatever the local public thinks of Truman, it is currently doing very little thinking about him.

The politicians' eyes glazed, on or off "the record," and they plodded through the platitudes that befitted their positions and alignments. The housewives were hazy and trite, the labor leaders swore belligerently and said little, the ordinary citizens were as fuzzy as the housewives. The conservative businessmen hollowly and without much force repeated what they have been repeating ever since "the Roosevelt depression."

But there was one conclusion that could be drawn from the mass of unhappily expressed statements. With one exception, all kinds and classes of people seemed to be disappointed with Truman if not downright mad at him. The exception was a sprinkling of persons in the patronage platoon—recipients of patronage, dispensers and hopefuls.

The rest were opposed to the President, some strongly but most in a dimly understood, half baked way. Personal interests or the newspapers take care of most person's attitudes in such a field. This is not offered as an original obesrvation, but as what popped into my head while I mulled over this mass of fuzzy opposition and remembered that three of the four Los Angeles newspapers are already against Truman but haven't even begun really to aim their guns yet. Where the fourth paper will be when things get hot politically no one can say with certainty. It does seem certain however, that this mass dissatisfaction with Harry Truman isn't going to be lessened by the inevitable heavy barrage against him from the journalistic big guns. Los Angeles will buck its newspapers politically when it's hungry and desperate, but who expects mass economic suffering during the forthcoming presidential campaign? Even with an economic crisis, there isn't much to indicate it would swing things Truman's way.

Within the borders of what I have called the patronage platoon I found one Democratic party leader who really tried to say something. I quote him for two reasons: (1) he spoke honestly and with feeling, despite his vested interest in his party and (2) his statement is a refined version of what the hazy housewives and all the others were trying to say and didn't, carrying with it at the same time an intelligent and liberal Southern California political leader's reaction to this inarticulate mass opinion.

He said:

"Truman is trying hard but he just doesn't know how. He's sincere, but what good does that do when you surround yourself with a bunch of two-bit guys. I wrote national headquarters last week, telling them that if the president pulled any more boners like the railway strike fiasco, we might as well throw the next election out the window as far as Southern California is concerned.

"The majority of Southern California democrats are at least mildly liberal, remember, and the vote in this county, overwhelmingly democratic, constitutes more than 40 per cent of that of the whole state. These people have absolutely no confidence in people like Snyder and Allen—or even Steelman.

"We can still win if the Republicans continue to ride the same old horse. But if they should put up Stassen, for instance, and Truman goes on down his present path, there'll be a lot of people jumping onto Stassen's wagon. I might even jump myself."

Just for fun I decided to close my investigation by asking four fellow newspapermen two questions: 1. What do you think of Truman? 2. What do you think the people of Southern California think of Truman?

An elderly, politically conservative reporter who has worked on half the papers in the country:

"I think Truman is a dud. The people around him are making all his decisions for him, just as everything he reads on the radio is obviously thought by somebody else and written by somebody else.

"You can tell by the way the average person stares at signs along the highway that he doesn't think. He just gapes. The average person around here doesn't like Truman but doesn't know why. How could he like him? What is there to like?"

A politically ardent young left winger:

"President Truman is, I think, carrying forward the program of the great anti-labor monopolies. His fights for progressive issues are weak and half hearted. He's not following in the foot-steps of Roosevelt and we

OBJECTIVES

The fundamental objective of The Nation Associates is to help focus the energies of the progressive forces within our country to an accelerated program of education aimed at enlarging the awareness of the American citizen of his responsibilities for building a world society that may, in the end, justify the agonies and sacrifices of the war.

The principles and objectives to which The Nation Associates is pledged are:

1. To perpetuate the peace through a world government to which the United States should be fully committed, endowed with the powers necessary to enforce its decisions, and revised to meet new threats created by the atomic bomb.
2. To win the war against Nazism and Fascism on the political front at home and abroad.
3. To punish those guilty of crimes against civilization.
4. To maintain security through economic planning to the end that full employment might be guaranteed, the gains of labor protected, and the prosperity of America and the world increased.
5. To protect freedom for all by fighting against reaction, racial and religious discrimination.
6. To inspire free discussion of all issues affecting the life and destiny of the people of the United States and the peoples of the world.

ACTIVITIES

The establishment of a continuing weekly radio program addressed to Education for Democracy, to be a dramatization under the sponsorship of The Nation Associates.

The holding of a national institute as an annual undertaking for discussion of critical problems such as the extension of democratic methods in foreign policy, international cooperation, labor relations, racial equality, etc.

Regional conferences in the Middle West, Far West and South, devoted to problems of local importance but national in their implications.

The organization of local chapters of The Nation Associates for discussion of issues and activities, and wider participation in local and national affairs aimed at achieving social progress.

Renewed efforts to secure the end of diplomatic relations by the United Nations with Franco; the restoration of the Spanish Republic and its inclusion among the United Nations.

Contemporary activities such as are made necessary by current developments.

can expect only minor concessions from him as he moves down the path of reaction."

This reporter thought most Southern Californians were generally unhappy about Truman but not enough so to mean much of anything at present.

A middle aged reporter, liberal generally, who "doesn't like politics":

"Truman is administratively unstable, jumps the gun, is too preoccupied with being a quick decision man. I think he might grow in capability but it would be at the expense of the country.

""Roosevelt's death created a greater vacuum here than anywhere else in the country. The people are disappointed and feel lost. They're ready to accept something other than Truman—but what?"

A reporter whose hobby is history and who keeps his politics pretty much to himself:

"I think Truman is a darn sight better than Roosevelt, and I voted for FDR four times. If Truman fails, we'll put in someone else. With Roosevelt we had come to depend too much on the leadership of one man. Truman at least represents the traditional American form of government working and not the 'one man' principle.

"Truman's only strength here is the old Democratic party organization but he'll be bolstered by the three-quarters of a million newcomers from Oklahoma, Arkansas and Texas who haven't voted yet. They'll go for Truman."

Perhaps the feeling of most Southern Californians concerning the president can be summed up by the comment of a streetcar rider in front of me who was talking Truman to his companion.

He paused, shook his head and said, more in sorrow than anger:

"I just can't figure out what that fella thinks he's doing."

Authority for Authors?

BY HAROLD J. SALEMSON

September, September 21

At the end of the first year of so-called peace, Hollywood's producers could look over their field of enterprise with complete satisfaction, if it were not for the thoroughly disconcerting moves recently made by the Screen Writers' Guild, which threaten to spoil an otherwise highly-optimistic picture.

What is the fly in the ointment?

The fact that the writers, long held in servitude within the studios, reduced to the rank of just another name in the procession of screen credits, have decided to assert themselves.

It had long been a policy—and a very conscious one—on the part of major studios to play down the importance of writers as much as possible. Directors are still generally credited for the success of all good films, although, with very few exceptions, they are no longer those who deserve the credit: in most modern film-making, 90% of the picture's ultimate value is accounted for by the time the script is written; unlike the situation in the silent days, the director's contribution today, unless he has participated in the scripting and preparation of the production (as many of the better directors—to say nothing of those, like Jean Renoir, Dudley Nichols, and others, who are, or consider themselves, essentially writers, with the directing end just an additional chore after the script is finished), has become a relatively minor one.

Yet the studios have continued to minimize the writer's role. Their two main expressed reasons for this are patently phoney: 1. That the public is not interested in who wrote the script (an unproven assertion, since the studios have never tried, through their publicity departments, to give script-writers the prominence they give directors or stars); 2. That the Screen Writers' Guild's insistence on credit to the men who actually did the writing holds up advertising possibilities and sometimes puts the studios in a position of having to give credit to writers other than those most widely-ballyhooed as having worked on the script. While it is true that studios sometimes have such misadventures, they have mainly themselves and the uninformed hit-or-miss methods employed by their executive producers to blame.

Now, how has the scenarist revolt manifested itself?

After a quiet no-strike period of great distinction in helping win the war, the Screen Writers' Guild was one of the first Hollywood organizations to reconvert with a vengeance. The first inkling of the Guild's postwar attitude came with the launching, in June 1945, of The Screen Writer, a little monthly magazine which has since come to be called by innumerable commentators "the most aggressive journal of its kind", "the only Hollywood publication with a sense of humor," "the only house organ with more readers outside the membership than within it," and lately, by New Movies, the organ of the National Board of Review, described, with The Hollywood Quar- terly, as being worth more to the industry "than a million dollars worth of 'public relations'."

Beyond that, at its July 29 membership meeting, the SWG had the temerity to pass a resolution questioning the wisdom of the film-rider imposed on France as a condition to the U. S. loan and, as French trade-union leaders had signified to the Guild, virtually assuring the doom of the French movie industry. The merits of this case are another story— and one which deserves full treatment on its own—but the Johnston Office was officially shocked that any employees' group, such as the SWG, should presume to criticize its employers who, Johnston representatives implied, were only carrying out standard practices of driving as hard a bargain as they could legitimately get away with—a highly-accepted type of conduct, it seems, in the world of international trade.

But the straw that broke the camel's back was the publication in the July Screen Writer of James M. Cain's "An American Authors' Authority", and its endorsement in principle, by a vote of 343 to 7, at the July 29 membership meeting.

The "American Authors' Authority", still only in the planning stage, has caused more ink to flow than any other project the Guild has ever been associated with—including most of the highly-touted films its members have worked on. The producers themselves have taken little official cognizance of it. But it is no secret that in their inner councils they feel this is the event described in that time-worn threat, "Comes the Revolution . . ."

The AAA, conceived by Cain many years ago and brought to a head after conferences he held with SWG's Original Material Committee which was concurrently working on the general idea of leasing literary material to studios for a period of years instead of selling it outright, is an over-all administrative body, intended to standardize procedure in all fields of literary endeavor in this country (and ultimately in the world, of it is to be successful), in a way that the French Société des auteurs et compositeurs, or our own Authors' League or ASCAP, or other musical performing-rights societies, have never approached.

It proposes to hold copyright in the name and for the benefit of its members, who should ultimately include all those who write. Supported by a tax levied on those who lease copyrights for book or magazine publication, radio, theatre or film production, or any other ultimate uses, it will keep an up-to-the-minute file on availability of all rights (doing away with doubt as to which rights an author retains when a sale is made); clear all contracts to see that they conform to accepted procedure; perhaps in some cases act as a collection agency; have all rights cleared and the picture straightened out to give greatest protection and benefits to a writers' heirs at the time of his death; represent writers in courts and capitals through lobbying, amending of copyright laws, and legal representation in cases affecting writing crafts; and, over and above all, strictly forbid its members from ever selling any rights to anyone: procedure to be adopted will be that any publisher, producer or studio will get rights to the work for a given medium only, and on a specific time-lease, all other rights remaining the author's, and those leased reverting to him after a given length of time.

AFFAIRS OF THE Nation . . .

Above is a constant reader of The Nation. He happens to be one of the country's best informed men on national affairs. He is a dynamic liberal. We believe he is the next great United States Senator from California. Good luck to The Nation . . . and to him.

Now, why are the producers so terrified of this perfectly logical plan?

Obviously, what they are most afraid of is loss of "control". They may speak, or think, of the economic losses threatened, but these are a minor item. What terrifies them is the end of the peonage of writers.

If writers lease, instead of selling, studios hoping to renew a lease will of course have to bear in mind that it would be better to do an adaptation that will make the writer happy. Otherwise, at lease end, he will take his wares elsewhere. This means an end to the present system in which a writer has no say whatsoever in the form given his work adapted to the screen, nor even the right to withdraw his name if he feels his ideas have been perverted.

The mass attack launched against AAA, with producer blessing, but most newspaper editorialists following their publishers' leads with no need of coaching from Hollywood, has stressed two potential dangers in the plan: control of content, and elimination of new writers. The former of these was disposed of at the Guild's July 29 meeting, when endorsement of the plan in principle was immediately followed by the unanimous adoption of the following resolution: "That there be no discrimination in the rights or treatment accorded by AAA to any piece of written material by reason of its content." As for the other objection, it is obvious that writing cannot live without new blood. While Cain's plan calls for obligatory membership of AAA writers in the respective guilds of the Authors' League, this provision has not yet been adopted, since it is the consensus that such a decision would have to be made on the basis of the objective conditions in existence at the time the AAA goes into effect. However, those close to the planning committees are certain that there is no intention of trying to keep young writers out.

But these facts are clear: the Authority, in one form or another will be accepted, because it is a Magna Carta for writers, long overdue; economic injustice to writers, acquisition of "all rights" in perpetuity by publishers and producers, will be done away with; there is no intention of controlling content of material, a matter on which no two members of AAA could agree, anway; there is no desire on the part of writers to close literary fields to new talent—quite the contrary; writers will gain new respect and, through the Authority, new authority, which will make the written word meaningful once again—make it the expression of the writers rather than of the employers, in all fields, whether the relatively free ones of novel or drama, or the increasingly restricted ones of radio and motion pictures. Cain, the wags put it, is indeed his brother-writer's keeper, and with his help his brother may again become able.

The editors of The Nation would appreciate comments on this special supplement. For example, do its western readers believe that such a supplement on an annual or more frequent basis would be desirable? If so, how frequently? What type of subject matter, not touched upon in this issue, would they like to see explored? What western political or other organizations could assist in securing mass distribution of such special editions? It is along these and related lines that the editors would welcome comments and suggestions. Communications should be sent directly to J. King Gordon, Managing Editor, The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York 7, New York. Individuals or groups interested in obtaining additional copies of this supplement may do so by writing to the Circulation Department in the New York office.

15,000 New Readers Since 1943

The Nation's growth in circulation—fifty percent since 1943—testifies to these facts:

We are living in an age in which more and more people believe that there can be neither peace nor prosperity in one part of the world, while there are conflicts and starvation in another.

We are living in an age in which the interest in democratic education is gaining new momentum, and in order to increase that momentum citizens as a whole want to be well informed.

The Nation, because of its independence, fearlessness, integrity and ability, is considered the most influential journal of opinion and the leader of progressive thought in America today.

Why They Read THE Nation!

CHESTER BOWLES:

"Too often these days we read a great many facts without necessarily getting at the truth. The Nation, I have found, can usually be relied on to give its readers the truth as well as the facts about world events."

HENRY WALLACE:

"The Nation has become indispensable to everyone who wishes to keep in touch with the vanguard of progressive political thought in this country. For many years it has carried on the finest traditions of liberal journalism and has maintained its editorial integrity. I feel sure that all forward-looking Americans will continue to rely on The Nation for an independent and clear-sighted analysis of the events of our time."

JOSEPH E. DAVIES:

"The Nation adheres to a policy of enlightenment and liberal service in the public interest, in an effort to promote a wider knowledge and more intelligent understanding of the facts motivating present events in the world, the outcome of which is so vital to us all."

HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS:

"The Nation prints material I can't find elsewhere. It is soundly critical yet it has an excellent record in advocating positive, liberal programs Its reviews are written by the most competent and representative persons and they help busy people to know what they want to read. We must keep 'contemporary' and The Nation does that for us."

CLAUDE PEPPER:

"The Nation's editorials and articles have the rare quality of scientific objectivity and freedom from special pleading. Their timeliness and practicality make them staunch allies in the fight for progressive, liberal government."

ROBERT W. KENNY:

"It seems to be increasingly more difficult to get out a liberal periodical. Many promising ventures have become doctrinarie, stereotyped, or satellites of purchasing power. The remaining periodicals which are free from such distortions, such as The Nation, deserve profound gratitude and support."

The Challenge of Henry Wallace

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

[The following is an address delivered Sunday, September 22, at the Nation Associates' West Coast Conference in Los Angeles.]

MR. BYRNES has been sustained and Mr. Wallace has been dismissed from office—and a great issue has been joined. The issue of America's foreign policy is too serious to be lost in intricate debates about subordinate issues. Progressives may disapprove of the tactics used by Mr. Wallace in making his protest against the tendencies prevailing in our State Department. I disapprove of them. I think he should have resigned, and gone out on his own feet. Progressives may disagree with certain of the positions he took: the unimportance of the veto in atomic control or the implied acceptance of "blocs" or spheres of powers—an implication Mr. Wallace has, however, himself disavowed. One may disagree or disapprove or question this or that. But one must not allow these exercises in political analysis to blur the great issue.

Are we to have a progressive, democratic foreign policy? A policy based securely where President Roosevelt intended it to be based—on a close alliance among the three great powers continued into the peace? Or are we to have a foreign policy based on ruthless struggle for power, in which the East and the West compete for the favors of our late enemy in order to build up strong rival coalitions? Within this broad formulation there is plenty of room for debate on detailed specific problems —not insignificant ones. But our approach to those detailed problems, our way of handling them, will be totally different, depending upon which over-all policy we are committed to. This is the great issue that the action of Henry Wallace has raised, and that the country, because of his action, has been forced to face. It will not be pushed aside—not by the ousting of Wallace, or the exigencies of this fall's election campaign, or by the Peace Conference itself. Whether Henry Wallace decides to use the freedom of speech so kindly presented to him last Friday by the President or whether he adheres to the vow of silence previously exacted, the rest of us are obligated to carry on the fight he started.

The battle won't wait even if Mr. Wallace takes a furlough, for he has set in motion a political operation whose force will begin to dissipate if it is held in suspension pending October 23 or November 5.

For those of us who, not today or yesterday but during the whole desperate struggle for collective security, finally and conclusively lost at Munich and during the war which inevitably followed—for those of us who all these years have argued and campaigned for a democratic American foreign policy, the action of Henry Wallace must be seized upon as a new call to arms. For it is a fact that before Wallace spoke out, the mood of the American people was becoming dangerously apathetic on the one side and more dangerously hysterical on the other. Those who look upon every negative vote by Mr. Molotov as a challenge to the final showdown between socialism and capitalism had begun to talk about a "quick preventive war"—utilizing the modest advantage of the atomic bomb to insure its success. Those who had watched with dismay the hardening ring of mutual provocation and counter-attack, saw no way to crack it. Then came Henry Wallace's proposal that the United States, as incomparably the strongest nation on earth—today literally unassailable, however temporary that immunity may be—should use its power not to win small niggling pin-prick successes on a hundred contested issues at Paris or Lake Success but in a statesman-like effort to crack the circle of enmity by a direct effort to relieve Russia's fears and dissipate its suspicions. He did not say that Russia's fears were all justified. I am dead sure the Administration, of which he and Mr. Byrnes were both members, wants to avoid war with Russia; and that Mr. Byrnes is convinced his policy of meeting stubbornness with stubbornness right down the line is the surest way to avoid war. But granting the peaceful purposes of our government, Mr. Wallace did put his finger directly on a long series of acts and attitudes which, viewed from Moscow, look both hostile and frightening. I don't need to repeat them here. It is enough to say that Henry Wallace would end, promptly and forever, the schoolyard-bully technique in dealing with Russia. "We'll sail our ships wherever we blank blank please" is not a useful slogan for the times we are living through. In other words, Wallace would avoid provocations; he would make every legitimate effort to draw Russia back into the Big Three fraternity with all the rights and privileges of membership; he would try to work out closer trade and financial relations with the Soviet Union. And at the same time, he would ask of Russia (as was made emphatically clear in the Madison Square Garden speech) a reciprocal effort at understanding and conciliation.

I think it should be made very plain, however, why Mr. Wallace talked more about American mistakes than about Russian mistakes in his remarkable letter to the President. He did so I am sure because he was not instructing the Kremlin on how to run its foreign relations; he was writing as a Cabinet member to his own chief about American policy. And while I strongly disapprove of both the manners and many of the specific attitudes displayed by our Russian allies, I believe our job is to reform our own foreign policy before we go overboard in excited horror at the policy of the Russians. The elections in Rumania and in Bulgaria may have been of very questionable validity, but our protests might sound a little more impressive if the whole world had not witnessed the successive stages of military control and ruthless extermination of left and liberal elements which culminated in the recent sad plebiscite in Greece.

For the real issue is not an issue arising from the temporary provocations which have become the daily practice on both sides of every frontier in Europe and Asia as well as at Paris. The real issue is the continuance of policies which, before the war, discredited democracies in the face of the worldwide fascist drive and, during the war, sacrificed our friends to placate our enemies and, today, threatens to maintain in power all over the world —in China as in Greece, in Spain as in Latin America— those elements of reaction which can survive only at the expense of every democratic principle we have ever professed.

Mr. Wallace talked about the degree to which American foreign policy has been geared to the necessities of British colonialism. After recent visits to several of those Middle Eastern countries which provide the chief strategic and material underpinnings of the British Empire, I agree that no independent American policy exists in that part of the world; our diplomacy there is wholly subordinate to that of Britain, even against our immediate material interests. But I want to say one thing that may seem to conflict with all I have recently written on Palestine. While Britain is today chiefly responsible for the most glaring mistakes of Western policy, tomorrow's villain is far more likely to be the United States. Slowly, but I think quite certainly, we and the British are exchanging roles.

Lately in the English political weeklies I have detected a new note—a note of fear and suspicion in their discussions of American policy. Labor and liberal writers in England are beginning to see in this country a threat not only to peace but to the political objectives for which the Allies pretended to fight. They are coming more and more to look upon us as the great imperialist-isolationist power of the years to come. They have watched the decay of the democratic energy and faith that somehow, under Roosevelt, survived even the shameful expediencies of our policy toward Franco and toward Vichy. They have watched while American power in Europe has been martialed against every manifestation of the social revolution of which the Great War was only a single, if a monumental, act. Liberals and leftists in England, and in France too, today talk about the necessity of "moderating" between the defiant socialist power of Russia and the arrogant capitalist power of America.

They believe, above all, that the fact of fundamental social change in Europe must be recognized and accepted by the United States if peace is to be made and maintained, for they know, as our officials and business men do not know, or refuse to admit, that free enterprise and unplanned economy are finished in Europe. Or perhaps this fact should be stated in reverse: Europe is finished for free enterprise. Finished. And unless we are willing to come to terms with socialism in Europe, there will be no hope of peace and, as a corollary, no chance of the survival of democracy.

The large bulk of Ernie Bevin tends to obscure the shape of things to come in Britain. But I think I am right in my belief that profound changes are taking place. It is possible, of course, that they will be arrested by outside pressure. It is possible that the economic and political influence of the United States will check progress towards socialism in Western Europe, helping to power men and parties which the American authorities consider more likely to preserve our conception of democracy and promote profitable business relations.

This may happen. If it does, the old game of empire will go on for a while longer, and reaction will be shored up in Spain and given a fresh start in Italy. And relations with Russia will get worse. But it need not happen. The United States, it is true, has no labor party, not even an effectively organized national liberal movement. But it has powerful progressive forces within both old parties; not in their top control—even the cadres of the New Deal have been mostly dissipated—but among the independent voters, the people who kept Roosevelt in office and kept the New Deal alive. They are still there, and today they face a new challenge and a new chance.

The challenge is a staggering one. How shall we meet it? Many liberals and radicals are demanding a new national party—a new progressive party to express the will of the great body of American voters who followed the New Deal and Wendell Willkie, and who today look hopefully to Henry Wallace for leadership. I believe this country needs a new party. But I must admit doubts about taking the plunge at this moment. I have lived through two major efforts to start a third national party, one under Theodore Roosevelt, one under Robert La Follette—"Old Bob." Both failed—and I think I know why they failed. Each one was the expression of a strong popular reaction against the Old Guard in power; both enlisted the energies of great numbers of decent independent voters, but neither one was able to command a continuing solid mass support, with strong organizational foundations. I do not believe a progressive third party can become effective or even survive in America unless it emerges from the organized workers. And I do not think the workers are ready to build a labor party in this country.

But I do see immediate hope in a greatly intensified, steady effort to create committees of action, locally and nationally, and through them to penetrate and even, (who knows?) to dominate one of the major parties. I see a desperate need for honest collaboration among progressive groups of all shades, to take the place of the sniping and undermining tactics that today vitiate so large a part of their effort. I see a desperate need of strengthening the few journals of progressive thought and action in America. And I see a possibility of creating, if not a third party, at least an effective realignment within the two old parties, so that the progressive sentiment in this country, which for many years has been the dominant sentiment, can find organized expression in every town and city—and in Washington too.

The time to push the fight is now—between today and November; and then between November, 1946, and November, 1948. The crisis in which we move provides the greatest impetus to action that human beings could find. Henry Wallace has issued a summons to action and a platform to which progressives can rally. Only if we take up that challenge, and take it up with courage and determination, can we check the steady drift in America toward reaction and a new war.

Economic Crossroads

THE national economy has reached a critical point in the road back from war. Superficially, the country has never been more prosperous. Employment is at a record peace-time high. Industrial production is at its post-war peak. Farm output is setting all-time records. Profits are good, hourly wages are far beyond pre-war levels. Yet business men everywhere are complaining about strikes and about interruptions in their production schedules caused by lack of raw materials. Building has been slowed to a walk despite unprecedented need for houses and other structures. There are rumors that goods of all kinds are being held back for higher prices, that raw materials are being hoarded by big firms, and that the little men are being frozen out.

Although few business men would care to admit it, it is evident that the present economic crisis has arisen chiefly because of the haste to throw off economic controls after V-J Day. Business men insisted that reconversion need not be planned, but one has only to compare the colossal production achievements of the first year of the war with the uneven record of the past year to recognize how wrong they were. The present raw-material shortages are due primarily to the abandonment of the priority system. Gradually some of the wartime controls, particularly in the allocation of materials, are being restored at the demand of the industries concerned. But the primary post-war problem—labor unrest arising from a failure to hold the price line—remains as far from solution as ever.

Labor has been caught in a terrific squeeze between wage controls and increased living costs. The gains represented by the 18½-cent hourly wage increases of last spring have been wiped out by the tide of rising prices. Despite a succession of victorious strikes real wages declined more than 10 per cent in the past year and are still dropping. The government's action in the maritime strike has administered the coup de grâce to the wage formula that seemed so satisfactory a bare six months ago. Confronted with the imminent collapse of the entire stabilization structure, the President has sent out an emergency call to five of his top-flight advisers in the OWMR to work out a new formula.

This new board is under great pressure to abandon wage control altogether. The C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. have both asked that wages be left to collective bargaining and that the government's sole check be the OPA's power to grant or refuse an industry's appeal for higher prices on the basis of increased labor costs. John L. Lewis has gone a step farther and demanded the lifting of both price and wage controls. A substantial section of the press, while blaming labor for the crisis, advocates the elimination of wage curbs as a step in the return to a "free market." The farm bloc is almost hysterical in its demand for an early end to all curbs.

It is virtually certain that if wages are freed from control, the demand for the further decontrol of industrial and agricultural prices will mount until it becomes irresistible. Senator Taft has already launched a campaign to end the control of all prices except rents by spring. The drive for the lifting of the existing controls on meat prices has been reinforced by a virtual strike of meat producers.

The elimination of all wage and price controls might be pleasing to big business, but it would not stimulate production or make for labor peace. Even the most conservative economists are agreed that increased prices would not help much in relieving the current commodity shortages. Time alone can restore productive facilities in the war-torn colonial countries that are among our chief sources of raw material. Meanwhile, a better system of allocation is needed, and that necessitates continued price control. We had a sample last summer of what happens when price control is suddenly ended. If wage controls were also lifted and each industry left free to determine its wage scale by collective bargaining, we should be faced with an even more chaotic situation. For if the Administration's price-wage policy had not been operative then, many of the strikes of that period might still be unsettled.

Out of fairness to labor the new wage formula should be tied more closely than the old to the cost of living and so permit frequent upward adjustments as long as living costs continue to mount. Nothing less will suffice to restore industrial peace. But such a policy will be ineffectual unless at the same time drastic steps are taken to check the upward spiral of prices. Since under the present law the OPA is helpless to prevent wage increases from being translated into price increases, Congress should be called back and forced to face the consequences of its so-called decontrol measures. A Congress that was in emergency session a few weeks before elections could hardly resist popular pressure for a restoration of an effective OPA. If the President holds to his refusal to reconvene Congress, the responsibility for the ensuing economic chaos will plainly be his.

The Shape of Things

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC INTEGRATION OF Europe is an ideal long cherished by The Nation. Nevertheless, we read with regret and alarm Mr. Churchill's speech at Zurich calling for a United States of Europe, since advocacy from such a source is calculated to strengthen opposition to the idea. As the London Times points out in a critical editorial, many people will conclude that the British Tory leader was really calling for a United States of Western Europe. More than that, they will conclude, and rightly, that what he is after is the creation of a conservative bloc dedicated to the task of stopping Russia. But no genuine union could be built on so negative a foundation, and even if it could, it would inevitably provoke a war which would complete the destruction of Europe. The only hope of bringing European countries together in a positive way lies in the development of integrated socialist economies—a proposal which can hardly command the support of Mr. Churchill. In so far as most European countries are reconstructing their industries on socialist lines, the foundations of greater economic unity are perhaps being laid. The completion of the structure will not be achieved in the early future, but there are some signs of action transcending boundaries. One example is the Anglo-French accord signed in the past few days. Its immediate purpose is the funding of the French commercial debt to Britain on generous terms; but by providing for regular consultation between the two countries on trade problems and for the coordination of industrial plans, it also points the way to permanently closer economic relations.

JOURNALISTICALLY EMBARRASSING BUT least important among the sad aspects of Chester Bowles's defeat at Hartford was the false assumption in these columns last week that he would be the Democratic choice for the governorship of Connecticut. We were not alone, of course, in taking his nomination for granted. Apparently he had more than enough delegates committed to him, he had the formal indorsement of party bosses McMahon and Cummings, and no observer credited any of his rival contenders with half a chance. We did point out, be it recalled, that McMahon's support was "late and grudging" and that there was "some question as to how enthusiastically he [would] deploy his forces" in support of Bowles. The fact is that he deployed no forces at all and confined his enthusiasm to the bald statement that he personally would vote for the former stabilization director. Bowles's only serious rival was Lieutenant Governor Wilbert Snow, who enjoyed the backing of the rural district delegates and the bosses of a few local city machines. With no whips cracked from above, these elements gave Snow enough strength at the start of the roll-call to produce a band-wagon psychology, which McMahon did nothing to head off. Scores of Bowles delegates swung over to avoid the cardinal political sin of being on the losing side, and the deed was done.

IT WOULD HARDLY BECOME US TO BEWAIL the failure of a state boss to dominate a convention, but we do bewail the defeat of Mr. Bowles. And we believe his party will have reason to regret it as much. The rural and small-town Democrats who put Snow across are in the position of Southern Republicans: they have strength at party conventions but are not even expected to deliver their districts in the election itself. The city Democrats on the other hand—particularly labor voters—are angered at the treatment accorded to Bowles and may well forget to go to the polls in November. Moreover, the independent vote, without which the Democrats stand small chance of victory, is far less likely to come out in force for Snow than for a dynamic national figure like Bowles. We can only hope that this will not prove true, because Snow is a proved liberal in his own right and would make a good governor, even though his election would have less national significance than a victory for Bowles. As for Bowles himself, he is young, hopeful, and committed to the political life. He learned a great deal at Hartford, and we are certain that the country has not enjoyed the last of his much-needed services.

PLAYING THE CLOWN HAS PUT MORE THAN one demagogue in Congress, and Senator Bilbo is now trying to discover whether the same technique can be used to keep him there. "I just had my mouth reamed out," he announced, "and now I got more mouth than ever"; and he explains that those Mississippi citizens who signed a petition asking the Senate not to seat him are only trying "to get me some publicity for my book on racial equality." But his humor has the evil quality of Hermann Göring's, and through it one can detect the same sweaty nervousness, for Bilbo is in real trouble. His indorsement of the Ku Klux Klan and his boast of membership appear to have genuinely shocked many Senators. Worse than that, from the Bilbo viewpoint, they have become a political issue. His right to sit in the Senate is now being challenged before a special committee to investigate campaign expenditures and before the standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. The first of these, which is headed by Ellender of Louisiana and from which little is to be hoped, is soon to hear testimony that Bilbo received a $25,000 campaign gift from a Mississippi firm. The second is to consider evidence that he conducted "the most violent anti-Negro campaign in the history of Mississippi," with thirty Negroes in the town of Greenwood alone kept from the polls by threats of death issued by the mayor in person. The standing committee is weighted with Northerners of both parties, fully conscious that their conduct in the Bilbo affair is being watched back home by all Negro voters and a good many white ones. Two Republican members, Bridges and Ferguson, have characterized the charges as "extremely serious," and the New York State Democratic platform has pledged its senatorial nominee to work for Bilbo's expulsion. In desperation Bilbo has already raised the cry of "Communist plot," thereby for the first time linking the right wing of the G. O. P. with Moscow.

REPRESENTATIVES OF THE MEAT INDUSTRY arguing before the Control Board in August insisted that meat supplies were adequate to fill demand at reasonable prices. Yet the moment ceilings were reimposed, meat disappeared from the stores. Why? In part the answer appears to be that there is a genuine, though temporary, shortage of finished animals caused by the unprecedented scale of slaughtering during July and August, when stock raisers rushed every possible animal they could to market. But this shortage is not the whole explanation. It does not account, for instance, for the disappearance of meat processed during the OPA holiday but not consumed during that period. When controls were reinstituted, there must have been millions of pounds of meat in cold storage. Who is now holding it back? Another question awaiting an answer is the reason for the suspension of buying by the big packers. They say that they cannot buy livestock at prices that will permit them to comply with OPA regulations. Do they mean that they are being consistently outbid by dealers willing to go over the ceilings? If so, they must have some inkling of the identity of these illegal buyers. Have they passed on their information to the authorities? Or are they, in fact, only too anxious to turn a blind eye to violations of OPA orders while they, in company with many wholesalers and retailers, stage a sitdown strike designed to force the abolition of ceilings and to defeat the purposes of the government and people of the United States?

Truman's Second Guess

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, September 22

OUT of the confusion of these last ten days the Washington correspondent can draw only one certain conclusion: American foreign policy will now be debated over the radio, on lecture platforms, in Congress, and throughout the world.

At a press conference last week Assistant Secretary of State Clayton was asked where a government executive who wanted to make a speech could find out what our foreign policy was. The Secretary gulped and referred the reporters to addresses of the President and Secretary of State, and to the newspapers. That is about as much enlightenment on foreign policy as one can get.

The story of these past ten days goes back for its beginning to the last months of Franklin D. Roosevelt's life. Roosevelt had divided the aims of our foreign policy into three parts: first, getting an agreement with Russia to throw all available strength against Japan so the war would end quickly; second, gaining Soviet confidence and cooperation in building a new world; third, the realization of an almost fabulously ambitious program for a global planned economy. F. D. R. had two basic convictions — that economic pressures were the root causes of war, and that civilization could not stand another war. He was willing to make broad concessions to the Russians to gain their support. His feeling toward the British government then in power was one of extreme irritation.

Jimmy Byrnes, former Senator and White House handy man, on becoming Secretary of State started somewhat timidly to follow the Roosevelt approach of granting concessions to Russia. His press conference upon his return from the Moscow and London conferences was almost gay. Byrnes was jubilant. He thought he would be congratulated on all sides for doing a good job. At this meeting with the press he built up a case for his position by revealing major concessions to the U. S. S. R. made at Yalta by Roosevelt. Then he walked across the street to the White House and was grumbled at by Admiral Leahy, chief of staff to the President. What in the hell had he got in return for all he gave the Russians? Truman also was decidedly cool and at his next news conference lashed out fiercely. A reporter had innocently asked, "Do you agree with the State Department policy of . . . ?" Truman cut him off, saying there was no foreign policy unless he approved it. The State Department, he said, could have no policy of its own. This was followed by a planted newspaper story from the White House that Byrnes would soon be replaced by General Marshall.

Two more things happened that spring. A Presidential special train bearing Truman and his guest, Winston Churchill, and numerous correspondents gaily left Washington for Westminster College in Missouri. In the evening Churchill's speech was passed out. A British spokesman suggested as a lead: "Churchill proposes Anglo-American alliance as Russian shadow darkens over the world." I remember vividly how the mood of the correspondents changed and their gloomy, frightened comments. Men roamed up and down the swaying train trying to find someone to assure them this was not the beginning of the end of the United Nations. Card games broke up, but no one went to bed early.

Next day Churchill said to a silent, bewildered audience of Midwestern Americans, "A shadow has fallen over the scenes so lately lighted by the Allied victory. Nobody knows what Soviet Russia and its Communist international organization intends to do or what are the limits, if any, to their expansive tendencies." President Truman, who had happily introduced Churchill by saying, "I know he will have something constructive to say," sat on the stage playing with the tassel on his mortarboard hat.

Byrnes was pressed from another side. Arthur Vandenberg told the Senate scornfully, "If we abandon the miserable fiction that we somehow jeopardize the peace if our candor is as firm as Russia's always is, and if we assume a moral leadership . . . we must have positive foreign policies."

Secretary Byrnes is, first of all, a consummate politician. All during his political career he has made his way by skilfully gauging the strongest pressures and yielding to them. Early this spring Byrnes put his finger in the wind. The surly, suspicious Soviet nationalism after Roosevelt's death had turned American opinion. Even liberal opinion was dismayed and confused by Russian harshness toward non-Communist progressives in Eastern Europe. But what counted most with Byrnes was that President Truman had been impressed by Churchill and was listening to Admiral Leahy, who makes no secret of his hatred of Russia. The Secretary of State, realizing that the White House was capable of changing its mind every other day, looked around for another source of support. With Senate backing he would be more secure. The man making foreign policy in the Senate was Vandenberg.

For the last four months Vandenberg has been the greatest influence on Byrnes. Decisions made on the lower levels of the State Department, up to and including Under Secretary Acheson, were overruled by Byrnes on advice from the Senator.

The military have had a hand in making foreign policy—MacArthur in Japan, Marshall in China, Clay in Germany, and the military ambassadors to Russia, Belgium, Panama, and the minister to the Union of South Africa.

Byrnes has been playing more closely with the British, too, particularly in the cases of Greece, Yugoslavia, and the Middle East. A big difference of opinion about our Greek policy existed within the State Department, with Dean Acheson protesting against sending the fleet to the Mediterranean.

Except for Wallace and his followers, no one in Washington has any fundamental objection to a firm policy with Russia. But there has been much criticism of the way in which Byrnes has handled the Greek situation, of our policies in the occupied areas, and of the severity of Byrnes's tone toward the Soviet Union. Much of the moderate criticism of Byrnes is stimulated by the indiscreet talk of army and navy brass hats who speak of "the coming war" and refer to Russia as "our enemy."

Admiral Leahy's influence on Truman, plus such factors as our possession of the greatest peace-time army and navy we have ever had, a proposal for industrial mobilization, the delay in taking atomic laboratory control from the army, and plans to turn Germany and Japan into American air bases, has created an atmosphere of uneasiness in Washington. It is feared, rightly or wrongly, that military thinking is a large factor in our foreign policy.

Henry Wallace became deeply concerned. He has a religious faith in the "brave new world." He was badly frightened by the power of the atomic bomb and dreamed of the world going up in flames. He was so shaken that he used the undiplomatic phrase "appeasement of Russia."

At a Cabinet meeting this summer Wallace said our policies were leading to war. He called on Byrnes to develop an independent American policy and accused him of trailing after the British. He expressed these views in writing in the letter released last Tuesday. There followed a series of conversations between Truman and Wallace, with Wallace, who has always got along well with Truman, as the teacher. Truman swung over completely: he is easily convinced, he distrusts the State Department, he has developed a stubborn personal dislike of Byrnes, and he is irritated by the British. Wallace had such influence with his pupil that the President indorsed the New York speech without qualification at his news conference a week ago Thursday.

Tough talking by Vandenberg and Connally over the transatlantic telephone brought a conference between Truman and Bernard Baruch, Byrnes's political godfather. On Saturday Truman reneged part way: he did not sponsor Wallace's remarks as official policy. He still, however, thought Wallace was right. During the two-and-a-half-hour talk between Truman and Wallace last Wednesday the Secretary of Commerce quickly agreed to keep quiet for three weeks until basic agreements could be worked out. The rest of the time was largely devoted to discussing a proposed statement on foreign policy to be issued by the White House. Several main points were agreed to: the United States was devoted to the cause of peace; war was impossible; United States policy was not directed against any country.

Then came the teletype conversation between Truman and Byrnes on Thursday. The situation had become downright "unpleasant" for the President. It was easier to fire Wallace than oppose Byrnes. At ten o'clock Friday morning the telephone rang in the Secretary's office. The White House was calling. The conversation lasted three minutes. Truman was sorry but he wanted Wallace's resignation. Wallace was startled but said he would comply.

Actually Henry Wallace was relieved. Correspondents saw him briefly Friday afternoon and night. He looked like a new man—vigorous, alive, cheerful. He was morally certain of his rightness. He was encouraged by the terrific volume of his mail. A peculiar combination of mystic, political figure, and student, Wallace enjoys being the champion of a "righteous cause." Unlike Roosevelt, he wraps himself up entirely in it.

Many officials in Washington stand somewhere between Wallace and Byrnes. Dean Acheson is one. He believes in close cooperation with the British. He is shocked and dismayed by Russian "imperialism." But he thinks Byrnes and the various forces now dominant in foreign policy have gone too far.

The outcome of these ten days depends on the Russians and on American public opinion during an election year. It is a good bet that Jimmy Byrnes will once more put his finger in the wind and shout that he too is fighting for peace.

Greece and Its Allies

BY BASIL VLAVIANOS

PREPARATIONS are being rushed in Athens for King George's return, made possible by the plebiscite held throughout Greece on September 1. Meanwhile, in the towns, in the villages, and in the mountains of that tortured country Greeks are killing Greeks at a steadily increasing rate, and tyranny is once more being imposed upon the people under the old pretext of securing "law and order." The police are seizing citizens without warrants; anti-Royalists are being branded Communist and subjected to all kinds of violence; more and more hounded individuals and families are seeking refuge in the mountains.

This situation demonstrates how inadequate a solution to Greek political problems was provided by a plebiscite held under extremely abnormal conditions. For in spite of the presence of British "observers," and in spite of assertions that exceptional order prevailed on the day of the voting, the fact remains that had the Greek people been left free to decide their future government, they would never have voted for a man who a few years before was busily organizing Greece, according to the New York Times, "on the German and Italian models."

The "observers" were correct in stating that there was relatively little physical violence on the day of the plebiscite. But they do not seem to have dealt with the fact that long before the actual voting took place, terroristic bands supported by the government had displaced thousands of democratic voters and had made it impossible for democratic leaders to move freely through the country, visit their districts, or inform the people of the true situation. While the campaign was going on, almost all democratic leaders were held virtually incomunicado in Athens. Moreover—and this is of far greater importance—the Greek people were subjected to tremendous psychological pressure before they voted.

But before going into this, a word about the decision to hold the plebiscite. On September 19, 1945, after long negotiations and a thorough examination of the situation in Greece, a joint statement was issued by the great powers to the effect that in the interest of the Greek people the plebiscite should be indefinitely postponed. This statement was supplemented on November 20, 1945, when the British, in full agreement with the United States government, asked the old liberal leader, Themistocles Sophoulis, to form a government and formally stated that the plebiscite would not take place before 1948. Then, suddenly, in March of this year, the British government went back on its word and declared that—again in the interest of the Greek people—the plebiscite should be held on September 1, 1946.

This was surely a master stroke of old-style British diplomacy. For Greek democratic leaders could not possibly conduct a campaign with terrorism raging in Greece, with the Peace Conference in session, and with the Greek government making constant appeals for unity pending the discussion of Greek questions in Paris.

In the meantime the idea was being widely spread among the Greeks that their only friends were the British, that without British protection the Slavs would have occupied Greece and killed all non-Communists, that British troops were staying in Greece for the sole purpose of saving the country from this menace, and—here is the core—that the British and Americans would be unable to help the country without the presence in Greece of the King, who was their trusted friend.

I was in London not long ago on my way home from Greece, where I had marked the extent and effectiveness of this propaganda. I suggested to friends of mine in and around the British government that the inevitable detrimental consequences of such propaganda could be forestalled by a clear-cut statement that Greece would get British protection and help, no matter what form of government the Greek people chose. The same request was made on many occasions before the plebiscite by prominent Greek liberals—without practical results. Obviously it was too late to expect to change British policy, which for many years had consisted of discouraging Greek democracy by the old method of first dividing the Greek people and then bolstering anti-democratic forces.

BASIL VLAVIANOS is the publisher and editor of the National Herald, a New York Greek-language daily. He recently spent a number of months in Greece.

However, British and Royalist propaganda would not have made the headway it did if the Soviet government had not substantially, if unconsciously, assisted. Against whom could the British have pretended that they were protecting Greece if Russia had not revived the old Slavic menace? What could better have reinforced the argument of the Greek monarchists that Greece would be lost without England than Russia's unbelievable support of Hitler's accomplice, Bulgaria, and its still more unbelievable attack on Greece? Greece has always been fearful of the Slavs. Yugoslav nationalists for a long time have had an eye turned toward Salonika, and Bulgarian aggressors have repeatedly attacked Greece in an effort to wrest territory from it. Obviously, Russia hoped that by supporting the Slavs its own access to the Aegean would be facilitated.

The great majority of the Greek people believed, nevertheless, that the old czarist methods had been abandoned by the Soviet government. They believed that after the contributions and sacrifices they had made in the war and the words of encouragement and recognition they had won from the Soviet government, no further attempt would be made by Russia to advance its own interests at Greece's expense. They imagined, on the contrary, that they would have Russia's support for their national claims, and that Russia would be the fountainhead of a new spirit of justice, democracy, and cooperation in the Balkans.

The first blow came when Russia allowed the British Tories a free hand in killing Greek democrats and laying the foundations for the return of the King. Although hardly innocent in the events of December, 1944, the United States protested against Churchill's methods. Russia did not. Then came the senseless behavior of the Greek Communists, who exploited the E. A. M. for their own narrow political aims and used old-fashioned revolutionary methods entirely incompatible with the spirit of popular democracy which they professed. They inspired fear and anxiety not only among the upper but also among the lower classes of the people. Almost every problem with which they were confronted, from the Conference of Lebanon until today, has been handled miserably. Last but not least, the Soviet government disappointed the Greek people by opposing Greek national claims at the Paris conference and by supporting the Axis satellites and attacking Greece before the Security Council of the United Nations.

Russia's support of Bulgaria is against all reason. Bulgaria was an active member of the Axis. It helped Hitler in his war against Russia, invaded Greece, massacred thousands of the people, displaced hundreds of thousands more, and caused indescribable damage to the country. Bulgaria is to the Greeks what Japan is to the Americans, what Hitler's Germany was to the Russians. The Greeks seek no revenge against the Bulgarian people, but they are shocked that Russia should want to deprive them of territories rightfully theirs for the benefit of an Axis satellite, territories 98 per cent inhabited by Greeks. And the argument that an outlet on the Aegean is necessary to Bulgarian trade is no more sensible than would be a demand for Galveston, Texas, on the part of Japan, based on its need for an outlet on the Gulf of Mexico. Moreover, I might point out, Greece has always been willing to grant Bulgaria an outlet in the form of a free port in Alexandronpolis or even Salonika.

Indeed, Soviet reasoning has been remarkable. When Mr. Byrnes praised Greece at the Peace Conference and took up its defense against the Bulgarian claims, Mr. Molotov admitted that everything said about the valuable contribution of Greece to the war was correct. He went even farther, calling Mr. Byrnes to task for omitting mention of the heroic exploits of the Greek resistance led by the E. A. M. This, however, did not keep him from backing the claim of the Slavic group that important Greek territories should be given to Bulgaria.

Then the Ukrainian delegate accused Greece of being a menace to the peace of the world because of the presence of British troops within its borders and because of the character of the present government. But is it not true that British troops entered Greece with the full consent of the Soviet government? Did not Russia agree that Greece belonged to the British sphere of influence? When the Russians call unarmed and devastated Greece a menace to the peace of the world, do they not inevitably create the impression that they are at least as cynical as the British in the pursuit of their interests? When they demand the immediate evacuation of British troops from Greece, what guaranty do they offer that the next day Bulgarian and Yugoslav troops will not invade Macedonia and Thrace? Unfortunately, the spirit of Munich is still so much alive that, under the circumstances, no one can blame those Greeks who feel that their only security lies in the presence of British troops.

The result of the plebiscite held on September 1 can be explained only in the light of these facts. It was not a personal victory for the King. I venture to say that George II is less popular today than he was during the war. Most of those who voted for him did so with the feeling of having to take a bitter dose. And we should not forget that in spite of the tricks, the terrorism, and the psychological coercion, a large part of the Greek people found the courage to vote against the King. According to official estimates, George II got only 68 per cent of the votes. Taking into consideration the character of the present Greek government and the advantages it would naturally have in an election of this sort, we can conservatively assume that more than 40 per cent of the real voters cast their ballot for democracy. That is too many to kill or force into silence.

By employing tyrannical methods and violence the Greek government will only provoke more violence and strengthen the extremists, just as they strengthen communism by calling all liberals Communists—pushing them into the party through persecution and oppression. If Great Britain and the United States allow these methods to be continued, the outlook for Greece is gloomy. Only democracy can still save Greece and transform it from a battlefield into a bridge between the interests of East and West.

But democracy is more than a word; it is an achievement. And if it is to be achieved in Greece, or anywhere, a sincere and prolonged effort must be made by the great powers. It is extremely sad to have to say that until now they have not made that effort but on the contrary have sought to discourage democracy almost everywhere.

Politics and the Intellectual

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

DURING my six months in Europe I left France several times to visit other countries. Each time I returned to Paris I sensed a change for the better, not only in the material aspects of the city but in the spirit of its people. Where this change was least reflected was in the intellectual magazines; the August issues looked very much like those of last February—in both one found the same inevitable articles on existentialism.

If philosophy is the mirror of an era, the expression of the collective conscience at any given moment in a nation's life, then it is proper that my last article in this series on Europe should be devoted to a movement that has brought together some of the most brilliant minds of France. After the Bergson vogue and the more significant Nietzsche vogue, we are now witnessing another philosophical upsurge in France and in many other Western countries. Existentialism is already familiar to American readers, but its political meaning has been little discussed. Its popularity derives not so much from its way of dealing with problems as from the problems themselves, which grip the mind and emotion of all thinking men.

Existentialism received its first strong impetus from Germany, where two professors of the University of Baden—Heidegger and Jaspers—founded a new school of philosophy. Actually the ideas they advanced were not original; theirs was a kind of second-hand existentialism based on principles which the Danish philosopher, Soren Kierkegaard, a disciple and later an enemy of Hegel, had enunciated at the beginning of the century. Nor could the Baden professors even claim the credit of having discovered Kierkegaar; years ago that genial Spaniard, Miguel de Unamuno, talked to me enthusiastically of Kierkegaard and had already written an essay on the fundamental aspects of his philosophy in "The Tragic Sense of Life." From Germany the existentialist spark was carried to France, where soon it began to burn brightly in many intellectual circles.

In France the keeper of the flame is Jean-Paul Sartre. No one could be more French than he, more versatile and many-sided. Sartre is not only a philosopher but a poet as well, an admirable example of the "thinker-poet," as Jaspers somewhat enviously used to describe men like Kierkegaard and Unamuno. Novelist, playwright, critic, and essayist, Sartre uses his philosophy and his poetry as interchangeable instruments. The protagonists of his novels and plays are created to illustrate his philosophy, and at the same time these creatures of his poetic imagination provide the subject matter of further philosophical elaboration. Sartre has the advantage over his teachers of being, or aspiring to be, a man of action. He is not a philosopher of the library or of the salon who tries to escape contact with the street. The distinction of his disciples, like the gifted Simone de Beauvoir, and the homage paid him in both the Bohemian cafes of Paris and the austere university centers of the provinces do not satisfy his ambition to reach great masses of people. I have the feeling that he would gladly exchange his élite following for one of those noisy, enthusiastic crowds that invade the Vélodrome d'Hiver for a great political rally. But, for reasons which I shall try to explain, Sartre's cherished dream of becoming the cicerone of France's political renaissance will never be fulfilled.

The main reason why existentialism has failed to attract a mass following is its lack of faith in the sustained collective effort by which the French people turned defeat into resistance. Instead of strengthening the élan that carried the nation through the most terrible ordeal of its history, the existentialists delight in emphasizing the tragic aspects of human existence, the fate of man whose last great effort is the effort to die. These are familiar themes, old as time itself—reflections on the misery and futility of man's existence, periodically rediscovered by the philosophers in every age and expressed usually with insupportable dulness or, occasionally, as in the case of Schopenhauer, with grace and humor. The single contribution of existentialism has been to inject into the old lamentations the theories perfected by modern psychologists to explain la condition humaine.

Cast into an alien world, buffeted by mutually antagonistic forces, groping blindly between two eternities, man stands on shifting ground, ignorant of whence he came and where he is going. Pascal in his "Pensées" expressed all this in terms of classical elegance. The Baden professors and their disciples have chosen to force these tortures of the soul into a rigid philosophical system. The anguish of the existentialist is a "Kierkegaardian" anguish, a cosmic worry born of the inability to overcome weakness and the constant preoccupation with death. "Nothingness" occupies a large place in Sartre's philosophy; it is present everywhere, brooding and oppressive.

In describing life all existentialists use the same dark palette. It is only when they draw the conclusions from their analysis that the proponents of the new philosophy part ways. Believers like Jaspers, who tend toward the religiosity of Kierkegaard, escape from hostile reality by projecting their thoughts on to a transcendental plane. The atheists, on the other hand, reject the consolation of faith. Their phenomenological introspection has led them to conclude that there is no God, and so they are unguided and defenseless. They would be left absolutely naked were it not for a small fig leaf called "human freedom." "Man is created free," said Schiller. But Sartre, who does not accept the existence of God, cannot take over the formula of the German poet. Man creates himself, says Sartre. First he "exists" and then he "thinks."

For Sartre it is imperative to push the concept of a world without a God to its ultimate conclusion, since only in such a world can emerge the truly free man, dependent on himself alone, owing nothing to anyone. His responsibility thus is enormous: he has taken upon himself the direction of the destiny of mankind. Sartre asks of man the attitude of the old Stoics who resisted the assaults of a hostile world with unalterable equanimity and retained, even in defeat, the consciousness of their own superiority.

But while this gospel of strength makes the philosopher Sartre sound very impressive, the poet Sartre speaks to us in a different tone. His novels and plays present a series of frail, depraved, insane, or homosexual characters that prove existentialism a rather poor instrument for creating men. A little functionary, impelled by an irrational hatred of all mankind, fires blindly into a group of passers-by; a wife who cannot bring herself to leave her mad husband finally escapes into the world of madness; a woman who has tried to live apart from the man she despises returns to him in the end, knowing well that he offers nothing but the saddest erotic compensations. With minor exceptions Sartre gives us only the negative aspects of life. It is a long walk through the infernal region that we take under the guidance of this modern Virgil.

It was natural that existentialism should attract the intellectuals, precipitated out of war into an era of disruption in which only the very strong can hold firm. The last world war produced a group of sensitive, at times remarkable, writers for whom the clash of arms had been almost too much to bear. But that literary generation was pampered by destiny in comparison with the poor intellectuals of World War II. The writers of the early twenties had not yet suffered disillusionment with the Revolution; the purges and internal struggles on the left were to come; the League of Nations still held promise; the dry rot of fascism had not yet infected the middle class. In 1946 few intellectuals in either Europe or America see a way out through positive political action. Classic fascism has been discredited forever, and neofascism is still in the making; traditional social democracy appears weak and vacillating, while communism is for many of them essentially the negation of free thought. In sullen irritation they turn their backs on those who go on fighting because they believe in the ultimate victory of the left and follow blindly any new faith whether it is labeled existentialism, sixth international, or world government.

Sartre is too much a man of his time not to feel irresistibly attracted by the proletariat. But it is a love that is not reciprocated. Without having read either Kierkegaard or Heidegger, the workers of France have a clear idea of the world in which they live; a profound instinct puts them constantly on guard against the seduction of the Sartre doctrine. Though he has asserted that his conception of man is little different from that of Marx, his tendency to view objects solely as phenomena or representations makes him suspect. In the final analysis he takes his place with Husserl and the empirio-critics with whom Lenin years ago crossed swords. To the miners of France who sweated last winter to increase coal production, the objects of this world are not mere phenomena but hard and resistant things the handling of which tires arms and shoulders. What attraction for them can be found in poor creatures, frail and wavering, in whom every impulse toward freedom is drowned in a sea of contradictions? What can the workers find in an empty heroism that is the very negation of life, that suspends judgment on the social past and reads only futility into the social future? What could appeal less to a class that has before it the concrete task of finishing the social revolution than Sartre's defeatist phrase: "Never were we freer than under the German occupation"?

Of course the Resistance presented the intellectuals with few of the contradictions that cloud the meaning of the present conflict. Vichy drew a dividing line: on one side the capitulards, on the other the résistants. A kind of brotherhood of decency reunited the seigneur and his servant, the industrialist and the toolmaker, the atheist and the priest. Everyone knew his post; he had no doubts. Looking back, the existentialist asks himself whether a hero's death might not have been easier than the return to the confused and prosaic struggle of today. Now he must listen patiently as an uninspired Assembly debates a new constitution that in the end will broadly resemble the old one; as power politicians at a peace conference destroy bit by bit all hope in the century of the common man. Now he must watch the Socialists engaging in the same tactics that thwarted working-class unity between the two wars, and the Communists riding roughshod over sincere anti-fascists who dare to voice the slightest criticism of party tactics or policy. In a word, he is being asked to travel the painful road of revolution, to accept retreats along with apparently insignificant advances, to plunge resolutely into a task which calls for work, strong nerves, and a certain capacity for humor and contempt.

That is too much to ask of the average intellectual. In every great crisis he searches for an avenue of escape in some new philosophical or artistic doctrine. World War I produced dadaism; World War II, existentialism. And each school had its own comfortable physical shelter from the storm: in 1914 it was the Cabaret Voltaire; today it is the Cafe de Flore.

Paradoxically, the one who feels least comfortable in that shelter is the one who created it. Sartre is continually leaving his charmed circle in search of contacts with the left. In an article Mise au point, published by the Communist weekly Action, and in a volume entitled "L'Existentialisme est un humanisme," Sartre attempts to answer the principal objections to his doctrine raised by Naville and other Marxist critics with whom he is in constant disagreement. He dismisses the charge of pessimism by saying that if man is free, as he himself has asserted, then it is within his power to change the world to conform with his ideals. Almost as if to illustrate this point, Sartre injects a new note into his latest novels. Now the cosmic worry contains overtones of pity for man faced with immense responsibility in every moral decision. Desperation assumes the nature of a warning that man must depend on himself, that he cannot rely for help on any external force, supernatural or historical. Man is alone, but this solitude endows him with enormous energies and unexpected possibilities.

Unfortunately, at the very moment when he appears ready to take the step toward positive action, Sartre falls back into the confusion and contradiction of his earlier works. For he is, above all, an incorrigible irrationalist. Reason is his enemy. He leaves everything to intuition and inspiration. His heroes—like Mathieu of "Chemins de la liberté"—are always looking for some emotion or inspiration that will impel them along the road to action. Freedom as conceived by Sartre offers not the slightest guaranty of success. It suggests a painful mountain ascent, with the climber in constant danger of falling into the abyss and the final goal wrapped in an impenetrable blanket of clouds. This kind of freedom negates the influence of man's will on human actions. The simplest issue raises questions of whether one is doing the right thing. Often we see the protagonists of Sartre's novels suddenly forgetting their role and acting in a way that contradicts their character. We are faced with a logical discontinuity.

Sartre himself has described an incident which reveals the full measure of his vacillation. A young man, faced with an important decision, came to him for advice. Sartre sent him away without an answer because, he says, the boy's course was determined in advance. "He contemplated a concrete action, whose implications he understood perfectly and which he would undertake with comrades he knew and trusted. But he could only engage himself for a limited time. How can he commit himself irrevocably to an action that will continue beyond his death, when he has no way of knowing what his comrades will do once he is gone? Who can tell—at that moment they might decide to reestablish fascism." Georges Mounin is right when he says that the social revolution of which Sartre dreams has evolved to such a subjective plane that it no longer holds any terrors for capitalism.

If the existentialist philosophy is carried to its ultimate conclusion, the entire history of the world resolves itself into a series of private, unrelated actions which have no real meaning. History becomes a carrousel of human events, or rather of human accidents, turning round and round without ever reaching a destination. In such a situation man must either accept collective suicide, as was suggested by the German philosopher Hartmann, who long before the advent of the atomic bomb envisaged the day when men would by common consent dig a great hole in the earth, line up in it, and blow themselves to pieces; or he must rely on the heroic but isolated actions of individuals whose personal genius has lifted them above the impotent mass.

Sartre's doctrine, like his literary work, is still in the process of formation. He has just announced that he is writing a treatise on ethics. His novel—a trilogy—still awaits its third part. In his last book three names—Descartes, Kant, and Marx—began to compete with those of Kierkegaard, Heidegger, and Jaspers; perhaps through them he may find a way out of his own contradictions. But as it stands today, existentialism, for all political purposes, is a confusing, negative, self-defeating doctrine. From existentialism to cynicism the way is easy; and it is always in the ranks of the disillusioned that reaction finds, in the decisive moment, the intellectual complicity so useful in making every retreat appear harmless, even praiseworthy, to those who no longer have the nerve to fight.

Let the existentialists, or their successors, enjoy the liberty to make Nothing the hero of their poems, novels, plays. One may admire their virtuosity; enjoy their ingenuity. But their exercises must not be permitted to confuse or depress those who are carrying on the fight to free the world from the forces—intellectual as well as political and social—which have produced two major wars in twenty-five years. If the post-war philosophers are too weak to fight the hard battles that lie ahead, they should stay away from politics and surrender their claim to leadership.

Better Pay for Better Teachers

THE GLENCOE PLAN IN ACTION

BY M. R. CUNNINGHAM, JR.

VISITING an empty schoolroom, a skilled observer can tell quickly, from the work thumbtacked on the walls and the notes on the blackboard, whether the teacher has the life and imagination that stimulate children to learn. Thoughtful parents usually know intuitively whether Johnny is catching a spark from his teacher. These meaningful signs, however, are frequently ignored where they should be heeded most: school systems generally have failed to recognize the difference between good and bad teaching except at the most obtrusive extremes. Teachers' pay has been not only shamefully low but illogical; until recently no serious attempt to measure and reward teaching quality had been developed.

That higher salaries for teachers and compelling incentives to better teaching are within practical reach has now been demonstrated by the public schools at Glencoe, Illinois. In addition, the Glencoe program, which has been in operation for nearly a year, provides a needed tonic for the whole educational process. "You can't be half-hearted about your job here!" is the way one Glencoe teacher expresses it.

That is the way all teachers should feel about their work, Paul J. Misner, Glencoe's superintendent of schools, believes. Yet professional keenness has been tragically lacking among teachers. Building it up was one of the chief goals that Misner and the Glencoe Board of Education had in mind when they started some intensive fact-facing and fact-finding two years ago. Tempted by war-time wages in other fields, teachers were turning their backs on the profession in ever-increasing numbers. In three years the annual teacher turnover in Glencoe, where teachers' salaries were comparatively high, had risen from 5 to 20 per cent.

Obviously, teachers' salaries had to go up. But higher salaries alone would not accomplish other aims that Misner and some of the Glencoe board members had been thinking about for years. Something was wrong with the theory, as well as the level, of teachers' pay. Teaching was the supreme purpose of the entire school system, but salaries were so arranged that the only way a teacher could make more money was to become a supervisor or principal. In other words, the best teachers were paid a premium to stop teaching! Another thing that didn't seem right was the advancement program, under which teachers with a given amount of preparation were started at a certain salary, which was then increased yearly. "Seniority should be counted, of course," said Misner, "but we ought to be rewarding teachers for teaching better—not just for living longer." Moreover, the group realized, some women who are ill adjusted socially or emotionally actually deteriorate in teaching ability, instead of improving, as the years pass. Yet these teachers get automatic increases along with the others.

How, Misner and the Glencoe board asked, could you make sure that higher pay would buy better teachers, would prod teachers to strive for professional improvement? To help break this problem down, they called in Dr. Arthur B. Moehlman, professor of school administration at the University of Michigan and editor of The Nation's Schools, who is considered one of the country's leading specialists in educational finance and personnel. Dr. Moehlman studied the Glencoe schools for a year, concentrating on the measurements used to establish salary and salary-advancement schedules for teachers and other school personnel. If you could find a way to take the premium off becoming a supervisor or principal and put it on becoming a better teacher, he reasoned, you could provide the stimulus to superior performance that teaching, in contrast to more competitive occupations, has always lacked. Incidentally, then, you wouldn't need so many supervisors and special-service people, whose only function is to help the teachers teach, and you could pay higher salaries without spending much more money.

Like many modern schools, Glencoe had a teacher rating plan, providing regular checkups on teaching efficiency. Every year each teacher was given a descriptive rating evaluating her performance in the four principal areas of her work—personal-social relationships, pupil-teacher-relationships, community relationships, and professional development. Each teacher was also scored as to character, intelligence, vitality, emotional stability, professional competence, growth, and other pertinent qualities.

Rating plans are nothing new in public-school systems. For the most part, though, they have fallen into disrepute because in many cases the rating has been an arbitrary yardstick applied by a single supervisor or principal, often in a belated attempt to justify the dismissal of incompetent personnel. Many times, too, the rating has emerged as nothing more than an expression of the rater's personal feelings. Misner, however, had always believed firmly in ratings and used them intelligently. "A lot of educators think that teaching ability is too intangible to lend itself to any form of measurement," he says. "As a matter of fact, it is just because a teacher's effectiveness is such an intensely personal, elusive thing that I believe we must everlastingly try to analyze and evaluate teaching success as objectively as we can."

In Glencoe a teacher's rating was never left to the judgment of a single person. It was arrived at rather in a series of conferences among supervisors, principal, superintendent, and, significantly, the teacher herself. Self-appraisal by the teacher, in fact, is the keystone of Glencoe's democratic rating plan.

Because they had participated in the formulation and application of their own rating plan, Glencoe's teachers were ready for the revolutionary proposal that Moehlman and Misner ultimately made: Let's use ratings as the basis for determining salaries. Without a dissenting vote the teachers told them to go ahead and work it out.

As it emerged from several months of additional study, with the Board of Education taking part, the Glencoe plan has these main features:

1. Teachers are employed on a twelve-month basis, instead of for ten months as in the past, but they are paid at the same monthly rate.

This gave every teacher a 20 per cent raise right away. In addition, it accomplished other important objectives. Under the year-long program some teachers remain to direct the summer academic-recreation schedule that parents welcome as an addition to the school's community services. Others participate in local workshop activities to improve their teaching skills in the fields of art, music, dramatics, speech, science, and other subjects commonly assigned to special teachers. Some concentrate on curriculum studies and reviews of the year's teacher training, and some travel or attend advanced study sessions at a teachers' college. All these activities have one goal—better teaching. As a by-product, the teachers' summer program reduces the need for extra personnel for special services and thus loosens the budget for classroom teachers.

Actually, the twelve-month plan more than pays for the two extra months of teacher time. "We used to spend the month of May hunting for a summer job—and letting our school work slide," teachers confess. "We had to," they add, "and so do thousands of other underpaid teachers." That is one reason learning slows up in the closing weeks of every school year. Time is also wasted at the beginning of a school year, with a week or more devoted largely to getting organized and oriented—making lists, ordering texts and supplies, assigning lockers, and so on. Under the new plan teachers say that learning has momentum from the first day of school.

2. Salaries for classroom teachers are determined on the same basis as those of special teachers, counselors, and administrators.

For years public schools have paid lip-service to the obvious fact that the classroom teacher is the most important person in the educational process—but have paid more money to everybody else in the school, including, in some cases, the janitors. The Glencoe plan is making its concept of the classroom function stick by paying teachers, supervisors, administrators, and special-service people on the same basis. The starting level is determined by training; increases depend on competent performance. The teacher who stays in the classroom has the same earning opportunities as the one who aims for the principal's office.

3. A single salary schedule eliminates sex differentials.

"Equal pay for equal work" is another principle which has had obeisance but little practical recognition from educators. Little as men teachers have been paid, it has usually been more than their woman colleagues—a tacit acknowledgment that salaries were based not on professional contributions but on the going market price for people who would teach. Any merit plan would be destroyed or badly diluted at the outset, the Glencoe board realized, if this differential were continued. So Glencoe faced up to the educational alarmists who predicted that equal pay would only discourage men teachers. "Current school personnel practices are equally discouraging to men and women alike," was Misner's reply. "We're concerned with the improvement of teaching. We want to attract and retain the most competent teachers, and we think the way to do it is to reward them not on the basis of sex but on performance." The number of his own men teachers—and of the others who want to get into the Glencoe school system today—is proof that he was right.

4. All salary advancements are determined on open merit ratings established cooperatively by teachers, counselors, and administrators.

Briefly, the salary-advancement schedule for teachers as worked out by Moehlman and Misner and put into operation last year by the Board of Education provides that within the appropriate classification according to preparation any teacher may earn increased compensation on the strength of superior professional spirit and ability, individual contributions of value to instruction or administration, or exceptional service to the community—all these to be determined by the merit-rating plan. In addition to annual increases given on the merit basis, a teacher is eligible for special merit awards, with accompanying bonuses, after three years' service. These awards are made for three-year periods, after which the conditions are reviewed to determine whether the extra compensation, which may amount to as much as 15 per cent of the teacher's annual salary, shall be terminated, modified, or continued.

This plan makes sense in an American community that is accustomed to paying for results. One Glencoe taxpayer who hasn't any children and had resisted every school-tax proposal for the last fifteen years wrote to Misner and offered to triple his tax contribution if necessary to guarantee continuation of the new setup. While that was not needed, the Glencoe board is convinced that most communities should pay much higher school taxes than they do, and would gladly pay them if they were assured that better education for their children would be obtained. However, careful projection of costs in Glencoe through 1960 indicates that the economies inherent in extending teacher effectiveness over broader areas will quickly catch up with the additional outlay required to finance the $800-to-$1,400 annual salary increases called for right away.

Educators who have studied the plan believe that this building up of professional self-respect will do more than anything else to bring into teaching the kind of men and women that the profession needs so desperately today. Better pay for teachers will help, of course, but most teachers and educators agree that recognition of professional ability is even more important.

Small-Town America

BY ALDEN STEVENS

VII. Dinuba, California

THE Bureau of Agricultural Economics, a fact-finding board for agricultural policy-makers and to some extent a policy-making organization itself, has been having trouble ever since Henry Wallace left the Department of Agriculture in 1940. First it was blamed for the setting of price ceilings for cotton and then for saying that Southern Negroes were learning organizing techniques from Northern Negroes. But it was its study of Dinuba, California, that brought down the killing blow.

Dinuba is a flat, well-paved Central Valley town, its pleasant, uncrowded bungalows set in grass and shaded by olive and palm trees. It is clearly prosperous, though there is a small slum area and the forty-three ramshackle buildings of a farm-labor camp across the tracks are occupied by Japanese families cultivating their own tiny vegetable gardens. On the main street is the inevitable Bank of America and a branch of the Security–First National. There are drugstores, variety stores, hardware, furniture, and electrical-appliance stores. For movies Dinuba has the State and the Pep. Along the tracks are a Del Monte and two other packing plants. Among the fourteen churches are a Methodist church, a Mennonite, a Mormon, a Seventh Day Adventist, a Nazarene, Aimee Semple McPherson's Foursquare, and a Korean Presbyterian. The town has no powerful labor organization and no important cooperative, but it has Masons, Odd Fellows, Rotary, Lions, and Wisemen.

In 1944 Walter Goldschmidt, a field worker from the Berkeley regional office of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, was assigned to investigate the effect of large-scale farming on the people who do it. He made a comparative study of Dinuba and Arvin, another farming community a hundred miles south. These two areas were picked because normally the value of their products is almost exactly the same (about $2,500,000 in 1940), their populations are comparable (the Dinuba farming area 7,700; the Arvin area 6,500), and their actual cultivated acreages not too different (Dinuba 28,000, Arvin 41,000). In both regions high-value crops are grown by irrigation.

There are, however, important differences between the two towns. In the Dinuba area 34 per cent of the breadwinners are farm owner-operators, in the Arvin area only 11 per cent. In Dinuba 29 per cent are farm laborers, against 65 per cent in Arvin. Professional and white-collar people make up 16 per cent of Dinuba's population but only 8 per cent of Arvin's. Dinuba has twice as many business establishments and twice as many churches.

While there were a number of reasons for the variation, such as the greater age of Dinuba, the principal one was quite clear. Goldschmidt found that the size of the average farm around Dinuba was 57 acres and the average annual production $3,300; around Arvin it was 497 acres, with an average production of $18,000. In the Dinuba area there are almost no large operators, and in Arvin there are almost no small operators. Dinuba, with its paved streets, brick buildings, and furniture stores, is a small-family, straight-capitalist farm community. Arvin, with its dusty, poorly lighted streets, wooden shacks, and saloons, is a backward, semi-feudal industrial village.

Drawing by Golden

Arvin works mostly for Joe Di Giorgio, who is said to control more fruit land than any other man in the United States. In a WPA community building at Arvin is a bronze bust of Joe, who regards himself as a great benefactor of the town and its people, and who poses as just a poor immigrant boy and hard-working farmer. When Joe, flanked by high-priced lawyers and assuming a strong accent, testified before a Senate committee he said he was just a plain dirt farmer, not a "long-distance telephone farmer." (This is a fairly typical performance; one of Joe's contemporaries said to the Senate Commerce Committee: "I operate a family-sized farm. It is operated by my wife, my four children, and myself. It is composed of about 42,000 acres.")

Arvin has a two-lane pavement down the center of its broad main street. It has no other paved streets. To the casual tourist driving through, a Dinuba man's contemptuous description of it as just "a wide place in the road" seems accurate enough. You would never imagine that this impermanent-appearing collection of jerry-built shacks jammed together often two on a lot was in any way comparable with Dinuba. Yet the BAE figures show that it is. The difference in the homes is reflected in the fact that in Arvin only $103 is spent on furniture for every $100 spent on liquor, whereas in Dinuba $232 goes for furniture for every $100 for liquor.

The same volume of farm production supports about 15 per cent more people in the Dinuba area at a level of living, based on material possessions, approximately 34 per cent higher. In addition, social opportunities in Dinuba are far greater, as shown by the fact that it has five service and commercial organizations against Arvin's two, two fraternal organizations against none in Arvin, four active women's clubs against none in Arvin, and two scout troops, each with its own building, against one in Arvin with no building. As though to demonstrate the differences in social opportunity, Goldschmidt reports one Arvin farm operator planning to become an absentee landlord in order to give his children better surroundings, while a much-traveled business man selected Dinuba as the place to start his own enterprise because it seemed an ideal community in which to raise a family.

To top off the differences, Dinuba has been incorporated for forty years and thus makes local decisions by democratic methods. Arvin is unincorporated.

The comparison between Arvin and Dinuba has an important lesson for the nation. The Bureau of Reclamation has always had a regulation that no more than 160 acres of any one person's land may be irrigated from one of its projects. A man may irrigate additional holdings himself if water is available, but this is more expensive. Large California operators have been trying to get this rule set aside for the Central Valley project. Their desire to have unlimited cheap water is understandable, but from the national point of view the rule is desirable because it offers opportunity to many more farmers and the Dinuba study shows that owner-operated farms averaging as few as fifty-seven acres make for more prosperous citizens and a happier community than big industrialized operations employing larger numbers of hired workers.

This proof that small irrigated farms are better than large brought about a resolution by the directors of the California Farm Bureau Federation, friend of the big farmers, disapproving ". . . the personnel of the BAE spending a considerable portion of their time in preparing reports on various Central Valley study problems." In the next Department of Agriculture appropriation bill the following provision mysteriously appeared:

> No part of the funds herein appropriated or made available to the Bureau of Agricultural Economics shall be used for state and county land-use planning, for conducting cultural surveys, or for the maintenance of more than one worker in the respective regional offices.

Howard R. Tolley, realizing that the bureau he had built and directed was now stripped of its fact-finding ability and of its freedom, resigned as chief, and the usefulness of the bureau came virtually to an end. The Dinuba study, which showed that its small family farms make a better way of life than the large factory farms of Arvin, and that less than 160 acres of irrigated land is enough to support a family, was used to destroy one of the most honest and courageous organizations in Washington, the Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Wall Street's Nervous Breakdown

THE graph of stock averages for the past few weeks looks very like the profile of a cascade. Values have tumbled precipitately, come to rest precariously and temporarily on narrow ledges, and then sped downward again. Eventually the market will level out, but the point where this will happen does not yet seem to be in sight.

Is there any good economic reason for this break in the stock markets? I must confess that I have failed to find one among the many explanations by "authorities" that I have been reading. Like doctors baffled by lack of recognizable physical symptoms, they all, in the end, fall back on references to psychological conditions. Investors, we are told, are acting this way because they are suffering from "frustration" and "loss of confidence." But that leaves us asking why such neurotic tendencies should develop in the face of a situation which, objectively considered, appears highly promising. For business as a whole is good and shows signs of getting better as reconversion problems are ironed out. Employment has reached new highs, production is rising, retail sales continue to beat all records.

Nor can the situation be described as one of "profitless prosperity" when every day adds to the tale of increased dividends. It is true that a few industries which had been beset by a combination of labor troubles and material shortages—automobiles are the outstanding example—made a poor showing for the first half of 1946. But the earnings picture, taken all around, is extremely favorable and for many industries positively rosy. The Journal of Commerce has recently declared that no early decline in profits is in sight and that, in fact, earnings for the current half-year are expected to be higher than those reported for either the six months ending June 30 or the second half of 1945. In another business organ, Barron's, H. J. Nelson, contributor of a regular column on the stock market, pointed out on September 2 that "earning power is strong and bids fair to be stronger in the current half-year, notably in the case of railroads and heavy industries. It is to future earning power that the stock market always looks."

Since these words were written, the slump has come, and one can only conclude either that the market is expressing a disbelief in apparent future earning power or that it has been so scared by something that it is neglecting this normally important factor. One non-professional theory, put forward by Representative Sabath, is that the break has been caused by "bear raids" conducted in the political interests of the Republicans. There seems to be no evidence to support this suggestion. Figures published by the Securities and Exchange Commission show that during the month ending September 13 the short interest on the New York Stock Exchange declined from 732,649 shares to 627,946, the smallest total since January, 1943. This means that in the first days of the break the bears, as a group, were buying to cover sales made previously and thus were supporting rather than depressing the market.

In 1929 over-extended credit was an important factor in the collapse. The pyramiding of holdings on very slim margins had been carried to fantastic lengths, and when the bubble burst there was forced liquidation on a tremendous scale as speculators unable to keep their loans covered jettisoned stocks at any price. But during the bull market which began shortly after Pearl Harbor margin trading has not been of great significance, and for many months past new margin commitments have been prohibited. Hence involuntary liquidation has played a very minor part in the recent landslide. If investors have scrambled to sell, it is not because their bankers have been snapping at their heels but because they have sought to salvage profits or to cut losses.

It is strange, however, that at a moment when talk of inflation is filling the air, there should be such a rush to convert equities, which in effect represent goods, into depreciating currency. Nor is this puzzle solved by references to fears engendered by the international situation. For what could give a more powerful boost to the massive inflationary forces in existence than the outbreak of war?

Thus logic and economic analysis alike seem of small help in providing a convincing diagnosis of the market's ills, and like others I find myself compelled to seek psychological explanations. One thing to remember is the longevity of the late bull market. As it grew older many investors with large paper profits grew increasingly fidgety. Yet, in its final months this market exhibited particular virility, thanks mainly to the abolition of the excess-profits tax, which automatically doubled and trebled the profits of numerous concerns, and to lively anticipations of the great killing to be made from restocking war-stripped shelves.

Although, however, as I have already pointed out, that killing has been, and is being, enjoyed by many concerns, the return to normalcy has not been as immediate and uninhibited as many business men anticipated. The OPA and the unions have clouded the hoped-for unrestrained carnival of profits in a way that has, indeed, proved frustrating to numerous capitalists. Even those who have not actually been hurt in the least have been squealing so loudly that they have almost convinced themselves of their ruin. In short, Wall Street—using that expression in a much wider than geographical sense—may be said to have wailed itself into a nervous breakdown.

That, perhaps, should not worry the majority of people. But a market slump without economic cause will not necessarily remain without economic effects. In our society a stock-market depression can do much to slow down the whole economy both by checking consumption in the upper brackets—paper losses make investors feel poor even though their incomes are unaffected—and still more by frightening business men from expanding investments. Continued long enough, a break in the market often provides its own economic justification. Whether it will do so on this occasion, it is not yet possible to say, but failing an early recovery of nerve the outlook is ominous. KEITH HUTCHISON

P.S. Since this page went to the printer the market has rallied as a result of Wallace's dismissal—further proof of its irrational and neurotic behavior.—K. H.

BOOKS and the ARTS

A Modest Expert

NORTH & SOUTH. By Elizabeth Bishop. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

ELIZABETH BISHOP is spectacular in being unspectacular. Why has no one ever thought of this, one asks oneself; why not be accurate and modest? Miss Bishop's mechanics of presentation with its underlying knowledges, moreover, reduces critical cold blood to cautious self-inquiry.

The adornments are structural, as with alliteration, contrast, and the reiterated word as a substitute for rhyme. And rhyme, when used, outshines restraint. Miss Bishop says, "icebergs behoove the soul," "being self-made from elements least visible . . . fleshed, fair, erected indivisible"; and of "snow-fort" "sand-fort" Paris at 7 a.m.,

> . . . It is like introspection > to stare inside, or retrospection, > a star inside a rectangle, a recollection:

One notes the difficult rhyme-scheme of Roosters, sustained through many stanzas: "Peter's sin was > of spirit, Peter's > folly, beneath the flares > among the servants and officers.

Among the many musicianly strategies is an expert disposition of pauses; and the near-rhymes are impeccable, as in Wading at Wellfleet, "The sea is 'all a case of knives'

> Lying so close, they catch the sun, > the spokes directed at the shin."

One has here a verisimilitude that avoids embarrassingly direct descriptiveness; when journeying from the Country to the City, for instance: "flocks of shining wires seem to be flying sidewise"; and direct description is neat, never loose, as when the asphalt is said to be "watermelon-striped, light-dry, dark-wet," after the water-wagon's "hissing, snowy fan" has passed. We find that enumerative description—one of Miss Bishop's specialties—can be easy and compact:

> Now can you see the monument? It is of wood > built somewhat like a box. No. Built > like several boxes in descending sizes > one above the other.
> Each is turned half-way round so that > its corners point toward the sides > of the one below and the angles alternate.

The wake of the barge is foliage with "Mercury-veins on the giant leaves," always the accurate word; and sensation, yet more difficult to capture than appearance, is objectified mysteriously well:

> Alone on the railroad track
> I walked with pounding heart.
> The ties were too close together > or maybe too far apart.

Miss Bishop does not avoid "fearful pleasantries," and in The Fish, as in the subject of the poem, one is not glad of the creature's every perquisite; but the poem dominates recollection; Anaphora does; and The Weed has so somber an authority, surrealism should take a course in it.

Dignity has been sacrificed to exactness in the word "neatly": "The mangrove island with bright green leaves edged neatly with bird-droppings like illuminations in silver"; and in Songs for a Colored Singer, where impulsiveness is the verbal machinery, has every phrase the feel of the rest of the words—the auxiliary verb "will" for instance? "And if I protest Le Roy will answer with a frown." Like Pyramus and Thisbe, however, ardor in art finds a way, and apostrophe s is the deft spelling for "is": "All we got for his dollars and cents/ 's a pile of bottles by the fence." The omission of three poems which appeared in "Trial Balances" is a loss—The Reprimand, and Valentines I and II.

Art which "cuts its facets from within" can mitigate suffering, can even be an instrument of happiness; as also forgiveness, symbolized in Miss Bishop's meditation on St. Peter by the cock, seems essential to happiness. Reinhold Niebuhr recently drew attention in The Nation to the fact that the cure for international incompatibilities is not diplomacy but contrition. Nor is it permissible to select the wrongs for which to be contrite; we are contrite; we won't be happy till we are sorry. Miss Bishop's speculation also, concerning faith—religious faith—is a carefully plumbed depth in this small-large book of beautifully formulated aesthetic-moral mathematics. The unbeliever is not ridiculed; but is not anything that is adamant, self-ironized?

> . . . Up here
> I tower through the sky
> For the marble wings on my tower-top fly.

With poetry as with homiletics, tentativeness can be more positive than positiveness; and in "North & South," a much instructed persuasiveness is emphasized by uninsistence. At last we have a prize book that has no creditable mannerisms. At last we have someone who knows, who is not didactic.

MARIANNE MOORE

Nehru's India

THE DISCOVERY OF INDIA. By Jawaharlal Nehru. The John Day Company. $5.

JAWAHARLAL NEHRU is a great leader of people who has had numerous periods of leisure interspersed through a long career of public activity in which to meditate, generalize, and write about the causes to which he is devoted. These periods of leisure have been forced upon him by the government of India in nine confinements in jail. A man of reflection and unusual capacity for literary expression, he has used much of his imprisonment for writing, and he has produced three important books: "Glimpses of World History," his "Autobiography" (published in this country as "Toward Freedom"), and now "The Discovery of India." This last work, of nearly six hundred pages, was written during five months of the almost three years which constituted his latest term—August 9, 1942, to June 15, 1945.

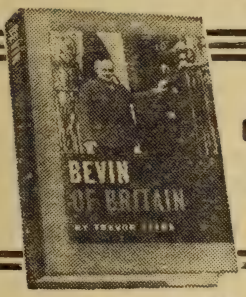
The purpose of the present volume is to survey the past and present of India so as to assess the country's strength and weakness and its position in the world, but not in any academic fashion. The whole undertaking is in response to "the call of action . . . not action divorced from thought, but rather flowing from it in one continuous sequence." The course of action which he endeavors to indicate is at once national as constituting policy for India and individual as a directive for himself.

This purpose gives the book a very personal character, since Nehru is talking about himself as well as India. Some of the material is directly autobiographical, notably that which deals with his wife's death in Switzerland in February, 1936. More consists of an exposition of his personal philosophy, the springs of his activity, his response to mankind, individually or in the mass, and to nature, the moods developed by the sight or thought of the Bengal famine or by his imprisonment. Still more consists of informal essays, varying in length from a paragraph to several pages, giving his personal opinions on Indian or world institutions or cultural phenomena, from any period of history, appraising them in their time and locality and evaluating them for the present world, especially for India.

After a brief introductory section the book falls into two great parts. The first of these, 230 pages in length, treats India's past from the time of the Indus Valley civilization in the third millennium B. C. through the termination of Indian rule. The second, almost 300 pages long, deals with India as a British possession: the consolidation of British rule; the motives and methods of British administration; its effect upon the country; the rise, growth, and character of the nationalist movement and especially the Indian National Congress, with discussion of its social, economic, and political aims and some remarks about its leaders, more particularly Gandhi; characterization of other parties, especially the Moslem League, its viewpoint, which he regards as medieval and feudal, and its leader, M. A. Jinnah; India during the war; current problems.

The survey of India's past deals with humanistic, social, and technical data. It is in no sense a conventional treatment. Nehru is not a professional historian—he says so himself—and the professional historian would find the discussion unsatisfactory. The value of Nehru's discussion, however, is definite. Any topic which he happens to be considering he embellishes with his own opinions concerning its meaning today. For example, he shows that the discovery of the Indus civilization, first announced in 1924, helped to build up India's self-esteem by proving that the country shares the glory of antiquity with the Near East and China, but he makes it clear that Indians must not ignore the needs and opportunities of the present in day-dreaming about that or any other period of India's greatness. The religion of the Rig Veda was interesting and important around 1500-1000 B. C., but present-day efforts to resurrect it as a practical cult are futile. The system of caste, he admits, developed in response to the social and economic demands of ancient India, but excesses and corruptions became a part of it and have made it a liability, not an asset; it hinders India's advance, and must be abolished. The great message which he would give to India in this part of the book is "not to break with the past, and yet not to live in it; realize the present and look to the future." India's history, he says repeatedly, has had its periods of growth and periods of stagnation, and it has now been for some centuries in one of the latter. The growth came when there was a willingness to change, to accept new material and amalgamate it with the existing culture. That is India's need now. To Indians, who live close to their civilization, Nehru's linking of the past and the present must be most suggestive and instructive; even in a new country like our own, where tradition is a very young thing, appraisal of our religious, educational, and other social institutions is a perennial subject for investigators; but they are rarely examined by a man so close to his people, yet so rich in thought and word, as Nehru. To Westerners his treatment is perhaps the most illuminating ever published on the significance to India today of its inherited civilization.

In his long treatise on India under Britain Nehru again writes unconventionally, but with a better command of the source material. This is the part of India's history which bears most directly upon his mission. He writes in discursive fashion, speaking without any fixed order and with considerable repetition of the motives of British imperialism, the difference between the domination for exploitation which it practiced and the domination by India's previous conquerors, who settled in the country. He finds that Britain destroyed India's economy, both agricultural and industrial,



THE FIRST BIOGRAPHY OF A DYNAMIC PERSONALITY

Bevin

OF BRITAIN

By TREVOR EVANS From this biography emerges one of the most controversial and arresting figures ever to appear in English public life. In these pages the reader gets a powerful sense of the personality and stature of Bevin from his beginnings as a Bristol drayman, as Minister of Labor and National Service in Churchill's War Cabinet, right down to the present when he stands as a key figure in England's Labor Government.

encouraged feudal and antiquated systems of landholding, wiped out the old local village government, instituted a political administration divorced from contact with the people, supported and in some cases created Indian states, which as a class are a liability, and has in general been so indifferent to the interests of the country that it is impossible for India to remain in the British Empire (or Commonwealth of Nations) on any terms. These are all old propositions, but Nehru develops them with great eloquence and power. Such improvements as Britain has brought to India, in the way of railways or other modernization, he discounts as meant to further British exploitation. He summarizes the Congress's point of view in not giving the war vigorous support, in spite of its hostility to Germany, Italy, and Japan. He shows in an excellent analysis exactly why the Cripps proposals of 1942 were loaded with harm. Americans would do well to read these accounts to correct the misconceptions that still linger in many minds. He shows why the Congress objects to dividing India along the lines of "Pakistan," and tells how the Churchill government tried to destroy the Congress as a political force.

Nehru's main points are, first, that India is culturally a unit; the Hindu-Moslem antipathy he considers greatly exaggerated and largely produced by the British policies in India; it must be remarked here that he does not seem to give very convincing material for supporting the thesis that the two communities are or ever were sufficiently assimilated culturally to be regarded as one. He thinks, second, that India's greatness resulted from a combination of philosophic search and material development. Third, India is at present in a trough which has lasted for a number of centuries, and for which India itself must take full share of the blame. Fourth, India must exert itself to new creativeness so as to take its place in the modern world, and absolute prerequisites to this end are internal unity, which Indians can achieve if they wish, and complete freedom from Britain.

The true measure of Nehru appears in his international view of the world. Nationalism he regards as not in itself desirable, except as satisfaction of it must precede any cooperation of one country with others. For a country under foreign domination, he says often, nationalism cannot be ignored or displaced by internationalism. Nevertheless, he sees the larger goal clearly and predicts, in words written while the war was still in progress, much of the bickering between the allies that is now going on. As leader of India's new popular government he may be expected to throw his country's support to the promotion of his international aims. Emotionally as well as intellectually his interest is in mankind as a whole, not in a local group.

W. NORMAN BROWN

The Blind Men and the Elephant

G. B. S.—90. Edited by S. Winsten. Dodd, Mead and Company. $3.

EVERYBODY except the village idiot—and, reading some of this prose, you can feel none too sure of the exception—seems to have been invited to contribute words of praise for George Bernard Shaw on the occasion of his ninetieth birthday. Some of the tributes, particularly those of the elders—Gilbert Murray, Max Beerbohm, Sidney Webb, H. G. Wells—are touching to the point of pathos; and some of the essays, notably those by C. E. M. Joad and Dean W. R. Inge, can be taken seriously; here and there, in many places, for that matter, one can find small nuggets for which to be grateful.

For example, Professor Edward J. Dent quotes our hero on the subject of Mahler's orchestra, with its brass "a huge tribe of mongrels, differing chiefly in size. I felt that some ancestor of the trombones had been guilty of a mésalliance with a bombardon; that each cornet, though itself already an admittedly half-bred trumpet, was further disgracing itself by a leaning towards the flügel horn; and that the mother of the horns must have run away with a whole military band."

Or James Bridie with a few words of sense in what seems to me a very silly effort indeed on Shaw as dramatist: "He has given us Alfred Doolittle, Androcles, General Gascoigne (sic), William the Waiter, Warwick, Bluntschli, Lady Cecily, Dubedat, Shotover, Lickcheese, Mrs. Warren and Ellie Dunn, and fifty more varied and living characters. His John Tanner is as good as Molière's Don in an entirely different way. I have no patience with people who say that Shaw can only create walking gramophones."

But, in general, it does not add up to very much of anything; judging the original by the tributes, one would be inclined to wonder what all the furor was about. Everybody takes a little segment, walks around it from the outside, feels it and handles it, like the story of the blind men and the elephant, and never gets to the total reality: the book comes out more fromage than homage. In particular, I think more might have been made of the emotion in Shaw's plays, the music, the poetry, the color, the great dramatic effects, extending even to the stage directions. Read, to see what I mean, the setting for the beginning of the first act of "Caesar and Cleopatra"; or study the magnificent fourth act, with its changes of light to the final curtain, the darkness, and the moonlight, and the tableau: "Ftatateeta is lying dead on the altar of Ra, with her throat cut. Her blood deluges the white stone." Or other scenes, in other plays: the shifting of the wind at Joan's entrance, interrupting the lovely lyric interlude between Dunois and the page; the wonderful description of the stage setting at the beginning of the epilogue in "Saint Joan"; the terrible irony of the "Immenso Giubilo" passage in "Major Barbara"—so many places: what do you mean, no emotion, no poetry, no drama, in Bernard Shaw?

Still, he frightens people. Karl Marx made a man of me, he said; so he frightens those who are frightened by Marx. Mozart, who showed him how to be profound without being gloomy, had something to do with it; so he frightens those who prefer Brahms. Their name is legion, unhappily, who cannot see "gaiety transfiguring all that dread," who cannot hear, as Gilbert Murray heard, the benevolence in the chuckle behind the holly bush. "Supreme strength," Chesterton wrote in "The Man Who Was Thursday," "is shown in levity," and he goes on to quote the Bible: "Why leap ye so, ye high hills?" Shaw has levity, in this sense, in the best sense of the word: lightness, and lift. The only words of his that ever gave me a sinking feeling were those at the end of the latest newsreel picture of him that I saw: "Goodby," he said, three times, "Goodby, goodby." Oh, no, stay for ever! We need you.

"This shall be written of our time," wrote Chesterton in his book on Shaw, "that when the spirit who denies besieged the last citadel, blaspheming life itself, there were some, there was one especially, whose voice was heard and whose spear was never broken." Amen. ROLFE HUMPHRIES

The Lone Ranger Rides Again

TWO WORLDS. By William B. Ziff. Harper and Brothers. $3.

IT WOULD probably be sufficient to say of "Two Worlds" that Old Faithful is at it again, but that this time the ejected mud has a slightly different chemical composition and the colored lights Mr. Ziff turns upon the cloud of steam are of more lurid hues.

At any rate, the normal methods of reviewing a book can hardly be applied to this conglomerate ejaculation. Old Faithful does not state his axioms, present the facts, analyze their import in consecutive stages as other men do. He does all these things on every page, with varying degrees of explicitness and rigor, so that one is contantly listening, with diminishing aural tolerance, to the same complex of points. Nor does Mr. Ziff distinguish between his rational judgments and his emotional reactions, for they all have the same effect of maintaining thermal pressure. Facts, errors, allegations, oversimplified dramatizations of history, scraps of myth, infantile rationalizations, sound intuitions, and great lumps of realistic tufa whirl around in his volcanic caldron until the moment of release, when Boom! or Pouf! Then for a brief minute the mud of a new vision of order patters down upon one's clothes.

I am not being unfair. In two consecutive paragraphs on page 310 Mr. Ziff marshals his reasons for believing that the "Western" non-Russian world can be welded—with a North American blow torch—into an economic and military unity. They are: (1) The British, Canadians, Australians, and New Zealanders have a cultural outlook like our own. (2) Many of the Latin countries of South America are melting-pots, like the United States. (3) Brazil and Chile are European for the most part; Uruguay and the Argentine are almost purely European. Proof? See Point 4. (4) Perón had an English grandfather.

With his eye upon the newspaper, or at least the clippings, Mr. Ziff declares there are two worlds. Geographically these are the Eurasian and the Western world. Diplomatically they are or should be the Russian and the North American world. Politically they are to be considered as communist and capitalist respectively. The attempt to institute world government, Mr. Ziff says, can only lead to war, which will probably involve the defeat of America. Therefore America should neither fear Russian imperialism nor its methods but should go and do likewise. The United States should federate the Western world with the aid of Ziffian persuasion and a number of flattops. Then we should join with the Russians to federate the world.

Like Mr. Ingersoll, Mr. Ziff has been reading PM, and he is therefore stuffed with understanding about Britain.

Britain is cunningly trying to put over the idea that its commercial survival is necessary to America. At the same time, "Britain must be viewed as the most eastern extension of this hemisphere and, in certain respects, the key to its military defense." It is hopeless for Britain to try to restore its economy by nationalization, Mr. Ziff declares. Britain alone cannot defend the Empire; so it is "apparent that Britain can only be rescued by an act of voluntary renunciation which divested her of her Empire and caused her to become a working partner in a federate union of equals."

Is it unfair to suspect that Mr. Ziff, once a Five-World, now a Two-World man, is on the way to becoming a Non-Willkian One-World man, and that somewhere at the back of his boiler he thinks we should liberate Britain with a voluntary renunciation of its empire? On page 330 he writes, "We could settle the Argentine question with a minimum of effort by sending a few airplane carriers to the mouth of the Rio Plata, where an expeditious end would be placed to both Perón and his pretensions."

That the "Western bloc" in the U. N., unlike the "Soviet bloc," has no articulated common philosophy Mr. Ziff knows, and he quite properly argues that it is useless to oppose the Soviet dynamism with negative solutions. The basis for our philosophy must be a faith in the practice of free enterprise and the parliamentary system. But there is no sort of discussion in this book of what sort of strains the attempt to impose this faith in free enterprise upon European parliaments might produce. Analysis designed to discover whether free enterprise is economically practicable in Europe is also missing.

Mr. Ziff is aware that the two worlds would necessarily be military agglomerations. That does not frighten him, for he believes that "our" prosperity and force would be so impressive that the Russian dynamism would come to terms. I can swallow a gnat or two like a flattop off the Argentine coast, but I balk at too many camels on my plate at one helping. It is a gratuitous assumption that the two Ziffian vulcanisms, ideologically so different, so vast in their federal extension, spreading over such ambiguously turbulent areas as they must, would either federate or work together more peacefully than the world emerging from the public volcano of the U. N.

FICTION IN REVIEW

Wishful Writing

I HAVE several times written in this column about the work of John Hersey as a very marked example of our recent political-literary tendency to reduce the complexity of the world to a series of easy choices between right and wrong social and personal attitudes. Irwin Shaw, whose short fiction frequently appears in the New Yorker, is another notable exponent of the same school of liberalistic over-simplification. There are twelve stories in Mr. Shaw's new volume, "Act of Faith" (Random House, $2.50), all on war themes. Even a brief synopsis of their content should indicate the facility with which they make their discriminations between human good and evil.

In Preach on the Dusty Road, a successful accountant, seeing his son off to war, wonders why he has spent his time trimming down the income taxes of his wealthy employers instead of working to save the world from its present doom. In Faith at Sea, a thirty-five-year-old naval lieutenant, sustained by the responsibility of his position and the confidence of his men, performs an appendectomy on a sick sailor. In Walking Wounded, a war-fatigued soldier contrasts the behavior of his gallant English wife and the war-profiteering of the women he meets in Cairo. In Retreat, a German major, retiring before the American advance on Paris, drinks beer with a French Jew and vainly protests his innocence of Nazi guilt. In Part in a Play, a French actor atones for the fact that he has played in the occupation theater by getting himself killed fighting the Germans. In Medal from Jerusalem, a German Jewess in Palestine scorns her Arab admirer and gives her love, and a St. Christopher medal, to a young Vermonter. In The Veterans Reflect, an American soldier, returning to his family in Chicago, is outraged by overhearing a rich business man insisting that the real danger in the world is Russia. In Act of Faith, a young Jewish soldier, whose friends have been persuading him to finance their leave by selling the Lüger he captured from a German, receives a letter from home describing the anti-Semitism in America; he wonders if it is wise to part with his gun, until he is reassured by the decency of his Gentile comrades.

This omits four of Mr. Shaw's stories—Gunner's Passage and Night in Algiers, which are merely fragmentary impressions, and Hamlets of the World and The Priest, which are the best stories in the volume and the only two which would be importantly minimized by so bald a summary. Hamlets of the World is about a young French officer, under Vichyite orders to resist the approaching American forces, who is killed by his men because he has no way of telling them what they are so anxious to hear—that he too wants to join the Americans instead of fighting them. The Priest is about a Jewish underground fighter, disguised as a priest, who has to give absolution to a devout Catholic comrade about to be executed by the Nazis. These two pieces alone, among the stories in "Act of Faith," seem to me to make more than their pedagogic point; they are the only stories in the volume that suggest that it is often not enough merely to be on the correct side in the struggle to save the democratic decencies.

But the clear moral oppositions in Mr. Shaw's stories—self-interest versus conscientious citizenship, sexual frivolity versus marital devotion, fighting the Nazis versus collaboration, and so on—are not the only evidence of the simplicity of his view of life. There is also Mr. Shaw's approach to the characters through whom he reads his lessons. It is worth noting that such small human complexity as Mr. Shaw can admit at all, he admits only in his "foreign" characters, in his Frenchmen or Germans or Arabs. His English and American soldiers are as unindividualized as figures in a poster. Young or old, officer or enlisted man, Jew or Gentile, they are virtually the same man—the composite clean, sincere, decent product of the best civilization in the world. In some part, perhaps, this sameness may be a result of Mr. Shaw's habit of understatement; in the Hemingway line, Mr. Shaw is addicted to few words and unannounced feelings, and there is nothing like this manner of terse brevity to create the illusion—even in a drunk—of clear-eyed reliability. Rather more significantly, it derives, I think, from the deep impulse to idealization. Of course the chauvinism implied in this much idealization is not unexpectable in war time. The formulation of mass ideals may even be a necessary work of war propaganda—and if one must have recourse to "types," I suppose Mr. Shaw's young Anglo-Saxon democratic fighter is not a bad type. The important thing is not to confuse this kind of poster drawing with art, which makes its generalizations by the nicest selection among particularities.

On the other hand, because Mr. Shaw's pieces fall so far short of the literary stature that is claimed for them, they must not be thought of as reporting, however first-hand may be the experience from which they stem—as, that is, true reporting, in the old-fashioned sense of the word. In the last few years we have been developing in this country a new kind of journalism, whose method is first to contrive the scene and then to record it. If we wish, for example, to "report" the typical white-collar worker's home, first we decide what we think such a home should look like; and if the real house on which we finally train our camera fails to conform to this ideal, there are always screens, filters, angles to help us get the desired view. Platonic journalism, one might call it; and Life, which each week gives us the flat, false, bright face of America, all the wrinkles removed or only such careful wrinkles introduced as will denote the honest American effort, is its most successful practitioner. It seems to me to be no accident that a novelist like John Hersey got his start on Life, and that one so quickly connects Mr. Hersey's work and Mr. Shaw's. I have the impression that the author of "Act of Faith" knew just what a war against fascism should look like before ever he went to it. There is nothing in his stories to indicate that a complicated reality was allowed to affect this ideal.

History Lesson

Dear Sirs: The admirable suggestion of Leonard Gordon to purchase Palestine with the $300,000,000 it has been proposed to give the Arabs reminds me that when I lived in France I heard it said that Napoleon once offered to buy Palestine from the Jews for a million francs. They disregarded the suggestion on the ground that prophecy had declared that the nations of the world would give Palestine to the Jewish people as their birthright.

It might be well to recall the history of Palestine. From archaeological research and Old Testament history we learn that the Hebrews settled in Palestine about 1400 B. C. and dominated its history for about fifteen hundred years. It was the center of pilgrimages during the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries A. D. when it was a stronghold of Christianity, until taken by the Moslems in 636. In the eleventh century the struggle between the Christians and Mohammedans resulted in the Crusades, and Jerusalem was taken by Godfrey de Bouillon and became a Christian capital until the sixteenth century, when it was conquered by the Turks. It remained under Turkish rule from 1517 until 1918.

Great Britain was given the mandate over Palestine by the League of Nations in trust for the Allied powers.

secret have to be given away free? Is that effective bargaining? Wouldn't it be better to make the continued manufacture of the bomb an avowed item of negotiation? Wouldn't it advance us farther if the United States were to announce that it would cease manufacture of the bomb as soon as the Soviet government took the first step toward effective world control? History Lesson

Dear Sirs: The admirable suggestion of Leonard Gordon to purchase Palestine with the $300,000,000 it has been proposed to give the Arabs reminds me that when I lived in France I heard it said that Napoleon once offered to buy Palestine from the Jews for a million francs. They disregarded the suggestion on the ground that prophecy had declared that the nations of the world would give Palestine to the Jewish people as their birthright.

It might be well to recall the history of Palestine. From archaeological research and Old Testament history we learn that the Hebrews settled in Palestine about 1400 B. C. and dominated its history for about fifteen hundred years. It was the center of pilgrimages during the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries A. D. when it was a stronghold of Christianity, until taken by the Moslems in 636. In the eleventh century the struggle between the Christians and Mohammedans resulted in the Crusades, and Jerusalem was taken by Godfrey de Bouillon and became a Christian capital until the sixteenth century, when it was conquered by the Turks. It remained under Turkish rule from 1517 until 1918.

Great Britain was given the mandate over Palestine by the League of Nations in trust for the Allied powers.

The Shape of Things

THE SCIENTIFIC AND TECHNICAL COMMITTEE of the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission has issued a report as illuminating to the layman as to those intrusted with devising means of keeping our world safe from atomic war. For a moment the shadow of Hiroshima is lifted, and we catch a glimpse of the vast potentialities of atomic energy in a world without bombs. The highly readable document presents a clear picture of the processes by which nuclear fuels and radioactive products are extracted from the two basic materials, uranium and thorium. It reaches the important conclusion that technical safeguards are possible to prevent fissionable materials from being diverted from peaceful to war-time uses. But it insists that such safeguards must be applied at every stage of the process from mine to atomic-fuel installations. The later stages are obviously the most dangerous and require the most rigorous supervision to prevent the diversion of nuclear material. Not only has the material reached a high degree of U-235 concentration, but the installations needed to make bombs from nuclear fuel are comparatively small and require only a limited, highly trained personnel for their operation. At this stage clandestine activities would be most difficult to detect. The committee deliberately excludes questions of the political feasibility of the necessary safeguards. But its line of reasoning leads directly to the acceptance of the main findings of the Lilienthal-Acheson and Baruch reports. The free exchange of scientific information and the close consultation of nuclear scientists may, as the committee suggests, aid in detecting possible clandestine activities. But nothing short of an over-all international Authority with full control over all atomic-energy development will provide adequate safeguards. It is to be hoped that the Soviet representative on the U. N. Atomic Energy Commission, who gave his assent to the technical report, will join with the other commission members in recognizing its much wider implications.

TODAY, WHEN A KING RETURNS FROM EXILE it's news—and not too good news at that. It can hardly be said that George II's return to Greece brings to a martyred people the fulfilment of hopes raised by the often-repeated war aims of the Allies. For in his name the days of the Metaxas terror have been restored. Former fascist leaders and Nazi collaborators direct the monarchist gendarmerie and vigilantes in their war of extermination against all Greeks who persist in their belief in freedom. UNRRA supplies are withheld from the wives and children of peasants who have fled to the mountains. Anti-malaria planes are commandeered to hunt down political refugees. Liberal and left leaders are deported to concentration camps in Greek islands, their lives at the mercy of monarchist jailers. The harvest stands ungathered because the peasants have fled from the terror. All plans for economic rehabilitation are suspended. And on the northern frontiers of Thrace and the Epirus, guerrilla bands infiltrate from Bulgaria and Albania, to provide the rightists with the pretext that their actions are in defense of Greek soil. It is too much to expect that George II will emerge as a heroic liberal figure who would bind up the wounds of his nation and actively support the rebuilding of democracy. His past record contains no sign of political enlightenment. But at least those outside powers who engineered his return should insist that he call off his supporters from their savage depredations, that he restore civil liberties, and that he widen his government to permit an infusion of liberal elements. It is also fair to insist that, in keeping with Stalin's recent assurances, the pro-Soviet states to the north desist from their pressure on the frontier and give the Greek people a chance to begin their long, painful march back to freedom.

CHARLES DE GAULLE'S UNCOMPROMISING opposition to the new French draft constitution places squarely upon him the responsibility for dividing France into two bitterly antagonistic groups. His speech at Epinal last Sunday was an example of the iniquitous policy of bloc-building, which is undermining the chances of real peace between nations, applied on a national scale. The man who symbolized "unity among Frenchmen" and who still protested at Epinal that he belongs neither to the right nor the left, has become the undisputed leader of French reaction. Having renounced the support of the M. R. P., which not only voted for the draft constitution but had a large hand in its preparation, De Gaulle must turn henceforth for support to the Parti Républicain de la Liberté and to the Cagoulards who have succeeded in entrenching themselves in the French army. INSIDE INFORMATION FROM CHINA CASTS grave doubt on Nanking's claims of great victories in its recent anti-Communist drive. Kuomintang losses in the past six weeks of fighting are estimated to be in the neighborhood of 130,000, or 15 per cent of the combat effectives at Chiang's disposal. This figure is accounted for by large-scale desertions and the surrender of several important units. Communist losses are not known, but they are believed to be much lighter because there have been few desertions and no instances in which whole units have gone over to the enemy. Chou En-lai, second-ranking Communist leader, is quoted as saying that the American arms captured will equip three Communist divisions. American correspondents have also reported noticing an increasing amount of Lend-Lease material in the hands of Yenan soldiers. Although the Kuomintang troops, aided by American arms and planes, have succeeded in taking a number of important cities, including the Communist base of Hwaiyin in North Kiangsu, the Communists, through their greater mobility and the support received from the peasants, have constantly harassed the flanks of the Kuomintang columns with a success not generally reported in the American press. The pattern is a familiar one in China. Anti-Communist liquidation campaigns were invariably "successful" during the early 1930's. If the recent campaigns have yielded no greater results than the above information suggests, the present moment would seem a propitious one for renewed American pressure for all-round political and military settlement.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN DESERVES THE SUPPORT of every American citizen in his firm stand against the lifting of meat ceilings. That the meat shortage is caused by a strike of packers and cattle growers against OPA regulations is so obvious a fact that the public should have no difficulty in fixing the blame. But with Republicans and Democrats alike seeking to make political capital out of the shortage, a forthright statement by the President was necessary to allay misunderstandings. Moreover, the statement should help in alleviating the shortage. For in serving notice that there would be no change in government policy, that the present ceilings on meat would be rigorously enforced, the President must have reassured thousands of small growers who had been withholding their cattle because of the rumors that meat would shortly be decontrolled. The statement was well-timed. As Secretary Anderson has pointed out, October is the month when the cattle-raisers usually begin to market their grass-fed stock. While the bumper corn crop will make it possible for a larger number of animals to be fattened for later sale, Department of Agriculture statistics indicated that only about 25 per cent of the cattle are normally held back for grain feeding. Last week's figures show an increase of 50 per cent in the number of cattle slaughtered as compared with the previous week. Thus, we should expect a distinct improvement in the meat situation within a few weeks if the present effective measures against the black market can be maintained and strengthened. It is essential, however, that all of us keep our heads and not allow either packer propaganda or the Republican search for an election issue to create a state of public hysteria that would force a change in Administration policy.

Their Own Petards

IN THESE frantic and complex days when the vintage of wrath is being trampled out in the capitals of the world, when global conflicts and national politics demand more and more attention, the harried liberal has reason to be thankful that certain individuals and groups keep on fighting those less dramatic battles which tend to get lost in the cosmic shuffle, but which must nevertheless be won, and won the hard way.

Such a deserving group is the Committee for the Nation's Health, an organization headed by Dr. Channing Frothingham, which carries on the good fight for national health insurance as embodied in the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, S. 1606.

Among the more intriguing products of Dr. Frothingham's campaign is a recently published statement submitted to the Senate Education and Labor Committee to refute the hysterical pamphleteering of the National Physicians' Committee, an independent protégé of the American Medical Association, bound by the latter's policies. The fillip in this particular statement is in the method of refutation: the N. P. C. is confounded with a factual analysis of S. 1606 prepared by the Bureau of Legal Medicine and Legislation of the A. M. A. itself and published in the Journal of the American Medical Association. The A. M. A. is thus permitted to make a liar out of one of its own unofficial spokesmen, and the spectacle is thoroughly enjoyable.

For example, the N. P. C. stated in one of its fulminations: "The doctor would have little if any interest in the patient who is compelled to visit him. . . . Sick people must depend on a doctor that has been assigned by a political bureaucrat." Dr. Frothingham supplied the italics and the Journal supplied the answer: "A beneficiary may select any practitioner appearing on a panel to treat him subject to the consent of the practitioner or the group of practitioners, as the case may be." The N. P. C. tells the public: "The Surgeon General would be authorized to determine what hospitals or clinics may provide service for patients and under what conditions." The A. M. A. analysis, on the other hand, explains: "The Surgeon General shall exercise no supervision or control over a participating hospital unless it is owned or leased and operated by the United States." There are many more confutations, just as startling, the sum total of which should illustrate the hopeless confusion of the cause which our medical pontiffs promote; men who descend to scare campaigns are usually hard-pressed for logic. No less than six public-opinion polls have sampled sentiment on national health insurance, and all found a majority of the people in favor, in proportions ranging from 59 to 85 per cent. Against such popular indorsement, and against such alert protagonists as Dr. Frothingham and his cohorts, the A. M. A. should make sure that its spokesmen at least compare notes hereafter if it would succeed in its efforts to keep adequate medical care for all American citizens from ever becoming a reality.

TWO SPECIAL FEATURES are introduced in this week's Nation

Pre-Election U. S. A.

Each week, from now until the November voting, The Nation will carry on-the-spot reports from the key districts where a slight shift of votes will spell the difference between a Democratic and a Republican victory. Robert Bendiner, Nation associate editor, leads off with three articles on the New England states and New York. He will make two further trips into the Middle West and the Mid-Atlantic states. Ernest Kirschten will write from St. Louis, Pete Akers from Chicago, Dick Neuberger from Portland, and Carey McWilliams from Los Angeles.

In One Ear: A NEW RADIO COLUMN

The Nation's new radio page will be edited by Lou Frankel, one-time radio editor of Variety and of Billboard and now continuity director of Station WHCU, Cornell University. No one associated with radio is better qualified to write on the radio industry, on radio advertising, on radio programs, and to provide Nation listeners with a critical guide to the airways. We predict this will become one of our most talked-of columns.

Stalin's Letter

IN FRAMING his answers to the questionaire submitted by the British correspondent, Alexander Werth, Premier Stalin clearly took into account the internal as well as the external situation. His letter was immediately broadcast throughout the Soviet Union and served to produce a perceptible relaxation of tension. The Russian people needed reassurance that war was not imminent. For months the Soviet propaganda machine had been telling them of capitalistic conspiracies to encircle Russia, and the dismissal of Mr. Wallace had aroused fears that the Western warmongers had triumphed and were about to launch their attack. Stalin, in effect, reversed this propaganda line. He said that there was no "real danger of a new war," that the atom bomb was not a decisive military weapon, and that the foreign warmongers were a noisy but politically impotent minority.

Outside the Soviet Union the letter also produced a drop in the temperature, while adding new material to the debate begun by the Wallace episode. It was, in fact, well designed to increase the doubts about official American policy held by many middle-of-the-roaders whose thinking is not dictated by Moscow but who refuse to accept the theory of "irrepressible conflict" between East and West. In Britain, particularly, the Stalin letter seems likely to reinforce those who feel that Foreign Secretary Bevin has backed uncritically an American policy which has passed lightheartedly from firmness to provocation. It is not only the Labor left wing which voices such views. They have been expressed with equal emphasis by the liberal Economist and indorsed, albeit with diplomatic circumlocution, by the conservative leader, Anthony Eden. With Stalin's letter offering a hope that the "new spirit and new approach" asked for by Eden are practicable, the pressure on Bevin to adopt a more independent attitude is likely to be increased.

Reactions of the State Department to the Stalin letter have been decidedly cool. On the one hand, there is a complacent tendency to regard it as a tribute to the effectiveness of the Byrnes policies; on the other, there is a demand that fair words be followed by fair deeds in the shape of a less aggressive Soviet attitude in international negotiations. Of this, admittedly, there has been no sign since Stalin spoke. The Russian delegation in Paris has pursued its objectives with undiminished truculence, and the Kremlin has dispatched a new note to Turkey on the Dardanelles question framed in ominously minatory terms. But an immediate softening of Russian policies was hardly to be expected; in the absence of some positive response by the Western powers to Stalin's gesture, that might be interpreted as a sign of weakness.

Before the real worth of that gesture can properly be evaluated, some sign of reciprocity rather more arresting than Mr. Truman's expression of belief in permanent peace is surely called for. It ought to be possible for our statesmen, without loss of face, to discover whether Stalin is really prepared to discuss a way out of the impasse that has been reached in American-Soviet relations. It may be, as Walter Lippmann has suggested, that the Soviet government is looking for "a breathing spell," and is willing to call a halt to expansion until it has restored Russia's war-wilted economy and provided itself with the atomic bomb. Even so, we ought not to reject any opportunity for a truce, since we, just as much as Russia, need a breathing spell. Without it we cannot hope to rebuild the economic foundations of the Western world and provide it with a structure of social security —the only real fortification against the eventual advance of communism.

In his letter Stalin twice declared that peaceful collaboration and friendly competition between the Soviets and Western democracy was possible. It has hardly seemed so during the Paris conference, where the American policy of the open door has been squarely opposed by Russia. Moreover, the Soviets have consistently cold-shouldered the international institutions which this country has sponsored as a means of freeing and expanding world trade. Does Stalin's declaration of belief in the possibilities of peaceful collaboration indicate a change in this line? It may be so and for very practical reasons. On another page in this issue Keith Hutchison presents facts which suggest that the food situation in Russia is critical. Recent reports by American correspondents in the Ukraine show that industrial reconstruction is proceeding slowly because of lack of man-power. Workers must be recruited from the farms, but until more farm machinery is provided they cannot be spared. This year UNRRA is helping to fill the gap between production and consumption in western Russia, but when it ceases its activities the shortage of goods may become alarming. Equally, UNRRA has been providing a life-belt for some of Russia's satellites in Eastern Europe. When it packs up, these countries will be on their own except to the extent that the Soviet Union can render aid out of its own attenuated resources. The logical conclusion of the policies which the Soviets have been pursuing up to now is economic isolation. That seems likely to mean a period of intense hardship both for the Russians and the inhabitants of the Russian sphere of influence, and perhaps inability to fulfill her Five-Year Plan.

That is the reason why, in return for economic assistance, Stalin may be ready to modify present Russian hostility to the American international economic program. Hard-boiled Russophobes may argue that we should refuse any deal and let the Russians stew in their own juice. Experience after the last war should be sufficient to warn us against the danger of an isolated Russia.

In any case we should remember that if the Russians need our help, we need theirs. We are, perhaps, in a position to slow up reconstruction in Eastern Europe, but they have the power to check recovery in Western Europe and particularly to prevent the reintegration of Germany into the European economy. The possibilities of a deal are obvious, and if Stalin is ready to trade, let us not lightly reject the opportunity.

Liberalism at Los Angeles

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

UNDER any circumstances the recent conference at Los Angeles conducted by The Nation Associates would have aroused immense interest, for the question under discussion — The Challenge of the Post-War World to the Liberal Movement—is an urgent one and a distinguished group of men and women contributed to the program. But events added an almost poignant intensity to the meeting. If the committee in charge had employed Hollywood's best publicity experts to give the conference a build-up they could never have thought of a stunt to compete with the Wallace incident.

Henry Wallace dominated the sessions, symbolizing in both his position and his fate the issue between the progressive forces in his country and those which are creating a right-wing coalition masquerading under the label of bi-partisanship. Although he had been belatedly adopted by the extreme left, it was the non-Communist groups who saw in the whole incident a dramatization of their basic dilemma—the dilemma of a progressive mass disunited and cut off by changing political currents from the organizational base from which, during the Roosevelt era, it had exercised effective power.

The conference also gained significance from the fact that it was a regional enterprise, though geared to national and world events. Organized by Lillie Shultz, director of The Nation Associates, it was carried through in close and continuous consultation with a number of West Coast progressive leaders. Chief among them was our staff contributor, Carey McWilliams, whose knowledge of the region—political, social, even geographical —is unequaled. It was Mr. McWilliams who edited the special conference edition of The Nation, described on the inside front cover this week, and who helped prepare the program of the five sessions. As a consequence the discussions were intimately related to the chief problems of the Pacific Coast, both economic and political. Speakers were mostly drawn from the area, with a few imported from the East to emphasize national and international aspects of the program. Most of the important independent civic and political groups cooperated and sent delegations. The sessions were crowded—several to overflowing; I have never attended a serious meeting where attention was keener or where everyone present participated more actively and intelligently.

Although domestic issues aroused plenty of interest, especially those bearing on the political campaign, the international crisis in all its aspects stirred the conference most profoundly. At the session on world affairs Mr. del Vayo's talk on Spain and Greece got the warmest response, and not only because it was eloquent and moving. In that gathering, the fate of the two nations, expressing so dramatically and painfully the failure of the democracies' foreign policy, was taken as a symbol of the fight that must be won in our own country if the hold of the Old Guard is to be broken. Similarly, at the dinner, Bartley Crum's urgent plea for a new approach to world problems—not only to Russia—won the greatest applause, while his dramatic proposal that a third party be created to crystallize liberal sentiment had a mixed reception. Without question, West Coast progressives have made the Administration's record in foreign affairs the test of its claim to liberal support in every field.

California is a state where political interest is lively, discussion free, lines loosely drawn, personalities important. People like to say: "In California, politics are fluid." No words could express the situation better. Until recently the left groupings, from Communists and their sympathizers to the liberal elements in the old parties, have supported a loose coalition or at least maintained a truce. The factional fight has been less bitter, open breaks less sharp and final, than in the East. Lately, however, for a variety of reasons even the appearance of a popular front has been harder to keep up. The state political fight in particular—described by Carey McWilliams in The Nation for June 22—crystallized existing animosities and created a demand for new alignments that would more exactly express the honest differences among progressive groups. An extremely interesting paper read at the conference by Harry Girvetz of the University of Santa Barbara, representing what might be termed the "right liberal" position, called for a new political organization which would explicitly disavow communism and the Communist Party but at the same time refuse to become involved in anti-Communist polemics or "make the mistake of identifying communism with fascism," and which would set about putting into effect a program based upon clearly formulated liberal principles. That such an organization will come into being is questionable, since many independent progressives prefer to minimize the issue of communism as far as possible, concentrating on positive, though independent, action and avoiding open factional conflict.

But whatever their opinion about political organization on the left, progressives in California, like progressives everywhere, realize that a vacuum exists today in the political life of America. The place occupied in Roosevelt's day by the New Deal and the elements that backed it, nationally and locally, is empty. No political force now operating has been able to prevent a rapid shift of power within the Democratic Party to its more reactionary elements. That is why the stand taken by Henry Wallace aroused such anxious hope in all progressive groups, and why, in California, the coincidence of Wallace's dismissal converted the conference of The Nation Associates into a political convention of the independent progressive forces of the Coast.

[Next week The Nation will discuss editorially the political significance of the plans and program formulated by the conference of progressives held last Saturday and Sunday at Chicago.]

In the Light of Bikini

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, September 28

ON Monday afternoon an elderly Negro messenger trundled a car through a narrow hall in the Commerce Department. It was piled high with paper cartons crammed with Henry Wallace's personal files. After thirteen years in the Cabinet, this was the exit.

In his handsome wood-paneled office Wallace was saying goodby to old friends. His was the only cheerful face in the smoke-filled room. One reason for his good humor was the mail stacked on desks, chairs, and tables in the outer office. It came from every section of the nation. The phrases were emotional. It was the kind of mail Franklin Roosevelt used to get.

President Truman's part in the Wallace controversy brought a curious reaction at his news conference this afternoon. He was reading a prepared statement on the meat situation and wandered off the written script for emphasis. He said earnestly, and without realizing the connotation, that he knew what he was talking about—this time. A roar of laughter swept the room.

Henry Wallace had been a private citizen only a few days when the military began to speak its mind on war and peace. Vice-Admiral Denfeld, who is being groomed for chief of naval operations, told an audience at William and Mary College that the United States must be ready to defend itself "at the drop of a hat."

Tuesday afternoon a sleek naval transport lay beside a pier in the Washington Navy Yard. It was the U. S. S. Burleson, home from the Pacific after being headquarters ship at the Bikini atomic-bomb tests. When the reporters were all assembled, Vice-Admiral Blandy, deputy chief of naval operations for special weapons, strode into the wardroom. He got down to business right away, speaking in a crisp professional voice: "These tests are one form of being prepared for war. The best way to avert war is to be prepared for it. Our slipshod methods in the past have resulted in great loss of life. We have a chance to prevent the next war—I do not refer to any specific war—by preparing for it."

This philosophy off his chest, Admiral Blandy turned the press conference over to the medical officers. They had news of what might happen to the world in an atomic war. It was all very scientific and sterile—an account of the effect of atomic radiation on animals used in the Bikini tests. From a five-page mimeographed statement we learned:

> Deaths may be expected up to and even months after the animals are exposed to radiation sickness. Animals affected by severe radiation become apathetic, lose appetite, appear weak, and are prone to develop secondary infections causing deaths. Those with the heaviest doses die within a few days. Those with lighter doses show no immediate ill effects. They develop mild but more prolonged symptoms which may result in death.
> Radiation sickness is painless in its effects on animals. Since the animal has no knowledge it has the disease, there is none of the mental anguish that assails a human being. The animal merely languishes or dies a painless death. Suffering among the animals was negligible.

Vice-Admiral McIntire, chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, was asked by an uneasy reporter if the tests had revealed any way of preventing damage to man. He replied vaguely, "There is no question we saved the lives of some animals. This is a continuing thing."

Some of his subordinates, men who had worked on the tests, were not so reassuring. A reporter said, "I read the other day that an Oak Ridge scientist died from atomic radiation. Have you had any successful treatment for human beings?" The answer was, "We hope we will learn methods to save those exposed to moderate amounts of radiation. I do not believe it will ever be possible to cure those with heavy doses."

The man answering most of the questions, Captain Shields Warren, a reserve officer, was asked what he meant by a "moderate" dose of radiation. He replied thoughtfully, "That depends upon the animal. Insects can stand up to 100,000 R units. If man gets from 300 to 500 R units, that is sufficient to kill. Guinea pigs are slightly more susceptible than man. The rat is more resistant. A moderate dose would be less than 300 R units."

Besides the loss of white blood cells, radiation, Captain Warren explained, caused sterility. "The sex cells of the body are more sensitive to radiation. It is possible for animals or man not to be killed but to have the sex cells destroyed. In some animals used in the test there is evidence of atrophy of the testes." In his professional manner he added, "The mice were not harmed."

In the second Bikini test all the pigs, which have about the same susceptibility as man, were killed. A reporter mused, "I assume, then, all the men on a ship so exposed would have been killed." Captain Warren said his guess was they would have died unless evacuated immediately. Admiral Blandy was not enjoying this line of talk. He interrupted to say positively, "The fact that all pigs were killed does not mean all men would have been, too." That ended that.

Were there any changes in the habits of the animals? Yes, Captain Warren said, they were restless, irritable, and aggressive for two or three weeks. If they recovered, they got over it.

Was there any means of protecting an individual on shipboard from atomic radiation? The captain said that any armor that might be devised would be useless, because it would keep the individual motionless. Admiral Blandy explained, "The men have duties to perform and they can't be tied down."

The Admiral was asked whether the results of the tests would be made available internationally. He answered in firm tones, "No, they remain secret United States property." He could not even reveal the position of the animals on the target ships. He had a strict security directive from the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The questions moved on—was there anything to the idea that electronics might be useful in atomic warfare? Admiral Blandy replied, "This has not been pursued. It is just conjecture. I don't believe it's feasible."

Were any structural changes on ships being contemplated as safety measures? The Admiral said drily, "Principally, removal of the patient before exposure. The best protection is not to be there when the bomb goes off."

His last statement was offered crisply, "We are bringing some of the ships back to the naval yard to acquaint personnel with the hazards in a possible war."

After the conference the correspondents clambered down the wooden steps built alongside the ship on the pier and walked off through the Navy Yard in a heavy rain. It was a relief to get away from the world of atomic war.

Will Germany Go Communist?

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Berlin, September 20

GERMAN political life is still developing in an unreal world because the crucial issues—relations between Russia and the West, the forcing of millions of persons expelled from Eastern Europe on an already overcrowded population, and the paralysis of German economy—cannot be discussed, all criticism of military government or any Allied power being prohibited. It is on these issues, however, that the people are dividing into political parties, and on their resolution that the political future of Germany depends.

In the states of the American zone the old Socialist Party, the S. P. D., has a voting strength of from 28 to 43 per cent. The Communists have a uniform strength of about 10 per cent. Russian-supported efforts to combine the Socialists and Communists have been resisted in western Germany but have been successful in the Russian zone, where the Socialist Unity Party is now the official instrument. Every kind of pressure was exerted to guarantee its victory in the recent elections. The Russians even prohibited people from voting for the opposition parties in places where these parties did not have complete slates of local candidates. This made the opposition impotent everywhere but in the larger cities, and the 40 per cent vote against the Unity Party appears therefore the more surprising. The Russians may be expected gradually to reduce the vote of the opposition and to increase that of the official party by their customary methods.

The victories of the Unity Party in Russian-controlled areas cannot, however, hide the fact that the Russians suffered a major defeat in the west, where the Socialists resolutely refused to be swallowed up. This defeat has exerted great influence on both Russian and Anglo-American policy. The Russians are no longer pressing for the unification of Germany, for their hope of controlling it ideologically has waned. On the other hand, our interest in unification has been increased, as was revealed in Secretary Byrnes's speech, because we now know that Germany will not go Communist if we give it half a chance. The vigor with which Germans right down to the Socialist left wing have rejected communism must be seen to be believed. The best proof of it is that the heavy burden of occupation troops is gladly borne so long as it guarantees that Russia will not occupy the whole country. Secretary Byrnes's assurance that we would stay in Germany as long as any other nation did was the climax of his speech for the Germans.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, a staff contributor of The Nation, is professor of Christian Ethics at Union Theological Seminary. After attending the World Council of Protestant Churches in England last summer, he went to Germany to obtain a first-hand impression of the political situation there.

The new political development in Germany is that all non-Socialist and non-Communist elements in the nation have been brought together in a kind of catch-all party, similar to the French M. R. P., called the Christian Democratic Union. The core of the new party is the old Catholic Center and Bavarian People's Party, but the Protestants have joined it in force. Its formation is evidence of the revival of Christian influence in the nation, due to the part played by the churches in the fight against Nazism, but it also shows that the question of religious instruction in the schools was given a disproportionate emphasis in the election propaganda because the real issues were taboo. The Christian Union has no clear economic-political line, representing as it does everything from extreme Bavarian clericalism to left-wing Christian socialism. Some of this Christian socialism is more realistic than the kind of socialism that indulges in utopian illusions and promises a "classless society and eternal peace"—concepts which have no conceivable relevance to the bitter realities of the moment. Certain elements in the Socialist Party desire to cease the age-old cultural-religious struggle and make common cause with the social-minded Christian groups. Others insist that the Christian Democratic Union must be regarded as a reactionary wolf in sheep's clothing.

The former group has just had a significant victory in Bavaria, where a proposal for a provision in the new Bavarian constitution creating a Presidency in Bavaria was voted down. The measure was a façade for reactionary monarchist and separatist tendencies and was defeated by a combination of left-wing Christian votes and left-wing Socialist votes. The Socialist leadership voted for the proposal, thus proving that the Socialist like the Christian Party has not yet reached a stable political orientation. It is more than likely that a party will emerge in Germany which will be pragmatically rather than dogmatically Socialist, which will seek to embody historic Christian rather than pure Marxist cultural forms and to deal with the problems of freedom and planning after the manner of the British Labor Party.

While all parties in western Germany except the Communists are vigorously anti-Russian, it must not be assumed that the Communists have lost Germany irretrievably. Russian terror has cured the Germans of communism, but our stupidity may cure them of attachment to democracy. Democracy can flourish only where there is at least some economic health; yet we are permitting western Germany to languish in a fantastic "cigarette economy," an economy of scarcity in which no consumer goods are available and everyone but the farmer is hungry.

The industrial production of Germany is so low that the thirty-odd million dollars' worth of export goods which the country has amassed in a year would not pay for its food deficit for three months, even on the present scale of hunger consumption. The cost of occupation eats up whatever surplus might be accumulated. The Russians have geared the economy of eastern Germany into their own. Their great poverty in consumer goods prevents them, however, from raising living standards in their zone. Otherwise they could make our position completely untenable. The British and American zones have better food standards than the other two because the British and American armies do not live off the land. The slight advantage that our zone enjoys is due to the greater scarcity of food in the British zone and the shortages in Britain itself. The general economic paralysis is worse in the British zone than in ours, but the people are hungry everywhere, and diseases of malnutrition are on the increase.

To the misery of hunger is added the misery of overcrowding. Two and one-quarter persons to a room is the average in Germany. And the overcrowding is constantly being heightened by our policy of forcing the people to receive about 100,000 Germans a month from Czechoslovakia, Silesia, and Hungary. When the process is completed, a population of seventeen million Germans in our zone will have absorbed an additional two and one-quarter million expelled Germans.

As if to increase the discomfort, we are evicting more and more Germans from their homes to make room for the families of British and American troops. The British have just evicted 16,000 Germans in Hamburg alone. Usually four or five German families have to be evicted to make room for one American or British officer's family, who seem to have acquired standards of luxury never indulged in or dreamed of before. The contrasts are fantastic and have a bad influence on German morale. Moreover, the wealth and power on one side, the poverty and weakness on the other are largely responsible for the sexual immorality of an army of occupation. What can be expected when a package of cigarettes worth seven cents to the donor is worth a month's wages to the recipient?

Our own occupation authorities cap all other injustices with a policy of strict segregation of the conquered. Even the most renowned pianist, asked to perform for an officers' dinner, must eat in the kitchen. The worst of the British officials treat the Germans as colonials; the better ones dine with them on terms of equality. We have a good-natured or ill-natured boorishness which is not as bad as the worst British practice or as good as the best. On the cultural level the French have undoubtedly achieved the best policy. In the universities in their zone there is a genuine personal and cultural interchange unknown in the other zones.

But these conditions, appalling as they are to the observer, are insignificant in comparison with the broader problem. If the general economic paralysis of Germany continues, no real social or spiritual health can develop. Secretary Byrnes assured the Germans that we wanted to change this situation. He implied that the political and economic unification of Germany would bring about a revival of German economic activity. Unfortunately there is not the slightest hope that the Russians will agree to such unification. They would want the unification of Germany only if they could dominate the nation ideologically, and that is precisely what they would not be able to do if trade and industry were revived. They will therefore hang on to their part of Germany and try to increase economic misery in our part by holding us to the letter of the Potsdam agreement.

Sooner or later we shall have to decide how to restore a measure of economic health to western Germany and Europe without waiting on Russia. We have learned the necessity of strategically resisting Russian penetration into Western Europe. But unless we support our political policy with an adequate economic policy, Soviet ideology will cross our strategic barrier. If anyone thinks that peace can be secured by such a development he has read the history of the past decades in vain.

Pre-Election U.S.A.

BY ROBERT BENDINER

I. Along the Connecticut Valley

Hartford, Connecticut

THE political spotlight of the nation passed over this lively and overcrowded capital on September 17, hovered for an hour above Bushnell Memorial Hall, where the Democrats were picking an election slate—and moved on to more promising fields. Had the Democrats nominated Chester Bowles for governor, as everyone including Mr. Bowles fully expected, the spotlight would have remained over the Connecticut Valley for the next six weeks. In the first place, the election would have been a clear-cut plebiscite on the OPA in particular and the New Deal philosophy in general; and, second, it would have given the politicians a gauge for measuring the polling appeal of a man with Presidential possibilities—and Presidential aspirations.

Instead, the delegates gathered at Hartford chose as their standard-bearer Lieutenant Governor Wilbert Snow, a picturesque and pleasant poet from the backwoods of Maine—by way of Wesleyan University—and declined to set Mr. Bowles on the path to the White House. It should not be imagined, despite editorials in the New York Sun and Herald Tribune, that the decision rested on a fear that the personification of OPA would be too heavy a burden for their ticket to bear. On the contrary, Bowles lost the nomination because he was too likely to win the election. A confidential Roper poll on all candidates, taken on request of Democratic leaders in August, showed Bowles a favorite by something more than six to one. But party bosses do not always play to win, and this was one of the occasions when defeat was figured to be more profitable than victory. To lose the election would be to forgo control of State House patronage for the time being; but to win with a man as independent as Bowles might mean to lose it permanently.

It is not accurate to say that Senator Brien McMahon, who runs Connecticut's Democratic machine, actually knifed Bowles at the convention; he merely stood by and as an interested spectator watched that operation performed by others—specifically by the small-town delegates and such lesser bosses as Francis Smith of Hartford, a millionaire lumber dealer on whom price controls have always had a toxic effect. Hostile from the start to Bowles's candidacy, McMahon had at first tried to scare him off, and reluctantly indorsed him only when the results of the poll gave him no alternative. But by that time, as he frankly admitted, he had so far encouraged Snow that the most he could do was to announce his own intention to vote for Bowles and leave the rest to the chances of the convention.

Even so Bowles could have, and should have, won. Privately, he attributes his defeat to three failures on his own part: first, in an honest anxiety to dissociate himself from the techniques of the "Huckster" profession, from which he is a fugitive, he resorted to none of those high-pressure maneuvers which win delegates and influence newspaper publishers; second, he spurned deals, freely offered down to the zero hour, whereby he might have bought batches of delegates at the ceiling price of one commissionership per batch; and, third, he had no manager. Of these self-imposed political handicaps, he says, he regrets only the last. His promptness in moving the convention to make the vote for Snow unanimous and his agreement to campaign vigorously for the ticket made a favorable impression on party leaders, and it is a good—and pleasant—bet that neither Connecticut nor national politics has seen the last of him.

If Bowles emerged from the convention with his political hide intact, the same cannot be said of his party. Connecticut is a state with a large independent vote, particularly in the trade unions and in intellectual circles (next to insurance the academic nurture of the intellect is Connecticut's outstanding industry). This independent vote is vital to Democratic victory, but it is a lazy vote, one that requires enthusiastic conviction and even then considerable prodding. In the past decade Franklin D. Roosevelt had no trouble arousing that enthusiasm, and P. A. C. and its predecessors could be counted on for the prodding. Without Roosevelt it was believed that Bowles would provide the name and the political drawing power required to get out the marginal vote. Now that he is eliminated, the party's hopes of carrying the state are plainly at a low ebb. A few numerical facts will show the reason.

Senator McMahon

Connecticut has six Congressmen, including one Representative at Large. In 1944 the state elected two Republicans to Congress and four Democrats, including the Representative at Large, whose fate depends almost entirely on the fate of the ticket as a whole. Of the three Democratic victories in the Congressional districts, one was by a 54 per cent vote, one by 51.4 per cent, and one by a scant 51 per cent.

That was with Roosevelt at the head of the ticket. These same Democratic candidates now face an election on a slate headed by two respectable but uninspiring gentlemen, and they must seek to retain their exceedingly narrow margins among the very groups most outraged by the convention's treatment of Bowles.

There is no doubt that labor, in the industrial towns, is in a sullen mood over the recent turn of events. It wanted Bowles, and it wanted a chance to demonstrate its support of price control. It has nothing against Snow, but his appeal has been directed futilely to the rural vote, which is almost hopelessly Republican here, as virtually everywhere in the North. The opinion is general that Snow is liberal and honest—but politically inept and a poor campaigner. He is fond of talking whimsically of his experiences in chasing reindeer in Alaska, and even in a state that dotes on professor-politicians his academic aura will give him no advantage, since he will have to share such honors with his opponent. The Republican candidate, Dr. James L. McConaughy, is a cold and thoroughly reactionary don who for years administered the affairs of Wesleyan University, which happens also to be the institution served by Mr. Snow.

Snow is politically unsophisticated, and while this is not altogether to be condemned, his celebrated tactlessness may prove a considerable handicap. Typical of the tales about him is the story of how he harangued a Polish Catholic group near Hartford recently for being resentful toward the Soviets. Shocked, the local bishop walked out of the room, and the audience gasped. In consequence the Poles of Hartford County are not expected to be of much help to the Democratic ticket. Snow's directness is refreshing, however, and he would probably make a better governor than a candidate—certainly a better governor than McConaughy, who accepted the nomination with the solemn declaration that the big issue of the day was communism and that "the two greatest fighters against American communism are the church and the Republican Party."

The Democratic nominee for the Senate is hardly more likely to stir up the enthusiasm of the vital marginal group than is Snow. Logically Joe Tone should be sure of the trade-union vote. Formerly state labor commissioner, he has long been part of or close to the labor movement, but because of an unhappy episode in the dim past (he denies it even happened) he has incurred the animosity of the A. F. of L. around New Haven, and of the Railway Brotherhoods as well. Moreover, he is up against Governor Baldwin, a vote-getter good enough to win in 1944 despite the Roosevelt landslide. Baldwin is counting on some portion of the labor vote, since nearly a third of it in the state is normally Republican. As a bid for this support he successfully opposed the aspirations of Representative Joseph E. Talbot, Clare Luce's candidate for governor and a man whose record in Congress is all black. But Baldwin has made enemies within his own party, and the fact that he was drawing $10,000 a year from the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company while governor will be used against him—even though this dubious practice has the sanction of the law in Connecticut.

In the circumstances the Democratic Congressional nominees appreciate fully the uphill fight that confronts them. When I talked with Herman Kopplemann in the First District (Hartford), he was so skeptical of victory that he could not make up his mind to run, though I am told that he regularly puts off this decision until the zero hour. Kopplemann is elected when the vote is high, as it was in 1932, '34, '36, '40, and '44 (note that only one of them was a midterm election); he is defeated when the vote is low, as in '38 and '42. He is afraid of the apathy apparent in Democratic ranks this year and complains wistfully that "Republicans consider it a duty to vote, while Democrats regard it as a favor to the candidate."

Even more in jeopardy than Kopplemann's seat is that of James P. Geelan, running in the Third District, which centers in New Haven. Like Kopplemann, Geelan has an excellent voting record, but he is a colorless candidate and needs a strong ticket to pull him through.

Strangely enough, the only Democratic Representative given a good chance of victory is Mrs. Chase Going Woodhouse, who won out in the rock-ribbed Republican Second District in 1944 by less than 2 per cent. A professor of economics, Mrs. Woodhouse, gray-haired and motherly, might be thought a likely casualty. But every politician, newspaperman, and observer I talked to volunteered the opinion that she was as shrewd and able as anyone in Connecticut politics and an excellent campaigner. By any liberal standard, her voting record has been unexceptionable, but she knows that public policy is only one aspect of a Representative's work. Rightly or wrongly, service to constituents is at least as important, and in this field she can give lessons to many an old-timer. With the aid of her daughter and two or three assistants, Mrs. Woodhouse has carefully checked every request for help, and where aid was feasible and justified she has gone to work on the appropriate government agency. Mail is answered within twenty-four hours, and her constituents are kept posted on her activities by regular radio reports. So effective has this policy been that many a Republican neighbor is pledged to vote for her, not on the basis of her support of OPA or full employment, but because she brought the wounded Smith boy back to a base hospital in the States or because she got a pressing claim settled for Mr. McGillicuddy.

Much may happen between now and November that will change the Connecticut picture. Baldwin and McConaughy are vulnerable nominees if the labor-liberal forces choose to wade into their records. But these groups, which constitute the vital independent vote, will have to overcome their resentment concerning Bowles, their divisions over the Wallace affair, and the general lassitude of a mid-term election. That is a lot to overcome, but unless it is done I would hazard the guess that the present four-to-two ratio, favoring the Democrats, in the state's Congressional delegation will become four-to-two (and perhaps even five-to-one) in favor of the Republicans. In other words, the G. O. P., seeking twenty-five seats to win control of the next Congress, will pick up two or three of them—possibly four—in the single state of Connecticut.

[Mr. Bendiner's second article, appearing next week, will discuss the preelection situation in Massachusetts.]

Reflections in Trieste

BY G. E. R. GEDYE

Trieste, September 18

THE immediate reaction of anyone emerging for a time from the gray monotony of partitioned, grim, and hungry Austria into the material comforts of Trieste is that of a schoolboy on holiday. The shop windows are full of good things—at high prices—purchasable without ration cards; the restaurants are as good as were pre-war restaurants in a town of this size anywhere. Coming from a country without one open restaurant or a shop selling anything which anybody could conceivably make use of, one deliberately shuts one's eyes to realities and relaxes for twenty-four hours.

Few people capable of rational thought could stay in Trieste much longer without discomfort. For here in this narrow territory of Venezia Giulia one is presented with a concentrated sample of the bitter fruits of our victory over fascism. Nowhere is the naked reality of power politics more shamelessly revealed; nowhere does propaganda more openly distort day-to-day developments to give a picture far removed from reality. The strident insistence of the propagandists has apparently succeeded in convincing the masses of the population that the issue is one of racial self-determination as between Slav and Latin. In reality, of course, the issue is whether the magnificent harbor of Trieste is for the first time in history to fall under "Eastern" instead of "Western" control. Ultimately the decision will vitally affect the future set-up in the Central European states. For as Mussolini conclusively proved, he who holds Trieste can bring irresistible economic pressure to bear on the political development of these states, especially Austria and Hungary, whose ability to import and export depends on Trieste and their communications with it. Hence the lavish, cynical, and unscrupulous efforts of the propagandists; hence also the unreality of "Western"-controlled A. M. G.'s efforts to maintain full impartiality between Latin and Slav. By its very constitution

G. E. R. GEDYE is the Vienna correspondent of the London Daily Herald and of the Overseas Press of New York.

A. M. G. is bound to favor some form of Latin solution—or at least to prevent a solution which would give the East a stranglehold on Central Europe.

The issue of East versus West has long swamped the racial divisions. I have seen dozens of large-scale pro-Tito demonstrations where the Italian Communist shouts of "Vogliamo Tito!" completely drowned the Slovene Communist cries of "Zhivel Tito!" Many local Slovenes, on the other hand, as well as refugees from Tito's Yugoslavia—among them, of course, reactionaries, but also many who are simply non-Communists—are working eagerly for any solution other than the incorporation of Trieste in Communist Yugoslavia. In the mountainous, unfertile region which makes up Venezia Giulia, the population is almost entirely Slovene. Hence the colored maps supplied by the Tito propagandists are based on space—and are able to prove conclusively that nearly the whole area of Venezia Giulia is Slovene. But this hinterland is very sparsely populated; the crowded towns and ports are almost all Italian. Hence the maps supplied by Colonel Fonda and his pro-Italy propagandists of the anti-fascist Italian resistance movement are based on population—and show great blobs of Italian color. Neither suggests the existence of a quiet, non-political "man in the street" who, irrespective of race, remembers only that life for him, or for his father, was more peaceful, and money made more easily, when Trieste fulfilled its natural function as the port serving the central and southeastern areas of the extinct Austro-Hungarian Monarchy. These are the people who stand—but not very vociferously—behind the "Free State of Venezia Giulia."

There can be no question that the Slovenes, flushed with victory and revolutionary fervor, are the more aggressive. The Italians are for the most part depressed by defeat and anxious about the future, though of late they also have turned to violent methods. One cannot forget that it was Tito who announced on March 26 last that he would "resist with full energy" any unfavorable findings of the Boundary Commission, or overlook the continuous Slovene incitements against the A. M. G. and the recent shooting down of American planes which had inadvertently crossed the boundary line. I was at the American frontier post just outside Gorizia a fortnight ago when the commander of the Yugoslav air-force unit which had shot down these planes arrived to hand over the victims' remains to General Moore, commanding American troops in Venezia Giulia. Accompanying the remains was Ambassador Patterson from Belgrade. While the ceremony of handing over took place, a member of Mr. Patterson's party told me that they had been five hours on the way from Ljubljana—a journey taking normally little over one hour—because the Yugoslavs had insisted on going round by side roads so that their military preparations would not be seen. What, asked the Americans, are the military preparations which Tito is making on Venezia Giulia's frontiers, and why are they so secret as to necessitate shooting down American planes?

The local press is useless as a guide to realities. According to the Communist and pro-Tito press, everyone, whether Italian or Slovene by race, who does not believe that this territory should be handed over to Tito or will not sign on the dotted line to this effect is a "fascist." The pro-Italian press is less stultifying to read, but in its columns no Communist can be anything but a traitor. For the Titoists, A. M. G. is, of course, a neo-fascist administration; curiously enough they do not see anything incongruous in the fact that a neo-fascist administration allows them to make this accusation.

The Communist charge that A. M. G. is pro-fascist is worth serious examination, if only because it can be found repeated in the "party line" wherever Britain or America plays a role in the administration of occupied territory. At first sight it is just silly. In Zone A of Venezia Giulia the pro-Tito Communist Party—it entitles itself the Italo-Slovene Anti-Fascist Front—has a gigantic party apparatus, functioning quite openly, and an extremely violent press. At the moment the "war of nerves" takes the form of constant street demonstrations demanding the cancelation of warrants for the arrest of the leaders of the recent illegal—because purely political—general strike, who are now sitting comfortably in the Tito-governed Zone B. Nevertheless, A. M. G.'s scales are weighted against the "Yugo-Communists." Two months ago the Communists violently broke up the "all-Italy" bicycle race when it reached Trieste, and fired on the police. That same night Italian mobs in revenge wrecked sixteen Yugo-Communist centers. The impartial, British-trained V. G. police, largely Italian, looked on—so the approachable and very reasonable new Communist leader in Trieste, Babitch, told me. When I tackled A. M. G. about it, they admitted that the V. G. police had shown a deplorable "lack of courage."

What is the situation in Zone B, the part of the formerly Italian territory of Venezia Giulia occupied solely by Tito's troops? There Tito's Communists enjoy a totalitarian monoply of political agitation. I imagine not even Il Lavoratore, the leading Trieste Communist paper, would maintain that any Italian, let alone a Slovene, in this area could allow it to be known that he opposed incorporation in Yugoslavia and remain at liberty for twenty-four hours. For Anglo-American personnel Zone B is forbidden territory, and to the best of my knowledge, only one correspondent has ever been given free access to it. When this correspondent made statements unfavorable to Yugoslavia in his reports, he was requested to leave the country.

However, the indisputable fact that the democratic forms of free political agitation, discussion, and demonstration are liberally accorded in Zone A while a full totalitarian and one-party system operates in Zone B should not deter one from examining further the Communist allegations of reactionary tendencies in the A. M. G. The question is one which arises in all occupied areas. Perhaps we must expect the men we have put at the head of our administrations in these areas to sympathize with the possessing rather than the property-less classes, with the educated—or semi-educated—middle classes rather than the workers, with the people belonging to a milieu like their own rather than a hitherto submerged stratum now rising with volcanic energy to the surface. With more or less distaste, these conservative officials are trying to face up to a strange new world. They trust it will not last too long; they hope against hope that some day the working masses—decent fellows enough if they do not get ideas into their heads—will duly return to their proper station. Meanwhile the only thing to do is to keep them unobtrusively in check. And the best way to do this in their eyes is to give discreet support to their opponents.

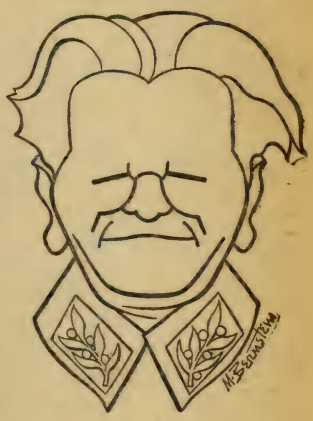
Since Soviet Russia is working to push its frontiers to Trieste by exploiting pan-Slavism among the Slavs and extremist anti-fascism among the Italian workers, it must be countered by supporting Italians who, let us say, are at least not anti-fascist fanatics. Naturally the other side exaggerates this into "pro-fascism" on the part of A. M. G. It is not—but there is an inevitable tendency to rely on Italian chauvinism to fight chauvinist pan-Slavism. In Trieste the process has become a vicious circle. Socialist workers who refuse to become the tools of Russian expansion are beaten up by Italo-Slovene Communist "action squads." They are avenged by Italian squadistri, whose methods closely resemble those of the Black Shirts. Anglo-American administrators, finding the staunchest opponents of Slav aggression in such circles, duly punish their excesses, but with feelings of regret which are certainly absent when they pass sentence on Communist rioters.

For the British, one way of breaking this vicious circle is to appoint men of Socialist convictions to leading posts in the diplomatic service and in those bodies which are administering occupied territories. Too often men who were not merely faithful exponents of the foreign policy of Conservative Britain but personal enthusiasts for the appeasement of Nazism have returned to Europe as servants of the Labor government. Britain needs to send abroad men who believe in the ideals for which a Socialist Britain must stand and who know that their only real allies are to be found in the Continental Socialist parties. I shall not go into the American system of political appointees, which too often results in some successful business man or lawyer being "managed" the whole time that he is en poste by his career counselor or first secretary.

Immediate developments in Venezia Giulia are likely to be on the following lines. Despite loud protests from each, both Italy and Yugoslavia seem now to have accepted the principle of a "Free Territory" of Trieste. Yugoslavia, of course, would never seriously oppose any scheme in which Russia had concurred, as Russia did in this case. Yugoslavia and Italy, well-informed local observers believe, are discussing very privately today the exchange of Gorizia (proposed for Italy, with the Yugoslav frontier running almost through its suburbs) for Pola and the Istrian littoral (proposed for Yugoslavia). Over the Monfalcone shipyards (proposed for Italy) there may shortly be more trouble. Although only 10 per cent of the workers there are Slovenes, 80 per cent have been in the Slovene-Communist-dominated Syndicato Unico since the terrific Communist drive against workers who belonged to the pro-Italian Camera di Lavoro.



Marshal Tito

Some Allied observers are convinced that Russia has tipped off Yugoslavia to abate its intransigence over the whole Trieste question. The reason, they believe, is Russia's desire to placate the Communists in Italy, who, unlike the Slovene-controlled Italian Communists in Venezia Giulia, are getting more and more restive over the Slovene attitude. These observers believe that Russia is assuring Yugoslavia that all its aspirations, respecting not only Monfalcone but Trieste itself, will be realized anyway within two or three years. I certainly have met nobody in any camp prepared to bet on a longer duration of any "settlement" of the Trieste problem on which the Peace Conference is likely to agree. There is, of course, only one sensible and ideal solution. That is to incorporate Venezia Giulia in an economic group of three politically independent and democratic states—Austria, Hungary, and Czechslovakia—and to have this group enter into special relations concerning Trieste with both Italy and Yugoslavia. Not one of the implied precedent conditions for this, the only desirable and durable solution, exists today. All that can be hoped for under actual conditions is that East and West will devise a temporary compromise in the shape of a new and more precarious Danzig, to which East will at least concede those "corridor" rights which at the moment it still refuses.

The Woodmen and the Trees

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Portland, Ore., September 24

ONCE the trees covered the land. Then ax and saw began their work. At first the green mantle was only fringed. Soon America's cloak of virgin timber was ragged and torn. Today it is not a cloak at all, but merely thin green strands threading the mountain valleys of the Far West.

Workers swung the axes and pulled the saws, and lumber fortunes piled up. The trees fell to earth and water carried off the soil. But who cared? The Wobblies wanted bacon and eggs instead of johnny-cake and greasy salt pork. Who could live, they asked, on a wage of 20 cents an hour? The Wobblies would burn down a forest to get what they wanted. Who cared? The forests would last forever, wouldn't they?

The United States Forest Service, the National Park Service, and various outdoor clubs fought the conservation battle for decades without labor's assistance. Trees cut to the ground meant jobs; labor and the lumber industry were of one mind on the subject of conservation. Today labor is the newest recruit in the camp of the conservationists. Labor has looked beyond the immediate horizon and seen what devastated forests mean for families in sawmill communities. And it is giving allegiance to a new policy with a good deal of objective criticism for its indifference in the past.

"We ask," said the International Woodworkers of America, meeting in Portland at their annual convention last week, "for sustained yield and selective logging to improve and protect our forests—for timber management, public recreation, fish and game, watershed defense, and livestock grazing." The Woodworkers are the largest C. I. O. union west of the continental divide, and they declared further, "We seek to reduce the destructiveness of logging that is done by union logging crews. By showing an interest in good forest-conservation practices for loggers, local unions should be able to stimulate greater employer interest in forestry, and at the same time make sure that avoidable destruction by I. W. A. logging crews does not occur."

A hefty Swede with a broken nose lit a pipe outside the I. W. A. convention hall. "I ban in the woods purty near turty years," he said. "Right now I larn how much hurt I done to trees in dat time. I be careful now. My crew—dey be careful too. All dis we larn from the union. It is something new."

The I. W. A. is backing the Hook bill, which provides for federal regulation of cutting on private lands. The old practice of "cut out and get out" would be forbidden. A lumberman could no longer gut a forest simply because he owned it in fee simple. There is a larger obligation, the bill's proponents hold, than amortization of investment—an obligation to future generations of Americans. A man may hold title to land, but he cannot leave an open sewer on it. The health of the community is at stake. Under the Hook bill title to a forest would not give a man the right to reduce that forest to stumps. At stake are recreation, wild life, drinking water, scenery, jobs.

The Hook bill would enforce sustained-yield practices in all commercial logging operations. Its author, Representative Frank E. Hook of Michigan, has seen what happened in the upper Great Lakes states when operators could cut at will. He wants to save the forests which remain in the West before it is too late. A Douglas fir or Ponderosa pine growing since Jefferson's time can be cut down between breakfast and lunch. Hook also seeks to establish a Forest Credit Division to lend lumbermen the money they will need to put their operations on a sustained-yield basis.

Once—not so long ago—loggers felt that hasty cutting of a forest was to their interest. "We know better now," says James E. Fadling, president of the Woodworkers. The operator probably lived a thousand miles from the forest—no Weyerhaeuser has slept in a bunkhouse for many years—but the lumberjacks and their families, after the trees were gone, found themselves inhabiting ghost towns. The mill machinery rusted. Tax payments ceased and schools closed. Stump ranching, toil to break a man's back and heart, was often the only recourse for the loggers—that or public relief.

The policy of "cut out and get out" might mean five hundred jobs for two years. The I. W. A. realizes that a hundred jobs for an indefinite period is closer to the union's goal. The I. W. W. waged industrial war for decent conditions in logging camps. The I. W. A. is waging war against logging camps per se. "Logging camps," says the union's director of research and education, Ellery

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER is an Oregon journalist whose articles on interesting developments in the Northwest—politics, power, conservation—appear frequently in The Nation and other magazines.

Foster, "add up to a shifting, nomadic life. A forest is cut down, the camp is moved on to another forest marked for destruction. We seek instead permanent communities which gain their economic sustenance from forests logged selectively over a long period of years, forests safeguarded for the future."

A forty-two-year-old forester with broad shoulders and a woodsman's eyes, Foster is behind a new departure in labor-union activity in the Northwest. From forestry school at the University of Michigan he went into the United States Forest Service and became a vigorous opponent of the wasteful logging then condoned by the loggers' unions. Drag chains pulled across young second-growth fir trees seemed sinful to him, whether or not the whistle-punk wore a union button in his cap. While the late Floyd Olson was governor of Minnesota, Foster was attached to the state department of forestry. Speaking to a group of loggers one day, he said, "You fellows ought to get wise that conservation is in your interest. You have the same interest as the public. You want the forests to endure. Otherwise your jobs will be washed up. Liquidating the forests may help a few shortsighted operators. It won't help you."

During the early part of the war Foster advised the lumber division of the War Production Board. He then joined the Woodworkers. Weyerhaeuser, Crown-Zellerbach, and some of the other big companies have recently put trained foresters on their pay rolls. Ellery Foster is the forester of the I. W. A. He watches out for bulldozers that crush seedling pines and for cookhouses that scatter sparks. From his typewriter roll innumerable pamphlets setting forth the union's insistence on sustained yield and sound forestry. "Worn-out forests," warns Foster, "can plague peoples and nations with great misery. Our union members now realize this fact."

With respect to conservation of resources the record of American unionism has been almost as bad as that of the industrialists. John L. Lewis has opposed the St. Lawrence seaway on the ground that low-cost water power might replace coal. Fishermen's unions in the Pacific Northwest, A. F. of L. and C. I. O. alike, have resisted measures to curtail the excessive salmon catches. Even though it would save dwindling oil reserves, a Bonneville Power Administration proposal to run all Western rail lines with surplus hydroelectric power finds very little favor with enginemen reared at steam throttles.

The program of the Woodworkers reverses this trend. After a spokesman for the C. I. O. Fishermen's Union had appeared with cannery owners in opposition to a bill protecting the steelhead trout of the Oregon coast, a prominent woodworker suggested that the fishermen should hire a biologist "to put you fellows on the beam the way Ellery Foster has done it for us."

EVERYONE and his kid brother has something to say about radio. And the people who pan it the hardest are those who listen to it the least. Among the most persistent hecklers are many persons in the upper educational and income brackets who might do something to improve radio if only they tuned in more frequently. As it is, their criticism has no effect.

Radio executives are susceptible to complaints but not when the squawk comes from someone who doesn't listen regularly—that is, to all sorts of programs impartially, those that may not be liked and old favorites. Radio executives would especially welcome competent criticism from the upper strata of their listeners, from people with "names"—writers, artists, editors, and other intellectuals.

Radio, even more than newspapers and magazines, is controlled by the advertiser. Be it network or local station, no broadcaster lays down the law to an advertiser—not with sincerity and rigidity. Some radio men may put up an argument, but always with the knowledge that a compromise will be the result, a compromise that will keep those advertising dollars on the right side of the ledger.

But radio today, unlike the newspapers and magazines, also has to answer, if indirectly, to the public, as represented by the Federal Communications Commission, that undeservedly maligned overseer of radio. To read the trade press and listen to radio-industry spokesmen one would think that the FCC was a cross radio must carry if it would stay in business, a crown of thorns set upon its brow years ago by a nitwit Congress. Actually the FCC was established to protect the interests of the public; for years, particularly under the chairmanship of James Lawrence Fly, it fought valiantly to lift American radio to a higher level. But always with little if any help from the public. About the only organization to lend a hand was the American Civil Liberties Union, which by no stretch of the imagination can be said to represent the mass of radio listeners.

The people who do listen to radio don't know, don't care, don' wanna be bothered about the FCC; just give them Jack Benny and Bob Hope, Gangbusters and Mr. D. A., soap operas and swing, and they're happy. People who would be inclined to support the FCC, don't listen to the radio.

Nor does the FCC get any help from the press, except from PM and Variety, Jack Gould in the New York Times, and John Crosby in the Herald Tribune. "The FCC," say the industry spokesmen, "is just more government interference with private industry; if the FCC claims to talk for the people, what people?"

Opposition to the FCC is particularly vigorous this year, for the National Association of Broadcasters, the radio trade association, has now for the first time in almost a decade a competent and effective head in Judge Justin Miller. With authority to clean out the dead wood and end the internecine feuds Judge Miller, at $50,000 a year, is whipping the N. A. B. into a cohesive unit that can talk for the industry—and more important, can keep its members in line. Not all the internal bickering has been ended, nor is all of radio in the N. A. B., but progress is being made. Meanwhile the FCC remains without informed public support.

If things go on as they are, it is merely a question of time until the industry wins the battle. So right now, while there are still some fighters on the commission, while Congress still thinks a federal agency is necessary to protect the public's interests, right now is the time to get something done about radio.

But that means you will have to listen to the radio: listen to soap operas, to jive, to comics, to recorded music, to everything that makes radio a great popular medium, even though you, as an individual, may not agree with the millions. Only by listening to the radio can you put any punch in your criticism.

Each week this column will discuss some aspect of the radio industry. From time to time it will print contributions by names you know in radio. Listen to the programs suggested each week. Sound off in the mail. We'll answer questions and complaints. We'll get action, too.

THE TIME CAPSULE: Last week some nameless but immortal Manhattan moppet descended from the world of his elders into an East Side subway station and, eschewing the conventional pornography, chalked on the wall in foot-high letters: "MISERY!"

REFLECTED GLORY: We take a special pride in the coveted Fifty-Year Button recently awarded to Andrew B. Werth, who gives The Nation its final proofreading each week, for half a century's membership in the New York Typographical Union. To Mr. Werth, the congratulations of The Nation's staff and The Nation's readers.

A COLUMNIST in the St. Paul Pioneer Press writes about a busload of state conservation commissioners and fisheries men being taken on a three-day tour of Minnesota's north country. "They were impressed," he declared. "As one, R. P. Hunter of Connecticut, put it: 'All men are created equal—if they come to Minnesota.' The remark was prompted by the sight of a flock of mallards and teal in a small pond two miles from the city limits."

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Russia's Food Crisis

IN HIS election address on February 9 Premier Stalin brought great cheer to the Russian people by his promise that "in the very near future the rationing system will be abolished." Two months ago fulfilment of this promise still seemed possible, and Mr. del Vayo, writing from Moscow in early August, reported in these pages a radio announcement of the end of bread rationing in the fall. But on August 28 a Moscow broadcast stated that "in view of drought in a number of regions and the diminishing of state food reserves," rationing would continue into 1947.

A few weeks later publication of a government decree ordering action to check the violation of statutes governing collective farms suggested that the disappointing harvest was not due solely to weather conditions. Among the abuses to which the decree called attention were the undue expansion of administrative staffs and the resultant swollen overhead costs, the neglect of democratic procedures, including the failure to call regular general meetings of farmers, and the alienation of collective land and other property. Restoration of statutory democratic meetings for the discussion of collective farm affairs was ordered, and local Communist Party committees and local Soviets were forbidden to appoint or dismiss farm chairmen against the will of such meetings.

No doubt this provision is intended to mollify resentments aroused by party bosses and rural bureaucrats. But if, as a result, the peasants really do gain a greater voice in the management of the collectives, they can hardly be expected to cooperate enthusiastically in carrying out that section of the decree which aims at preventing the alienation of collective property. For since the outbreak of the war the peasant has had many incentives to enlarge his personal plot of land and to cultivate it intensively even if that meant neglecting his collective duties.

It was after the 1933 famine that the collective-farm system was first modified to permit each member an individual landholding in addition to his share of the collective property. These plots were supposed to be limited to a half hectare, about one and a quarter acres, but in the course of time many peasants succeeded in increasing their areas to an extent that made possible the production of a surplus for the market after satisfaction of their own needs. In an effort to check this tendency new rules were introduced limiting the number of privately owned animals and increasing the required minimum of labor time devoted to the collective.

I do not know whether these rules were relaxed during the war, but the situation in any case put a premium on evasion. The food-distribution system provided for the sale of subsistence rations when available at comparatively low prices in the government stores. To supplement the meager diet thus provided, those Russians who had either spare rubles or goods with barter value patronized the free markets, where prices were set by supply and demand. These markets were perfectly legal; in fact, the peasants were encouraged to bring in their surplus produce. With a dozen eggs or a pound of honey salable for a fistful of rubles, many of them have been able to acquire paper fortunes.

Given such incentives it is not surprising that many peasants have been tempted both to stretch the boundaries of their private plots and to devote to them as much of their working time as possible. Moreover, in the vast and fertile lands devastated during the war the reorganization of collectives has been subject to severe handicaps. Their farm machinery and livestock were largely destroyed in the fighting or by the Germans, and so far only a fraction of both has been replaced. "The tractor," as the London Economist of March 16, 1946, put it, "is the unifying technical factor in collective farming, just as the horse represents the classical source of power for the small individual farmer. Where both—the horse and the tractor—are lacking, any form of farming, whether collective or individual, must decay. At present, members of collective farms are trying to work their own private plots as best they can, without bothering too much about the collective fields."

Naturally, the Soviet government is combating this tendency, for, apart from the principle at stake, it cannot rely on individualistic farming to supply the surplus of commodities it needs to carry out its industrial plans. Yet while machinery and fertilizers are lacking, propaganda and purges cannot do much to improve the morale of the collectives. One step, however, appears to have been taken to lessen the attractiveness of private cultivation and increase the rewards of collective labor. A Moscow dispatch in the New York Times of September 20 reports a drastic increase in the prices of rationed foods, accompanied by considerable price cuts in the "commercial stores." These state-owned stores, where goods can be bought without ration cards, set a price standard for the peasant markets. The net effect of this apparently contradictory move, therefore, will be to increase the revenues of the collectives, owing to the higher prices charged for the staples of mass consumption, while lowering the profits of private production. It should thus make possible increased compensation per unit of labor time given to the collectives and help to persuade the peasant to devote less effort to his private holding.

But this concession to the peasants must mean a sharp increase in the cost of living for urban workers, most of whom will find little compensation for the higher prices of rationed goods in the reduced quotations of the free markets. The price of black bread, for instance, has been advanced from 1 to 3.40 rubles per kilogram, meat from 14 to 34 rubles, butter from 24 and 28 to 60, sugar from 5 and 6 to 60 and 70. Set these prices against a wage of 300 to 350 rubles a month, which John Fischer, writing in the current Harper's, estimates as the average in the Ukraine, and it will be realized that few workers will be left with a margin for purchases of non-rationed goods at still higher prices.

These developments, which indicate a very tight food situation in the U. S. S. R., certainly afford support to the theory that Russia's bad external manners reflect internal strains and stresses. They also suggest that it would be good policy for us to temper our "toughness" by an effort to relieve these stresses.

The Poetry of Reason

WILLIAM BLAKE: THE POLITICS OF VISION. By Mark Schorer. Henry Holt and Company. $5.

WILLIAM BLAKE has been all things to all critics: an idiot or madman to some of his contemporaries, an immoralist to Swinburne, a symbolist to Yeats, a mystic to Foster Damon, a visionary to Helen C. White, a cabbalist to Denis Saurat, a Christian Socialist practicing resignation to J. Middleton Murry, a proto-surrealist to Herbert Read, a Marxist emancipated from the schematics of Marxism to Jacob Bronowski, whose "Man Without a Mask" (1944) is relentless, or even inspired, in its socio-economic approach. Now Mark Schorer in the most comprehensive discussion of Blake yet to appear has seen him as he must be seen, as a poet of the later revolutionary eighteenth century within "a particular tradition, in a particular period of history." Schorer so liberally considers the function of myth in poetry and the psychological implications of Blake's will to integrate personality that one is liable to underestimate his final and authoritative distinction of interpreting Blake's vision as politics of the Enlightenment. Inevitably someone was to see that Blake "took the most basic assumptions" of revolutionary rationalism and transvalued them into an ethic of the imperative right of the individual to his own consummation.

Proverbially, the Enlightenment is without poetry. Tom Paine was very clear that "the composition of poetry differs from that of prose in the manner of mixing long and short syllables together"—and Blake was Paine's friend. Even Schorer, like Damon and the others, intimates that the ecstasies of Blake redeemed the eighteenth century from poetic decadence. Not exactly. By Schorer's own heavy evidence Blake is the fulfilment of the Enlightenment in its most rational and abstract vision. Although he has infallibly situated Blake within the Industrial and French revolutions and all the traditions of deism and dissent, Schorer may not sufficiently trust the Enlightenment itself. The best of Blake—The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, and his terrible poems on the chartered streets of London—is the lyric of Enlightenment. With Voltaire, Blake exclaims, Ecrasez l'infâme:

> I wander thro' each charter'd street,
> Near where the charter'd Thames does flow,
> And mark in every face I meet
> Marks of weakness, marks of woe.
>
> In every cry of every Man,
> In every Infant's cry of fear,
> In every voice, in every ban,
> The mind-forg'd manacles I hear.
>
> How the Chimney-sweeper's cry
> Every black'ning Church appalls;
> And the hapless Soldier's sigh
> Runs in blood down Palace walls.
>
> But most thro' midnight streets I hear
> How the youthful Harlot's curse
> Blasts the new born Infant's tear,
> And blights with plagues the Marriage hearse.

Blake supposed that he had cast off Rational Demonstration, the mechanics of the deist, and Newton's sleep; yet he was the poet, the only poet, of the philosophes, and he, not Wordsworth, knew Reason in her most exalted mood with all the fierceness of his imagination—"the divine body in every man." His failures, like those of the Encyclopedists, occur when his logic is least furious, least illumined; then he resorts to the rhetoric of occultism, in the Jerusalem, for example. Like the Encyclopedists, too, Blake "refused to admit the cleavage between knowledge and belief," for vision is both.

Schorer is rigorously correct in discriminating between the vision of Blake and the vision of the mystic or of Shelley, the so-called Platonist. The vision of Blake is the vision of Jefferson heightened, the Cartesian vision inflamed, the vision of those "reasoners" who founded their heavenly city on the principle that men are created free and equal—a principle that cannot be demonstrated historically, sociologically, psychologically, or theologically, but a principle apocalyptically vivid to the esprit de géométrie, to the Jacobin. This sort of abstraction moved Condorcet to tears. Schorer complains that Blake wavered: "Either he insisted that the life of vision alone was real, or he argued—more frequently—that the life of vision made matter real." To the eighteenth-century mind this is no dilemma: in one of his letters Blake writes, "Dear Sir, excuse my enthusiasm or rather madness, for I am really drunk with intellectual vision whenever I take a pencil or graver into my hand." The tear, to Blake, was an intellectual thing.

The very clarities of the Enlightenment reduced myth to rhetoric until Blake becomes "a religious poet who is without either a theology or a proper God." For Voltaire, for Godwin, for Blake a thought is an experience that does not terminate in the senses. Consequently Blake's poetry is not, as has been claimed, metaphysical. Deprived as he was of myth and ritual, Blake created a system, a dialectic of opposites and contraries, resolved, poetically at least, by a device of thematic statement and return like that in "Tyger! Tyger! burning bright." In spite of the "proliferation" of obscure symbols in the later poems, the simplicity of balance, the equations and correspondences (Urizen-Luvah, etc.), amount to a tyranny of concept. Therein is Blake's difference from Yeats, who is not a rationalist, or from Shelley, whose concepts—unless we except The Mask of Anarchy—are forever at the mercy of his passions. Shelley's is a false intellectual beauty, a harmony more tumultuous than Blake's. The intellectual beauty of Blake is that of eighteenth-century written constitutions and the fanatical coherences of the Godwinian system. Schorer has named the basic paradox: Blake "employs abstractions to overcome the concept of the abstract." Blake's

"revisions" do not detach him from his tradition of revolutionary rationalism. Schorer's exhaustive index has four pages of entries s.v. Blake as Thinker.

It is probably unnecessary for Schorer to debate whether Blake dramatized his definitions and symbols. Drama can hardly exist in the rarefied abstraction of the Enlightenment; it needs the atmosphere of myth. Blake's vision was of extraordinary intensity, and his symbols were savagely luminous—but they were not drama. An essential *un*humanity is betrayed in his conceptualism of symbol (after all, the eighteenth-century verse is filled with personification). Even in a poem like The French Revolution, which moves very close to the actualities in Paris, Blake identifies himself with the age of Gibbon when he discerns a profane theorem being illustrated within local circumstances. Blake views the Revolution not tragically but chorally, with specters of religious men weeping, driven from their abbeys "by the fiery cloud of Voltaire." This is the "detachment" of enlightened history; it is not dramatic.

As poet, Blake translated the specifically eighteenth-century problem of political tyranny to social and, ultimately, to psychological terms. His opposition to the ancien régime, prerogative, law, and inequality appears not only in The French Revolution and in America but also in poems on chimney sweeps and at last in The Four Zoas with their creed of the integrity of the individual, soul and body, and their law of the free will of the psyche at harmony within itself. Blake's most raging political and religious insights—always identical among the Encyclopedists—are a hatred of divisions "in individual psychology, in social institutions, in national interests and conflicts, in the physical and moral structure of the universe." As Schorer puts it, "Godwinism becomes wisdom." The psychology of Locke, Hartley, and Hume is transposed into Blake's intuition that cleavage means neurosis, and that man must emancipate himself from convention. Now opens another deep paradox in Blake, the rebel angel, whose vision is at once political and anarchist. The impasse was that of "democrats" like Holbach and the other atomistic individualists who professed a brotherhood of man. Energy, said Blake, is eternal delight—which amounts to spiritual laissez faire.

If energy is delight and if "Active Evil is better than Passive Good," then Blake faces the issue of the naked Will, of the Right as a mere Negation and pity as a fraud. Again and again Schorer quotes Blake's proverb that seems to foreshadow Nietzsche and the superman, a slave morality and a master morality: "One law for the lion and ox is oppression." But Blake's assertion is not really Nietzschean; it is a rational diabolism. There is no appeal to biological struggle or survival—to progress, yes; but not to evolution or vitalism. The obsession is that of the concept, not of blood, history, or nature. Blake lacks entirely the organic sensibility of Wordsworth, who found in nature the nurse, the guide, the guardian of his heart, and soul of all his moral being. This organic sensibility, which Wordsworth assumed necessary to the poet, reappeared, monstrously, in later transcendentalism, when Carlyle, for example, addressed "this ever-living Universe" with his desperate query, "Ha! why do I not call thee God?" Blake once told Crabb Robinson that reading Wordsworth had given him a dysentery. One speculates what might have been his affliction had he read Carlyle, Nietzsche, or D. H. Lawrence.

Blake is no natural-supernaturalist, transcendentalist, or "romantic" but the most intensely visionary of rationalists. "Are not," he asks, "religion and politics the same thing?" This is the profoundly "enlightened" question of all revolutionists who like Blake would build Jerusalem in green and pleasant lands.

WYLIE SYPHER

"Gerty" and the G. I.'s

BREWSIE AND WILLIE. By Gertrude Stein. Random House. $2.

THE chief thing Gertrude Stein tried to do was to write as if she had kept her innocence. Everything had to be seen simply and sharply, as a new thing and a wonder. If the vision was direct enough, it did not matter whether it was profound: she was not trying to make progress. That is why she could write so much that was nonsense and so much that was banal (". . . the girls tend to be tall, taller than they used to be but not the boys not taller than they used to be, I suppose there is a physical reason for this, I do suppose so") and still be a fine artist.

She had to leave America, where the pressures of middle-class earnestness were too strong; she had to work very hard with the language, and cultivate her egotism to follow her own way strictly, shutting out many of the important intellectual currents of her time that meant much to others but had nothing to do with her purpose—so that when she was successful she could write like a twelve-year-old girl full of intelligent and sensitive curiosity and very brilliant, more brilliant than any girl ever was at twelve. (Twelve is about right, I think: all the essential knowledge has been gained, but the adult world of sex and misfortune and ideas is still part mystery and part stupidity.)

Her relations with the people of the United States were not quite like those of any other bohemian expatriate. She aroused considerable irritation—you are not supposed to go and live your own life in France while the rest of us must stick it out with the Book-of-the-Month Club and the American Labor Party—but in the end hundreds of American soldiers who had never read her books sought her out in France and called her "Gerty" and found her a great old girl. For her part, though she could not live in America she was always very seriously concerned with America and with being American, and she was certainly very happy to see the soldiers and to find that they had heard of her.

"Brewsie and Willie" is the result of that curious lovers' meeting between her and the American soldiers after the invasion of France. She formed a very high opinion of the soldiers—they were sure of themselves, she wrote in "Wars I Have Seen," no longer provincial as they were in the last war—and in "Brewsie and Willie" she tried to set down what they were like and what she herself had to say to them, in a number of conversations among soldiers, and to her countrymen in general.

Her private world here got mixed up with our public world, and it is fair to say of "Brewsie and Willie" what it would not have been fair to say of the more personal "Wars

I Have Seen": that she did not look deep enough or think hard enough.

Her soldiers are very real in the things that concern them —jobs, morals, security, the threatening future—and in the way they talk, outwardly relaxed and inwardly worried, fumbling earnestly for answers, painfully conscious of their own inadequacies. ("Listen, said Brewsie, you see, said Brewsie, you see I don't think we think, if we thought we could not articulate the same, we couldn't have Gallup polls and have everybody answer yes or no, if you think it's more complicated than that . . . thinking is funnier and more mixed than that . . . oh Willie, I get so worried, I know it is just the most dangerous moment in our history, in a kind of a way as dangerous more dangerous than the Civil War. . . .") But their decency is too pure, and they are more honest in their thinking and more childlike in their attitudes than most Americans really are; she saw that they sucked candy and tried hard to get things straight in their minds, but she did not see how knowing and cynical they could be also, and how acquisitive and cruel. She endowed them with her own innocence—but Gertrude Stein's innocence was a literary method for the creation of Gertrude Stein's world, and in giving her innocence to the soldiers, whom she had made quite recognizable and public, she was patronizing them and distorting them. "G. I.'s and G. I.'s and G. I.'s and they have made me come all over patriotic"—she fell in love, and she allowed herself to be taken in by the myth of a special American decency and good-heartedness.

And there is her final message to Americans at this "most dangerous moment in our history": Don't exhaust the country's raw materials. Learn to be individuals. Find out why there was a depression. Worry hard and think hard. This is sound advice—except that the raw materials seem to have preyed upon her mind unduly—but I hope it is not merely ill-natured to say that it doesn't help much. It was the price of Gertrude Stein's art that she paid too little attention to the serious preoccupations of her time; in politics she was stupid and uninformed—she could apologize for Pétain like any good-natured and unintelligent bourgeoise.

The funniest thing is that in reading "Brewsie and Willie" one even feels a twinge of that unreasonable philistine irritation she aroused so often when she deserved it less. For she has escaped again; worry and think, she said, and then died, expatriating herself so effectively this time that we cannot hope to reach her with our murmur: yes, that's what we have been doing, worrying and thinking.

Wallace in Siberia

SOVIET ASIA MISSION. By Henry A. Wallace. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

TWO topflight Americans, both with the blessing of F. D. R., roamed the wilds of Arctic Siberia. Henry Wallace's report, "Soviet Asia Mission," challenges comparison with Wendell Willkie's "One World." There is a thoroughly American tang in both men—shrewd, kindly, energetic fighters for righteousness, not bothering over much about ideologies: "I don't know where I am going, but I'm on my way." "One World" is the more readable book, but not because, as Major Cheremisov unkindly suggested, the theme song of the Willkie trip was Vodka, Vodka, Vodka and that of the Wallace raid Kipicheonia, Kipicheonia (boiled water). While Willkie was—not offensively—egocentric, Wallace is self-effacing. His book is a synthetic product in which a dozen men had a share. They are a remarkable team, enough for a brain trust. But the writing of books is like the culinary art: too many cooks. . . .

I never could understand the aversion of many sensible, God-fearing Americans for Henry Wallace. He is no crackpot, but eminently sane. The agricultural part of his report should be very valuable. There are areas, like the Caribbean and the "permafrosted" North, which have physical unity. Men in such natural regions should swap information, exchange seeds, compare breeds, in the way of neighborly farmers. Incidentally, this pooling of interests across political lines would be a great help to peace. Men who realize they have to fight the treacherous muskeg will be less inclined to fight one another.

Wallace, a sane, progressive, hard-working man, found sane, progressive, hard-working men in Soviet Asia, and liked them. He discovered with delight that their Northeast and our Northwest actually met. This takes some of the glamour out of Siberia, the mysterious and terrible, the House of the Dead, the haunts of Gods, Beasts, and Men. Parts of Siberia are every bit as good as Nebraska, and, God willing, they may some day rival Minnesota. Alma Ata, the strange and remote, is "the Hollywood of Central Asia."

With most of Wallace's conclusions we all agree. The air age, as Victor Hugo prophesied, has made national frontiers ridiculous. There must be, there can be, understanding between the U. S. S. R. and ourselves; to foster distrust and hatred is a crime. Wallace yields a little to the nefarious Big Two fallacy. The very idea of bigness posits power politics, and power politics means war. He believes Europe is through, and has another guess coming: Europe west of the Curzon Line outnumbers the U. S. A. and the U. S. S. R. combined, is not inferior to either in technical skill, and will not forever remain balkanized. He exaggerates the importance of the Pacific: when the Far East has been industrially equipped it will no longer need us. We could conceive of free trade and free migration with Europe, not with Asia. He speaks of the four great cultures—the Anglo-Saxon, the Latin, the Chinese, and the Soviet Russian—ignoring Germany, India, and Islam. He does not realize that he is giving offense, for he is the kindest of men: in this again the "typical" American, as American as corn. But his limitations are only of the moment. They will recede as he progresses, for they are not in his nature. He has an open heart and an open mind.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

The Man Who Came to Dinner

DINNER AT THE WHITE HOUSE. By Louis Adamic. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

A MOTLEY production, this. The title is misleading, although the book does begin with the detailed description of an evening—January 13, 1942—that Mr. Adamic and his wife spent at the White House. "Dinner at the White House" contains or is concerned with all of the following items (but none of them is its center): what went on in Roosevelt's mind from 1942 until his death; Churchill, the arch-imperialist; the effect on President and Mrs. Roosevelt, Churchill, other people, and American policy of Mr. Adamic's book "Two-Way Passage"; some of the political ideas and observations and anxieties that disturbed or motivated Mr. Adamic during the period 1942-45; the Churchill-Roosevelt relationship; Mr. Adamic's view of the future—that there will be one world or none; an unfinished estimation of Roosevelt, Man and Statesman; Mr. Adamic's notion of the conflict between good and evil in the American character; and kindred minor subjects—such as Mrs. Roosevelt's goodness, Mr. Adamic's trouble with the Dies committee, conversations with Willkie, and so on. Mr. Adamic himself (1942-46) seems to be the only cohesive principle in the book—with the addition, perhaps, of his relation to Roosevelt as dinner host and world historical principle.

Even though much of the political thinking in the book is presented in diary form, and thus is quite dated, "Dinner at the White House" should interest a great many people and have a good sale. For the book has a certain value when viewed as a newspaper-like story of one author's various political experiences during the last four or five years. A reader who identifies himself with the author may be quite interested—after all, Mr. Adamic did have dinner at the White House, he did have conversations with Willkie, and so on—but he will not be very much enlightened politically. That is because Mr. Adamic's political thinking is often inconsistent, often inconclusive, and very often rhetorical.

For example, he speculates more about what was going on in Roosevelt's mind than about events occurring in the world at large. This can be justified only on the premise that Roosevelt's mind was the focal point of history. But of course Mr. Adamic does not stick to this premise: it is obvious, even to the man who attempts the feat, that the entire history of a period cannot be crammed into the arena of one man's mind —even the mind of "that man." The fate of the hero is not a substitute for history, but merely a minute segment of it. And what goes on in the hero's mind is only a small part of his fate. But, as we know, there are very strong reasons for personalizing the processes of nature and history.

The book will be of some interest to those individuals engaged in observing the ineptitude of the modern mind when confronted with modern experience.

DAVID T. BAZELON

FICTION IN REVIEW

IN SO far as Nelson Gidding's "End over End" (Viking, $2.50) stays with its main job of recording the circumstances of an American flier shot down and captured by the Germans in Italy and kept in solitary confinement in the hope that he will give his captors useful military information, it tells an interesting story. Like his hero, Dale Stribling, Mr. Gidding was himself a flier and a prisoner of war; certainly his account of Stribling's prison experience has this ring of authenticity. But although there is no doubt that a similar autobiographical accuracy operates through the rest of Mr. Gidding's novel, it does not give it a similar substance. Unlike the prison scenes, the flashbacks to Stribling's life before the war swing no natural or contrived dramatic weight. Indeed, in their closeness to their source in Mr. Gidding's own experience they seem only egotistical—an inflation, by means of pretentious prose, of lamentably thin material. Thus we learn that the captive flier was once a child, that he had a mother and father, that his mother and father were divorced, that he belonged to a serious literary group at preparatory school, that he thought as his whole generation thought about the possibility of another war, that he was a helluva guy for a girl to love, that he loved a girl named Barbara, that Barbara was pleased that he smoked cigars—in short, that nothing very interesting ever happened to him before he was shot down by the Germans; or rather, that many things happened to him which are undoubtedly important to himself, but which are made of only small importance to the reader. In common with so many young novelists, Mr. Gidding has made the mistake of supposing that the subjective approach to fiction requires merely the ability to see oneself as a fictional subject—I am, therefore I am a novelist.

Like many of his contemporaries, Mr. Gidding also makes the error of confusing the soft and easy associative process with the hard processes of the imagination. His prose suffers from that most wearisome of clichés, the cliché of trying to appear bold and fresh by making a rude distortion of the familiar—"Home was a seventy-seven-layer cake, three miles of white skin above a nylon stocking, a cabin half in the sky and half on the beach, a hot-plate that kept your dreams always warm." Surely it is a sad misuse of the stream-of-consciousness method to offer such a poor trickle of consciousness in substitute for the true work of the creative mind.

Perhaps one reason why Waldo Frank's "Island in the Atlantic" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $3) seems such an old-fashioned novel is because, compared to the books of our new novelists, it is so far removed from its author: Mr. Frank is very much out of a narrative which unfolds entirely through the thoughts and actions of its varied characters. But unfortunately it is far removed from us too, and not merely because it deals with the past but because it creates no connecting chords with the present. Writing of old New York between the days of the Civil War draft riots and the First World War, Mr. Frank gives the impression of being himself fixed in that time. His novel has a flavor of antiquarianism that is rare these days even in frankly historical fiction, which usually errs in the direction of viewing all earlier periods only as preparation for or pre-statements of our own.

It is difficult to suggest what would have corrected the remoteness of "Island in the Atlantic." Certainly it would not have been improved by any mechanical effort to make it timely, by any forcing of the relevance of its political or moral content. But one suspects that if the people in Mr. Frank's novel were more significant as individual human beings, that would constitute all the bridge we need between their days and problems and ours. Perhaps it is the elements, so largely unconscious, that make for intensity of fictional characterization that also make a past time live for us in the present.

Christopher LaFarge's "The Sudden Guest" (Coward-McCann, $2.50) is a very nice novel about a self-centered woman's experiences when she finds herself all alone in her country house during a hurricane. As a matter of fact, there are two hurricanes in Mr. LaFarge's story—that of 1938 as well as that of 1944. In the first storm his Miss Leckton had had a houseful of unexpected and much resented company, people taking shelter under as inhospitable a roof as one could find; six years later she weathers the storm alone, the victim of her own egocentricity. The story moves back and forth between the two days of fierce weather, the transitions occasionally a bit awkward but the method very useful in building up a sense of the development of a character through the years.

The most striking thing about Mr. LaFarge's novel—much more impressive, I think, than its implied political parable—is the way in which it reaffirms our pleasure in the story of "plot." Except in detective fiction there are almost no novels these days which hold our attention with mystery and dramatic suspense, which keep us wondering what will happen next. It is a great deprivation—just how great a deprivation we only realize when we read a novel of imagination. But it is not only the drama of developing events that sustains "The Sudden Guest." Mr. LaFarge also knows where to look for the drama of character—in the hidden motives that determine action. His study of human isolation is not a profound psychological exploration but it is a sound one, and presented with restraint and taste. DIANA TRILLING

B. H. HAGGIN

BACH'S Concerto in D minor, which is on Columbia's September list, is one of the greatest of his instrumental works, with a finale in particular in which the continuing impetus of the unending invention is breath-taking. Also breath-taking is the continuing impetus of Szigeti's matured musical intelligence in the performance of a violin version of the work that Columbia issued several years ago, which I cannot hear without wanting to strangle the unembarrassedly incompetent and conscienceless people who gave it to us with its sound wretchedly distorted on the records. The new set (624; $3.85) offers a less impressive performance by the young pianist Eugene Istomin with the Busch Chamber Players that is also poorly recorded—the loud passages assaulting the ear with the percussive sound of the piano and brash sound of the strings.

Beethoven's String Quintet Opus 29, one of the finest of his early works, is superbly performed by the Budapest Quartet and Milton Katims, viola (Set 623; $4.85). But the recorded sound of the performance, which varies from side to side, is at best cold and at worst shrill and sharp, and worse with the wide-range Brush pickup than with the limited-range Astatic Tru-Tan.

With an excellent and beautifully recorded performance of the Franck Symphony by Beecham and the London Philharmonic in its catalogue (to say nothing of the atrocious Mitropoulos version) Columbia has recorded a performance by Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra (Set 608; $5.85). In his unintentionally amusing foreword to Dorian's "History of Music in Performance" Ormandy wrote about "Toscanini and those of us who subscribe to the principles of interpretative loyalty" and who "find . . . a clear-cut expression of our convictions" in Verdi's denunciation of conductors' "creative" meddling with composers' scores and his demand that they perform strictly what the composer has written. But in his performance of Franck's Symphony Ormandy makes innumerable changes of tempo that Franck does not make in his score and that create a work different from the one Franck intended. The recorded sound of the performance is dull.

Schumann's First Symphony is made an even less interesting work than it is by the treatment it gets from Leinsdorf in the performance he recorded with the Cleveland Orchestra (Set 617; $4.85). There is no majesty in the introduction that is marked maestoso, no grace in the finale that is marked grazioso; the first movement is rattled off perfunctorily; the scherzo movement is ponderous; and altogether the performance is technically precise and musically insensitive. Its recorded sound, which varies from side to side, is dull.

Most of the pieces in Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" Suite are performed satisfactorily by Rodzinski with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Set 627; $3.85); but the concluding waltz sounds as though he had taken time out for a cigarette and left a metronome to beat time for the orchestra. The recorded sound of the performance is clear and bright; but my copy of the set has some gritty, crackling surfaces.

Usually printers' errors produce things like the "Venus 12H" instead of "Zenith 12H" in my article on phonographs; but once in a while they produce a truth like the statement in the notes of the Maryla Jonas set—that as Mme Jonas began to play, at her famous New York debut, Jerome D. Bohm of the Herald Tribune suddenly sat "unright." Mr. Bohm's unrightness about her piano-playing is demonstrated in this set (626; $3.85) by performances most of which range from mannered to exacerbated, with pianissimos that are exaggerated, even though not as bad at microphone-range as they were at Carnegie Hall distance. The music is all Chopin's: on the one hand familiar and attractive pieces like the E-minor Nocturne Opus 72 No. 1, the Mazurkas Opus 30 No. 2, Opus 67 No. 2, and Opus 68 No. 4, the Waltz Opus 70 No. 3; on the other hand the posthumous Nocturne in C sharp minor, the Waltz Opus 70 No. 1, an unidentified Mazurka in B flat, and the Polonaise Opus 71 No. 2, which are rarely performed for reasons that are evident when one hears them now. (Only three Mazurkas are listed on the labels instead of the four that are on the record; and the listings are incorrect: on side 1 are the one in B flat and Opus 68 No. 4, on side 2 are Opus 67 No. 2 and Opus 30 No. 2.) The sound of the piano is reproduced with clarity, but without the rich resonance of the best Victor piano recordings; and the surfaces of my copy are gritty and crackling.

The songs of Rachmaninov that Jennie Tourel has recorded (Set 625; $3.85) I do not care for; but Miss Tourel sings them very well—though with an occasional excessive tremolo that I don't recall having heard in her singing before. Erich Itor Kahn provides good piano accompaniments which sound dull on the records; and again there are gritty, crackling surfaces.

Six dances are played by the Philadelphia Orchestra "Pops" (Set 588; $3.85): the Sailors' Dance from Glière's "Red Poppy" and Fernandez's Batuque" under the direction of Saul Caston; the Dance of the Comedians from Smetana's "Bartered Bride," Dvorak's Slavonic Dance No. 10, Brahms's Hungarian Dance No. 5, and Johann Strauss's "Wine, Woman, and Song" Waltz under the direction of Ormandy. The performances are good; and their sound is well reproduced.

On a single record (12372-D; $1) are the engaging Polka and Fugue from Weinbergers "Schwanda," well performed by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy, and also well reproduced. Ezio Pinza's enunciation of the words of "Deep River," on another single (17383-D; $.75), makes his singing of it a mistake.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

An Englishman on Wallace

Dear Sirs: Some of us over here, reading the speech of Henry Wallace, feel like saying, "Thank God!" If this man, who has now been three times thrown, stands up higher than ever, he may be the hope of all those, in several countries, who adhere to principles instead of labels. We do not say, "My country, right or wrong," but "Where is right, there is my country."

America and China

Dear Sirs: The American people can decide whether or not China is to suffer a devastating civil war. Shooting has already started. Whether it continues depends almost entirely upon you. If it does, you will be a participant.

This civil war will be fought in China, the country of your faithful and admiring ally. It will be the Chinese people who will be killed, Chinese towns and farms which will be destroyed, and Chinese ideals and hopes which will be suppressed.

International trade will suffer; economic development will be discouraged. Under such conditions there will be no market for American goods. The world trade-union movement will be deprived of a strong, united Chinese labor movement. Science, culture, and education will be stifled. In other words, China will not be a desirable ally for the United States.

We understand that the United States intends to aid the Chinese people in the reconstruction of their country. We learn that the United States is prepared to take the following steps: (1) grant extensive loans to China, (2) continue lend-lease, (3) sell surplus war properties, (4) maintain the United States marines and navy in China, (5) support the American military mission in China. Naturally we are grateful for the generosity of the American people. But such aid at this time arouses our fear.

You are hardly responsible for the causes of civil war in China. The Chinese people are fully aware of their own responsibilities. But on the other hand, the Chinese people cannot accept responsibility for the American contributions to the civil war. The Chinese people have received General Marshall with respect and friendliness. They accept his recommendations with hope and anticipation. They appreciate the fact that his efforts last January brought China closer to peace and democracy than anyone could have expected at that time. However, in the past six months, General Marshall's excellent contributions have been deliberately and systematically sabotaged by the forces of reaction. These elements do not care whether they plunge the Chinese people into civil war as long as they can continue to terrorize and exploit them. They are monsters who would rather destroy their country than abide by the wishes of the people. These forces of reaction are against democracy not only in China but also in the United States and the Soviet Union.

These forces of reaction now hold positions of leadership in the National Government. Already they have abandoned Dr. Sun Yat-sen's "Three People's Principles" in favor of fascist activities. Today they ban newspapers and arrest students. They are leading private business into bankruptcy.

The United States apparently intends to issue this aid to the Chinese people through the National Government, which is permeated with the forces of reaction. Under such circumstances, we can hardly welcome this aid, for we know that it will be used to continue and enlarge the civil war. China needs aid for reconstruction, but any aid given to the National Government at this time will be aid for destruction. We feel that your contributions, intended to promote peace and democracy, will merely encourage fascism and war.

In other words, your lend-lease, loans, surplus property, marines, and military mission will lead China into a prolonged state of civil war, for the Chinese people will relentlessly fight for the termination of fascism in their country.

The forces of reaction cannot wage war without outside assistance. Lacking this assistance, they will be defeated. Hence, they have turned to the United States for contributions to their war chest. They have manufactured myths to deceive the American people into extending aid to China.

We believe in the sovereignty of the people. This explains why we address our appeal directly to the American people. The American government will not do what you forbid. We ask you to forbid your government to destroy our chance for peace and democracy and for maintaining cordial and useful diplomatic, economic, and cultural relations with you.

A Lack of Facts?

Dear Sirs: I read with interest the Report from Moscow, by J. Alvarez del Vayo (The Nation, August 17), and I was struck by the absence of factual information. This lack is best illustrated by his answer to the comment, "But you are implying that there is such a thing as public opinion in Russia." All he has to say is, "Yes, there is," and he explains that "it does not express itself in the same way as in Western countries. For emphasis he repeats, "But it exists and the Kremlin has many channels for sounding it."

This reader finds it strange indeed that Del Vayo dismisses this important subject—public opinion, the very substance of freedom—with a mere "yes, there is," expecting that, contrary to all other reports, trusting souls will accept, as so many things are accepted about Russia by true believers, his unsupported statement.

How does public opinion express itself in Russia? That is left unexplained. The Kremlin seems to have some mysterious method whereby public opinion is channeled into it.

Facts are wanted.

An Author Protests

Dear Sirs: The Nation of June 1, with Mark Starr's review of my book on labor conditions in Great Britain, has reached me only now. As he tries to make me out to be some kind of impostor in retrospect, would you be kind enough to print the following rejoinder:

Mr. Starr says: "On the title page he is listed as 'formerly statistician, American Federation of Labor.' Actually Mr. Kuczynski . . . worked with the A. F. of L. as a part-time volunteer, and was employed for a short time as a paid worker."

The truth is that I never worked as part-time volunteer but was a full-time paid worker of the A. F. of L. in 1927 and 1928.

Mr. Starr says: "When his work was more carefully supervised, Mr. Kuczynski left."

The truth is that I left in order to write for the Brookings Institution a study of employment statistics before returning to Europe, and that the Federation asked me to continue to serve as a paid adviser on research work as long as I stayed in the United States, which I gladly did.

Mr. Starr says that I "drew the conclusion that the workers are better off during a depression than during a boom."

The truth is that I never concluded any such utter nonsense but simply showed how relative or social wages and real wages moved, within the trade cycle, in opposite directions, a phenomenon already explained a hundred years ago by Marx.

If any of your readers should draw any conclusions from these misstatements by Mr. Starr as to the validity of the rest of the review I would be only too happy. JUERGEN KUCZYNSKI

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • OCTOBER 12, 1946 NUMBER 15

The Shape of Things

IN HIS SPEECH BEFORE THE AMERICAN CLUB in Paris on October 3, Secretary of State Byrnes declared very emphatically that the United States was not going to retreat into a policy of isolation again. There must, he said, be no doubt about America's determination to interest itself in European affairs—a doubt which twice had led to war because other nations had miscalculated the consequences of their actions. The significance of this remark, which he backed by a renewal of his proposal for a Four-Power 40-year treaty to maintain German demilitarization, was its implied warning to the Russians that they could not count on a future American withdrawal from Europe which would open the way to their attainment of hegemony. Perhaps this warning was necessary, but it is a pity that Mr. Byrnes did not accompany it by some gesture that might help to melt the icy barrier that divides us from the Soviets. His comments on Stalin's recent statement were, in fact, politely freezing. He welcomed the Russian Premier's assurance that there was no fear of an atomic war, adding coldly that he hoped this would put an end to "unwarranted charges" that the United States was planning to use its bomb to intimidate Russia. He agreed there was no immediate danger of war but pointedly asserted that "while no nation wants war, nations may pursue policies ... which lead to war." The Secretary's speech, in short, was firmly negative. It offered no hope of ending the impasse which Russian-American relations have reached, an impasse illustrated by the wide differences which remain between the views of the two countries on many of the peace treaty problems over which the Paris conference has been fruitlessly wrangling for nine weeks.

IT IS NATURAL THAT THE BRITISH SHOULD resent Mr. Truman's latest pronouncement on Palestine. Coming as it did on the eve of Yom Kippur and, even more importantly, of the fall election campaign, it carried a flavor of political expediency which English comment promptly recognized. And the fact of its release in the face of a direct request from Mr. Attlee that it be temporarily withheld from publication, added to London's annoyance. But the President's statement was actually more than a campaign maneuver. It represented an important body of American opinion which, since the adjournment of the London Conference, has become increasingly pessimistic about the prospect of early change. If nothing is to be done before the London Conference reassembles in December, the D. P.'s are clearly doomed to another winter in the detention camps of Germany. The President went back to the report of the Joint Inquiry Committee to insist again that substantial immigration into Palestine should not be held up while Britain ponders the long-range aspects of its Middle East policy. He also reiterated his earlier recommendation that the immigration laws of other nations, including the United States, should be liberalized in order to admit refugees, a proposal which ought to mitigate British resentment. And after reviewing the long sequence of fruitless inquiries, negotiations, and proposed solutions, he gave tentative support to the compromise partition plan endorsed by the Jewish Agency. Altogether, the substance of the President's statement was important and its tone moderate and cooperative; it is greatly to be hoped that the British will not write it off as nothing more than a bid for Jewish votes.

ALL BUT TWO OF THE TWENTY-FIVE NEGROES accused of attempted murder during the troubles at Columbia, Tennessee, last February, have been acquitted. That verdict is a triumph for the defending lawyers who, in an atmosphere thick with prejudice, fought from beginning to end with skill and courage. But in some part it can be attributed to the way in which the case was covered in the national press. In particular the syndicated articles of Vincent Sheean exposed the way in which the defense was hampered by the rulings of the presiding judge and laid bare the social background of the Columbia "incident" which occurred when, following a dispute between a Negro and a white man, a white mob gathered in a lynching mood. That night the frightened colored citizens were on guard in Mink Slide, the business section of their quarter. Shots were fired on both sides and four policemen who approached the colored district in a darkened car were wounded. At dawn, State Commissioner of Safety, Lynn Bomar, who admitted at the trial that he had no search warrant, led a posse of highway patrolmen to Mink Slide and started a reign of terror. Stores were smashed and ransacked, money stolen, and 103 men and boys thrown into jail without charge. In the following week, all these prisoners were beaten and two killed "trying to escape." Twenty-five were then arbitrarily held for trial. In court, the prosecution could produce direct evidence against none; it proceeded, apparently, on the Hitlerian theory of "collective guilt." It is satisfactory to know that a Tennessee jury has repudiated this theory. But even if the verdict against the two convicted men is set aside on appeal, as seems probable, it can hardly be said that justice has been served. For the man directly responsible for the deaths of two Negroes and wanton destruction of much property remains—Heaven help Tennessee!—Commissioner of Safety.

FIVE MORE SPANISH REPUBLICANS HAVE JUST been sentenced to death in the new wave of Franco terror which Mr. Del Vayo describes elsewhere in this issue. They are Ramón Prado, Julio Romero, Julio Sanchez, Bonifacio García, and Juan Cuadrado. A United Press cable from Buenos Aires reports that the Argentine Parliament has adopted a resolution urging the Spanish government to commute these sentences. The least we can demand of our government is that it take advantage of its good relations with the Spanish dictator to exert similar pressure on Madrid.

THE POSITION OF THE NATIONAL ECONOMY is now one "of great promise and great danger," said Director John Steelman of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion in his latest quarterly report. From our corner, the danger appears a great deal more conspicuous than the promise. As Mr. Steelman himself noted, prices have risen further in the last three months than in the previous thirty-eight while, despite wage increases, "the money the average working family has to spend per week has decreased since V-E Day." His report declares that the remedy is greater production of finished goods, which is hardly an original thought. The question to be solved is how to overcome the lag in production. It is fashionable to blame that on strikes and low labor productivity. But a lot of the trouble seems to be due to the ill-balanced distribution of man-power and materials, partly due to hoarding. In addition, there is accumulating evidence of deliberate slowdown by business and the withholding of finished goods from the market. Eric Johnston, a member of the OWMR Advisory Board, says rightly that we are paying the penalty for relaxing controls too early and particularly for the fatal hiatus that occurred in the summer when Congress failed to pass an acceptable OPA continuation bill. Mr. Johnston, declaring that wage controls have broken down and thus rendered impossible the successful continuation of price controls, recommends an end to both and urges reliance on (a) free markets and (b) self-restraint in the interests of national welfare, to see us through the danger of inflation which, he admits, remains. He does not realize that his two remedies are incompatible since the only law for the seller in a free market is to grab whatever the traffic can bear.

THE ARMY'S NEW MILITARY TRAINING PLAN is clearly preferable to the one which was allowed to die in committee at the last session of Congress for lack of popular support. In cutting the training period to six months and permitting the trainees to choose any one of seven alternative programs in lieu of another six months training, the Army has recognized at least some of the implications of atomic warfare. The kind of military training that was given to our soldiers in World War II is likely to be utterly irrelevant to the needs of national defense ten years hence. Six months would seem to be the maximum time for which the government could justifiably interrupt the cultural and scientific education of the country's youth. But is is doubtful whether the time, effort, and money demanded by this kind of training represent the wisest use of our resources for national defense. It is estimated that the new universal-training program will cost about $2,000,000,000 annually. If this amount were spent in improving scientific training in our schools and colleges and in enabling tens of thousands of young men to obtain a higher education, our potentialities for national defense might be strengthened to a far greater extent than is possible under any program of military training.

THE AMERICAN LEGION'S CONVENTION AT San Francisco has shown that it takes a good deal more than a World War to change the Legion. Full of nostalgia and grain neutral spirits, most of the legionnaires gamboled and staggered through San Francisco, shooting off water pistols or whistling hoarsely at girls; meanwhile the loudly reactionary and quietly efficient group that has always controlled Legion policy kept on controlling it, in spite of the fact that, by now, two-thirds of the legionnaires are veterans of World War II. Generals, admirals, and J. Edgar Hoover made the usual "Arm! Arm! The Reds Are Coming!" speeches, but General Omar Bradley, head of the Veterans' Administration, surprised his audience by delivering an attack on retiring Commander John Stelle. Stelle had declared that Bradley's indorsement of the $200-a-month ceiling on pay to men receiving on-the-job training was a "betrayal" of the veteran, and that the rights of veterans were everywhere being imperilled by the arbitrary and excessive "economy" of the government. Bradley defended government policy, accused Stelle of consistent exaggeration and misrepresentation in the interests of a special group, and reminded him that the veteran is a citizen first and a veteran second. Stelle's reply, though more palatable to the convention than Bradley's speech, won little applause outside of San Francisco; the American Veterans' Committee immediately came out in support of Bradley. There isn't much doubt that the Legion, in both practice and theory, is just what it used to be, and leftists boring from within seem unlikely to get much more for their pains than blisters and frustration.

Progressives in Chicago

THE Conference of Progressives, which met in Chicago September 28-29, was impressive for several reasons. It attracted representatives from a wide variety of liberal and labor organizations; it was addressed by a notable group of leaders who have refused to run before the current tide of reaction; it adopted a sound program of foreign and domestic policies; it issued a ringing appeal to progressives throughout the country to rally to the polls on November 5 and so insure that the Eightieth Congress will be a more liberal body than the Seventy-ninth.

These achievements will put new heart into progressives and may help to bring out the big registration of votes that is needed to repel the reactionary offensive at the polls. But it must be recognized that the weeks that remain before the election are too few to organize effectively "half a million bell-ringers." It is only possible now to build on foundations which should have already been laid by the P. A. C. and its allies, and there is all too much evidence that these groups are not operating this year as extensively or as enthusiastically as in 1944.

That is not difficult to explain. With the death of Roosevelt and the scattering of the New Dealers, the progressive movement has been forced to take defensive positions. Instead of looking forward to new horizons, it must strive to salvage as many of the Roosevelt policies as possible and, in order to do so, to keep what hold it can on the Democratic Party. This is the object of the short-term tactics adopted by the Chicago conference—the support of liberal candidates of both parties and the weakening of the tory coalition which dominated the last Congress. In practice, however, the result is that progressives find themselves tagging along with the Democratic Party machine in most constituencies, since left-wing Republicans are few and the choice is all too often between a bad Democrat and a worse Republican.

Moreover, it is difficult for progressives to associate themselves, however loosely, with the Democrats while at the same time repudiating the leadership of President Truman. At Chicago this problem was met by giving Mr. Truman the silent treatment, but that is hardly a solution as long as men like Henry Wallace and Claude Pepper, who are identified with progressivism, give their loyal support to the Democratic ticket.

Last week, in discussing The Nation Associates conference at Los Angeles, Freda Kirchwey wrote of "the dilemma of a progressive mass disunited and cut off by changing political currents from the organizational base from which, during the Roosevelt era, it had exercised effective power." The Chicago conference illustrated that dilemma but was unable to point out the way of escape. It did, however, tacitly recognize that the immediate program it recommended, an adaptation of the old Gompers policy of rewarding friends and punishing enemies, had only a limited usefulness. After the election the situation will be reviewed by a Continuation Committee appointed by the conference, and in January a new conference will assemble in Washington which will be able to look ahead to 1948 and beyond. On that occasion the question of the future of the progressive movement will have to be faced and answered. It is a movement, we are convinced, which has great and growing support among the people, but to realize its potentialities it must cease to lean on the memory of Roosevelt and develop new leadership and a new organizational form.

Politics and Justice

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE political basis of the Nürnberg trial was the decision of the major Allied powers that Germany, after Hitler's downfall, was not to be permitted the privilege of revolution. Whether the decision was wise or foolish can never be demonstrated, for no one can say that a revolution in Germany would have succeeded. Twelve years of Hitlerism had largely destroyed the elements necessary for effective revolt, and those elements had never been strong. This fact, of course, had no influence on the decision of the Allies, but it helped silence criticism even among those who, like myself, believe that only through revolution could the German people have purged itself of the poison of fascist tyranny. To mean anything politically, "denazification" must come from inside.

But the Allied powers, Russia included, were not primarily interested in the regeneration of Germany. Their policy was dictated by considerations of security, by the desire of each to establish quickly its own position in the area assigned to it, and, on the part of the Western powers at least, by a strong objection to violent change in Germany, especially from the left.

Because of bad political weather, the German revolution was adjourned to a courtroom.

No honest anti-fascist can regret the punishment of the men responsible for Hitler's dictatorship and for the system of terror and aggression that supported it. But to argue that their punishment was better accomplished by a Nürnberg trial than by a straightforward political decision misses, I think, the central meaning of the struggle against the fascist drive for power. The trial, in fact, obscured that meaning behind its elaborate façade of legalism. If Hitler's lieutenants had to be spared the political fate of Mussolini, if military control by the victors had to take the place of revolution, the most effective and understandable alternative would have been prompt action by the Allied Control Commission. Senator Taft, with impressive lack of logic, has insisted that because the trial was essentially illegal the defendants should not have been condemned to death but merely exiled, as was Napoleon. This argument probably conceals a more logical wish that they had all been acquitted. For if the Nürnberg trial was in fact outside the law, it had no better right to condemn the Nazi leaders to exile them to death. Whereas the Allied powers in 1814 might quite as reasonably have sentenced Napoleon to death as to Elba. A similar political decision by the Inter-Allied Commission in Germany in the summer of 1945 would have avoided the appearance of specious legality which has led even such militant anti-Nazis as our contributor, Rustem Vambery, to question the validity of the whole proceedings at Nürnberg.

I do not say that no good came of the trial. The execution of the top leaders will have a useful political effect in Germany as elsewhere; and even the acquittals, which seem to me quite unjustified, may help make the crimes of the condemned men appear larger and more sinister. The vast accumulation of evidence, presented in the courtroom and dramatized outside, should have convinced the ordinary German-in-the-street that the Nazi regime, individually and as a whole, was as unprecedentedly evil as the world knew it to be. And the appearance in court, as accusing witnesses, of some of the surviving victims of Hitler's extermination camps provided an unforgettable lesson in the meaning of terror.

More important was the attempt of the Tribunal to establish aggression and crimes against humanity as offenses under international law. This effort may have been legally indefensible, as Dr. Vambery maintains, providing dubious grounds upon which to convict the accused Nazis. At the same time, viewed politically and even morally, it is possible to argue that it set up certain standards which represent the beliefs of all decent men and women in this threatening era. In other words, Nürnberg may have helped crystallize a point of view which must form the basis in custom upon which valid law can eventually be erected. To find moral values in juridical proceedings which are unsound legally will itself seem immoral to the legal purist. But to one who looks upon the whole trial as essentially an over-elaborate political process, the coincidence of high ideals and questionable law offers fewer difficulties.

One more word about the effect of the acquittals. There are those who believe they were justified as a demonstration of the fairness of the procedure, proving that the cases as a whole were not prejudged. This argument seems to have been overthrown by the reports from Germany, which indicate that the attitude of the ordinary citizen toward the acquittals is one of bewilderment and disapproval. He knows Schacht as the clever fox who converted Germany's financial system to the purposes of rearmament and war, who organized leading industrialists and bankers in support of the Nazi program, and who helped Hitler into power—while maintaining always a convenient fiction of superior detachment. As for von Papen, the man who induced Hindenburg to give Hitler the Chancellorship and who betrayed Austria to the Nazis, he too is known to all Germans as an active accomplice of the regime. That he managed to cover his operations with a cloak of respectability and, especially, of piety in no way mitigates his offense. To have these two land on their feet after the fall of Nazism has obviously produced a reaction of cynicism rather than respect. And the same attitude, in lesser degree, applies to the freeing of Fritsche. Legal safeguards which prevent the punishment of men whose acts so clearly merit punishment are sure to be regarded as devices to protect the powerful rather than the innocent. And the fact that Schacht's acquittal will apparently result in the freeing of all the leading industrialists and financiers now awaiting trial only adds to the unfortunate political effect of the verdict.

De Gaulle Marches Backward

BY GEORGE SLOCOMBE

Paris, October 1

THE events of the past week will have a profound influence on French history for many years to come. By his speech at Epinal on Sunday, September 29, General de Gaulle cut himself adrift from the mass of French democratic opinion as effectively as, and hardly less dramatically than, he broke with his past on June 18, 1940, when he denounced the capitulation of Marshal Philippe Pétain to Germany. A solitary by nature and by choice, the General has never been more aloof from his countrymen, more alone in his political thinking, than he is today. The fact that he is enthusiastically acclaimed by the diehards of the recently formed Party of Republican Liberties, that they would like to carry him to the Elysée tomorrow as the chief of an authoritarian, anti-Communist, but also anti-democratic regime, that his popularity is still great among the peasants and among the small rentier class, both of whom find difficulty in reorienting themselves in the new political atmosphere of France, does not alter the grave truth of De Gaulle's essential solitude.

The dominant, the tragic reality is that General de Gaulle has finally broken with the Resistance, with almost all the young, ardent, patriotic, forward-looking elements of France which revolted against Vichy, which suffered and came near death under the enemy occupation, which desired a new France after the liberation, and which still desire it. And the Resistance, for all its reiterated professions of admiration for the De Gaulle of the eighteenth of June, 1940, and the years which followed that courageous declaration of faith in France's destinies, for all its past loyalty and undiminished respect for his person, has definitely broken with De Gaulle. He is now seen as the associate, willing or unwilling, conscious or unconscious, avowed or occult, of the remnants of Vichyism, the unrepentant survivors of the "two hundred families," the anti-democratic, power-loving, money-conscious feudalists of the Third Republic whose spokesmen and chosen instruments ranged, in the tragic years before and after the débâcle, from Gaston Doumergue, Pierre Etienne Flandin, Camille Chautemps, Edouard Daladier, Georges Bonnet to Marshal Pétain and Pierre Laval.

Only this realization could have brought about the eleventh-hour reconciliation over the draft constitution between such redoubtable and permanent adversaries as the Christian Democrats of the M. R. P., the Socialists of Léon Blum, and the Communists of Maurice Thorez and Jacques Duclos. Only this could have achieved an eleventh-hour agreement between the Christian Democrats and the Communists on an electoral law which retains proportional representation on the departmental plane but rejects the mixing of lists of candidates at the electors' choice—an agreement which satisfies neither party as to the principle but which gives to each a certain temporary advantage in the elections to be held this month. And only this realization of De Gaulle's real intentions could have provoked Léon Blum, a generous political critic and an erstwhile admirer of the General, to his recent probing and destructive polemics against De Gaulle.

In French politics it is never the superficial subject of agreement or disagreement which counts. All the political parties in France debate endlessly over a phrase, but each reads into the written word its own meaning. The constitution on which the three great parties of the Resistance reached unanimous agreement on the eve of De Gaulle's speech at Epinal satisfies none of them. It is a document full of compromises, evasions, and innuendoes. The salient fact about it is its insistence on the sovereign rights of the democratically elected National Assembly. The second chamber, called the Council of the Republic, has been grudgingly accorded the right to initiate laws, if not financial laws, but refused the right to veto those passed by the Assembly. It will not enjoy the power, possessed by the old Senate, of rejecting legislation passed by the more directly and democratically elected lower house, or of ordering, by agreement with the President of the Republic, the dissolution of the lower house in a political crisis. The President of the Republic has been permitted the right of appointing the president of the Council of Ministers (Prime Minister), but this appointment must be ratified by an absolute majority of the National Assembly.

The lower house thus retains its sovereign powers of legislation and of control over the executive at every stage in the political battle. It may be argued that the new President will in fact enjoy as great powers as those actually exercised by his predecessors under the Third Republic. On every occasion when a President of the Republic has attempted in the past to exceed the de facto powers allotted to his office under the new constitution, he has run into grave trouble with Parliament and has had to submit or resign. It is clear to the Resistance parties that the crux of the quarrel with General de Gaulle centers in the powers of the President of the Republic. In order to see the position clearly, one has only to imagine the Communist leader Maurice Thorez engaged in the same battle for a strong chief of state. General de Gaulle would then be found among the partisans of the sovereign Assembly.

The effect of the General's Epinal speech, in which incidentally he went farther and more defiantly along the path to an authoritarian state than he has ever permitted himself in earlier declarations, may be surprising both to De Gaulle's followers and to his critics. He has unmistakably counseled the nation to say No when the constitution is offered for ratification in the referendum of October 13. But the nation has already said No once, and it has shown little interest in the debates over the constitution. Out of apathy, out of alarm at the prolongation of a regime of provisional governments and temporary parliaments, it may conceivably reverse its previous judgment and reply Yes. It may also take fright at the prospect of a fascist dictatorship adumbrated in the General's demand for a strong executive and a strong chief of state. Even if some sections of the nation are not opposed to a paternal government which will create a barrier against communism, the same sections may reasonably recoil from the prospects of civil war between the General's partisans and the Communists. Finally, there is the traditional civilian distrust of the general on horseback. The French are a martial nation but not a military nation. In times of peace they suspect the interference of soldiers in politics. The Dreyfus Affair, and the four years' rule of Marshal Pétain, left a permanent distaste for military intervention.

These are the negative factors which may insure a reaction against General de Gaulle even among the Catholic, property-owning, professional classes which admire him most. The positive factors are even more convincing. The Assembly has passed the revised draft of the constitution by an impressive majority—440 to 106. The Socialists, Communists, and M. R. P. voted unanimously for it. Under the electoral law as amended, little or no change can be expected in the next Assembly. The position of the three great parties remains unaffected. Even if a proportion of the M. R. P. voters is influenced by General de Gaulle's condemnation of the constitution, and replies No, there will remain sufficient Yes voters among the M. R. P. to swell the solid ranks of the Socialists and the Communists. Many of Edouard Herriot's dwindling following of Radicals and Radical-Socialists, moreover, although they do not like the draft constitution, will probably vote for it because they like General de Gaulle's authoritarian tendencies even less.

It should be realized also that General de Gaulle has given the three Resistance parties their best fighting slogan, both in the referendum and in the new general elections. A constitution, even perfect, is a poor thing to do battle for. But a personality, a name, especially when that personality and that name are associated with the most tragic and eventful years in the history of France, are the best of slogans, the most brilliant of battle flags. Napoleon, for many years after his eclipse, was the subject of a legend over which men argued, fought, quarreled, triumphed, or despaired. There is nothing so dangerous as the dictator myth.

The Law of the Tribunal

BY RUSTEM VAMBERY

IN SPITE of such obvious anomalies as the acquittal of Papen, who sponsored Hitler's rise to power, and the hanging of Rosenberg, who provided the Nazis with their ideology, the acquittal of the German General Staff and the hanging of its chief, General Jodl, the Nürnberg judgment clearly made an attempt to keep up legal appearances. There was, indeed, nothing wrong with the Nürnberg trial except its psychological background and its juridical foundation. As I emphasized in earlier issues of The Nation (May 19 and December 1, 1945), both the Charter of the International Military Tribunal and the Tribunal itself had les fautes de leurs qualités: the Charter because it assumed that the four-power agreement could create international law and the Tribunal because for lack of legal rules to define the crime and determine the punishment it had to imitate the arbitrariness of Hitlerian jurisprudence. Legally there is as much justification for the position "They should have hanged those fellows in Nürnberg in the first place?" as for the suggestion made by the gloomy Dean of St. Paul's that a general pardon be granted to the accused.

It is not the personal fate of those lunatics and scoundrels who exemplified German megalomania running amuck but the fate of law and justice in which we are interested. Justice Jackson stated that the kingpin of the case is the declaration that aggressive war is a crime. How aggressive war is to be defined and why it is a crime we are not told in the summary of the judgment prepared "for the convenience of the press," which looks more like a textbook of history than a legal document. Had Hitler won the war, Great Britain would undoubtedly have been named the aggressor since it declared war on Germany after the Nazis invaded Poland. In his foreword to Professor Sheldon Glueck's recent book, "The Nürnberg Trial and Aggressive War," Justice Jackson said that "by any possible definition of aggression, this war was aggressive in its plotting and execution." If this contention is granted, then Justice Jackson should be able to furnish us at least one out of several possible definitions of aggression to appease our juridical conscience. But instead of going to the elementary trouble of formulating a definition of aggressive war, the Nürnberg court, in the words of Professor Glueck, "avoided wrangles over definitions and dealt with the challenge—is it a crime to make a war of aggression?" It is strange, considering the possibility of divergent definitions—no legalistic mind is needed to find the hitch—that the Tribunal should have been able to give a correct answer without a knowledge of the question.

In Chapter III of his book Dr. Glueck uses similar sleight-of-hand to reach the conclusion that aggressive war is an international crime. He begins by confessing that during the preparation of an earlier book he was "not at all certain that the acts of launching and conducting an aggressive war could be regarded as an 'international crime.'" But later he states that "further reflection upon the problem has led me to the conclusion that for the purpose of conceiving aggressive war to be an international crime, the Pact of Paris, together with other treaties and resolutions, may be regarded as evidence of a sufficiently developed custom to be acceptable as international law." Now, Professor Glueck's own investigations reveal a number of interesting features in these treaties and resolutions. The Pact of Paris, in spite of outlawing war, did not make its violation a crime. The Draft Treaty of Mutual Assistance (1923) failed in fact of adoption because of the major objection "that it would be difficult to define what act would comprise aggression." The famous Geneva Protocol never came into effect. The Washington Conference (1928) condemned war in general without attempting to differentiate between types of war. The Rio Anti-War Treaty (1933), condemning wars of aggression, and other similar declarations used the term "crime" in a poetic rather than a legal sense. Therefore, as even Professor Glueck and the Nürnberg Tribunal have to admit, the "crimes against peace" are "strictly speaking not based upon proof of any specific provision of any of the international treaties or conventions."

What, then, is the legal basis for considering aggressive war an international crime? According to Professor Glueck, it is "the crystallization of generally prevailing opinion" and "the existence of a widespread custom." However, he is aware of the requirement "of a very long if not immemorial usage to establish a customary rule either in common or international law," but thinks that because "of the tremendous technological development of the present epoch... the time requirement for the legal validity of custom in the field must, correspondingly, be telescoped." Although in the concept of a military tribunal the adjective is supposed to dominate the noun, the application of atomic energy or of the speed of rocket planes to the tempo of customary law seems to overrate the spiritual repercussion of "technological development."

With Dr. Glueck's conclusion that there is "evidence of a sufficiently developed custom" to justify the conception of aggressive war as an international crime his own remark that "every custom must have a beginning some time" seems to be inconsistent, as does also the general reaction of the press, which hailed the Nürnberg judgment as a valuable precedent—except a few papers which thought it foolish to say that this is a precedent because they do not recognize the slight difference between the rules of international law and the slaughter of defeated kings and populations in ancient times.

Victor powers can do almost anything. They might have even proclaimed a law in Germany defining aggressive war and setting the punishment for violation of this law; and by a dictate they could have made it retroactive, in contradiction to Article 9 of the Constitution of the United States. What they cannot do, however, is to declare that a custom exists. Because the precedents creating the customary rule are more powerful than any statute, which might be abrogated by custom.

Those who are so enthusiastic about the precedent set by the Nürnberg judgment have apparently never heard of the college professor from the Middle West who visited Oxford. Meeting an English friend in a college quad, the American asked why some people crossed the lawn while others went around it. "Because," was the answer, "it has been the custom for over three centuries to allow only dons to cross the quad." "Oh, I see," said the American. On returning to Missouri or wherever his college was, he posted the following notice on the bulletin board: "From today on the three-hundred-year-old custom begins that undergraduates must not cross the campus." It will take, if not centuries, a considerable time to find out whether the Nürnberg judgment has really set a precedent by making the violation of international treaties a crime. After all, it was early in the seventeenth century that Hugo Grotius proclaimed the rule Pacta sunt servanda—treaties must be respected. And the Nazis were certainly not the first to disregard it.

One of the columnists was emphatic that the "Nürnberg trial upholds our justice," apparently meaning Anglo-American and not international justice, but I am not too confident of that. Nor would I subscribe to the editorial which heralded: "The world will accept [the verdict] as both a magnificent achievement and a long step toward a new conception of international justice which makes future peace more secure." Reaction to the judgment abroad hardly justifies this optimism. I would not follow those writers who declare that the "new legal rules and standards now become integral parts of international law." What really happened at Nürnberg was a revolution in traditional law and jurisprudence. And since law is essentially conservative, it is hard to foretell whether the "precedents" will ever truly be precedents at all.

The judgment and the punishments imposed may, however, be looked at from different angles. Some comments see the judgment as "an international decalogue that all aggressors will have to reckon with in the future." This means that whatever its legal value the judgment will have a deterrent effect on future aggressors. But faith in deterrent punishment has very much decreased in the past hundred years. "There is considerable doubt," we are told by Professor Reckless in his book "Criminal Behavior," "that punishment has as much deterrent value as the justification presupposes." Barnes and Teeters call this belief in deterrence childish, and assert—in "New Horizons in Criminology"—that the "deterrent effect of capital punishment, even if it existed, is largely lost because of the mild modern methods of executing the death penalty." It is a well-known fact that at a time when pickpockets were still hanged in England pickpockets were frequently caught red-handed in the crowd watching the executions.

The reason for the failure of deterrence is obvious. While punishment, and in particular capital punishment, impresses the honest man, it has less effect on the prospective criminal. Perhaps his motive to commit the crime is so strong that it obliterates the dread of the consequences, or perhaps he hopes to evade the consequences by not being caught. Similarly the psychology of prospective aggressors, political or military, is so self-centered that the failure of their venture does not occur to them. Caesar would scarcely have been deterred by being told that he would be stabbed by Brutus, or Napoleon by the possibility of being deported to St. Helena. Dictators, tyrants, generals, conquerors, and other dangerous specimens of mankind do not react to motives as do Mrs. Grundy and Joe Doakes. Therefore, I am afraid, the judgment cannot be excused by the hope of intimidating future aggressors.

Nevertheless, we have to admit the procedure was fair, and that with respect to the observance of legal formalities, the piling up of an unprecedented amount of evidence, and dignified conduct, it was unimpeachable. Whether it does substantiate justice in abstracto is another question. According to Froude justice without wisdom is impossible. Not the Tribunal was lacking in wisdom but those statesmen who were so scared by the idea of revolution, which after all is the normal consequence of defeat, that they embarked upon the hopeless task of settling a war and the fascist-Nazi revolution by the application of non-existent legal rules.

Pre-Election U.S.A.

BY ROBERT BENDINER

II. Bay State Prospects

Boston, Massachusetts

MASSACHUSETTS, unlike Connecticut, offers no happy hunting ground for Republicans in search of additional Congressmen. Its Washington delegation has been overwhelmingly Republican for years, and its few Democratic districts are too safe to give G. O. P. Chairman Carroll Reece much cause for hope. It is the Democrats who may pick up a seat or two in this state, though the odds are slightly against it.

Of the fourteen Massachusetts Representatives in the Seventy-ninth Congress, and in the Congress before that, ten were Republicans and four Democrats. In terms of the total vote, however, the state is about evenly divided between the two parties, which will give you an idea of how shamelessly and skilfully Republican legislatures have gone about their gerrymandering.

Even Bob Hannegan will probably concede that seven of the state's districts will without fail return their present Republican Congressmen, every one of them to the right of Senator Vandenberg. In these rock-ribbed areas reelection of Republicans is automatic, with strict party voting in Congress the only qualification. One of these incrusted incumbents is reported to have made only one full-length speech on the floor of the House in his sixteen years of service, and that was on a bill concerning carrier pigeons.

Similarly, two traditionally Democratic districts, the Seventh and Twelfth, will send back their incumbents with no more than a show of opposition; and in Boston's Eleventh—now represented by Curley—Joseph Kennedy's young son John, who bills himself as a "fighting conservative," will have little more trouble in coming through than a Democrat would in Mississippi. The "fighting conservative" played so freely with the family fortune during the primary fight that jokesters around the State House took to wearing twenty-dollar bills in their lapels as "Kennedy campaign buttons." But he need not have been so lavish. The Kennedy name is powerful, and the opposition was slight. Having missed their chance in the primary, the P. A. C. and other independent groups are sitting this one out.

In the four remaining districts the Republicans have a chance to pick up one additional seat, that of P. J. Philbin in the centrally located Third. The seat has been Democratic in the past three elections, but in the last mid-term poll the margin of victory was just over 700 votes. No organized effort is being made for Philbin by the independents, however, because while he did well enough on labor legislation, his voting record on the OPA, foreign policy, atomic controls, and civil liberties was slightly less commendable than that of John Rankin.

Democratic leaders and the P. A. C. people here are resting their hopes on capturing the First, Second, and Fourteenth. A steady drift of Irish and Polish workers from Boston to the industrial towns in the western part of the state has been showing itself in the proportionally increasing Democratic vote in Pittsfield, Holyoke, and Springfield. I wouldn't say that the betting favors Democrats John Falvey and Foster Furcolo to replace Republican incumbents in the First and Second, but they have a chance—particularly Falvey, whose opponent, John Heselton, barely skinned through in 1944. Both Heselton and Charles Clason, who represents the Second, are solemnly campaigning on the unimpeachable issue of flood control.

Aside from the effort of Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., to grab the seat of his aging mentor, Senator Walsh, the only contest in the state worth national attention is the David-Goliath struggle going on in the Fourteenth. In this district, gerrymandered so as to eliminate sure-fire Democratic wards around Fall River while adding the traditionally Republican town of Wellesley, Martha Sharp is trying to bring to a close the twenty-two-year Congressional career of Joe Martin, minority leader and potential Speaker of the House. This is the kind of assignment that is usually foisted on a party dray-horse, which is precisely the type of opposition that Martin has had to contend with in the past eleven elections. It is no wonder that he has been thrown off guard to find himself confronted by a young, attractive, and intelligent woman, an excellent speaker with a well-thought-out program, determined to win and convinced that she will.

Martha Sharp and her staff, quartered at the Hotel Touraine, have been waging an uphill fight, but they are hopeful—and with reason. She has advantages that no other opponent of Joe Martin's has ever brought into a race against him. In a district with large French-Canadian and Portuguese elements, she can appeal to voters in both languages. What is more, she has decorations from the Paris and Lisbon governments for relief work as agent of the Unitarian Service Committee, the Red Cross, and the United States Committee for Care of European Children. She holds the White Lion of Czechoslovakia, as well, for services to refugees of that country in 1939, and is an honorary member of Hadassah for having raised more than $300,000 for the United Jewish Appeal.

Organized labor is backing Mrs. Sharp to an unprecedented degree in the district, with the Textile Workers, the Amalgamated, the I.L.G.W., and the Railway Brotherhoods all giving active support. She has the benefit of a full-time P. A. C. agent (outside of Connecticut there are only two in all New England, I discovered). And while the P. A. C. itself has been unable to make a dent organizationally in the 80 per cent Catholic area around Fall River and Taunton, some 485 shop stewards have been successfully promoting a large registration and are pledged to get out the vote in November. In no other district in New England is labor putting on so thorough a campaign.

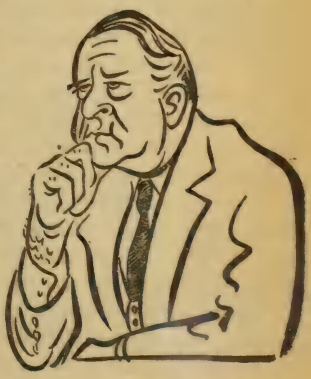
Representative Martin

Mrs. Sharp herself has thrown enormous energy into the fight, speaking constantly in the thirty-four towns of the district. She stresses housing, which is unbelievably bad up this way, full employment, an adequate minimum wage, fair employment practices, a national health and education program, social security, and a foreign policy liberal enough to include American initiative in the surrender of bases to the United Nations. In addition, of course, she points out Martin's failure to bring new industry to Fall River, which has lost more than half of the 106 textile mills it had when he first took office. The charge is that Martin would rather have a pool of unemployed than a sharp demand for labor. He talks often of deepening Fall River's harbor to stimulate commerce, and early in the autumn of every election year a dredge appears offshore. Workmen survey the problem, but all that the dredge raises is fleeting hopes. By the tenth of November it vanishes, the workmen depart, and nothing more is said of the project until the next campaign rolls around.

On the other side of the ledger, the Sharp people find themselves up against powerful forces. The northern part of the district is Yankee and Republican by tradition. The southern part is poor, dominated by the church, and politically primitive—ideal territory for a politician of unlimited cynicism and limited scruples, in short, for Joe Martin. Until recently Martin kept himself well in the background, but now he is nervously making door-to-door calls in the town of Wellesley, whose surprised citizens have never before had the pleasure of meeting their Representative. His agents have been at work for some time, seeing to it that he is all things to all men. Where it will do good it is even being whispered that "José Marteen" is really of Portuguese stock, while in the rural areas Martha Sharp's linguistic fluency is being given an ominous twist—something "foreign" about her, and therefore suspect. Throughout the district the red-label technique is being worked for all it is worth, which is considerable. Her Czechoslovak decoration soon became, for Republican campaign purposes, a Yugoslav award, from which it was an easy step to brand her a "friend of Tito."

The truth is that Martha Sharp's manager is a genial Irish Catholic and she herself pursues a radicalism no redder than Franklin Roosevelt's. Although the P. A. C. has given her a full-time campaigner, she has received little organizational help and is in fact handicapped by lack of funds. Nevertheless, her chances of winning are good enough to have thrown a very real scare into the Republican camp. For a hard-crusted veteran like Martin to be defeated—and perhaps done out of the Speakership—by a progressive and politically unknown amateur would be a humiliation hard for the G. O. P. to swallow.

It is a pity that Martha Sharp cannot play on the marked inclination, running strong throughout the country, to oust the "ins." Naturally enough, that appeal is ruled out here, since the party's nominee for the Senate, David I. Walsh, has been an "in"—not counting a short stretch between 1924 and 1926—for lo, these twenty-eight years. He went to the Senate in 1928 as the first Massachusetts Democrat elected to that body since the Civil War.



Caricatures by Seligson

Senator Walsh

Between Walsh and Lodge Massachusetts liberals are less torn over which to vote for than which to vote against. Lodge is trying hard to live down his isolationist record, not to mention his grandfather's, but his pretensions to Willkie Republicanism are unconvincing, and I find that Lodge himself is profoundly distrusted. Walsh, who like Lodge was one of the most rabid of pre-Pearl Harbor isolationists, makes no claim to having seen the light of One World, preferring to base his appeal to the left on his generally pro-labor voting record. I had the chance to see his answers to a questionnaire prepared by the local Citizens' P. A. C., and aside from the question of breaking relations with Spain, which none of the candidates favored, his replies were well over on the New Deal side. Labor will vote for him, without cheers—just as it will probably vote to reelect Governor Tobin—largely because it is used to his well-established faults and virtues, whereas the youthful and cagy Lodge is looked upon as an unreliable and potentially dangerous figure.

The contest for governor in this state has stirred up hardly any more enthusiasm among liberals than the senatorial campaign, with Tobin enjoying a mild preference over Republican Robert F. Bradford. Beneath a thin surface of harmony, the intra-party feud between Curley and Tobin is still intense. At the Democratic convention, the Mayor and Governor embraced, but only after Curley had said to the delegates, "I don't think any man could be more vicious and cruel than he has been to me." While the regular party vote may not be disrupted by Curley's dubious tribute to the head of the ticket, the incident is not likely to encourage those marginal votes that Tobin will need in what is certain to be a close race.

The Melody Is Gone

BY HENRY ZON

Washington, October 1

"SENATOR, we're a team, and when the President gives the word, we move." Harry Hopkins, appearing before the Senate Commerce Committee one cold January day in 1939, stated thus the credo of New Dealers in the government service. Today the men and women who regarded themselves as members of the team have left the government service, or are seeking the nearest exit, or are wasting their talents on routine government work.

"If lawyers," one of them said recently, "could solve the problem of how to practice law without clients, Washington would see the greatest exodus since 1812." Another, long on the legal staff of the National Labor Relations Board, confessed a few days ago that among all the men who had seen the board through its trying years not one would refuse a decent offer.

New Dealers who have stayed in the government have done so in the belief that liberalism is a workable doctrine able to survive the loss of a leader, even though that leader was such a one as Franklin D. Roosevelt. Some regret with bitterness that Roosevelt did not give the liberal, idealistic, and enthusiastic government servants he gathered around him a freer hand to create a lasting structure. As far back as 1934 a memorandum submitted to an important New Deal official declared that too many details were taken care of in the White House and that more thought should be given to the maintenance of the liberal cadres then being formed.

HENRY ZON was for six years manager of the Washington bureau of the Federated Press, a labor press service. He recently returned to Washington after four years in the Army Air Forces.

Such philosophic meditations are not sufficient to hold the Robert Nathans, James L. Flys, and Ganson Purcells. The chance to develop a long-term political theory does not compensate for daily frustration. Before April, 1945, the White House had magic, gave inspiration. Mr. Roosevelt was "the Boss" who could use the tools handed him, who could apply the facts and theories, who could provide a solution to vexing problems, who could perk up lagging spirits. A store of anecdotes illuminate this aspect of Roosevelt's personality.

There is the story of how he sent the press section of the NRA a corrected handout, in his own handwriting, pointing up an obscure phase of the program. There is the story of how he baffled Oscar Johnston, manager of the government cotton pool, one day after Johnston had battled personally with an $1,800-a-year clerk in the State Department over the width of the left-hand margin on an important executive order which Johnston was trying to rush through to approval. As Johnston came into the famous gadget-cluttered oval room, the President looked up and said without the trace of a smile, "Oscar, I'm afraid I can't sign this order." Johnston, bristling, wanted to know why not. "Well, you see," retorted the President, still poker-faced, "the left-hand margin is half an inch too narrow."

"Now," according to a departed New Dealer, "if you can get in to see Truman at all you have a feeling that he's just another government official in just another government office. There's no dazzle, no inspiration. Just apathy." "You will notice," he said, "that people around Washington still mean Roosevelt when they say 'the President'; they refer to the present White House occupant as 'Mr. Truman.'"

Admittedly it is unfair to compare Truman with Roosevelt. The nation suffers from war weariness. People are tired of reform, and pressures are not what they were in the thirties. The bright-eyed lawyers just out of Harvard, Yale, and Columbia who showed the Wall Street law firms legal tricks they never thought existed are older, with responsibilities they did not have ten years ago. Many are nervous about the prospects of a Republican victory in 1948 and the loss of their jobs.

The whole problem of personnel turnover has been discussed with Mr. Truman by men who have left for the greener pastures of private endeavor. They report him apathetic. He is inclined to feel that the retention of desirable people is solely a matter of raising the salary ceiling. Any criticism of Secretary of the Treasury John W. Snyder, Reconversion Director John R. Steelman, or RFC Director George E. Allen he brushes aside impatiently. The less people bother him the better he likes it, and the feeling extends down through his subordinates. Symptomatic of the Administration's attitude was Allen's recent remark in an interview: "My philosophy is what you might call strictly a bromide. I believe a majority of people will eventually arrive at the right solution of any question that comes along—so why stew about it till they do?"

The list of those who have resigned is a long one. The important names have been printed in the daily papers, but hundreds on the lower levels have slipped out unnoticed to scratch around for themselves, and thousands of others are eyeing the door. The lengthening list of law firms in Washington is indicative. A client can have his choice of former Assistant Attorney General Thurman Arnold, former Under Secretary of the Interior Abe Fortas, former OPA General Counsel David Ginsburg, former Assistant WPB General Counsel Henry H. Fowler, the former head of the Board of Immigration Appeals, Joseph Fanelli, and the former head of the Department of Justice's Claims Division, Frank Shea.

The replacements are different too. Washington is no longer the goal of the law-review men. Professors can no longer inspire their classes by citing recent graduates who have made their mark in government service. It is more important to have a connection with Battery D, 129th Field Artillery, than with Felix Frankfurter. Mediocrity and a willingness to ignore issues are in demand.

A foreign diplomat described the turn of the wheel in a very much off-the-record conversation with newspapermen. "When Mr. Roosevelt was in the White House," he said, "every day there, with its air of delightful expectancy, seemed like Christmas." "Now," he added sadly, "every day is just Thursday."

British Labor at the Crossroads

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, September 30

CHRONICLING contemporary history requires one, as your correspondent is painfully aware, to fit into place pieces of a jigsaw puzzle whose final pattern has yet to be decided by largely unpredictable future events. Looking back over the past two months, abnormally wet and cheerless even for an English summer, one sees an untidy disarray of political odds and ends. Pieced together, they begin to make a picture of growing disappointment. When Parliament meets again on October 8, Labor M. P.'s will reassemble with the pretty general conviction that during the recess the government's stock, particularly among its own supporters, has fallen. It is all very well to say that those who vote for a political change either because, as Oscar Wilde said of entrants into matrimony, "they are tired or because they are curious" are inevitably disappointed. The electorate who voted Labor into power in the summer of 1945 is disappointed for tangible reasons which it is increasingly inclined to voice.

AYLMER VALLANCE is The Nation's London correspondent and one of its staff contributors.

To begin with, the common man, and more particularly the trade-unionist, is at last asking aloud where Bevinism is going to take him. Up to a point he was ready to accept the Foreign Office line, plugged by the whole British press with the exception of the Daily Worker, that the Russians were aggressive and must be taught good neighborliness. This line made a natural appeal to people who instinctively dislike the hectoring fellow who throws his weight about in the pub. But ready though he was at first to regard with humorous approval the spectacle of Ernest Bevin getting tough with Mr. Molotov, the British workingman has lately begun to view the issue with more judicial eyes. Monarchist reaction in Greece, made possible only by the backing of British bayonets, shook him, and news of the spread of civil war in northern Greece prompted anxious questionings whether British troops might not soon be involved in support of the crowned leader of the Populist Party.

Then, as the Peace Conference pursued its interminable wrangles, it began to be noted that every proposal made by the U. S. S. R. seemed to be automatically opposed by Britain or America—simply because it was Russian. Labor supporters as far removed from the Communist Party as Mr. Attlee himself began to ask whether it was really a vital interest for the British working class that Trieste, for example, should be treated as an Anglo-American colony and garrisoned, regardless of its inhabitants' wishes, by G. I.'s and Tommies. They began to look more closely into the real motives behind the apparent determination of Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes to secure "freedom of trade" on the Danube—a demand backed by American retention of Danube shipping belonging to the riparian states and by British championship of the dispossessed oil interests in Rumania.

Aneurin Bevan

Just why, they wondered, were negotiations in hand for a great expansion of trade with Franco Spain? Why were more and more prominent ex-Nazis being appointed to key posts in the German administration of the British zone? And why must we convert Palestine, in place of Egypt, into a great military base? Above all, why should we spare troops for this and that ambitious foreign commitment when labor shortage was holding back the production of goods and the progress of reconstruction at home?

Into that atmosphere of increasing disquiet the speech of Henry Wallace and still more his letter to President Truman fell like a bombshell. The Tory press and, significantly enough, the official organ of the Labor Party, the Daily Herald, did their best to offset the effect of Wallace's appeal for a new approach to the U. S. S. R. by playing up his brief and almost incidental criticism of British imperialism. Here, it was said, was a "head-in-the-air" idealist who had listened to Communist or anti-British Zionists and was talking nonsense. Was not Britain withdrawing from India and Egypt in a most un-imperialist way? This effort, however, to misrepresent Wallace by underlining out of its context one passage of his theme was not wholly successful. The common man here took in enough of Wallace's purport to realize that a member of the United States Cabinet, after weighing all the relevant facts, had come to the conclusion that the Byrnes-Bevin line had in it a definite threat of war. Realization of this brought foreign policy with a bang right into the working-class kitchen and the pub at the corner. Ernest Bevin began to be seen not as a bluff British working-class version of Palmerston but as an ineffectual stooge of American big-business policy. Had the Foreign Secretary forgotten that he was a member of a Socialist government? Had Britain nothing to contribute in the way of positive Socialist policy? With respect to Europe must it be left to Mr. Churchill at Zurich to repeat, without a word of dissent from Downing Street, his plea for an anti-Soviet bloc, and for Mr. Eden, oddly contradicting his leader, to reciprocate Stalin's suggestion, in his interview with Alex Werth, that a Communist East and a Social Democratic West of Europe might find between them a modus vivendi?

In the new session of Parliament there will be not far short of 100 Labor M. P.'s—of whom only a few can fairly be described as "fellow-travelers"—who are radically opposed to the Foreign Secretary's policy. In the country their point of view—that Britain cannot afford to be tied up with the diplomacy of the United States Department of State and that we must choose, and choose soon, between formulating a Socialist foreign policy of our own and drifting into an inevitable third war—is gaining more and more adherents. So far as foreign policy is concerned, the Labor government is seen as having arrived at the parting of the ways.

And it is not only with regard to foreign policy that the British public has the sense of being at a crossroads. Two significant developments at home have marked the summer months—the campaign for a "closed shop" in industry and the squatter movement. Both have been spontaneous popular ebullitions, arising out of the same feeling of frustration. The prelude to both was the ignominious retreat conducted by the Minister of Supply in the question of nationalizing the steel industry. Unlike the bankrupt coal industry, steel, the common man realized, was one of the key strong points on which the politically worsted bourgeoisie of England was relying for its retention of economic power. Judge, then, the Labor voter's dismay when he heard that nationalization was to be postponed and that the only control over private enterprise in steel was to be exercised by a board consisting of two steel magnates, two "middle-of-the-road" trade-unionists drawn from the industry, and a big-business accountant from Glasgow as chairman. This form of control, which means that the public funds the industry must have for reconstruction will be spent pretty much at their own sweet will by the tycoons of the Iron and Steel Federation, was viewed as evidence that the government was too weak seriously to challenge a well-organized capitalist lobby. Would the result, it was asked, be any different in the line-up between the Cabinet and the powerful pressure groups being organized by the managements of the railways, the road-haulage corporations, and electricity and gas, all slated theoretically for early nationalization?

The mood of doubt thus engendered had as its first direct consequence the agitation for a "closed shop." And this campaign was not, as the Tory press tried to represent it, a move by trade-union leaders to increase their empires; it was a rank-and-file movement, canalized through the shop stewards and carried forward with a vigor which disconcerted the statesmen-like heads of Transport House. It was a signal that the working class was preparing for direct action, if need be.

Then came the squatters. More direct action, and this time with a touch of illegality in it. The first squatting was in empty military camps which apathetic councils and dilatory departments in Whitehall had failed to utilize, as they might have done, for improvised accommodation for the homeless. This received official toleration, indeed tacit approval. Aneurin Bevan, the Minister of Health, declared himself "in sympathy," and the Ministry of Works bestirred itself to see that sanitation was improved and water and other services laid on. But the next phase of squatting caused a violent revulsion on the government's part. Under the lead of local Communist organizers, squatters invaded blocks of luxury flats and large mansions in London which had been requisitioned for war purposes and had been lying empty for many months. Here was an attack on private property. The Tory press clamored for a strong hand; and the government, asserting, correctly enough, that no private individual—and still less the mischief-making Communist Party—could be allowed to take on itself the right to decide on the allocation of dwellings, appealed to the courts for eviction orders, promptly obtained them, and compelled the squatters to evacuate.

None the less, the demonstration—and it was in fact no more than an orderly and quite good-humored demonstration, far removed from the "Marxist anarchy" which the Tory press saw in it—was not without effect. It brought home the human misery created by the present acute housing shortage; it shook up lax local authorities into doing much more to requisition unused property for the benefit of the homeless and overcrowded; and it threw a glaring limelight on the extent to which Bevan's housing plan, which has so far resulted in the completion of barely 20,000 permanent houses, is being sabotaged by the black market in building. Not merely have licenses for unnecessary repairs and improvements in well-to-do dwellings been issued with a profligate hand by local authorities, in some of which corruption is rampant, but it has now been disclosed that in London alone 40,000 registered building workers have "disappeared" into unlicensed black-market jobs. Contractors have started the construction of municipally ordered working-class houses and then diverted their operatives to more profitable private orders. The labor force actually engaged on working-class house building is pitifully small; and to be fair to the building employers it must be added that the operatives' output is not much more than half of what it was before the war.

Here we come to what is perhaps the crux of the matter. The British people today, by and large, are not putting their backs into it. It is not merely a question of production being held up by absolute labor shortage, though that will exist until we cut our foreign commitments and demobilize another million men; and it is not merely a question of bottlenecks in the supply of raw materials and components, though that too is occasionally a trouble. Whether we take the coal mines, the engineering shops, or the textile factories, evidence is overwhelming that output could be enormously increased without unduly fatiguing operatives if labor really did its utmost. What is lacking is the incentive. It has been emphasized more than once in this correspondence during the past year that the halfway house between capitalism and socialism which the Labor government has tried to build might be rendered unlivable by the reluctance of the working people to give their best for a society still ruled predominantly by the motives of private profit and selfish interest.

To some extent, of course, the present incidence of pay-as-you-earn taxation militates against readiness to work overtime or to increase earnings beyond the point at which the tax abruptly rises. To some extent, too, workers, and particularly women, complain that it is no use sweating to make more money when there is so little to buy in the shops. But neither of these arguments really holds water. Even taxed, a fat wage packet has more appeal than a thin one; and actually—despite the current quip that the present "Britain Can Make It" exhibition ought to be called the "Britain Can't Buy It" exhibition—the necessary priority given to export trade is leaving a steadily increasing quantity of consumers' goods available for the home market. J. B. Priestley came much nearer the mark in a recent article in the Daily Herald on incentives in the new Britain. He wrote that what was lacking at present was the "chariot of fire." Looking for some such sign in the sky, the British people today are left in doubt whether, as they dreamed last summer, they are really being led toward a Socialist commonwealth, or whether, after one year's instalment of progressive social reform, the tendency will be to drift back into acceptance—for the most part—of the capitalist status quo. Perhaps the next session of Parliament will clarify the matter.

What is certain is that British Labor is at the crossroads. If the government is prepared resolutely to challenge vested interests and to apply positive Socialist policy both at home and abroad, it will be followed solidly by its supporters, and it will evoke from the whole British working class a new readiness to toil with a will. If not, there is a dismal prospect of the political Labor Party splitting into factional left and right, and of reconstruction degenerating into a cynical campaign by organized labor to secure sectionally every advantage it can out of an acquisitive society.

The People's Front

ON OCTOBER 1, the tenth anniversary of his nomination as rebel chief of state, General Franco delivered a speech at Burgos in which he boasted that despite Spain's economic difficulties his regime was stronger than ever. The dictator was obviously referring to its international position, and on this score his optimism was fully justified. The summer, which was full of menace, had passed, leaving him on the best of terms with London and Washington.

During the summer British diplomacy gently explored the possibility of a change in Spain, not with the idea of restoring the republic but in order to set up a government less vulnerable to foreign criticism. The maneuver was a little naive since it was based on a belief in the reliability of the Spanish generals. Had Mr. Bevin been willing to listen to the Republican leaders, they could easily have shown him how futile it was to build a policy around a handful of disappointed army officers. The Spanish military allowed themselves to be courted by British agents but adopted a policy of watchful waiting. The dictator had a simple method of dealing with his dissident generals: he gave them the alternative of being promoted or dismissed. With true patriotic fervor, they accepted promotion. When it came to the old army game, Franco never doubted for a moment that he would beat the British Ambassador, Sir Victor Mallet.

So, after three months of timid attempts at "democratizing" Spain, British foreign policy finds itself back where it started. Its objective is very clear: to do everything possible to avoid a showdown in Spain, to help Franco by increased trade and by counsels of moderation, to prevent the Security Council or General Assembly from giving practical application to the San Francisco and Potsdam resolutions: in a word to let the Spanish issue die of inanition. In this, London has the support of Washington, and both capitals have the blessing of Pius XII, the real promoter of the policy of saving the last fascist regime "for Christianity."

It is no blind hatred of the church that prompts me time and again to underline the role of Rome in fostering a neo-fascism that would replace the swastika by the cross. Behind every anti-socialist cabal stands the Vatican. Only a few weeks ago, I am informed, in a farewell audience with a group of American Catholic officers, the Pope expressed the hope that "the gallant American army, which rendered such eminent services to civilization, would again be at its post in the decisive struggle against the enemies of Christianity." In less theological words he invited the Americans "to come back soon and fight Russia."

Franco is enchanted with the Western democracies. Not so the Spanish people. Writing in the London News Chronicle about his recent clandestine visit to Spain, Captain Francis Noel-Baker, a Labor M. P., said, "My friends of the opposition movement repeatedly warned me that British prestige was falling fast." And he added, "Communist influence in Spain is still weak, but Russia, which so far as they can see is their only active friend abroad, is rapidly winning the sympathy of Republicans all over the country."

The Republicans need not see very far to reach that conclusion. Recently an interesting struggle has been going on in the United Nations Economic and Social Council between the British and American delegates, trying to open a door—if only a back door—to the Spanish dictator, and the Russian delegate, who at one point in the debate warned, "If we go on like this, one of these days we shall find ourselves sitting here along with a Franco representative." His warning was well timed. Only last Thursday the Council admitted Franco Spain to the International Civil Aviation Organization, a United Nations agency. When the republic is reestablished, surely we shall hear a lot of talk about Russian influence in Spain; in that day let our British and American friends remember how and when it was built up.

Though Franco seemed well satisfied with himself in his Burgos speech, he admitted a serious deterioration in the country's economy. Prices have climbed sky high, and he has run short of money to import food. I have before me a confidential report prepared by the Director of the Instituto Español de Moneda—which, needless to say, did not reach me through official Spanish channels. The document reveals that the huge reserves of foreign currency which Spain amassed during the war—Switzerland alone shipped in 260,000,000 Swiss francs—are gone. A corruption beyond words, in which the army and the Falange are heavily implicated, has practically wiped out the national resources. The Franco administration had the greatest difficulty in finding gold to cover a recent order for only 30,000,000 pesos worth of Argentine silk. It has been obliged to deprive the people of olive oil—one of their main staples—in an effort to build up sterling credits by exports to Britain. Now Franco is looking to Portugal, which has 110,000,000 pounds in foreign exchange deposited with British banks; he is hoping to negotiate a deal, with Anglo-American backing, in order to obtain some of this money. In discussing the monetary crisis, the report of the Instituto Español de Moneda suggests that "because of popular opposition to a public foreign loan, a more discreet form of credit must be visualized." Obviously this means loans negotiated through private banks.

The worsening of the economic situation has inevitably meant an increase in popular discontent, and this in turn has brought a new wave of government terror. The brief interlude of pretended tolerance is over. In recent days Franco has arrested, tortured, or executed dozens of Republicans, among them several Basque Catholics and the young resistance leader, Julio Nieto. This is the kind of regime which the Western democracies maintain in power in Spain while exhibiting such scrupulous anxiety over the fate of the democratic process in Eastern Europe.

The Railroads Plead Poverty

SHOULD you be at the Union Station, Washington, and happen to notice a portly gentleman with coat out of elbows and a battered hat, suppress the generous impulse that might lead you to spare him a dime. He is probably only a railroad president (salary, $100,000 plus) on his way to the Interstate Commerce Commission, where he will argue that the railroad industry is doomed unless freight rates are immediately raised 25 per cent.

Indeed, the show that railroad officials have been putting on before the ICC in recent weeks deserves commendation as the most effective tear-jerker of the year. On September 18 Dr. Julius H. Parmelee, director of the Bureau of Railroad Economics of the Association of American Railroads, presented statistics to prove that only ten of the thirty largest roads would have any net income in 1946. In fact, he declared, even if the full 25 per cent increase claimed was granted, they would still be in the red in 1947, while the industry taken as a whole would have a net income of only $250,000,000—much too small an amount to enable it to maintain its credit and do the job expected of it. Dr. Parmelee was followed the next day by leading executives of the Pennsylvania Railroad, the New York Central, and the Illinois Central, all of whom had pitiful tales to tell. The Pennsylvania representative said his company faced the most serious financial situation in its hundred-year history. Never before, he whimpered, had it operated at a loss, but this year, after allowing for carry-back tax credits, it would have a deficit of $14,616,000 and next year one of more than $9,000,000, even if the desired freight-rate increase was granted. Officials of the other two roads gave similarly gloomy forecasts, though they did concede the possibility of some trivial earnings in 1947.

Whether this statistical dirge shook the ICC we do not yet know, but it certainly shook the nerves of investors and led to heavy selling of railroad stocks and bonds. This inspired Robert R. Young, chairman of the Chesapeake and Ohio, whose avocation is writing advertisements, often very effective ones, to rush into the fray. In an open letter to Alfred Schindler, Acting Secretary of Commerce, who had suggested to the ICC that it might be wise to wait and see how traffic developed in the next few months, Mr. Young declared that "the stalling tactics of the commission" had forced the railroads "to publicly predict calamity and bankruptcy by 1947," thereby precipitating a market panic and the weakening of railroad credit (his italics and split infinitive). As a consequence, he warned, the railroads might be forced to abandon all their plans for improvements.

Against such prophecies of doom, it seems well to set the calmer estimate of the situation presented in Barron's of September 30. This organ of financial opinion said: "It is difficult to debate against the statistics presented by railroad officials . . . yet there are analysts in the railroad-securities field who feel that it would be only human nature if the chances for improved efficiency and savings in operating costs were played down." Moreover, the article implied, the railroads have had a double incentive to inflate costs during the current year. On the one hand, monthly operating deficits lend support to their case before the ICC; on the other, "the carry-back provisions of the tax law are an inducement to charge to operations this year every possible legitimate item of expense." In this connection it is interesting to note that in the first seven months of 1946 expenditure on maintenance of roads and structure by the Class I rails was 15.7 per cent of gross revenues, compared with 10 per cent in 1945, while that for maintenance of equipment was 19.9 per cent against 17.5 last year.

Now it is perfectly true that in the early months of this year the railroads suffered a sharp decline both in gross revenues and net income. Military traffic was dwindling rapidly, and civilian traffic was slow in expanding owing to reconversion difficulties and strikes. Then in May the railroad workers won advances in wages aggregating $675,000,000 annually. It was to cover this expense and the increased cost of materials that the railroads put forward their claim for a 25 per cent increase in freight rates, which would add about $1,000,000,000 annually to their takings. Recognizing a case for some immediate relief, the ICC granted a provisional 6½ per cent increase pending open hearings on the full claim.

The tendency of traffic since then has been upward, and the Shippers' Advisory Boards have just estimated that freight-car loadings in the final quarter will exceed those of the corresponding period in 1945 by 9.8 per cent. There is good reason to think that this improvement will carry over into 1947 and that railroad earnings, while not returning to their unprecedented war-time level, will compare very favorably with pre-war figures. A sharp reversal of present business trends would, of course, change the picture. But as railroad executives know very well, they cannot lift themselves out of a depression by raising their charges. That would only discourage customers and encourage competing forms of transport.

The war years brought back to the rails a prosperity which in the thirties they thought had vanished forever. Profits for the years 1941-45, inclusive, reached a grand total of $3,389,954,000, which compares with $421,249,999 for the five years 1936-40. As a result railroad corporations were able to pay off a large part of their bonded debt and thus cut fixed charges by some $125,000,000 annually. In addition, under the war-time amortization law they were able to write off completely the cost of new facilities and equipment of an estimated value of some $2,000,000,000. This means an important saving in costs since no further depreciation need be charged against this property, most of which will be as useful in peace as in war.

These war-time profits, together with the huge tax refunds which they can collect this year, should certainly be taken into account by the ICC before it permits the railroads to take the pauper's oath. And until they can prove that their estimates of 1947 revenues have not been cooked, they should not be given anything beyond the provisional relief already granted.

In One Ear

BY LOU FRANKEL

WHEN the Security Council of the U. N. met at Hunter College last spring, radio, and television too, made a great to-do about the coverage afforded the listener. For a time a U. N. accreditation was as much prized as one to SHAEF during the war. But after Gromyko took his famous walk, radio quietly folded its gear. On October 23 the General Assembly of the U. N. will meet, for the first time in the United States, at Lake Success. Again radio is scrambling for space, and again radio can be expected to pull out once the G. A. loses its hot-news appeal.

Radio men see nothing wrong in this. They say the sessions are hard to listen to—the windy speeches and translations tire the ear; once the news edge is dulled the listeners want to hear the regular commercial programs.

Radio, and almost everyone else, takes the U. N. for granted. It sees no need for cohesive, comprehensive support of the U. N., the sort of support radio gave the war effort. Consequently U. N. news is handled by the secondary echelons in radio, not by the top brass. To the newsmen a U. N. meeting is just another event competing for air time with the world series or the political conventions.

Radio's refusal to recognize that winning the peace is a bigger fight than winning the war results in an individual competitive approach to the U. N. instead of a cooperative effort by the whole industry. Thus NBC smartly outflanks its competitors by inveigling the U. N. into accepting a special NBC–U. N. week (October 20-26) of programs. NBC reaps a publicity harvest, the U. N. gets a number of programs, and the listener has the dubious privilege of staying up till 11:30 p.m. to hear these special broadcasts.

Thus also the National Association of Broadcasters bluntly ignores the U. N.'s request for time on the agenda of the first N. A. B. convention since the war. To the U. N. it is a chance to discuss U. N. needs and radio's problems in meeting them. But not to the N. A. B. Not until the U. N. had appealed to two N. A. B. board members did the association condescend to invite a U. N. representative to speak.

The big networks can take a cue from WMCA, WNYC, WQXR, or WLIB, all New York stations which have consistently covered the U. N.—WMCA best of all. Instead of broadcasting the boring translations, WMCA's Frank Kingdon and Ray Walsh used the time for commentary. In addition, WMCA fed KFWB in Hollywood, at first via a direct telephone line, at KFWB's expense, and later by air-express transcriptions. WLIB, the New York Post station, likewise sent air-express transcriptions to its sister stations KYA in San Francisco and KLAC in Los Angeles. When the General Assembly meets, WQXR will feed WPEN in Philadelphia, WMCA will resume its service to KFWB in Hollywood, and WLIB to KLAC and KYA.

What these stations do the networks can do also; the reason they have not done it is simply that the afternoon sessions of the U. N. conflict with network commercials.

Well, WMCA has an answer to that problem. To keep its commercial commitments and at the same time service the night-time audience, WMCA, in addition to airing the daytime U. N. meetings between commercials, transcribed every moment of every U. N. meeting. These recordings were then edited down into a half-hour documentary program and broadcast every evening. When the General Assembly convenes, WMCA will offer these transcriptions, via air express, to any interested station on a share-the-cost basis.

On the network level the only original thinking comes from the American Broadcasting Company. ABC is offering $250 for original scripts on problems in international relations, and hopes to broadcast these dramatic programs during the General Assembly meetings. The Bill Benton unit of the State Department short-waves a complete play-by-play report of the U. N. It is intended for foreign use, although a few domestic stations use the material.

Early this summer 600 domestic broadcasters, in reply to queries by the U. N., said they would carry U. N. programs when available; 150 of these stations said they were equipped to use short-wave material. For a time it seemed that Press Wireless, a commercial transatlantic service, could supply it. However, its application to operate this service was refused by the FCC. An appeal is now pending.

The WMCA procedure shows that radio can lick the commercial headache, the bugaboos of windy talk and tedious translations, and the problem of the evening listener.

The ABC program of original dramas, although still only in the idea stage, suggests what the networks could do.

The State Department short-wave station and the Press Wireless application clearly point the way for simple, fast, and inexpensive servicing of hinterland stations.

The recent change that came over WHN, a powerful and money-mad independent outlet in New York, offers a hint to the public. WHN put lines into Hunter College for the early sessions of the Security Council and then dropped them. But when Drew Pearson and his ex-partner Bob Allen applied to the FCC for the license of WBAL, the Hearst station in Baltimore, doubtless claiming that WBAL had not lived up to its public-service responsibilities, WHN rushed to the U. N. for permission to reinstate its equipment.

Politics and Imagination

THE PARTISAN READER, 1934-1944. Edited by William Phillips and Philip Rahv. Introduction by Lionel Trilling. The Dial Press. $3.75.

IN THE past six months George Orwell has received too much attention in the American press for anyone's comfort. It recalls the boom that James Burnham's "Managerial Revolution" enjoyed some time before the war. But neither boom was a surprise to Partisan Review subscribers, who had been reading these men for years in their favorite magazine. And where did most of us learn about existentialism, when that boom was first beginning, if not in Partisan Review? Ever since John Reed Club days its editors, William Phillips and Philip Rahv, have shown a fine flair for feeling out the areas of greatest cultural density. Running an unattached literary intelligencer, they have been able to print the most vivid documents of the modern imagination without regard to their underlying tendencies and, along with these, an intellectually liberating series of attacks, at once so brilliant and so inconsistent, on the stereotypes, delusions, and deceptions of American public thinking, both left and right.

This generous "Reader" reprints, of course, the most talked-of pieces, like the fascinating and repellent The Man in the Brooks Brothers Shirt, by Mary McCarthy, and such distinguished firsts as Eliot's The Dry Salvages and Kafka's In the Penal Colony, which have, however, been so exhaustively and repetitiously interpreted elsewhere that they have passed out of Partisan Review's sphere of influence. What want rereading much more urgently—considering the way the tide is running nowadays—are the critical pieces reprinted here, closer in spirit to the Review's own editorial position, by men like John Dewey, Sidney Hook, Ernest Nagel, Dwight Macdonald, James Burnham, and Meyer Schapiro. These analyze in the most devastating fashion some of the anti-rational formulas which are increasingly being passed off as truisms in current critical discussion.

But these names also suggest that the policy of the Partisan Review is not easily defined. The editors, in their valuable postscript, call it an independent, critical Marxism. Such fine studies included here as those of Rahv on Dostoevski, and Edmund Wilson on Flaubert, and Clement Greenberg on Avant-Garde and Kitsch show how the Marxian view gives breadth and depth and prevents transcendental indulgences. But "independent" Marxism is necessarily rather anomalous. Marxism understands the world by changing it, and the way to change it is to organize. Partisan Review has no organizational connections or influence, and it is not much interested in practical politics in this country, in the situation in the trade unions, for instance. The editors themselves were never very whole-hearted party people, and they broke with Stalinism when they could no longer stand the air in M. Vishinsky's courtrooms. Instead of abandoning socialism, however, they increasingly urged a definition of it that gave primacy to individual integrity and democratic rights. This course took them so far to the other side of the liberals that in the summer of 1946 a featured editorial in Partisan Review attacked the liberal publications as the unprincipled fifth column of Russian world conquest.

Beside the anomaly of Partisan Review's independent Marxism is the further anomaly that much of its imaginative material and intellectual support comes from writers like Auden, Trilling, Kafka, and Eliot, whose attack on the liberal imagination proceeds from such very different premises. In the John Reed Club period Phillips and Rahv found official Stalinism destructive of artistic quality, and when the magazine became independent in 1937 they sought a free wedding of unattached Marxism and modern artistic sensibility. W. H. Auden's defense of Yeats in "The Partisan Reader" reveals some incompatibilities of this marriage.

Though Yeats was anti-democratic and pro-fascist, Auden says, he showed himself in his sensibility and in the diction of his poetry to be a just man. Yeats and Eliot have been the supreme examples of modern sensibility for many critics. Their artistic practice and their own rationalizations of it have been largely responsible for the critical assumptions that prevail in the non-political literary quarterlies which share writers with Partisan Review. These assumptions make the sensibility necessary for true poetry dependent on an ascending relationship of symbols, myths, and religious dogmas, for symbols, myths, and dogmas invalidate intellectual analysis, and it is intellectual analysis which destroys tension. It was never certain that Yeats believed in the eclectic occultism which gave him images for his poetry, but to maintain it he had to attack all rationalism in philosophy and government, repeating Nietzsche's accusation that British philosophy had twice brought about a general depression of European intelligence. "There are truths which are best recognized by mediocre minds because they are best adapted to them."

Younger writers brought up in the tradition of Yeats and Eliot have embraced, in the interests of poetic tension and an ascent from mediocrity, a wide variety of faiths or myths, Eastern and Western, Calvinist and Thomist, gnostic and existential. The individual creeds are often theologically monstrous, as Randall Jarrell proved in Partisan Review last year by a brilliant review of Auden's dogmatics, and the incompatibilities of these revealed truths are not likely to cure the skeptic of the relativism of which he is fiercely accused. But in order to create an atmosphere in which belief can flourish, these writers unite in the attack that is now widely fashionable on rational "reductive" analysis, on systematic causative explanations, particularly of the Marxian and Freudian kind, and on anything that savors of naturalism, positivism, or disbelief in original sin.

Partisan Review has energetically rejected supernaturalism even though it has shared the sensibility and printed the work of those who embrace it. This rejection, together with the isolated, alienated character of its Marxism, has left little positive ground for the Review to stand on, a fact which comes out rather painfully in the non-critical pieces. There is a fine humanity in the intimate studies of Joyce, Proust, and Cotton Mather, and in Paul Goodman's witty The Facts of Life. But nearly all the fiction and a good deal of the poetry reveal the attenuation of personality and of the dramatic imagination that comes when sensitive and intelligent people feel themselves outside of social life, even though it fascinates and preoccupies them. The stories by Mary McCarthy, Lionel Trilling, Delmore Schwartz, H. J. Kaplan, Saul Bellow, Isaac Rosenfeld, and Elizabeth Bishop are wonderfully acute and honest, but their central characters are strikingly similar in their isolation, instability, and lack of self-confidence. They feel alternately their own unreality and the unreality of the situations that confront them, and their self-abasement even assumes an unpleasantly physical character.

These personal revelations make an interesting check on whether a highly discriminatory intelligence is sufficient for morality, whether a properly social consciousness can remain largely critical and intellectual. More emphasis is needed on quite simple techniques of actualizing fraternity, of testing out in imagination and even more in reality the ways in which people working together can influence social decisions toward a truer community. This is what Partisan Review used to preach in the early Stalinist days "of high confidence and inspiration," to which the editors now look back with nostalgia. It would seem that a humane Marxism requires it even more.

Christianity Without Paul

THE IDEA OF THE CHRIST IN THE GOSPELS OR GOD IN MAN: A CRITICAL ESSAY. By George Santayana. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

THE reviewer wants, first of all, to express his thankfulness to the writer of this book. Nothing is more helpful for our theological work than the understanding criticism coming from non-theologians, philosophers, historians, scientists, and artists. There is much criticism of theology from these sides, but it is not always—or even often—understanding criticism. There is much misrepresentation, by professional philosophers, of what theology has done and is doing, and there is little comprehension among most leaders of our secular culture of the profundity and actuality of the classical documents of our religious tradition.

Santayana's book cannot be challenged in any of these respects. He knows the historical as well as the systematic problems of present-day theology, and, above all, he knows their significance for our human existence; he understands, as we call it today, their "existential" meaning.

The first, predominantly historical part of Santayana's book analyzes the Idea of Christ in the Gospels in eleven chapters, each of which contains Biblical material in an original and impressive interpretation. The way in which the philosopher looks at the miracle stories, the prayers, the passion of Jesus, the appearances of the resurrected Christ, is striking and revealing. Methodologically most important is the first chapter, Inspiration. Here Santayana liberates himself completely from the uncertainty about the so-called "historical Jesus." He frankly admits that he has no theory about the event which inspired the disciples, the early church, and the evangelists. He recognizes—with many recent theologians—that the Gospels do not warrant such a theory, that the only thing we have is the inspired picture of a man in whom God is present in an absolute and unique way. The nature and the different traits of this picture, created by inspiration, and not the practically unknown occasion for the rise of the inspired picture, are the objects of Santayana's analysis. This makes it possible for him to use the four Gospels without discrimination. He knows that Mark gives the earliest tradition and that John is a late, mystical interpreter; but this does not prevent him from using material taken from both of them with a strong emphasis on the Johannean literature—which, as so often, attracts the philosophical mind.

There is no place for Paul in Santayana's book: this is, of course, partly due to the fact that Paul has not written a Gospel. But this alone is not sufficient to explain the omission from the second part, which deals with concepts and ideas and not with the picture. Santayana has no place for Paul because he rejects the absolute categories in which Paul lives, sin in its infinite depth, and reconciliation as an absolute paradox. Grace seems to Santayana—in accordance with Catholic thinking—not so much forgiveness as the gift of spiritual power.

A few special points as they appear in the systematic part may be mentioned. Santayana interprets the Christian idea of God as monarchical monotheism, sharply distinguished from everything pantheistic. He derives from it the doctrine of creation as an event within the universe—which comprises God and matter. God is a part of being, not being itself as in classical theology. Santayana recognizes the mythical character of monarchical monotheism, but he declares that it is as essential for Christianity as the ideas of temporal creation and consummation. But can a myth, recognized as a myth, be preserved without undergoing fundamental changes?

Santayana accepts the Thomistic doctrine of the supranatural soul. This is surprising, since this doctrine shows more clearly than any other the clash between the theological and philosophical traditions which Aquinas tried to synthesize. But Santayana's reason for accepting this doctrine is obvious: psyche (life-process) and soul (bearer of the spirit) are generally united, as God and man are uniquely united in Christ and as spiritual and vital forces are united in those who are elevated above ordinary human inclinations. In all these cases the human, the natural, the vital is accepted but at the same time superseded by the divine, the supranatural, the spiritual. A refined dualism and asceticism remain, and so does a sublime esotericism: the masses of people do not reach and do not even desire spirituality and divinity.

Santayana's book attempts a synthesis between mystical Catholicism and modern skeptical naturalism, using the results of Protestant historical research; but it is at a great remove from the Protestant spirit. PAUL TILLICH

BRIEFER COMMENT

Keynes and Veblen

"BEYOND SUPPLY AND DEMAND. A Reappraisal of Institutional Economics," by John S. Gambs (Columbia University Press, $1.60), is an original and important book, clearly and entertainingly written. Dr. Gambs calls it "a book about the theories of Thorstein Veblen and . . . economists who have been inspired by his work." But it is also an attempt to reappraise current economic assumptions, classical and institutional alike. Dr. Gambs is convinced that the time has come for some very fundamental thinking in economics. In the atomic age "the relatively uncomplicated thinking of a decade ago will not save us from disasters even greater than those which have lately befallen us. It is doubtful whether we shall ever again be able to blunder through for a while with NRA's and WPA's and AAA's; whether we can ever again trust to the sheer weight of productive power to bring us victory over a strong foe. . . . This time we shall have to revalue our fundamentals or take the dire consequences."

"There has been no adequate philosophy" or "adequate psychology" among economists. Veblen's followers, for all their useful work, "are . . . empirical, eclectic, pragmatic. . . . They have sought to skirt error by avoiding any consciously made philosophical assumptions. But this in itself leads to an assumption . . . a dangerous preconception . . . that naive induction, eclecticism, empiricism, pragmatism, sacred or profane, can be fruitful. This . . . may lead nowhere even more surely than . . . faith in neo-Hegelianism or . . . Gestalt psychology or Freud."

One of Dr. Gambs's main reasons for attempting a reappraisal of Veblen is that he provides a background for a better evaluation of Keynes. He gives us a delightful sketch of "a Veblenian essay on Keynes." Its essential point is that we cannot have both full employment and "the spirit of business enterprise." That is the great economic issue of the day, and it is the kind of issue which makes reconsideration of the assumptions of economics imperative.

The World in Black and White

FORMER AMBASSADOR WILLIAM C. BULLITT, in common with a lot of us, is concerned with the shape of world affairs. In "The Great Globe Itself" (Scribner's, $2.75), he earnestly exhorts us to do something about it. His program has already had tremendous mass dissemination; it is, quite simply, to set up against Russia as quickly as possible a "Defense League" of nations on as wide a base as possible, and to announce firmly to the Soviets, meaning it too, that one more "aggression" will bring a war in which we will use the atomic bomb. Mr. Bullitt's repeated references to the Soviet absorption of the Baltic states and eastern Poland make it clear that he is thinking primarily, although not entirely, about territorial expansion. He argues, with a host of quotations which are for the most part very familiar in this kind of book, that the Soviet Union represents a blend of Asiatic tyranny and Communist will to dominate the world. Only a "Defense League" can preserve peace and liberty for the world.

An appraisal by H. B. HAGGIN of some of the new phonographs

One need not be an unblinking apologist for everything Soviet Russian to look upon Mr. Bullitt's proposal with less than enthusiasm. The Great Globe which Mr. Bullitt writes about in bland prose, with strong moralistic and religious overtones, is an extremely simple one: you can draw it in black and white, and there is no question about what is what. Mr. Bullitt deals as freely in generalizations and self-righteousness, portraying his projected league—which would in some mysterious way operate within the U. N. without destroying that organization—as the guardian of liberty and the good life. He touches only lightly on the question of the league's membership, though we can hardly doubt that Franco's Spain and the Vatican—neither of them even mentioned, by the way, in "The Great Globe Itself"—would eagerly enrol. Could a crusade against the Bolshevik East do other than strengthen and revitalize fascism everywhere, not least in Germany? Is there any more immediate way of reversing the military decision of the war and transforming it into a victory for a good many of Hitler's ideas?

From an author who has been ambassador to the Soviet Union and France, one might be forgiven for expecting some depth of vision, some understanding of the interrelationships of national and international affairs. Mr. Bullitt many times laments our shameful behavior in allowing Poland to fall within the Russian orbit, but he says nothing about the sorry state of affairs in pre-war Poland. He excoriates Tito's Yugoslavia, but there is not a word concerning the problems created by the pre-war Serbian dictatorship in that country. To say this is of course not to indorse the Soviets' actions in Poland, Yugoslavia, and elsewhere. It is merely to point out that politics, too, abhor a vacuum, and to suggest that what has been happening in Eastern Europe, having a history of more than a few years, cannot be attributed solely to latter-day Russian expansionism. In a book subtitled "A Preface to World Affairs" Mr. Bullitt might with profit have given his readers some comment on the influence on world affairs of social revolutions over-long delayed; this in turn might have led him to formulate a foreign policy based on more than panic, self-righteousness, and a one-sided view of the world.

Professorial Guilt

THE STORY OF THE PROSTITUTION of scholarship to political ends needs to be told whenever it occurs. Unhappily it occurs all too often, and it is not unusual for men of probity in one field of specialty to have utterly irresponsible opinions in another. Where there is no freedom of publication to serve as a check on special pleading, it is naive to be surprised that pseudo-scholarship climbs into the saddle and gallops away, carrying the gift of science to the outstretched hand of the ruler.

The present volume ("Hitler's Professors," by Max Weinreich, Yiddish Scientific Institute, $3) is rightly concerned about the part that German professors played in the rise of Nazi doctrine and in the annihilation of 6,000,000 European Jews. It seeks to determine the complicity of German intellectual leaders in the crimes committed by German politicians and soldiers. It documents copiously the maunderings and rantings of many men who held intellectual eminence in the Nazi state. The story of a great crime is told again, without passion but, unhappily, without real objectivity.

Over and over again the term scholarly is ascribed to men whose intellectual probity is by no means a matter of prior record, to publications of an obviously special cast, particularly those clustered under the aegis of geo-politics. This failure to distinguish between pseudo and real scholarship vitiates the conclusions as to intellectual responsibility and leaves unanswered the really important question. That question is not how much of an aura of scholarship Nazidom managed to cast over its doings and doctrines, but rather to what extent science was perverted to the uses of an ideology with the consent and cooperation of the professors of that science. The answer to that question is important, since it will give us much needed light on the extent and power of the disease. It is certainly clear that the German universities gave their students no particular ability to resist infection; we should like to know whether there was any more capacity for resistance among the professors themselves.

Such an inquiry must consider certain definite points. It must determine to what degree the universities and scholarship generally were viewed as an adjunct of political action even before Nazism. It must determine which recognized men of science, and how many, were willing to twist the doctrines of their own fields of specialty to Nazi needs. It must determine what proportion of the scholars held firm and what they did to maintain their intellectual integrity. This book takes up only the second of these points, and that in a fashion by no means systematic.

It is quite possible that German scholarship did sell out. This book, however, does not prove it. It does do a real service by raising the question and by adducing evidence which, when more systematically considered, may yield us an answer.

GEORGE J. BECKER

The Last Red Leaf

ELEGANTLY, AS BECOMES AN ARISTOCRAT; elegiacally, as one must who considers himself nearly the last of these, Sir Osbert Sitwell continues his memoirs in "The Scarlet Tree" (Little, Brown, $3.50). This instalment, covering approximately the first decade of our century, treats mainly of the evasions of the author, as a scion of Heartbreak House, his obduracies and recalcitrance when faced with the regimen of Hobbyhorse Hall, as represented by the English public schools. Light, water, houses, gardens—these he loves; for people he has a less warm regard, though he can turn a kindly eye on many, especially those endowed with some eccentricity in the character. Conscious of the fact that, like his brother and sister, he is distinguished by virtue of being an artist, Sir Osbert writes a prose that has manner, style, and taste; the elaborate, ornate, rich, and intricate sentences rest on a firm foundation of structure. To the reader who has idle hours a-plenty, they serve well to beguile tedium, to interest and to charm; if, however, you have work of your own to do, meals to get, or grass to cut, or reviews to write, you may sometimes become a little impatient with these longeurs.

JAMES AGEE

THE RAIDER," an English film once called by the beautiful title "Western Approaches," is the story of the convergence in mid-Atlantic of a U-boat, an English lifeboat, and an English ship which has strayed from convoy. The men in the lifeboat realize that the Germans are using them as a decoy; they are determined to warn off the rescuing vessel, if need be at the cost of their lives. The rescuers are torpedoed all the same, but manage to outwit and sink the submarine. The submarine crew, so far as I could make out, is left to drown; the English derelicts are taken aboard at last.

This very broad, strong, simple story, which suggests many of the good things about Kipling or even Tolstoy, is, I gather, true, or is anyhow a composite of true incidents. It is played entirely by non-professional actors, sailors, and we are told that they are reenacting their experiences. The picture is directed by Pat Jackson, who also wrote the scenario and the dialogue for the semi-fictional scenes of reenactment.

"The Raider" reaches this country very late, after a muffle of delays I would be curious to see explained. It is a war film and was made to be seen in war time; but it is also one of very few war films which can be seen without blushing at any time, and which is, I think, permanently to be respected.

It is not, to be sure, in any sense a morally or politically searching or a psychologically exciting piece of work. The predicament is a deadly simple, physical one, and the reactions are no less simple and physical. There is little exploration of development of character: the men in the lifeboat, for instance, know each other well to begin with and get to know each other even better in the course of a couple of weeks' exposure, but the audience gets no illusion of knowing them better; it is merely privileged to rubberneck. But it is looking at the surfaces of people of extraordinary strength and authenticity; moreover, the Germans, especially the U-boat captain, are no less full-blown as personalities than the English. Most attempts to make the enemy "human" have gone as fishy as the still more conventional attempts to make him a devil, a brute, a clown, or at very least a foot-fetishist; here, more successfully than in any other film I can remember, he is merely made up of another bunch of people who are very deeply absorbed in a life-and-death predicament and as deeply interested in their jobs. It is an obvious point, of course, but you have to see it really done, for once, to realize fully the childish shallowness of any other way of "indicting" war. By a characteristically good and unobtrusive bit of writing the only Englishman who expresses hatred for the Germans for using them as bait is also the only one who has opposed his captain's determination to warn off the rescuers. Another fine little bit is the submarine captain's red-bearded patriarchal smile as he says that they'll just turn loose their last couple of torpedoes and then—home.

It is this same hale, sane, uncomplicated, and unquerulous sense of reality which gives the whole picture its finest qualities. To use non-professionals well in this semi-fictional kind of work requires a particularly warm, quick, and flexible understanding of people—of when to direct and when to leave alone, of how to combine several degrees of both harmoniously, and of what, artistically, is more "real" than the actual and what is less real. It is a rare and potentially very important kind of creative faculty, called for by movies and by still photography as by no other kind of art. I have seen some very good things done with it, chiefly by the English; and the Russians have often used it very powerfully—though less perceptively in a purely human way—by, for instance, cutting non-professional faces into intense poetic or rhetorical contexts. But I don't remember seeing anyone use non-actors so extensively, with such respect and understanding and thorough success, as Mr. Jackson has used them here. Anyone who wants, for instance, to see the varied awkwardness of non-professionals used to perfection can study over and over the little scene in New York in which the convoy captains are briefed. Or for a sample of directing neither too much nor too little, so that art and actuality work on each other like live chemicals, there is the exchange of smiles between the radio operator and the adolescent boy in the lifeboat, at the moment when everyone first has good reason to give up hope. Or for a quietly definitive illustration of the quality free naturalism can have when a man with the right poetic instincts is in charge, watch the variety of manner in which the sailors transfer from the lifeboat to the ship, and compare the unlimited beauty and touchingness of this little scene with the also touching, skilfully predigested and packaged quality of the realism in the scene in which crew and captain part in "In Which We Serve." Or to check the film against something with which you may have been familiar, see what has been done with shots of the New York mid-war waterfront. The most ordinary "documentary" material in this film is always used with so deep and unpretentious a sense of its human meanings that without rhetoric or comment it becomes automatically poetic; and all that is necessarily fictional is anchored as short as can be managed to what is known to have been so. That combination sounds like and perhaps is the minimum of common sense for this type of film; it is not often attempted, however, and almost never achieved.

This same sort of purity of plain good sense at its best must help, I think, to account for the excellence of the transitions and of the cutting, which never use artily, or point up, or intrude on, but are always made part of the hypnotic leavening of, the noble prevailing rhythm of the film, which is simply that of ocean water. It must have taken the same good sense to foresee that such a film could and should be

SCIENTIFIC HUMANISM—ITS ORIGINS, TEACHINGS, AND SOCIAL PROGRAM

AN OUTLINE OF THE PHILOSOPHY THAT MAY PROVIDE A BASIS FOR THE INTEGRATION OF THE WORLD'S GREAT CULTURES

This fresh, significant and important essay is by Dr. Oliver L. Reiser, professor of philosophy in the University of Pittsburgh. It is divided into the following valuable sections:

1. A Scientific Humanism Appears. 2. An "Ism" That Will End All Isms? 3. The History of Scientific Humanism. 4. Why Is Scientific Humanism "Scientific"? 5. The Philosophy of Scientific Humanism. 6. Revolution Is Perpetual. 7. Why Are We Here, Anyway? 8. Is Life Worth Living? 9. Does Life Have Any Meaning? 10. Why Be Good? 11. The Starting Point for Ethics. 12. What Does Morality Consist Of? 13. What Kind of Society Do We Want? 14. Economic Security Is Not a Vain Dream. 15. Scientific Humanism and the Atomic Bomb. 16. Education for Tomorrow's World. 17. An Institute of Scientific Humanism.

made in color; that the imperfections of color film, as a rule so deadly under studio control, greatly enhance both immediacy and beauty when they collaborate with the imperfections of unaffected people and of open nature. And it took a kind of flat plain sense—far beyond that of the mere realist—which I have never seen get so far on the screen before, to realize that you have no right to record the sufferings and honor the fortitude of men exposed in a lifeboat unless you make those sufferings at least real enough, in swollen features and livid coloring, feebleness of motion and obvious crushing headache, to hurt an audience, and hurt it badly.

It seems to me striking that in this film and in others the English have done so well in their handling of real people in films, and that we as a rule have done so very badly. (One must, thank heaven, except several of our war record films.) The chief reason, so well as I can understand it, is an ugly one. Few Americans either behind or in front of our cameras give evidence of any recognition or respect for themselves or one another as human beings, or have any desire to be themselves or to let others be themselves. On both ends of the camera you find very few people who are not essentially, instead, just promoters, little racketeers, interested in "the angle." I suspect it will some day be possible to deduce out of our non-fiction films alone that the supposedly strongest nation on earth collapsed with such magical speed because so few of its members honored any others, or even themselves, as human beings.

HAYDN'S Symphony No. 97, though not one of the works which the Haydn liveliness of mind carries to sheer incandescence, is a delightful work in which that liveliness gives us characteristic surprises—such as the daring harmonic progressions in the coda of the first movement or the agitated coda of the slow movement. The new Victor set (1059; $3.95) offers a performance by Beecham with the London Philharmonic that is exquisite in sonority, in polished execution, in phraseological contour, but without the vivacity, the sharpness of inflection which Haydn's music requires. The performance is excellently reproduced except for the heaviness of bass that seems to be characteristic of English orchestral recording.

No composer has taken more pains than Tchaikovsky to set down in his score what must be done in performance to translate the printed symbols into the shape in living sound that he imagined; and a conductor with proper understanding of his function and with musical competence who plays Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony as the score directs will produce the superb piece of music that Tchaikovsky created. Koussevitzky is not such a conductor; he sets tempos different from those Tchaikovsky establishes by metronome (for example, the excessively slow tempo of the horn solo in the slow movement) and makes retardations and accelerations of pace that Tchaikovsky does not ask for; and in this way he distorts the shape of the work and its character and meaning. But the tasteless musician is a great conductor: the playing of the Boston Symphony under his direction is fabulous in its beauty of sonority and refinement of execution; and it is reproduced with spacious richness, though not invariably with the balance necessary for clarity of contrapuntal texture (Set 1057; $6.85).

I would expect the music put on records to be music people will want to hear again and again—which I cannot imagine anyone wanting to do with Arthur Benjamin's Elegy, Waltz, and Toccata and Roy Harris's Soliloquy and Dance for viola and piano, recorded by William Primrose with Vladimir Sokoloff and Joana Harris (Set 1061; $4.85). They provide occasions for dazzling demonstrations of Primrose's virtuosity in the handling of his instrument—or rather of his two instruments, since he uses an Amati in the Benjamin work and a viola recently made for him by William Moennig, Jr., in the Harris. The tone of the new one is more sonorous but also coarser; the smaller tone of the Amati is finer and silkier. The performances are excellently reproduced.

Rachmaninov's trashy Second Concerto is performed with brilliance and sentimentality by Arthur Rubinstein with the N. B. C. Symphony under Golschmann (Set 1075; $5.85) for the benefit of those who are receiving their musical education from the films; and piano and orchestra are excellently reproduced. As far as I am concerned a Rachmaninov concerto is something to listen to only for the exciting kind of playing Rachmaninov himself does in it.

Rubinstein is also heard on a single disc (11-9219; $1) playing four unpleasantly and pointlessly dissonant Mazurkas Opus 50 by Szymanowski. Beautiful-sounding playing, faithfully reproduced. On another single (11-9220; $1) the General Platoff Don Cossack Chorus sings the folksong "Nightingale" without the tricks that are heard in Listov's "Song of the Tachanka." On still another (11-9218; $1) Eleanor Steber sings the Merry Widow Waltz and "Vilia" from "The Merry Widow" very beautifully, except for an occasional strong tremolo in the waltz, in which also the recorded sound of her voice is a little sharp. And $.75) on which the fresh tenor voice of Christopher Lynch is heard in "Believe Me, If All Those Endearing Young Charms" and "Oft in the Stilly Night," which he sings for the most part quite simply.

Vox, a new company, has issued a volume called "Chopin Recital" (Set 604; $3.93, including federal tax) in which several popular pieces are played by Jacob Gimpel. They are the Fantaisie-Impromptu Opus 66, the Nocturne in E flat Opus 9 No. 2, the Valse in C sharp minor Opus 64 No. 2, the Polonaise in A flat Opus 53, the Etude in C minor ("Revolutionary"), and the Mazurka in B flat minor Opus 24 No. 4. Only rarely does Gimpel indulge in the excessively mannered style that is traditional in the performance of Chopin's music; and even then his playing exhibits its admirable feeling for musical continuity. But the feeling for continuity operates through a technique which, though well developed, does not always achieve continuity in the sound; and he hasn't all the strength required by the Polonaise. The sound of the piano is well reproduced; but the surfaces in my copy are noisy and some sides waver in pitch.

Another Vox set (161; $5) called "Salzburg Serenades" offers Mozart's Serenade K. 239 and the Concertante and Rondo from his Serenade K. 320, performed by a chamber orchestra under Edvard Fendler. The music is pleasantly inconsequential, and performed and recorded satisfactorily; but surfaces again are noisy, with an additional noise from a peculiar stain on the records.

From a Zenith circular I discover that the 9-tube set with 10-inch speaker that I heard is the 9H079, and that the 9H081 and 9H088R have a 12-inch speaker, which is of course preferable.

As for the separate cabinet for the speaker, which will improve the sound of any good machine, it can be made of ¾-inch plywood, with any dimensions that will give the interior a minimum capacity of 15,000 cubic inches for a 12-inch speaker or 18,000 cubic inches for a 15-inch speaker; with a removable back that fits in flush with the sides, top, and bottom; with long pieces of wood attached diagonally to the back and side panels (inside) to eliminate vibration; with the entire interior (except the hole in the front panel over which the speaker is mounted) lined with a thick wadding like the Kimsul made by Kimberley-Clark. A small hole in the back panel for the speaker-cable to pass through; castors for easy movement of the cabinet; and thin gauze over the hole in front—these complete the job.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

"The Only Ignorance"

Dear Sirs: The article Placebos in Medicine and Elsewhere, by Dr. Martin Gumpert, in the September 14 issue of The Nation merits comment because it raises questions which are of vital concern both to the medical profession and to the public which it serves.

After conceding the validity of the claims of the Cornell-New York Hospital symposium concerning the efficacy of certain placebos, Dr. Gumpert proceeds to condemn the use of placebos as a fraud. On a note of solemnity he intones, "I resolve that I will not treat patients who expect placebos from their doctors and I will not use the services of a doctor who prescribes placebos." In this I feel sure that Dr. Gumpert is deceiving himself. Has he never prescribed vitamins for patients who showed no evidence of avitaminosis? Did he never dispense a mixture known as "I. Q. & S."? Does he not recall the relief experienced by a patient who received a written prescription which, however, was never filled by the druggist?

Why does Dr. Gumpert call the placebos a fraud? Because "they are an indication of the ignorance of physicians, a proof that medicine is not yet a true science but still deeply overshadowed by magic, taboos, anxieties, and primitive rituals." Alas, to the chagrin of Dr. Gumpert, medical science will continue to be concerned with devils, because the object of our medical endeavor is man, who is, and for a long time will continue to be, beset by the very same "magic, taboos, anxieties, and primitive rituals." It has been the failure, or the refusal, to recognize this less tangible aspect of man which has been responsible for the unfortunate mechanistic orientation toward human illness and suffering. . . .

In the hands of the physician who knows what he is doing with the placebo as well as the administrator of ether anaesthesia knows what he is doing, the use of a placebo can hardly be called fraud. If it has alleviated suffering it is good medicine whether its effect is pharmocological or psychological. Consequently, contrary to Dr. Gumpert's assertion that placebos are a sign of the ignorance of physicians, I submit that the failure to understand the indication for a placebo, an effective method for its administration, and the dynamics of its effectiveness constitutes the only ignorance in the whole question. . . .

Madness in Method

Dear Sirs: My daughter has just returned from a first visit to my old home town. She was born in Philadelphia twenty-four years ago and has a fair complexion. On a Southern bus she sat in the Negro section. The driver ordered her to the white section. She refused to move, and told him she had no objections to sitting beside Negroes. When he kept insisting, she told him she was a Negro and was sitting where the law said she must sit.

But contrary to her expectations, his face wasn't red. Confused or not, he said, "All right. Be stubborn. But I won't let the niggers sit by you. You're only keeping them out of a seat, that's all." And he did make the newly arriving colored passengers stand in the rear of the car!

Keeping the Negro in his place, especially on a segregated bus, very often calls for more madness than method. . . . The place the Southern white man picks for the black man is, after all, only some manner of living which the white man feels sure is below his own; his own being far below any praiseworthy standard of decency and progressiveness.

It all means that the white South is satisfied to have the Negro to look down upon, even though it has nothing in God's wide world to look up to.

Dear Sirs: D. L. C. (The Nation, September 14, Letters) evidently is used to the type of crossword puzzle whose answers "fall out" without any mental effort on the solver's part. Known as the "all-over-interlock," it can be solved while in a coma, and is extinct everywhere today except in the United States.

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

The Shape of Things

THROUGH NO WISH OF ITS OWN A HIGHLY confidential organization called "American Action, Inc.," has just emerged from the underground. Its avowed purpose is "to defend our country against its enemies at home," and it appears to be led by Colonel Robert R. McCormick and General Robert E. Wood, both of whom were conspicuously indifferent about defending our country against its enemies abroad. The Congressional committees on campaign expenditures are about to look into the affairs of the group, having in mind the Corrupt Practices Act, which calls for quarterly financial reports from all political committees operating in more than one state. We don't know just when this lineal descendant of the Liberty League and America First was launched, but one of its officials has stated in writing that its "growing list of supporters . . . literally covers every section of the country." That takes time—enough probably to have warranted several quarterly reports. But none have been filed. American Action, Inc., says it is not a secret organization, but it refuses to reveal the names of the 187 members of Congress whom it is pledged to fight in the current campaign. And that raises an interesting question concerning its purpose. It may be assumed that an agency sponsored by McCormick and reputedly supported by Joe Pew, E. T. Weir, and General Wood is not out to purge Congress of Republicans. There are 237 Democrats in that body, but roughly 50 of them are confirmed coalitionists who could only gladden the eye of a Liberty Leaguer. Could it be, then, that American Action, Inc., is merely an unofficial subsidiary of the G. O. P., charged with raising a secret slush fund to combat those "enemies at home" known as Northern Democrats?

✶

NOT BEING PROFESSIONAL WHISTLERS IN THE dark, we do not pretend to find much comfort in the progress of the current election campaign. Our correspondents in various parts of the country report that Republican gains in Congress are virtually assured; Newsweek's poll of Washington correspondents shows a great majority convinced that the G. O. P. will capture the House; and a nation-wide Gallup poll reflects the same sentiment by the disconcerting margin of 63 per cent to 37. Nevertheless, we do not believe the time has come to head for the nearest wailing wall. Registration is surprisingly high, which is certainly a condition for Democratic victory, even though it by no means makes that victory inevitable. Republican leaders profess to see in the big registration the promise of a heavy protest vote in their favor, but they are puzzled because the increases are proportionately heaviest in the Democratic strongholds of the big cities, where a protest would more naturally take the form of simply keeping away from the polls. Such speculation, while fascinating as a game, is fruitless, however, and even damaging if it interferes with a last-ditch fight. It should be obvious to all liberals that the fight is worth while, regardless of the chances, and regardless of the shortcomings of the Democratic Party. A Republican House, a Democratic Senate, and a politically unskilled President form a combination that can only mean national paralysis for what are almost certain to be two of the most crucial years in the country's history.

THE PARIS PEACE CONFERENCE HAS ENDED without bringing peace much nearer. In fact, its most conspicuous result has been the solidification of the Eastern and Western blocs and the widening of the gulf between them. Again and again, voting in the plenary sessions on the most crucial sections of the five treaties was fifteen to six, with the Slav minority fighting each point to the bitter end. This division of votes means that on the most controversial questions the westerners obtained the two-thirds' majority needed to give conference decisions the force of "recommendations" rather than "suggestions." But this does not mean that when the Council of Foreign Ministers gets down to the business of preparing final drafts, these decisions will be incorporated. Since unanimity among the Big Four is required, the battles over the Trieste constitution, Danubian navigation, and the economic clauses of the treaties will be fought again. Eventually, if there is to be peace at all, both sides will have to make compromises. But

APPROVAL OF THE FRENCH CONSTITUTION should end the political instability created by eighteen months of successive referendums and elections. Although the new code was adopted by a slim margin of a million votes, there is no reason to believe that the parties which favored it will lose ground in the November 10 elections; on the contrary, it is logical to assume that many of the people who, under the moral pressure of General de Gaulle, abstained from voting will regain their freedom of action at the polls next month. The closeness of the vote makes it imperative for the three major parties to continue the coalition; the small crowd that demonstrated against the constitution on Sunday night, shouting "Down with Bidault and Thorez," has already pushed the present government forces closer together. If they achieve a genuine working collaboration, they have a chance in the coming period to reduce reactionary opposition and gradually consolidate the new French democracy.

WITH CAPTURE OF KALGAN BY KUOMINTANG troops, the hope of preventing a full-fledged civil war in China has vanished. Although General Marshall made an effort to arrange a last-minute truce, neither side was willing to accept the other's proposals. The deadlock that has so long persisted seems to be more firmly set than ever. Alarmed by continued American aid to the Kuomintang while the United States was presumably acting as an impartial arbitrator, the Communists are insisting that the Kuomintang live up to the entire January agreement or drop the pretense of negotiating. The Kuomintang has been rather obviously stalling in the hope of obtaining by military force what it could not obtain in negotiation. In his "Double-Ten" Day address Chiang Kai-shek, who has just been renamed to the Presidency for an indeterminate period, made no reference to his commitment to set up a coalition government and said nothing about the administrative and agrarian reforms which liberal groups have been advocating as the basis for a democratic regime. But he vigorously attacked the Communists for "plotting" to divide the country and once more urged that the National Assembly be called to ratify the Kuomintang-drafted constitution before the January agreements are put into force. Since American mediation efforts have clearly failed, it would appear that the suspension of American economic and military aid, as implied in the Truman directive of last January, offers the only hope of averting American-supported civil strife.

Primer for Atomic Politicians

BY J. KING GORDON

THE public debate on the international control of atomic energy has degenerated into an unseemly brawl largely because of a studied disregard of the essential facts in the case. No politician likes to be reminded that he should go back to school, study texts, and become acquainted with a technical subject which up to a few years ago was a closed book to 99 per cent of laymen. In the field of big principles and big generalities the politician is at home. On a high moral plane he can argue with feeling about sacred sovereign rights, the intransigence and menace of foreign powers, the incompatibility of political systems, the broad principles on which international peace must rest. He has even become fairly adept in tossing the "veto" around in political volley ball.

When it comes to a discussion of the actual details of a scheme of international control he flunks out on the first test, either because he considers these matters of secondary importance or simply because he has not made himself familiar with a new subject which was not included in his elementary political textbooks. When, for example, an international inspection system is mentioned, his imagination conjures up armies of U. N. functionaries, mostly foreigners, roaming the wastelands of Canada and Siberia, overrunning factories in Stalinsk and Oak Ridge, and opening suitcases in the parcel rooms of Grand Central Station. The practical difficulties in setting up such a system appear to be so vast that they simply underline the hopelessness of the international political impasse. No wonder our defeatists rush back to their political bomb shelters, to their arms factories and their B-29's, or else soar out into the stratosphere where the world state is being set up.

It is with no thought of evading the gloomy realities of the big-power conflicts that we suggest that the atomic politicos and their disciples might devote some of their anxious hours to a study of the actual work of the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission. It is perhaps because the members' days are spent in close proximity to super-explosive material that they deny themselves the luxury of the loud-popping phrase. They know that ultimately political decisions will have to be faced, but they have concluded that there is more chance of reaching top-level agreement if the problem is stated in specific terms. True, there have been the exhibition fireworks of Messrs. Baruch and Gromyko, but in the main the commission has confined itself to a careful examination of the prerequisites of any satisfactory scheme of atomic-energy control.

The first major advance registered was the report issued by the Scientific and Technical Committee, which discussed the feasibility of a system of safeguards to permit the development of atomic energy for peaceful ends and prevent its use for purposes of destruction. The committee met in informal private sessions, and its members were able to carry on discussion and debate in their capacity as scientists and not as representatives of their respective countries. It is of considerable significance that Dr. Richard Tolman of the United States, Sir Paget Thomson of Great Britain, Professors Skobeltsin and Alexandrov of the Soviet Union, Professor Pierre Auger of France, and the other representative scientists could reach unanimous agreement on a report in the preparation of which they had all participated. Their report deliberately avoided political issues but provided the necessary technical basis for any effective system which was later to be developed at the policy level.

The next important advance was made last week when, on a proposal of General Andrew McNaughton, head of the Canadian delegation, Committee 2 unanimously agreed to enter into discussions of the safeguards necessary to insure the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only. Following the breakdown of the problem of control as outlined in the technical report, General McNaughton proposed to divide the work of the committee into three successive phases. In the first phase the committee with its scientific advisers would seek to formulate the various measures necessary to prevent the diversion of materials at each stage in the production of atomic energy. Here, for example, the system already set up in Canada, where the uranium mines are completely under government operation and control, might provide useful examples. In the second phase the committee would discuss safeguards to prevent clandestine operations whether of mines, installations for the production of atomic fuel or radioactive materials, or actual bomb factories. As the technical report emphasized, clandestine operations in the later stages of the process are most dangerous not only because of the higher concentration of U-235 but because of the extreme difficulty of detection. In the third phase the problem of illegal seizure by individual governments or groups within nations would have to be discussed and safeguards devised to prevent it.

This approach has several obvious advantages. First, the discussions will bring together policy representatives and scientific advisers, and they are bound to have the effect of educating the policy-makers in the actualities of the problems of control. It is also to be hoped that they will eliminate some of the misconceptions around which the wordiest debate has raged. Second, as in the case of the technical report, the findings of the group will constitute a joint international effort. The report when it appears may seem to articulate in specific detail the broad implications of the Lilienthal and Baruch reports, but it will have eliminated the suggestion of "you-must-take-our-plan-or-we-won't play." Third, the report would provide a frame of reference within which the system of international control—called for by the Moscow Foreign Ministers conference of December, 1945, and the United Nations Assembly of January, 1946—could be worked out.

There are no short cuts to international security. And many difficulties ahead of the Atomic Energy Commission will have to wait for their solution on a vastly improved political climate. But at least it should stop defeatists to consider that in one important section of the United Nations men of good-will and trained intelligence have worked out a pattern of international negotiation that has already produced results. The shadow of Hiroshima is still with us; but it has lifted a little.

OPA in Extremis

COMMENTING on the second price-control bill, an editorial in The Nation of July 27 suggested that "even though the bill were a sound one, it is doubtful whether effective control over prices could be reestablished. Three weeks of mad markets have shattered the line, and stouter levers than Congress has provided would probably prove powerless to roll prices of primary products back to the June 29 level."

In the weeks since, our misgivings have been only too well justified. Prices of primary products left uncontrolled, such as cotton, butter, milk, and tobacco, have continued to soar. This has meant a further upward move in the cost-of-living index and has forced the OPA to raise ceilings for goods still controlled, such as cotton textiles. Meanwhile, products put back under ceilings as a result of the decisions of the Decontrol Board have all but vanished from the market. And as the price line gives at point after point, the strain on the wage lines grows increasingly severe. The whole stabilization policy, in fact, is approaching collapse.

President Truman would surely have been politically smart if he had listened to those advisers who urged him to veto the second price-control bill as he had the first. Instead, he decided to keep up the battle against inflation with the blunt weapon Congress had given him. It has not been possible, however, for him to avoid retreat, and now friend and foe alike are clamoring for a total surrender. The Republicans, compensating for their chronic lack of a positive program, are trying to make the meat famine the issue of the forthcoming elections; many Democrats, scared of a hunger-inspired revolt in their urban strongholds, are urging the President to bring back steaks no matter what the cost.

Actually, it is doubtful whether we shall see meat at prices within the reach of the average purse for many months, whatever is done. True, the prospective supply is relatively large—146 pounds per head in the coming year as compared with 125 pounds before the war—but at the present national-income level the prospective demand is 160 pounds. This means that prices, if uncontrolled, will rise to a point at which the lower-income groups will be forced to cut their purchases drastically; total consumption will thus be equated with the production level.

One reason for the present meat shortage is the killing, in two senses, that stock-raisers and packers made during the OPA "holiday" in July and August. Immature animals which should have spent several months in the feed-lots putting on weight were rushed to market to take advantage of soaring prices. As a result, the "pipeline" from range to consumer was nearly empty when ceilings were reimposed. It has failed to fill up again because of a sharp fall in pressure at the far end and serious leaks at several points. The stock-raisers are not sending their normal volume of steers to the markets. They are angry because meat is kept under control while other agricultural products have been freed. However, before many more weeks pass, lack of grass will force them to reduce their herds. At the terminal markets, where offerings are mostly less than 50 per cent of normal, many of the choicest animals are allegedly bought for the black market and of the others an abnormal proportion is being diverted to the Midwestern feed-lots. The big packers claim that they cannot buy at the going prices and comply with the law, but the validity of this claim is dubious. For most of the beef that is now reaching New York is being handled by independent packers who appear to be able to buy and sell at prices which enable retailers to keep within ceilings. Moreover, it has been widely reported that the big packers and chain-store operators have been establishing huge feed-lots in the corn country and stocking them heavily. They hope, apparently, either to hold back supplies until price ceilings are lifted or, at least, to gain an extra profit from the weight added by feeding.

Is all this evidence of a conspiracy? In a legal sense, we doubt that it is. The stock-raisers are holding back because they can reasonably hope for a bigger profit and have little fear of loss. The big packers can also afford to gamble, especially since they are reaping a harvest from their dairy interests. Probably they have some kind of understanding but a "gentlemen's agreement" is a difficult thing to prove in court.

What is to be done, then? A few hours after this issue goes to press, the President will talk to the nation about the whole stabilization program and announce what plans he has for relieving the meat famine. There are few clues to his intentions, but it seems to us that his choice of policies is a limited one. Only the most drastic measures, including requisition of cattle and meat and the reimposition of rationing, would now make control effective, and such measures are neither politically nor administratively very feasible. On the other hand, any attempt to appease the meat interests by raising ceilings or granting new subsidies will mean a further crumbling of the line and may not even serve its purpose of producing more meat. The fact is, business sabotage and political cowardice have sold out price control, producing a chaotic situation which hampers production without perceptibly slowing the advance of inflation. Much as we fear the consequences of a return to the free market, we have reluctantly come to the conclusion that the public support necessary to make the stabilization policy effective is no longer forthcoming.

Wallace's New Job

THE news that Henry Wallace will become editor of the New Republic is of first-rate importance—political as well as journalistic. It will be welcomed by all progressives, for it puts the direction of an outstanding organ of opinion in the hands of the man who, above all others, today symbolizes the battered but still-surviving ideals of the Roosevelt era. Mr. Wallace's announcement that he accepted the post only when he had been assured every effort would be made "to get the New Republic read by workers, small business men, and farmers all over the United States" shows clearly the serious political purpose he will bring to the job. A statement from the New Republic itself indicates that changes in style and format and content are planned, aimed at winning a wide popular circulation. This effort to reach levels of the public so far largely untouched by the few existing progressive journals will be watched with hope, only faintly colored with skepticism, by Mr. Wallace's contemporaries. For the country greatly needs a mass-circulation journal of liberal tendency; under Henry Wallace's leadership, with adequate financing and the able support of Bruce Bliven and Michael Straight, who will continue to serve as editors, the New Republic should be able to fill, at least in part, that gaping vacancy.

Just as important, politically, is the fact that Mr. Wallace has gained a platform. Since he left the Cabinet his future has been clouded with uncertainty. His sharp opposition to the foreign policy of the Administration, together with the circumstances of his dismissal, put him in an anomalous position as a party leader. He can hardly open his mouth even in support of a Democratic candidate without risking the displeasure of the "regulars." For all his protestations of loyalty, Mr. Wallace is in effect a man without a party. But he is a man with a following, and what he needed was a means of reaching and influencing that following. Otherwise, his leadership would inevitably collapse.

For reasons not fully explained, he decided against serving as head of a union of progressive political groups, including the C. I. O.-P. A. C. Perhaps he felt that such a connection would limit his political freedom; or perhaps he wished to avoid commitment to a coalition representing only one section of the labor movement. Whatever his reasons, Wallace has evidently decided he can best promote his political faith and his high ambitions by steering an independent course with the New Republic as his personal organ.

"Nobody's Damn Business"

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, October 11

THE struggle for power by the army and navy broke out into the open this week. The army bluntly challenged the State Department to come out and fight. Professional military and naval officers have been carrying on a behind-the-scenes campaign to dominate Washington ever since Harry Truman took up residence in the White House. Their philosophy was put in plain words by Admiral Halsey when he said, "It is nobody's damn business where we go. We can go anywhere we please."

TRIS COFFIN is a commentator for the Columbia Broadcasting System.

The recent brazen attempts by the military crowd to muscle in on both foreign and domestic policy have shaken the capital. One afternoon this week one of the most influential civilian officials here said to me, "This is the real battle. Price controls, civil liberties, taxes are a side issue compared to this. We can't let the army and navy roam all over the world threatening people and becoming more powerful at home."

The story goes back to the spring of 1945 when a frightened and bewildered Harry Truman became President. He was deeply aware of the awful gaps in his knowledge of world affairs. He turned to that salty old sea dog, Fleet Admiral William D. Leahy, who had accompanied Franklin Roosevelt to so many meetings with Stalin and Churchill.

The little artillery captain from Missouri has an unlimited awe of top-rank officers. Admiral Leahy, who is both Chief of Staff to the President and chairman of the powerful Joint Chiefs of Staff, was a good teacher. He propounded the historical military view—the best guaranty of peace is to have the biggest army and navy in the world. Moreover, military leaders, being practical men with experience all over the map, were more capable of dealing with foreign nations than striped-pants diplomats.

President Truman swallowed this easily—hook, line, and sinker. He ardently championed peace-time conscription, lecturing Congressional visitors severely on the subject. He has approved the principle of every plan slipped on his desk by Admiral Leahy.

Secretary of State Byrnes at first resisted the military pressure. He was running foreign policy, or so he thought. He saw which way the wind was blowing when President Truman chastized him at a news conference and Admiral Leahy placed a story with a favored columnist that General Marshall would become Secretary of State. Finally Mr. Byrnes was forced to give in. The heaviest pressures brought against him, he has complained recently to friends, come not from the Senate but from the brass hats.

There has been a continuous series of irritating squabbles between the State Department and the services over bases. The army and navy want to equip and maintain bases all over the world, using hundreds of thousands of troops and millions of dollars of equipment. There are arguments over occupation policy, with General MacArthur blithely ignoring all directives from the State Department. The navy thought up the peace-loving project of sending a large bristling fleet to the eastern Mediterranean. The plan was pared down by the State Department.

Policy toward Russia has been changed by military pressure. The brass hats say the Soviets may attack us unless we scare the hell out of them first. According to civilian advisers in official Washington, Russia does not want war for at least fifteen years. What will happen then will depend on how the two nations are talking and acting.

Last Tuesday afternoon War Department press agents called up correspondents and told them not to miss the conference of Assistant Secretary of Air Stuart Symington. Real news would break. The Assistant Secretary read briskly from a handout: "The flight of the B-29 Dreamboat over the Arctic wastes is but another proof that General Spaatz is right when he emphasizes the danger of an attack over the polar regions, this because of the far shorter distances that way to the United States from all industrial countries. . . . In the future if America is attacked, our retaliatory attacks will begin immediately, and as soon as possible thereafter it will be necessary to carry and either drop or land troops. Thousands of planes will be needed."

Boris Krylov, the Russian correspondent for Tass, listened with a straight face.

The Assistant Secretary continued: "The air forces will send a group of B-29's around the world if the State Department approves. . . . The specific reason for this flight is to work out technical problems of moving large groups of large planes long distances. The purpose is to train and maintain an air force capable of carrying out an assignment as may be required under the United Nations."

If Symington thought he would get by with this he was mistaken, for the first question was, "Isn't this putting pressure on the State Department?" He answered with a smirk, "Oh, we wouldn't do that." Had the War Department asked permission of the State Department or discussed the flight with it? The answer was no. (As of today, the army has not yet discussed the flight with the State Department.) The planes, Symington said, would cross Egypt and India and fly up the Pacific. A reporter asked sarcastically, "Would the flight involve courtesy calls?" Symington was not enjoying himself. He answered stiffly, "If this is requested by the State Department."

Some of the other questions and answers follow:

Q. Can this flight be compared to the tour of the carrier Franklin Roosevelt in the Mediterranean? Would you expect the same criticism?

A. The flight will not be made unless it is approved.

Q. Are the air forces thinking of the potential use of B-29's as an instrument of national policy, in line with Secretary of the Navy Forrestal's comment that the carrier trip was a part of foreign policy?

A. We like to think of the air forces as an instrument of national policy.

Q. Will this flight allay or increase the fears of the world?

A. What we want to do is further military training. Other matters are outside of the War Department.

Q. You mentioned this flight would help the United Nations. How?

A. Under the United Nations we have a responsibility to further the development of our military knowledge.

A girl reporter in the front row asked, "Is this flight in the interests of peace?"

Assistant Secretary Symington by this time was having a little trouble in keeping his temper. He snapped back at the girl, "Do you think so?" She murmured something about this being his press conference. He closed the matter abruptly, "This is not a matter for the War Department."

Yesterday afternoon President Truman was asked about the flight of the B-29's. This time there was no curt or angry denunciation of an official who was feuding with the State Department; he replied mildly that no decision had been made.

Then Mr. Truman went on gaily to announce that a naval squadron would steam down to Chile in honor of the inauguration of a new President. Fleet Admiral Leahy would be Mr. Truman's personal representative at the ceremonies.

This afternoon Acting Secretary of State Acheson commented that he had heard only generally of the flight of the B-29's. He had not been informed when, where, or how.

A correspondent inquired, "Do you now have any request from the army for approval of the flight?" The reply was negative.

The Washington Post, which has on several occasions reprimanded the services for their lust for power, said in an editorial headed Muscle-Flexing:

> We do not believe that the country's ultimate interests are served by the kind of demonstrativeness contained in Mr. Symington's proposal for a mass flight of B-29's around the world. It is a piece, it seems to us, with Admiral Halsey's bristling boastfulness and with the uncalled-for exhibition of muscle-flexing we engaged in at the time of the Greek elections when there was a demonstration of navy planes over Athens. Some of our military men seem to think their department is the State Department. They behave and itch like frustrated diplomats. . . . Inevitably the tour would bring distrust and suspicion of our motives. It would be a form of braggadocio which instead of calming war nerves would do just the opposite. . . . We hope the President calls off the project. In its way it would undermine Secretary Byrnes's policy as Secretary Wallace's intervention did.

Official Washington is going to take a long look at Mr. Truman's ultimate decision, for press-conference remarks indicate that he has moved in as arbiter. His ruling will be a sign of how he is thinking about the Atomic Energy Commission. The services are lobbying vigorously for the appointment of a military-minded man like Ferdinand Eberstadt.

Behind Egypt's Crisis

BY ANDREW ROTH

Cairo, October 3

ON SEPTEMBER 28 the Egyptian Prime Minister, Sidky Pasha, having failed after six months of negotiations to conclude a treaty with Britain, resigned his office. The ensuing political crisis has significance far beyond Egypt's borders because Egypt is the dominant state in the Arab League and the most important link in the chain of friendly states which Britain has been trying to weld in the Middle East.

A fortnight earlier, when Sidky attempted to avoid resigning by reshuffling his Cabinet, the weekly Mussamarat al Guib printed a long account of the complicated love triangle of one of the Cabinet Ministers and asserted that this was at the bottom of Sidky's difficulties. To your prosaic reporter a more satisfactory explanation of the crisis is found in the peculiar character of the country's economic and political life.

Hardly anywhere else in the world is the contrast so sharp between the impoverished many and the wealthy few. The vast majority of Egyptians are illiterate agricultural laborers (fellahin) with an average cash income of £10 ($40) a year; they live in filthy mud hovels and usually suffer from two or three debilitating diseases. City workers are but little better off. A policeman, for example, earns £5 ($20) a month in a country where food prices are only about one-third lower than in the United States and virtually all manufactured articles, including clothes, are much higher. In the economic stratosphere, far above the teeming millions, are a handful of opulent pashas. It is difficult to state their wealth in exact figures, for the Egyptian government, in conformity with the pashas' desires, does not reveal the amount of personal holdings. King Farouk's fortune is estimated to be between ten and twelve million pounds (forty to forty-eight million dollars), and there are probably others still larger. No one can doubt the immense wealth of the pashas who has seen their splendid American cars or survived all-night banquets at their luxurious villas, where the tables are laden with delicacies from every continent.

ANDREW ROTH, author of "Dilemma in Japan," is on his way to Asia, but his interest in the aspirations to independence of semi-colonial peoples has led him to prolong his stay in the Near East. He is sending The Nation frequent reports on present conditions in the pre-war empires of France and Britain.

PASHAS VS. WAFD

This sharp division between the pashas and the people, with but a thin layer of a middle class in between, is reflected in the political parties. On one side there is the popular Wafdist Party, embracing a majority of the people, and on the other there are the parties of the pashas. The latter are small rich men's clubs with hardly any authentic popular support, but they can win a parliamentary majority in the fraudulent elections which are the general rule in Egypt. During elections the police load the scared, illiterate peasants into trucks, take them down to the polling places, tell them the name of the "government man" they are to vote for, and then give them a baksheesh of perhaps 10 piastres (40 cents).

The Sidky Pasha Cabinet, which was a coalition of Saadists, Liberal Constitutionalists, and independents, spoke with the voice of the pashas. Sidky Pasha himself is one of the economic titans of Egypt. Founder and president of the Egyptian Federation of Industry, he is a director of eighteen large companies—including a flourishing Coca-Cola branch—with a total capital of £54,000,000. The Saadists, headed by Nokrashi Pasha, also represent industrial interests, and the Liberal Constitutional Party speaks for the aristocratic big landlords of Turkish descent and has close links with the Palace.

These groups, like wealthy groups in any country emerging from a colonial status, are torn two ways by their feelings toward Britain. They bitterly resent Britain's control of foreign exchange and its use of the £400,000,000 debt as a means of influencing Egyptian trade. They want to loosen what they describe as their "chains of sterling" and increase their trade with non-sterling countries like the United States. But while they are anxious to improve their very junior position in the Anglo-Egyptian partnership they have no desire to dissolve it. Most Egyptian industrialists' fortunes were acquired in collaboration with British capital. Among the firms in which Sidky Pasha has an interest a majority are dominated by British capital. Egyptians want a bigger share of the spoils in companies operating in Egypt, but they would feel less safe if the British were not around to claim their share. At present many of the pashas are jittery about the mounting labor agitation and general social discontent, which they ascribe not to the people's horrible living conditions and the more than 600,000 unemployed but to the infiltration of Soviet ideas. Feeling too weak to cope with this unrest themselves, they look to Britain to protect them.

King Farouk too is torn by contradictory desires. He has long been strongly anti-British, but he cannot help observing that in British-influenced Greece the monarchy has been reinstated, while in Soviet-influenced Bulgaria the king has been given his walking papers. Little wonder that Farouk recently warned students going abroad to beware of Communist ideas. He is reported to favor an early agreement with Britain.

The British have now offered the following terms: First, they will evacuate Egypt within three years. Second, Anglo-Egyptian military cooperation will be automatic in the event of an attack on an adjacent country like Palestine or Cyrenaica; consultations will be held in the event of an attack on a "neighboring" country like Greece or Turkey. Third, the Sudan will continue to be an Anglo-Egyptian condominium—it is actually almost entirely under British control—but after a number of years the Sudanese will be free to decide their own future. Although these terms are unsatisfactory to the majority of Egyptians, the King, Sidky Pasha, and a number of other wealthy men are known to be anxious to have a slightly modified version of them accepted. And they probably would have been accepted but for the constant threat of the Wafd.

"No, Sir—this time you must pay in advance or I'll offer my fruit to these other customers first!"

The Wafdist thesis that "the Wafd is Egypt" may be an exaggeration, but certainly the Wafd is today and has been since 1919 the political instrument for expressing the nationalist sentiments of the majority of Egyptians. Political observers of almost all shades of opinion agree that in any relatively fair election today the Wafd would get more than 60 per cent of the votes. It is the only party in the political ken of the villager, and he will automatically vote for it unless coerced or bribed.

The Wafd has two wings. Of sixty leading members of its right wing, two-thirds are landowners with more than a hundred acres and one-third are industrialists. The Egyptian landlord tends to be strongly anti-British because Britain depresses the price of cotton, which is his main crop, by monopolizing its purchase and by setting up competitive, highly efficient, modern plantations in the Sudan. Industrialists have played a vacillating role in the Wafd. Most of them, because they want to get rid of British competition, start as staunch Wafdist nationalists, but later they either come to terms with British financial interests or are frightened by the Wafdist left; then they become "moderate" and split off to form a new party. Sidky Pasha himself was one of the first to split with the Wafd back in 1920.

The Wafd's left wing has roughly the same relationship to the party as a whole as our Political Action Committees have to the Democratic Party. It comprises student youth, trade unionists, and liberal intelligentsia, and these elements are attempting to convert the Wafd into a party which will not only combat British influence but also work for important social reforms. They have been particularly influential in Wafdist publications, and until the party's official organ, the daily Wafd el Misri, was suppressed in July, it was that rarity in Egypt, a genuinely liberal newspaper.

In short, the Wafd shows the same sort of cleavage that has appeared in every comparable nationalist party, be it China's Kuomintang, the Indian National Congress, or Mexico's P. R. M. The landlords and industrialists in the leadership are willing to follow a strong anti-British line and make small concessions to the impoverished fellahin and city workers, but quite naturally they resist social reforms, for these would undermine their own economic position. The leftists, on the other hand, want not only independence but a better livelihood, and if the Wafd does not move rapidly in that direction they plan to act alone. It is significant that the general strike and demonstration of last February, which was organized by the Committee of Workers and Students, was the first occasion on which left forces led a nationalist upsurge instead of merely supporting a Wafdist movement. Also noteworthy is the fact that the big wave of arrests in July took place on the eve of a general strike called by this same committee to achieve "increased salaries and the complete liberation of the country."

The strength of the Wafd and its articulate left wing pins Britain on the horns of a dilemma. Should it continue to favor the more pro-British conservatives like Sidky Pasha, or should it attempt to come to terms with the Wafd leadership?

If the British negotiators obtain the acceptance of something approximating their present terms, there is sure to be a strong Wafd-led movement against the treaty. Most politically conscious Egyptians consider a year plenty of time to give the British to evacuate Egypt. Long repetition of the slogan "Unity of the Nile" has convinced them that the Sudan should be joined to Egypt. Few care enough about Turkey or Greece to accept a treaty which would bring the hated British soldiers back into Egypt if these countries were attacked. And should such anti-treaty agitation get under way, its direction is likely to be seized by the militant student and labor leaders.

It may be possible to crush the movement; there is plenty of repressive legislation on the books. When Sidky was Prime Minister before, from 1930 to 1933, the unrest caused by unemployment was so great that he tore up the 1923 constitution and closed Parliament. The railway workers then struck against his imposition of a dictatorship, and the police fired into the railway workshops, killing fifty men, whom they buried secretly the following night.

Sidky can also act with more finesse. During his earlier term in office the Wafdist leader Nahas Pasha prepared to make a tour of the provinces to organize the anti-Sidky forces. Sidky gave orders that Nahas and his party should not be allowed in the railway station. When the Wafdists marched straight through the police cordon and boarded the train, the police officer telephoned Sidky: "What could I do? I could not shoot him. That's what they wanted." Sidky laughed and immediately called the railway superintendent. The Wafdists felt quite happy as the train pulled out of Cairo on time, but after an hour they found themselves in unfamiliar country. Sidky had ordered the train to be run out into the desert, and his political opponents were left there to sizzle for twenty-four hours.

THE FOREIGN OFFICE AND THE WAFD

From the British point of view any treaty which must be forced down Egyptian throats in this manner would hardly be worth the paper it was written on. Consequently the Foreign Office is looking with increasing favor upon signing a treaty with a Wafdist government. But King Farouk's bitter hatred for Nahas Pasha is an obstacle. In February, 1942, when Rommel was at the gates of Alexandria, the British felt it necessary to have an anti-fascist government in Cairo commanding popular support and forced the King to appoint the Wafdist leader as Prime Minister. Nahas Pasha, knowing that he had British support, flouted many of the sensitive young King's prerogatives, and Farouk's original dislike mushroomed into a consuming hatred. Nahas is now attempting to pour oil on the waters by conciliatory gestures—for instance, he has signed the palace register for the first time in three years.

While Great Britain would have to offer better terms to the strongly nationalist Wafd, it would know that the Wafd could obtain their acceptance by the nation. The weekly Al Khabar reports that preliminary moves have already been initiated by Sir Walter Smart, the Oriental counselor at the British embassy, who is said to have called on Nahas Pasha and asked him if, as Prime Minister, he would accept the following terms: first, evacuation to be effected in two years; second, the establishment of a largely advisory Anglo-Egyptian Joint Defense Board, with Egypt's aid in time of war restricted to Egyptian territory; third, northern Sudan to become an Egyptian sphere of influence, and southern Sudan to remain under British control. Nahas's attitude toward such terms is not known, but he has just prevented his party from making an extremist statement on treaty negotiations, presumably because he does not want to go out on any limb he may have to crawl back from.

It is fairly certain that Great Britain will use its influence to instal a Wafdist government in Egypt only if the Wafdist leadership agrees to jettison the party's left wing. This agreement will probably not be difficult to secure, for many prominent Wafdist conservatives are as embarrassed by the radical students and labor leaders in their organization as America's Southern Democrats are by Henry Wallace.

Pre-Election U.S.A.

BY ERNEST KIRSCHTEN

III. Will Truman Lose Missouri?

St. Louis, October 8

MISSOURI may be Harry Truman's home state —and Bob Hannegan's, too—but judging by samples of informed opinion from all sections of it, the odds are that the Democrats will lose rather than gain ground here in next month's elections. This may seem odd to an outsider, especially if he knows that in the August primaries the Democratic Party polled almost 70,000 more votes than the Republican. However, in 1942, the last non-Presidential election year, the Democrats got about 90,000 more primary votes than their opponents and still lost to the G. O. P. in the regular fall elections.

The explanation lies in the nature of the Missouri Democrat. In his political habits he is more akin to the Democrats of the solid South than to the Northern urban elements of the party. The sure-fire Democratic strongholds in Missouri are in conservative rural areas. There is politics as well as sentiment in the fact that the rich central part of the state is known as Little Dixie. The central counties, as well as those in the "boot-heel"—the southeastern cotton country—and a few others, almost invariably go Democratic. But in all these counties the primary vote is likely to be greater than that cast in November. This is because nomination is generally, as in the South, tantamount to election. The real fights for county and local offices take place in August, and often more interest is shown in them than in the Congressional races. Many Republicans vote in these Democratic primaries because it is the only way in which they can have any influence in the choice of local officials. Then in November they vote for the Republican candidates for Senate and House.

No cheer prevails at Democratic state headquarters, therefore, over the size of last August's vote. There is, instead, all but admitted fear that unless an unusually big off-year vote is piled up in the cities, the party's Senatorial candidate is in for a bad time. And while it is too early to be positive, the chance of a big vote seems slight. St. Louis, for example, looks safe for the Republicans. In the 1945 municipal election it gave 108,627 votes to Republican Mayor Kaufmann and only 54,115 to his Democratic opponent, Henry Chadeayne.

Unless this situation is almost reversed, Missouri will have two Republican Senators in the next Congress—for the Republicans will certainly make gains in the rural areas. This is to be expected, first, because of the general post-war reaction against the Administration. Gripes and complaints have accumulated here as elsewhere in the nation, and personal inconveniences apparently are going to weigh more in the polling places than considerations of high policy. There is anger at the OPA. And an almost unreasoning antipathy to organized labor has beeen aroused by the post-war strikes.

Further, President Truman's own stock has gone down in his home state. This was clearly indicated by a survey conducted by the St. Louis Star-Times and described in The Nation last April. The President's handling of the Wallace affair seems to have intensified the decline. While there was precious little sympathy for Mr. Wallace in rural Missouri, a good deal of displeasure was expressed over the way Mr. Truman first approved of the Madison Square Garden speech and then repudiated it, and first announced that Mr. Wallace would remain in the Cabinet and then suddenly called for his resignation.

The "purging" of Representative Slaughter in the Fifth District may prove to have been even more damaging to the interests of the party. While the President won this fight, he paid a heavy price. He aroused the hostility of party regulars, and Mr. Hannegan did little to placate their injured feelings when he visited Jefferson City to make the keynote speech at the Democratic state convention.

The latest and perhaps most serious result of the Slaughter purge is the charge that voting frauds figured in the victory of his opponent, Enos Axtell. It was no help to the party outside Kansas City for Mr. Axtell to have the support of what is left of the Pendergast machine, and this handicap has now been immeasurably increased by evidence of ghost-voting and other irregularities in at least three Pendergast precincts. The Kansas City election board has admitted the validity of some of the evidence, and the facts have been placed before the federal district attorney and Attorney General Clark. Since former District Attorney Maurice Milligan was able to smash the old Pendergast machine by means of vote-fraud prosecutions, it will do no good to try to sidestep the mess by expressing doubts about federal jurisdiction. The best thing to do now is to push through an investigation as speedily as possible so that the voters may know before Election Day how extensive the frauds were and what effect they had on the Slaughter-Axtell contest.

Whether this latest severe blow to the Democrats' hopes will sting them into making a vigorous fight is hard to say. The party has been losing ground in Missouri at least since 1940. True, it was able to elect the present Governor in the last Presidential year, but it was too badly divided to hold on to Bennett Champ Clark's Senate seat. Thus the Democrats were slipping in Missouri at the very moment that Harry Truman came into national prominence at the Chicago convention. Years of coat-tail riding followed by years of short patronage rations have left the party machinery in bad disrepair. So far this year the organizing and the campaigning have been little better than lethargic. Naturally, the National Committee is expected to make a special effort in Missouri, but it has not yet given many signs of it.

These general considerations show what Senator Frank P. Briggs must overcome if he is to go back to Washington. His hope lies largely in his own strength. He is publisher of a Macon newspaper and is favorably known throughout the state by reason of his service in the legislature. His voting record in the Senate is a good one. He is honest, forthright, and progressive. While he may not have been the greatest figure on Capitol Hill, he towers head and shoulders over his Republican opponent, James P. Kem, a Kansas City corporation lawyer. In his campaign speeches Briggs has taken an unequivocal stand on all major issues. He has not even played down his support of the OPA in the rural areas where it is unpopular. He has been friendly toward labor, but since he felt compelled to support the President in the Wallace affair it is hard to say how enthusiastically the P. A. C. will work for him. Indeed, it looks as if the C. I. O. would not be nearly so great a force in the forthcoming elections as it was two years ago. There is reason to believe that many labor voters as well as regular Democrats will stay away from the polls in November. If this happens, Senator Briggs will be replaced by an ultra-conservative Republican of small caliber who will probably do little more in Washington than wheeze about Communists—the chief item in his campaign stock.

As for the Congressional contests, only four seem fairly safe for the Democrats. The Fourth District (Kansas City) is likely to return C. Jasper Bell to the House. The Tenth District (in the boot-heel) is almost sure to reelect Orville Zimmerman. Clarence Cannon—no progressive—probably will win again in the Ninth, and in the Thirteenth (St. Louis), so long and so well represented by Jack Cochran, the chances are that his secretary, Frank Karsten, will succeed him.

The most liberal member of the present Missouri delegation, Representative John B. Sullivan, faces threatening opposition in the Eleventh District (St. Louis). He is running against a young Republican ex-service man, Claude Bakewell, who is sure to get strong support in a district which includes much of the city's Negro section as well as its wealthy West End. Another Democrat with a straight Administration voting record, A. S. J. Carnahan, is also in a hard fight in the Eighth District, where he is opposed by an aggressive Republican—Parke J. Banta. Further to darken Democratic prospects, the charges of election frauds in Kansas City have increased the possibility that Albert L. Reeves, Jr., may win over Axtell in the Fifth. Indeed, the only district in which the Democrats seem to have any chance at all to make a gain is the Second, and even there the Republican incumbent, Max Schwabe, probably has a winning edge over his opponent, William L. Nelson, Jr.

Senator Briggs

On the other hand, at least five Republican incumbents seem to be assured of reelection. They are S. W. Arnold in the First District, William C. Cole in the Third, Marion T. Bennett in the Sixth, the perennially obnoxious Dewey Short in the Seventh, and Walter C. Ploeser in the Twelfth (St. Louis). Ploeser is the chief hate of the C. I. O., but there is no getting away from the fact that he represents the conservative views of most of his constituents in the suburbs of St. Louis County and on the city's South Side. While he is the target of more denunciations than probably any other man in Missouri, the Democrats have never been able to find a strong candidate to oppose him.

Since Congressional elections are local affairs and are governed by local considerations, especially in non-Presidential years, the general conditions outlined in this article will not exert equal force in every district. Many of the contests look close, and a vigorous drive to get out a big vote could make the results more favorable to the Democrats than they now promise to be. Through his own strength and character Senator Briggs may be able to rise above the fortunes of his party. But a survey made more than a month before Election Day points unmistakably to the conclusion that disorganization and apathy, added to exasperation with the Administration, will bring a repudiation of the President and his party in his home state of Missouri.

Fascism, Philippine Style

BY R. F. MILLON

II

THE Philippines today, one year after the war, are in ruins. War damages were estimated by former President Osmeña at $1,000,000,000. Industrial losses include 6 per cent of sugar production, 5 per cent of cocoanut-oil production, 70 per cent of mining, 70 per cent of shipping facilities, and 60 per cent of land transportation. The great bulk of the people live in conditions which in the United States would be described as abject poverty. The pre-war national economy was completely geared to export trade. Ninety-eight per cent of all production except locally consumed rice and fish is for export; 95 per cent of that export trade is with the United States.

Against this background recent developments can be more readily understood. At the request of Paul McNutt, and with the concurrence of President Truman, Congress passed the Philippines Trade Act and the Philippines Rehabilitation Act in April of this year. Both measures were enacted with the professed purpose of aiding the Philippines. Actually, neither bill furnishes immediate aid. The Trade Act provides for the restoration of the pre-war dominance of American vested interests in the Philippines and its perpetuation for twenty-eight years; the Rehabilitation Act contains a stipulation that the Philippines cannot receive the act's principal benefits unless they accept the Trade Act.

If the Trade Act had not been passed, all Philippine exports to the United States would have been subject to full duties as provided in the Independence Act of 1934. There was thus a clear necessity for legislation of some sort to aid the Philippine economy, which had been totally dependent on the United States for more than forty years. When the United States first granted the Philippines preferential trade rights the result was the artificial stimulation of the sugar, cocoanut-oil, hemp, and tobacco export industries and the stifling of Filipino industry for the home market. Raw materials were siphoned into the United States; American manufactured goods flooded the Islands. Since immediate severance of economic ties with the United States would have been injurious, it was thought the Philippines would be forced to accept the proposed act with all its one-sided restrictions.

McNutt pushed the Trade Act through the American Congress by going to Washington and lobbying for it. In the Philippines Roxas, after purging his Congress of a large number of opposition members, has finally obtained approval of the measure, and the act now goes before the people in a plebiscite. Bitter opposition is expected from the Nacionalista Party and the Democratic Alliance, which includes the Hukbalahap, the famous war-time guerrilla organization, but the Roxas machine will probably get the necessary majority vote since it controls the election machinery and the counting of the ballots.

The provisions of the act are almost unbelievably harsh and one-sided. Philippine exports are to enter the United States under a quota system. American exports to the Philippines are to have no restrictions placed on them and can therefore continue to flood the Islands. Trade will be free until 1954. From 1954 to 1974 duties increase yearly, until the full duty is paid. Pre-war (1940) exporters of products to the Philippines will retain the right to ship the same proportionate amount until 1974. At the Senate Finance Committee hearing on the bill Assistant Secretary of State William L. Clayton stated that its provisions will force the Filipinos "to give American citizens special rights which we cannot give to Philippine citizens. Moreover, the bill ties the hands of the Philippine government in allocating quotas for certain products. Not only does this deprive the Philippine government of a sovereign prerogative, but it has the effect of giving pre-war producers a virtual monopoly for twenty-eight years of most important Philippine exports. It would enable them to prevent the investment of capital by new American industries, and new Philippine producers would not be able to compete freely in their own country. These provisions should be eliminated."

For the next twenty-eight years American citizens will have equal rights with Philippine citizens in the development of the Islands' natural resources. Filipinos, it goes without saying, receive no reciprocal rights in this country. The new republic will be unable to use its own wealth to develop its industries and will continue in effect to be a colonial source of raw materials for the United States and an assured, controlled market for our manufactured goods. To top it all off, the sorely needed funds provided by the Rehabilitation Act will not be made available until the Trade Act is ratified by the Philippine Congress. A more brazen attempt at blackmail could hardly be conceived.

R. F. MILLON spent eighteen months in the Philippines as an officer at General MacArthur's headquarters, engaged principally in the detection and exposure of collaborators in the Philippine army. The first part of his article was printed in the issue of September 21.

The American embassy is now reported to be pressing for extra-territorial rights for American troops in the Philippines and for title to vast tracts of land in the public domain for use as possible future bases. The grant of either would seriously impair Philippine sovereignty. Bitter opposition to these latest McNutt proposals is reported in the Islands.

After the election in April Roxas had a thirteen-to-ten majority in the Senate, not a very comfortable one, for under the old rules still in force sixteen men constitute a quorum. His first move in his fight to force the Trade Act through Congress was to have the Senate declare that in the four provinces of central Luzon dominated by the Hukbalahap the elections were invalid, since the Electoral Commission in its report had stated that frauds may have been committed there. Without any investigation and in absolute violation of the law which states that only an electoral tribunal may remove Representatives from public office, the Roxas majority, without a quorum, voted to refuse to seat opposition Senators Diokno (now in New York), Vera, and Romero. This done, the House, where Roxas held a sixty-to-thirty-nine majority, ejected the seven Hukbalahap Representatives but seated the lone Roxas man elected by the voters of the same four provinces. Among those expelled was Luis Taruc.

In my first article I exposed Roxas's collaborationist past. That he has not changed his spots is shown by the fact that the man he has appointed as his official secretary, third in succession to the Presidency under Philippine law, is Emilio Abello, who held the same position under puppet President Laurel during the Japanese occupation. Moreover, many leading collaborators, though they had already been indicted for treason by the People's Court, were on the grandstand as guests of Roxas when he took his oath of office. And Teofilo Sison, convicted of treason by the People's Court but free on bail pending disposition of his appeal before the Supreme Court, was present as an honored guest at the Independence Ball held in the President's palace.

Early in August former "President" Laurel and Jorge B. Vargas, the puppet government's ambassador to Japan, were returned to the Philippines from Tokyo by order of General MacArthur, after having been imprisoned for almost a year by the American authorities in Japan. These two men, whose guilt is so clear that they were to have been tried as war criminals in Tokyo, who were accused by Solicitor General Lorenzo Tanada last March of treason on 131 and 115 counts, respectively, are today asking for pardon under a general amnesty, and their appeal is being strongly supported by the Roxas press. Laurel, in his application for release on bail, has clearly shown what his defense will be if he is brought to trial; it will be based on the embarrassing fact that if he, Laurel, is guilty of treason, then so is President Roxas. Tanada, who for the past year has been chief prosecutor of all treason cases coming under the jurisdiction of the People's Court and who was Solicitor General in the Osmeña Cabinet, has retained both posts under the Roxas regime. Attacked by the anti-collaborationist element for remaining in the now collaboration-ridden government and by the collaborators for insisting on bringing many of them to trial, he has come out with a forthright declaration that Laurel and Vargas must be tried for treason. The chances of a general amnesty, however, are very favorable, for Roxas has no reason to believe that the United States government would offer objections.

The Hukbalahap is now disbanded as a military organization, existing only as the Hukbalahap Veterans' Association, but it is still being subjected to a ruthless campaign of suppression by violence and terror, ostensibly because of its lawlessness, actually because it has agitated for agrarian reforms and civil liberties and because some of its leaders are Communists. An Associated Press dispatch of last June clearly indicated the character of the campaign:

> The military police command, Philippine army, today characterized published stories of a major robbery raid on Pantabagan, Nueva Ecija, as "entirely false." Investigation disclosed that reports that 300 heavily armed Hukbalahaps had disarmed municipal policemen, terrorized townsfolk, and made off with rice, clothing, jewelry, money, and livestock were completely baseless. . .
> The report is one of a series of similar stories emanating from Nueva Ecija which investigation by American correspondents has shown were entirely fabricated. Apparently deliberate efforts to stigmatize the Hukbalahaps are being made within the province by persons with access to official stationery, or who have forged it. Some of the reports have reached Manila newspaper offices apparently documented by official reports.

MacArthur

While many stories of Huk "lawlessness" have appeared in the American press, this dispatch denying the stories received little emphasis.

The recently announced "settlement" of the agrarian problem has turned out to be a betrayal of the peasant forces. During the truce agreed on by the Military Police and the Hukbalahap Roxas promised the peasants a considerably larger share of the crop than they received before the war—but less than that guaranteed by former President Osmeña last year. The promise was accepted in good faith by the Huk leaders and transmitted to the people. Since then the Roxas government has flagrantly violated the truce, and virtually open warfare has broken out. Skirmishes involving as many as five or six hundred men on each side have been reported. The Roxas promise about division of the crop developed into a weak recommendation that Congress act in the matter. But Congress adjourned without action. The Roxas drive for forcibly imposed "peace and order" is now in full swing. Juan Feleo, leader of the National Peasants' Union, has been kidnapped and murdered. This outrage provoked Taruc, idol of his people, to issue a bitter denunciation of the Roxas double-dealing and to sever all ties with the government. According to latest reports he has been wounded in the leg in a clash between M. P. forces and a Huk detachment. Recently M. P.'s surrounded two villages in central Luzon and bombarded them with mortar fire, killing many women and children as well as men—because the inhabitants were suspected of harboring Huks.

With a President bent on establishing a fascist state and crushing all opposition by terror, with an economy chained to that of the United States for twenty-eight years to the benefit of America and the detriment of the Philippines, with industry stifled for the same length of time, with the people oppressed and barely able to subsist, the future of the Islands is not bright. The United States is responsible for the situation and should do what it can to rectify it. Pressure should be exerted on President Truman for the prompt withdrawal of United States forces. Pressure should be exerted on the new Congress for the repeal of the restrictive provisions of the Trade Act, on the War Department to recognize officially the services of the Hukbalahap as a guerrilla organization during the period of the Japanese occupation, on the State Department to urge the trial of all "political" collaborators, especially Laurel and Vargas.

There is little time to lose. America's fast-fading prestige is at stake. In the words of former High Commissioner to the Philippines Francis Sayre (Atlantic Monthly, March, 1945): "The eyes of the world, and particularly of every people in Asia, are upon the Philippines. The measure of American influence for good in the Far East for years to come will depend largely upon the wisdom and sincerity of American conduct in the Philippines."

WE THE PEOPLE: In answering a recent poll by the University of Denver's National Opinion Research Center, only 21 per cent of the persons questioned said they had ever heard of the Bill of Rights.

OF THE UNITED STATES: Jeff Davis, king of the Hobos of America, Inc., has announced, in Chicago, that hobos are staying off the rods "as part of their patriotic activities in aiding reconversion."

IN ORDER TO FORM A MORE PERFECT UNION: Gerald L. K. Smith says in The Cross and the Flag: "Wheeler made a mistake. . . . He thought it was good politics to deny or mildly repudiate those of us who have been his friends and admirers through the years. . . . The repudiation of old friends who may have been smeared is bad politics. . . . Young, new, and fighting Nationalists realize that there is only one way to be a Nationalist, and that's all-out for your friends and supporters all the time."

The People's Front

WAR before the first snow falls," was the talk in certain circles a few months ago. Time has since disposed of that suggestion, and we may reasonably expect the first spring flowers to bloom in a world at peace. But if such rumors have subsided, one still hears—both privately and in public—many complacent comments on the decisive political efficiency of the atomic bomb.

There are many in this country who hold the view that since the differences between the political and economic systems of Russia and the West must sooner or later lead to conflict, it would be wiser to settle that conflict while the United States still has a monopoly of the bomb. The basic error in this argument is the notion that with the atomic bomb wars can be won by robots and push-buttons. In fact, the idea that a rain of atom bombs on Soviet territory would liquidate the whole hateful system in a matter of weeks—even atomic enthusiasts no longer speak in terms of hours—is pathetically naive. Professor N. F. Mott of Bristol University, chairman of the Atomic Scientists' Association formed recently in Britain, neatly demolished this conception when he said, "To call a spade a spade, the Red Army would not be stopped in its march on Calais." While I was in Moscow, I heard a young foreign diplomat say to a French colleague, "Well, if they bombed Moscow, the Russians would retreat to the Urals, and then to Siberia, and then to China." To which the Frenchman replied, "Yes, but what I'm afraid of is that they might also retreat toward Paris."

The problem, then, is not to bomb Russia into submission, but to bomb Europe and the Levant and the Far East as well. It will not be too easy. Better let the spring pass, just as the autumn is passing, and put off talk about war against Russia until summer when people are more relaxed.

Since James P. Warburg took the trouble of cabling to Germany to check the accuracy of my information (see his letter to the editors on page 454), I felt it would be only fair, both to him and to readers of The Nation, to meet his criticisms with equally substantial evidence. I therefore sent my article and his letter to the German friend from whom I obtained the greater part of the material in question. My informant, a former leading trade-union official, is as thoroughly familiar with the present situation in Germany as anyone could possibly be. Though he has lived abroad since Hitler came to power, the American and British occupation authorities have sought his assistance on very important missions of investigation, and he has spent much of the past year in Germany. He is a Socialist, close to Schumacher.

To take up the food problem first. I thought I had made it perfectly plain that I was discussing the distribution of food packages from abroad, not the official rationing system. Food packages—which, incidentally, were allowed to come into the American zone in April and into the British in July, and which have been sent not merely by individuals but by relief organizations and religious groups—mark the difference between relative comfort and near-starvation.

In his reply to my letter my German friend objects to the statement that "the Germans must support this party [the C. D. U.—Christian Democratic Union] if they want to eat." He thinks it would be more accurate to say that "the C. D. U. uses the food packages to build up its political position among the German people." He supports my charge that the church party largely controls the distribution of these packages. He says, in part: "Eighty per cent of these private food packages go to the church charity organizations; 10 per cent to the Socialist Workers' Welfare; and 10 per cent to other relief organizations." As further evidence, if any is needed, Landrum Bolling, writing from Berlin to the Overseas News Agency on September 12, reported: ". . . the entire distribution, from the top committee, which consists of Catholic and Evangelical functionaries but without a single health or welfare expert, down to local parishes, is in the hands of people who are more interested in advancing the interests of the institutions with which they are connected than in determining, objectively, the greatest need and distributing the limited supplies accordingly."

With the rest of my remarks—about the Colonel Blimps, and Hugenberg, and denazification—my German friend is in complete agreement, and I will gladly make available to Mr. Warburg or any other interested reader the full text on these points of his three-page, single-spaced letter. Regarding the Blimps I might cite as further corroboration the recent series published by the conservative Swiss Journal de Genève under the by-line of its Berlin correspondent, Georges Blum, who if anything is still more conservative. But just as conclusive is the dispatch from Frederick Kuh in PM of October 11 which described a secret memorandum from the British Commissioner of Schleswig-Holstein protesting against "the withdrawal of Britain's support from the German Social Democratic Party" and its backing of "the right-wing Christian Democratic Party." Kuh reports the Socialists as "bitter and disillusioned at the turn which Britain's attitude has taken."

And though Hugenberg is described by Mr. Warburg as "eighty-five and paralyzed" (he is actually eighty-one), his arrest on October 4 by order of the British indicates that he has been "active politically" and is not considered harmless; the details of his doings and those of his colleagues in the Conservative Party were reported day after day in the newspapers of France during July and August and are easily available to Mr. Warburg. As for denazification, I could quote here dozens of British and American reports of the increased use of Nazis in high places. One of the most recent appointments in the British zone is that of Fritz Busch to the post of Director of Railroads. Busch had been a member of the Nazi Party since 1933; I even know the number of his membership card—2,956,700.

Trade Barriers Under Attack

THE most consistent and constructive aspect of American foreign policy in recent years has been its emphasis on the importance of loosening the chains which hamper the fruitful exchange of goods between nations. Much of the credit for this is due to Cordell Hull, who, whatever his shortcomings as Secretary of State, brought to his office in 1933 a lifelong passion for freedom of trade. His steady pursuit of this objective, however, would not have been possible without the backing of President Roosevelt, who shared his belief that the constriction of international commerce was inimical both to international peace and to national prosperity.

Throughout the war the Hull-Roosevelt team held steadily to the idea that the organization of the future peace would be incomplete, indeed impossible, unless it included provision for the abolition of economic warfare and the promotion of international economic cooperation on much more ambitious lines than had ever before been attempted. The Atlantic Charter and the Master Lend-Lease Agreements proclaimed the principles whose adoption they sought. UNRRA, the Food and Agricultural Organization, the World Fund and Bank, and the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations are some of the institutions which have been set up to translate these principles into practice.

Now the time has come for a direct attack on trade barriers of all description. Last February the Economic and Social Council adopted a resolution calling for a conference of all member nations to establish an international trade organization and appointing a preparatory committee, consisting of the Big Five and fourteen other important trading nations, to make arrangements for such a conference. When that committee meets on October 15, it will have as a basis of discussion a "suggested Charter for an International Trade Organization" which was published by the State Department a few weeks ago.

The purpose of such an organization, this document declares, shall be: "In general, to promote national and international action for the expansion of the production, exchange, and consumption of goods, for the reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers, and for the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce." That covers a lot of ground—so much, in fact, that it is impossible for me to give even the barest summary of the provisions of the suggested charter. The complexity of the problems it tackles, however, can be suggested just by listing some of the subjects dealt with in one chapter under the heading General Commercial Policy. They include: general most-favored-nation treatment; freedom of transit; anti-dumping and countervailing duties; tariff valuations; marks of origin; reduction of tariffs and elimination of preferences; general elimination of quantitative restrictions; exchange controls; export subsidies; state trading; contractual relations with non-members. Other chapters set forth elaborate proposals for policing restrictive private-business practices—such as cartel operations—and for establishing intergovernmental commodity agreements.

The authors of this draft charter—a large, anonymous group of government experts—have approached their task in realistic fashion. They recognize that it would have been utopian to plan for universal free trade, since most countries, and the United States is no exception, are clearly determined to protect their producers from foreign competition. They recognize also that few if any countries are prepared to commit themselves irrevocably against the employment of such devices as import quotas and subsidies. What the charter seeks to achieve, therefore, is the adoption of rules which will insure against arbitrary action by any member of the organization of a kind that will prove harmful to the interests of one or more of its fellow-members. Again, while the charter in no way prohibits countries from imposing tariffs, it does obligate signatories to enter on request into negotiations for reciprocal tariff reductions with other countries belonging to the organization. Above all, the charter seeks to end discrimination, for protective devices are doubly evil when they impinge with unequal force on the trade of different countries. Consequently all commercial agreements or treaties conforming to the charter will have to include most-favored-nation clauses extending their benefits to all members of the organization.

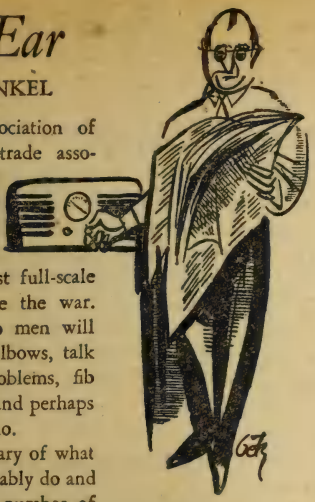
Another realistic feature of the State Department document is its treatment of state trading. It recognizes that while business in this country will probably continue to be conducted mainly by private enterprise, in other countries there is a strong trend toward the nationalization of industry and trade. A charter that sought to block state trading would be completely unacceptable to a large part of the world. On the other hand, a charter which did not provide safeguards against the use of state-trading operations as a substitute for tariffs would be unfair to the private-enterprise countries. For a country which maintained a state import monopoly of, say, steel would be in a position to protect its domestic industry by jacking up prices for the imported material. Therefore the charter provides that in such cases the margins between buying and selling prices shall be subject to negotiation as if they were tariffs. Further, member countries which engage in state trading will be obligated to do business on commercial lines, buying in the cheapest and selling in the dearest market.

In drafting this charter the State Department consulted representatives of other countries, several of which, including Britain and France, have expressed approval of the general principles on which it is based. However, it is not to be expected that the charter will enjoy a smooth passage either in the preparatory committee or in the full conference scheduled to meet next year. One source of opposition is likely to be the fears of undeveloped nations, such as India, that their industrialization plans will be stunted unless they have a free hand to protect new enterprises. More serious is Soviet disapproval of the whole conception of multilateral trade which the charter is designed to promote. This, however, raises issues which will have to be discussed on another occasion.

KEITH HUTCHISON

In One Ear

BY LOU FRANKEL



THE National Association of Broadcasters, the trade association of radio, will convene at the Palmer House in Chicago next week (October 21 through 24) for its first full-scale convention since before the war. More than 1,500 radio men will have a chance to rub elbows, talk over their common problems, fib about their golf scores, and perhaps do something about radio.

Here is a brief summary of what the convention will probably do and of some things that a number of radio men would like to see it do.

The broadcasters will struggle with the annual headache of switching from daylight-saving to standard time and back again. Radio programs are sent across country via telephone lines, which brings them from one time zone into another. Thus when people in New York hear Jack Benny at 7 p.m., the listeners in Los Angeles get the program at 3. When daylight-saving time comes around, radio reshuffles its program time so that Jack Benny may still be heard at 7 in New York. Many people in the industry object. But the present system will probably be continued.

Radio men will also battle over the doings of their Broadcast Measurement Bureau, radio's version of an official circulation-measuring unit—what the newspaper publishers call their Audit Bureau of Circulation. They will pat themselves on the back for finally reaching an agreement with the advertising agencies on a standard form of time contract and a standard rate card. And finally they will take up the Federal Communications Commission's "Blue Book" on radio's responsibility to the public.

Everyone will accuse the others of committing the sins that have brought down on all the wrath of the commission. When they get around to doing something, they will amend the anemic broadcasters' code to cut the amount of time now devoted to commercial plugs. Currently the rule of thumb calls for three minutes of commercials on each daytime quarter-hour and each evening half-hour. Since the code has no enforcement teeth the violations are fairly frequent. And since the convention is not likely to put teeth into it, the proposed cuts—of 20 per cent in daytime and 10 per cent in night-time plugs—will give the industry a chance to don sackcloth and ashes for the effect on the listener without curtailing its income.

Unfortunately, an agreement to cut the length of the commercial plug does nothing to improve its content or quality. Nor does it apply to the spot announcement. Radio men of vision are convinced that the spot announcement is the worst thing in radio today. Yet they have no hope that the N. A. B. will do anything to eradicate the evil.

The listener is continually plagued by spot announcements. One comes at the start of a commercial program—this is the cowcatcher; one at the tail end of the program—this is the hitchhike; and one at the station break—at this point the network station in your town sneaks in a local spot announcement between two network programs.

Enlightened executives say that with 60,000,000 radio sets in the country, ownership has reached the saturation point. But, they add, the sets-in-use figures for 1945 showed only 16.6 per cent of the sets being used during the daytime, that is, before 6 p.m., and 27.7 per cent during the evening hours (these figures are the average for the year). Therefore, they say, the way to increase radio's audience is by getting people to listen more often. The networks and the advertisers of network programs believe that their output is as good as they can make it. So there must be something else out of kilter to keep so many people away from their radio sets. And that something, these men reason, is the spot-announcement plague.

They would like the industry to educate the local station operator not to sell spots to the local advertiser. Stations sell and local merchants buy these spots on the assumption that they are the cheapest thing that will do the selling job. This, say the big-time entrepreneurs, was true at one time, but now the local spot is sandwiched in between a hitchhike and a cowcatcher and simply irritates an already irritated listener. If you consider that local radio income in 1945 was about $175,000,000 and that most of this income came from spot announcements, you will realize how many spots there are.

Local stations, instead of selling spots, should be peddling quarter-hour programs. Radio men who have studied the situation say the average one-minute spot, on the local level, costs about one-third of the local quarter-hour program rate. If the local station sold the merchant a fifteen-minute program, the sponsor would get his three minutes of commercial time, would make a better impression on the listener, and would have a program that could be merchandised and used to increase his prestige; most important of all, the ear of the radio audience would not be disgusted.

Until radio executives can convince the industry association that the spot problem must be solved—and they have not done it this year—no relief can be expected. Not unless you, the listener, complain.

WORTH HEARING

FRED ALLEN (NBC, Sundays). One of radio's top humorists even though the first program, with Lowell Thomas and H. V. Kaltenborn as guests, did not measure up.

LAGUARDIA (ABC, Sundays). Interesting even when, as sometimes happens, he has nothing to say.

OZZIE AND HARRIET (CBS, Sundays). Suburban America at home, even to the moppets, and fine comedy too.

LUX RADIO THEATER (CBS, Mondays). Commercial radio at its most efficient advertising level. A long-time favorite and a good example of radio as "the peepul" like it.

BESSIE BEATTY (WOR, New York, daily). The first of the Mr. and Mrs. programs and still the best.

Mother and Son

Meeting his mother makes him lose ten years,
Or is it twenty? Time, no doubt, has ears
That listen to the swallowed serpent, wound
Into its bowels, but he thinks no sound
Is possible before her, he thinks the past
Is settled. It is honest to hold fast
Merely to what one sees with one's own eyes
When the red velvet curves and haunches rise
To blot him from the pretty driftwood fire's
Façade of welcome. Then the son retires
Into the sack and selfhood of the boy
Who clawed through fallen houses of his Troy,
Homely and human only when the flames
Crackle in recollection. Nothing shames
Him more than this uncoiling, counterfeit
Body presented as an idol. It
Is something in a circus, big as life,
The painted dragon, a mother and a wife
With flat glass eyes pushed at him on a stick;
The human mover crawls to make them click.
The forehead of her father's portrait peels
With rosy dryness, and the schoolboy kneels
To ask the benediction of the hand,
Lifted as though to motion him to stand,
Dangling its watch-chain on the Holy Book—
A little golden snake that mouths a hook.

II

Adam and Eve

The Farmer sizzles on his shaft all day.
He is content and centuries away
From white-hot Concord, and he stands on guard.
Or is he melting down like sculptured lard?
His hand is crisp and steady on the plow.
I quarreled with you, but am happy now
To while away my life for your unrest
Of terror. Never to have lived is best;
Man tasted Eve with death. I taste my wife
And children while I hold your hands. I knife
Their names into this elm. What is exempt?
I eye the statue with an awed contempt
And see the puritanical façade
Of white church that Irish exiles made
For Patrick—that Colonial from Rome
Had magicked the charmed serpents from their home,
As though he were the Piper. Will his breath
Scorch the red dragon of my nerves to death?
By sundown we are on a shore. You walk
A little way before me and I talk,
Half to myself and half aloud. They lied,
My cold-eyed seedy fathers when they died,
Or rather threw their lives away, to fix
Sterile, forbidding nameplates on the bricks
Above a kettle. Jesus rest their souls!
You cry for help. Your market-basket rolls
With all its baking apples in the lake.
You watch the whorish slither of a snake
That chokes a duckling. When we try to kiss,
Our eyes are slits and cringing, and we hiss;
Scales glitter on our bodies as we fall.
The Farmer melts upon his pedestal.

III

Katherine's Dream

It must have been a Friday. I could hear
The top-floor typist's thunder and the beer
That you had brought in cases hurt my head;
I'd sent the pillows flying from my bed,
I hugged my knees together and I gasped.
The dangling telephone receiver rasped
Like someone in a dream who cannot stop
For breath or logic till his victim drop
To darkness and the sheets. I must have slept,
But still could hear my father who had kept
Your guilty presents but cut off my hair.
He whispers that he really doesn't care
If I am your kept woman all my life,
Or ruin your two children and your wife;
But my dishonor makes him drink. Of course
I'll tell the court the truth for his divorce.
I walk through snow into St. Patrick's yard.
Black nuns with glasses smile and stand on guard
Before a bulkhead in a bank of snow,
Whose charred doors open, as good people go
Inside by twos to the confessor. One
Must have a friend to enter there, but none
Is friendless in this crowd, and the nuns smile.
I stand aside and marvel; for a while
The winter sun is pleasant and it warms
My heart with love for others, but the swarms
Of penitents have dwindled. I begin
To cry and ask God's pardon of our sin.
Where are you? You were with me and are gone.
All the forgiven couples hurry on
To dinner and their nights, and none will stop.
I run about in circles till I drop
Against a padlocked bulkhead in a yard
Where faces redden and the snow is hard.

As the Norwegian dancer's crystalled tights
Flash with her naked leg's high-booted skate,
Like Northern Lights upon my watching plate.
The twinkling steel above me is a star;
I am a fallen Christmas tree. Our car
Races through seven red-lights—then the road
Is unpatrolled and empty, and a load
Of ply-wood with a tail-light makes us slow.
I turn and whisper in her ear. You know
I want to leave my children and my wife,
You wouldn't have me tied to them for life . . .
Time runs, the windshield runs with stars. The past
Is cities from a train, until at last
Its escalating and black-windowed blocks
Recoil against a Gothic church. The clocks
Are tolling. I am dying. The shocked stones
Are falling like a ton of bricks and bones
That snap and splinter and descend in glass
Before a priest who mumbles through his Mass
And sprinkles holy water; and the Day
Breaks with its lightning on the man of clay,
Dies amara valde. Here the Lord
Is Lucifer in harness: hand on sword,
He watches me for Mother, and will turn
The bier and baby-carriage where I burn.

ROBERT LOWELL

Signs of the Times

AN INCREASING number of American intellectuals are reading—and being influenced by—Professor Arnold J. Toynbee's monumental work "A Study of History," of which six volumes, of a projected nine, have so far been published (Oxford University Press, Volumes I, II, III, 1934, $17.50; Volumes IV, V, and VI, 1939, $23). This is not surprising. The work has many solid merits, and its very scope and form are stimulating and exciting to a generation of historians brought up in an arid tradition of academic specialization. Moreover, in a time when the interconnectedness of the world's continents and cultures is both more real and more apparent than ever before, and when serious scholars leave the larger problems of history and politics to quacks and columnists, it is altogether natural that so distinguished a work on universal history as Toynbee's should be eagerly read and deeply pondered.

The merits of Toynbee will be immediately obvious to the reader, so much so, indeed, that they may entirely blind him to its weaknesses. For the benefit of those who are unacquainted with his work I should like to quote a distinguished scholar whose opinion carries more weight than mine possibly could. Reviewing the first three volumes of "A Study of History," M. M. Postan, professor of economic history at Cambridge University, had the following to say (the Sociological Review, January, 1936):

> The infinite wealth of fact and allusion creates a pattern as intricate and a texture as rich as those of an Oriental carpet. There is no subject in history which it does not touch, and for every subject it touches it gives a complete summary of the present position in scientific discussion. . . . Professor Toynbee possesses the gifts of a truly great encyclopedist, of a Diderot or a D'Alembert, for he is capable of holding and giving out essential information while pursuing an argument. It matters not that on some topics the information is slightly out of focus, or that on others the present state of knowledge is too nebulous and too yielding to be even summarized with impunity by men with a philosophical purpose. What is important is that for the first time the essentials of modern knowledge in every imaginable field of history and archaeology have been set out by a man capable of comprehending and handling them.

This is high praise indeed, but it is amply justified. It is astonishing how much information Toynbee has packed into the six volumes which have so far been published. Professional historians will be delighted with the range and meticulous accuracy of his scholarship, while the layman will find that almost every page contributes to the enrichment of knowledge and understanding. Nearly everyone has at one time or another heard about or read references to a great number of historical figures and events without having more than the vaguest idea of their background and significance. It is this fact more than anything else, I suppose, which makes Toynbee such fascinating and rewarding reading. Time and again one feels that these odd bits of half-knowledge suddenly emerge from obscurity, assume a lifelike form, and fall into their proper historical frame of reference. The reader of "A Study of History" experiences all the satisfactions of the traveler who finally visits cities and countries which have hitherto remained unreal abstractions. Moreover, the work is written in so graceful a style and with such a wealth of metaphor and allusion that it deserves to rank high as a literary product in its own right.

Dwelling on the merits of such a work as this, however, is not particularly useful except in so far as it induces people to read it, and I hope I have made it quite clear that "A Study of History" is well worth all the time and attention which it requires. The rest of this article, therefore, will be devoted to a critical analysis of the work, which I hope may assist those who are persuaded to read it to a just appreciation of Toynbee's contribution as a whole.

Toynbee's method, reduced to its barest essentials, is to treat Hellenic (Graeco-Roman) "civilization" as an archetype to which all other civilizations, past and present, are assumed to conform with more or less fidelity. This results in the establishment of a theoretical schema—expressed in such concepts as birth, growth, breakdown, disintegration, creative and dominant minorities, internal and external proletariats, universal states, universal churches, etc.—which is used for the purpose of bringing form and meaning into a vast collection of data from all lands and all ages.

There are numerous objections to this procedure, of which only the most important can be mentioned in a brief review. Toynbee nowhere defines a civilization, and his practice in delimiting particular civilizations is essentially arbitrary. It follows that the historical uniformities which he believes he has discovered by empirical means are in reality imposed upon his materials from without. If he had sought to define a social system—using the term in the scientific sense of a whole of which the parts are interrelated in a definite and

NOTHING to FEAR

"One who has heard Roosevelt over the air — and most of us heard him many times — cannot read the words in this book as mere ink on paper. They are audible. They bring back the circumstances under which they were listened to: the neighbor's radio blaring into the street, and for once not resented; the tense group at an evening party, laying aside untasted drinks as the voice warned Hitler not to come into the Western Atlantic, the stillness in a home as the jazz music stopped and a President prayed before the nation. The speeches will mean these things, or things like them, as long as we of this generation survive." New York Times $3.75 ascertainable way—and if he had tried to identify a number of historical social systems, he would have discovered much more diversity than uniformity. It is this lack of appreciation of historical diversity, with its roots in different social systems existing in different environments and with different means at their disposal, which constitutes the cardinal weakness of Toynbee's work.

This weakness comes out most clearly when we consider the present as history, as Toynbee frequently does. Looking at the world around us through the spectacles provided by Toynbee's theory, we see a Western civilization, which has already spread its tentacles into the farthest corners of the earth and is in the process of overcoming or absorbing its surviving rivals, tearing itself to pieces in a crescendo of fratricidal strife. Will this process lead to a knockout blow by which one great power, emulating the example of Rome, will vanquish its enemies and establish a Western universal state? Such an outcome, in Toynbee's view, would be but a temporary respite. No more than in the days of the Roman Empire could a world conqueror of our time save civilization from disintegration and dissolution. Since, however, the theory allows of no alternative course, Toynbee is impelled by logic and emotion alike to look to divine intervention for salvation. He hopes and prays for "Western Christendom" to be "given grace to be born again as the Respublica Christiana which is its own earlier and better ideal of what it should strive to be" (Vol. V, p. 194). The last two volumes, written as the storm clouds of war gathered on the horizon, are increasingly occupied with this theme.

The flaw in Toynbee's reasoning is not hard to discover. A prisoner of his own theory, he is quite unable to appreciate the vast changes which capitalism—a scientifically accurate designation for our dominant Western social system—has wrought during the last four hundred years, or to understand the significance of the emergence of socialism as an actually functioning rival social system. Under present-day conditions a theory distilled from the experience of the ancient Mediterranean world is for the most part irrelevant and therefore entirely misleading.

Capitalism's achievements in the realm of science and industry have laid the foundation for an integration into one body social of all existing "civilizations" and of all remaining barbarians as well. Nomadism, once such a powerful historical force, is rapidly disappearing and with it the "external proletariats" which play an important role in all Toynbee's dramas. Science and industry, once again, have altered the social basis of religion. There is no longer any ground on which to build Universal Churches preaching new Higher Religions; nor, sad to relate, is there any prospect that organized Christianity will ever play a constructive role again. Higher Religions and Universal Churches were proletarian—in Toynbee's sense of the word—creations at a time when the objective possibility of abolishing the proletarian status did not exist. Today, for the first time in history, that possibility does exist, and the proletariat has reacted by building a socialist movement which is secular in both spirit and aim. It is highly significant that precisely in those parts of the world where the proletarian status of the masses is most extreme and least endurable, people turn to socialism, not to religion, for salvation. Finally, the burning question which we face today is not whether "Western civilization" can be saved from its own suicidal folly, but whether a capitalist social system which has lost its creative power and is rapidly barbarizing its own children can be replaced by a rational socialist order in time to save the fruits of all the civilizations which have flourished on the face of the earth in the past six thousand years.

When we see that Toynbee's theory fails when applied to the present we are naturally led to ask whether he has not, after all, been off on a false trail in dealing with the past; and the answer is surely yes. The true purpose of a study of history should be to discover and analyze and illustrate the inner laws of social change and development. Had Toynbee been pursuing this purpose he must have rejected from the outset the disastrous doctrine of the "philosophic contemporaneity" of all civilizations, and he must have concentrated on problems of variety and development rather than on the supposedly uniform life cycle of members of a single unchanging species. What we want to know from the historian—as distinct from the antiquarian—is how we came to be where we are and what we are today; and Toynbee's contributions to the solution of this problem, however substantial in volume, are essentially incidental.

If space were available, it would be worth while to examine in detail Toynbee's treatment of a number of important historical topics in order to demonstrate how his failure to identify and analyze specific social systems gives rise to false problems and leads to erroneous conclusions. The bare mention of two examples, however, will have to suffice.

One of the most important—and also most neglected—problems in the history of the entire civilized world right up to the opening of the modern period is the repeated eruptions of nomads from the Eurasian and Afrasian steppes into the territories of the surrounding agricultural societies. It is altogether to Toynbee's credit that he fully recognizes the importance of the problem, and his catalogue of nomad eruptions (presented in an Annex to Vol. III) is a magnificent piece of historical research. But his treatment of the causes of the phenomenon is vitiated by a failure to analyze (a) the social structure of nomadism, and (b) the normal relations between nomad and neighboring sedentary societies. As a result he is driven to adopt the quite unsubstantiated and equally unnecessary hypothesis of periodic climatic changes as the cause of nomad eruptions. His procedure is like that of those economists who, having described the wholly social phenomena of the business cycle, sought an explanation in the wholly non-social realm of sunspots. Toynbee adopts this course because he believes that nomadism is really a "society without a history," which is incapable of internal development and change. Anyone wishing to convince himself of the untenability of this view need only consult the brilliant studies of nomadism contained in Owen Lattimore's "Inner Asian Frontiers of China."

In an entirely different field, we find Toynbee categorically rejecting what he calls the "customary" view that "in the eastern portion of the Theodosian heritage the Roman Empire survived until A. D. 1453" (Vol. IV, p. 328) and building up instead the theory that a new Orthodox Christian civilization came into being side by side with a Western Christian civilization in the main European domains of the Roman Empire, and that the two societies "are sister growths whose relation to the Hellenic Society is manifestly identical" (Vol. V, p. 6). This theory, however, poses a great riddle: how account for the glaring contrast between a powerful centralized empire in the East which never lost its firm grip on the Orthodox church, and the flimsy Holy Roman Empire in the West which was actually the creature of the church and which committed suicide in the process of trying to win its independence? Toynbee explains the paradox by saying that Leo the Syrian, in turning back the onslaughts of the Arabs, successfully evoked a "ghost of the Roman Empire" in the East; while Charlemagne's attempt to perform the same political feat two generations later in the West proved to be a fiasco. The explanation is unquestionably ingenious, but even a slight acquaintance with the economic and social history of the period is sufficient to reveal its superficiality. The political and administrative structure of the Roman Empire rested upon an urban trading economy with the Mediterranean as its axis and lifeline. The decline of the empire in the West meant the decay of the inland provincial cities; and the interruption of Mediterranean trade, first by the Vandal pirates and finally by the Arabs, gave the coup de grâce to trade and urban life alike. By the time of Charlemagne the objective conditions necessary for a strong centralized state simply did not exist in the West, and they did not again appear until the revival of commerce and cities in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. By contrast, Constantinople remained throughout the entire period a large city even by present-day standards and the hub of a flourishing eastern Mediterranean and Black Sea trade. The continuity of the Roman Empire in the East is indeed more than a dynastic will-o'-the-wisp.

If Toynbee had taken account of such simple facts of economic and social structure as these, he could have often saved himself much unnecessary effort; and his theories would have gained in solidity what they lost in novelty.

I have tried to point out what are, from a scientific standpoint, the chief defects of "A Study of History." It is equally appropriate, and perhaps no less rewarding, to examine the work as a manifestation of the intellectual climate of which it is a product. Really valuable works on universal history are not an everyday occurrence, and those rare groups or individuals who achieve success in this exacting field seem to exemplify and express to an altogether unusual degree the significant intellectual trends of their own milieu and period. Thus the Encyclopedists have come to be regarded as the arch-representatives of the eighteenth-century Enlightenment; Buckle's "History of Civilization," incomplete as it is, is a monument to the strengths and weaknesses of British liberalism in the heyday of the Manchester School; while H. G. Wells's "Outline of History" catches the spirit of men-of-good-will in the early twentieth century as perhaps no other work does. If we analyze "A Study of History" from this angle, what do we find?

Toynbee himself is a highly civilized person whose learning is matched by an unflagging sensitivity to suffering and injustice and evil. One of the most sympathetic aspects of his work, in fact, is its unconcealed contempt for intolerance and discrimination in all their many forms. He is manifestly a product of exactly the same Christian-humanitarian tradition as Wells. But what a gulf separates the outlook of the "Study" from that of the "Outline"! Wells was an evolutionist who saw history as a continuous process of adaptation and growth, an optimist who was confident that the catastrophes of his own time were but the birth pangs of a new and higher society, a rationalist who, believing in the sovereign virtues of science and knowledge, confidently assumed that education is the key to salvation. Toynbee, on the other hand, is at bottom a mystic who believes that man is inherently incapable of shaping his own development and that therefore the only way to make life meaningful is to abandon the effort and embrace religion. From this standpoint history is a series of "philosophically contemporaneous" tragedies; the world we live in is a "City of Destruction"; and concern to know its ways—that is, to study science and economics and politics—is vulgar and superficial: the only worth-while goal of human aspirations is the attainment of the Kingdom of God.

The difference between these two outlooks is a great deal more than the difference between two individuals, important though that may be. Wells, though he wrote in the twentieth century, was essentially a child of the nineteenth; he spoke for an expanding society and a self-confident ruling class. Toynbee, coming on the scene a scant generation later, reflects a society in full decline and a class which has lost its grip and forfeited its claim to the respect and admiration it once regarded as its birthright. As a sensitive member of that class who is at the same time incapable of transcending its outlook and values, Toynbee can only look forward to the future with despair in his heart.

Toynbee's tragedy is, of course, a personal one; but it is more than that, for it is shared by many of the noblest spirits of our time. Knowing this, it is impossible to hear his cry of anguish and remain unmoved. But one must not allow oneself to be carried away. If the times are hard, they are also full of hope and promise for those who retain their faith in the human race and its ability to control its own destiny. It is, after all, to the good sense and steadfastness of ordinary people that we must look for salvation; and the invocation of religion and God amounts at best to abdication of one's responsibilities and at worst to bringing aid and comfort to those who, under cover of the Catholic church, are backing the "barbarians from within" who have no use for either religion or God and who are bent on saving their own privileges at the cost of destroying everything that civilized men have learned to value. Two Proper Crimes

CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE. By Paul H. Kocher. University of North Carolina Press. $3.50.

THIS is a valuable book for the background of Marlowe's thought; it is not concerned with the baffling detective story of his life, and does not I think recognize the influence of that on his work. There are sections on his knowledge of theology (he knew a lot), astronomy (he had apparently not heard of Copernicus), military technique (from reading only), and witchcraft (pretty sound). The learned precedents for Marlowe's reported blasphemies I think only amount to saying that he could have picked them up easily once he had decided to blaspheme at all. In the section on politics his probable taste for absolutism is explained as due to the "aloofness from human affairs" of a man who seems to have been a government spy for most of his adult life. It is more to the point I think that the Divine Right of Kings was the coming fashion, and coming from abroad; Marlowe was liable to intellectual snobbery and liked to carry an idea to extremes. He was a "man ripe for fascism" all right.

The thesis of this book, according to the blurb, is that he was primarily a Subjective not an Objective playwright, "one of the most highly Subjective playwrights of his age." However, we are told that "Edward II" marks a great advance in the poet's Objectivity, because there he uses irrelevant prejudices in his audience to make them hate the nobles and the king alternately. Such trickery is not Objective in any respectable sense, and if anything it presumably makes the audience more Subjective. Marlowe like other authors achieves the most Objectivity when he best externalizes his Subjectivity, as is dimly recognized on page 279. These ridiculously confusing terms ought to be hooted, I think, wherever they parade themselves, but they do not often succeed in making Mr. Kocher talk nonsense; they are chiefly used to say that the later plays are the more mature.

Mr. Kocher writes well about the puzzle of "Faustus," the question how Marlowe as a declared atheist could feel the story so deeply. He makes clear that Marlowe was fascinated by theology and could write with real horror about the idea of banishment from God. But when Mr. Kocher goes on to say that "there were moments when the ingrained creed sought to take possession of him again, moments when he almost felt that his life had failed of its highest consummation"—in short, that Marlowe was cosily wistful about Christianity, like a Victorian, I feel he misses the whole violence of the thing. If Marlowe had not been murdered so soon he would very probably have been burned alive. It was not hard for him to imagine hell fire. The tension of both realizing and denying the religion was thrust upon him in its most practical form. Surely that is the nerve of the terrific flippancy when Faustus tells Mephistopheles himself that he still doesn't believe in hell. It was not particularly "cold" of Marlowe, as Mr. Kocher thinks, to fail to regard the God of the Christians as a "tender father."

In another field Mr. Kocher is more optimistic about Marlowe's tenderness. "The Aristotelian virtue of friendship, on the other hand, was one of his few real enthusiasms within the limits of orthodox principle," and the friendships of Edward II are given as an example. This emotion, to a man like Marlowe, "would be the clearest revelation of human worth, and an intimation, perhaps not of immortality, but of the presence of a spirit of love. . . . It would always be a bond drawing him towards fuller participation in gentler ideals." The last act of "Edward II" is a crescendo of horror, seen as a punishment deserved by Edward because of his exorbitant love of his favorites. The obscene torture by which he is at last killed is an appalling parody of the homosexual act, and while it is being done the text presumes that the actor will wring the nerves of the audience by his yells: "I fear me that this cry will rouse the town."

This does not mean that Marlowe agreed with his audience that the punishment was deserved. Edward gives a long list of classical precedents for his tastes: "The Roman Tully loved Octavius" and so on; it seems clear that Marlowe felt a good deal of Renaissance snobbery about the matter. The peculiarity of the mind of Marlowe is not that it is "aspiring" or "Subjective" or considered "will invincible" but that it erected absolutely opposed ideals. The unmentionable sin for which the punishment was death was the proper thing to do. There are two occasions in the plays when Marlowe piles up the horror in this way, the deaths of Faustus and Edward, and they die because of the two crimes for which Marlowe stood boastfully and defiantly in peril of death. It seems to me that this is the primary fact about his work, and that a critic who muffles it up, from whatever kindly intentions, cannot be saying anything important about him.

I ought to add that Mr. Kocher is on top of the "Jew of Malta"; he brings out the high ingenuity of that crackling theological farce, and recognizes—like Mr. T. S. Eliot and unlike Dr. F. S. Boas—that the Jew is a parody of what the audience wanted.

WILLIAM EMPSON

Utopia Reconsidered

BRAVE NEW WORLD. By Aldous Huxley. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

WHATEVER its literary merits, "Brave New World" in the fifteen years since it was first published has caught the popular imagination and become a sort of standard reference to the world of science and the future. By this test, which is not an exact one, it would seem that Huxley's satire is successful and that his images of the over-rationalized life—babies in bottles, the alpha, beta, gamma, delta plus and minus division of society, hypnopaedia and orgy-porgy—should rank, say, with Swift's images of irrationality.

"Brave New World" is, however, a partial satire, its scope taking in but a single aspect of contemporary life. There is in this, as in all of Huxley's novels, a preoccupation with biological theory, the philosophical antecedents of which are social Darwinism and evolutionary thought of the nineteenth century, and whose political connections with the present are perhaps best illustrated by fascism. But there is another strain of thought in modern life on which Huxley's satire does not comment, and that is what one might call the analytic, as opposed to the integrative, tradition, as reflected in some present-day philosophies of science, and which carries over the assumptions and the empiricism of democratic theory from its origins in the eighteenth century. These two traditions are so closely intertwined in the world that it is something of a wonder that Huxley has ignored the latter. There is as much movement in the direction of "individualism," with as much horror in the process, as Huxley, seeing the individual engorged by the group, at the mercy of its pressures, finds in the opposite direction. It seems to me that when Huxley declares in his introduction to this edition of the novel that the state of utopian affairs envisaged in "Brave New World" is now nearer realization than he would have thought at the time he wrote it, he is making an optimistic, however grisly, assumption. The nations, though on the brink of total destruction (our greatest theoretical convenience, the atom bomb), are still far from putting away their furious raging together to see what can be done by way of integrative group coercion of the folks at home. Moreover, the integrative process, thus far, and with no sign of letting up, has gone on in virtue of the coexistence of its opposite: Gleichschaltung required the Polish furnaces as much as Goebbels, and in Russia there is the N. K. V. D. as well as the charismatic leader cult. The same may be said of the color and race prejudices that infest both British imperialism and our own domestic democracy—one group is solidified at the expense of another. Whole societies are propagandized into cohesion while other whole societies are cut off, all their ties broken before the death that each man in them must face alone. There is therefore no evidence, for whatever comfort this is, that we are moving in a unilinear direction toward Huxley's dread Utopia.

This limits what one can say for the scope of Huxley's satire. Its quality is to be determined by literary considerations, the most important of which is that "Brave New World" is not a good novel. Satire is, of course, a special case, very often departing so far from the novel that it cannot be judged by its standards; but "Brave New World" has the form of a conventional novel and to a large extent its imaginative purpose. Much depends on the inner experience of the protagonists, and the psychological validity of that experience—states of disaffection, rebellion, and reversion to the social norm which mark the behavior of a number of the characters—becomes at times so important to the novel's structure that it occupies a crucial position in the story; the social satire, otherwise the whole bulk of the novel, diminishes at these points to the status of a background. Yet the characters cannot stand out against a background, for by the novelistic standards by which they must now be judged they are no more than paper-thin. Bernard Marx, the undersized Alpha-plus, who as a bottled embryo was mistakenly fed alcohol, puts forth the greatest claim to character in virtue of his defects. He is a possible source of conflict with society, a center of dissatisfaction and opposition out of which drama can arise. But his limitations are too severe—in part, as the result of what his character is within the novel, a necessary limitation, but also as the result of what his character is outside the novel, that is, simply in human terms, where the fault is the author's who tried to make his drama more engaging. Set against Bernard is the novel's true moral hero, the Savage, flown to utopian London from an American Indian reservation. He has in him all the virtues of natural man as well as a poetic remnant, by way of forbidden Shakespeare, of the old culture that once flourished on earth. The Savage is the extreme opposite of the utopian world, and makes the tragic attempt, ending in his suicide, to live as an individual human being in spite of progress. Though he is credible as a repository of the vanished human culture, he is rather hard to take as the mythological figure he is also meant to be. It seems to me that the opposition between artless nature and the utter artificiality of modern man which Huxley tried to establish through the Savage's character was itself utterly artificial. Huxley has by now dropped the Nature half of this opposition, having recognized it as a typically modern myth and therefore far from the unconditioned, fundamental thing he originally took it to be (I believe "Brave New World" is the last of his novels in which the Natural Man as such appears). But Ground, which has since taken the place of Nature, is no more satisfying from a fictional point of view. While representing a position of the utmost metaphysical generality, and therefore, perhaps, free of the specific cultural motives of our time that generated the nature myth, it lacks the latter's vividness in point of imagination and is even less suitable, in being so far removed from contemporary issues as to seem gratuitous, as a source of opposition to modern civilization. For fiction at any rate, opposition to the times is always best centered within the times—which gives the figure of the revolutionary the outright advantage over that of the savage or the mystic. Huxley's antagonists to the world have always lacked this central position; they have, moreover, suffered from the fact that they are clapped together out of convictions which, while undoubtedly sincere, have never proved themselves fictionally by submitting to the test that only detailed, dense, imaginative experience knows how to put to ideas.

Such reservations have to do with the quality of Huxley's fiction as a whole. Considered with respect to their timeliness, where "Brave New World" has the greatest strength, Huxley's novels have all the virtues of philosophy and journalism. As a satire of our present culture "Brave New World," in spite of its limited scope, has at least the philosophical prestige of several well-thought-out criticisms; thus the criticism of the movies, and in general of our passive spectator roles in sport, play, and whatever enlivening rewards modern life has to offer—a criticism he has developed elsewhere—enters this novel in the unsurpassed image of the "feelies." The moral of withdrawal and rejection is on all such occasions very well founded both as philosophy and, for its imagistic value, as fiction. But the total withdrawal and rejection exhibit journalism's typical impudence. The confounding on one level in "Brave New World" of Henry Ford, Mussolini, Marx, Lenin, and Freud has no more to recommend its intelligence than a Hearst-press witch hunt, where similar modes of thought are employed.

Perhaps one reason why the social concern of Huxley's fiction is not so broad or so careful as it seems, or certainly as it ought to be, is that his bête noire is not the whole of modern social relations but mainly the sexual part. The real horror in "Brave New World" is sex, from the embryo bottle to the contraceptive belt, and the big thing, as in all his novels, is the seduction scene, meant to tie together all the themes and summarize his evaluation, but most fascinating on its own account. The sexual atmosphere in Huxley's books is always one of voluptuous or promiscuous or decadent or undignified, cold, or queasy fornication; and this atmosphere is so heavy that it stifles the moral that love is lacking. Huxley's attempt to give sex its due as a proper reward of life led to such unhappy results as Mark Rampion, the vulgar prude of "Point Counter-Point," who called Beethoven a eunuch, and made Huxley's nature myth as unnatural and inhibited a thing as his subsequent transcendence of nature is forced and old-mannish. Sex, as it seems to have obsessed him, and as it appears in "Brave New World" in transition between mythologies, is the pit in which lies waiting the two-backed beast of our perpetual embarrassment. It traps all with its promise of compensation; it is the escape from horror, from which in turn there is no escape, as the horror itself is deeply sexual. A man, he insists in "Brave New World," has the right to be unhappy, alone, detached, free in his individuality; but while one indorses these precepts, it would seem that they would carry greater conviction, and the satire which surrounds them, greater weight, if the horror to which they represent the recoil had less to do with the sexual attachment. Yet satire is not without an item of ironic self-expense, in that its distortion, which is to shock the world back to sanity, is often itself the most insane thing; without its own disorder it would never call attention to the world's. Thus the distortion of sex, in Huxley's case, its predominance and overwrought horror to which one may attribute his lack of a wider social scope, may actually be responsible for such scope as he has. CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

NEW YORK

What makes it so difficult to review this philosophy is that it is equally hard to agree or to disagree with it. How could one possibly agree with a philosophy, priding itself on its closeness to reality and experience, which is actually so lost in abstract argument that, following it, and its evaluation of past and present history, one feels oneself happily inside a paradise which rapidly turns out to be a fool's paradise? Dewey earnestly holds that the source of all the social and political evils of our time is laissez faire (supposed to have caused the outstripping of social knowledge by scientific knowledge); but a glance at today's or yesterday's newspaper invariably teaches us that hell can be properly established only through the very opposite of laissez faire, through scientific planning. (This, of course, does not say anything against science as such.) Even more out of tune with reality are Dewey's complacent judgments on those evil times of the past in which men were still slaves and serfs; only a great scholar living in the ivory tower of common sense could be so completely unaware of the fact that certain categories of men today are far worse off than any slave or serf ever was. Nor do we need to evoke the extremities of the death factories. Concentration camps have outlived the downfall of the Nazi regime and are accepted as a matter of course; their inmates belong to a new class of human beings who have lost even the elementary human usefulness for society as a whole of which slaves and serfs were never deprived.

But hard as it is to agree with Dewey, it seems even harder to disagree with him, for such disagreement is like disagreement with common sense personified. And who would dare or like to do that? Dewey's arguments, taken in themselves, without any reflection upon reality and experience, and without any remembrance of the commonplace philosophical questions as they appear and have appeared throughout all times (in proverbs, in prophecy, in tragedy, in art, up to the highest philosophical speculations)—those arguments are always sound and obvious, as though one simply could not think otherwise. This fantastic disparity between the argumentation itself, which in an abstract sense is always right, and the basis of experience, which in its historical actuality is always wrong, may be understood in the light of Dewey's central concept, which is not a concept of Man but a concept of Science. Dewey's main effort aims at an application to the social sciences of the scientific concepts of truth as a working hypothesis. This is supposed to put them on a sound scientific basis from which they and we will progress until the supposed gap between natural and social science is closed.

The intention of this approach is certainly humanistic in essence; it tries sincerely to humanize science, to make scientific results usable for the human community. The trouble is only that, at the same time, science, and not man, takes the lead in the argument, with the result that man is degraded into a puppet which through education—through "formation of attitudes," through "techniques for dealing with human nature"—has to be fitted into a scientifically controlled world. As though it was not man who invented science but some superhuman ghost who prepared this world of ours and only, through some incomprehensible obliviousness, forgot to change man into a scientific animal; as though man's problem were to conform and to adjust himself to some abstract niceties. As though science could ever be more than man; and, consequently, as though such a gap between scientific and social knowledge could ever be more than wishful thinking.

Superstition lies at the basis of all radical optimism and all radical pessimism, whose basic concepts of progress and decline resemble each other like hostile brothers. Both are truths in Dewey's sense, for both are working hypotheses in the historical sciences. Both stem from old and time-honored myths without which they cannot be understood or properly appreciated. The myth of progress presupposes that the beginning of mankind was hell and that we move forward to some kind of paradise; the myth of decline presupposes that the beginning was paradise and that from then on, possibly with the help of the original sin, we come closer and closer to hell. There is no doubt that great historians have used the progress myth while others, no less great, have used the other. But if we are serious about truth in history, we had better leave the delightful playground of mythology.

Apart from these considerations, which are concerned only with Dewey as a philosopher and not with Dewey as a great scholar, this book becomes excellent as soon as it deals with analyses of the scientific mind and the functioning of scientific experience. Here Dewey is extremely modern, in the best sense of the word, especially when he tries to "discover in terms of an experienced state of affairs the connection that exists between physical subject-matter and the common-sense objects of everyday experience," and when he shows that "modern experience is expansive since it is marked off by its constant concern for potentialities of experience as yet unrealized." In other words, what Dewey can and does give is a kind of logic for the scientific mind. That this is an important subject for science and scientists is beyond doubt. That it is the only concern of philosophy, or even one of its chief concerns, is a highly controversial question.

The Doctor Will Return

The surgical mask, the rubber teat
Are singed, give off an evil smell.
You seem to weep more now that heat
Spreads everywhere we look.
It says here none of us is well.

The warty spottings on the figurines
Are nothing you would care to claim.
You seem to weep more since the magazines
Began revivals on the Dundas book.
It says here you were most to blame.

But though I cannot believe that this is so,
I mark the doctor as a decent sort.
I mix your medicine and go
Downstairs to leave instructions for the cook.
It says here time is getting short.

That I can believe. I hear you crying in your room
While watching traffic, reconciled.
Out in the park, black flowers are in bloom.
I picked some once and pressed them in a book.
You used to look at them, and smile.

Routes to Headquarters

The first, preaxial digit of the hind
Stubs back a little for a fresher start.
We move this way to keep from going blind.

In great duststorms like these, the punctured heart
Is hastypudding shaken in a bag,
Which you could mold, effendi, with the art

You crowd together from your own unease—
Some mildewed plunder fit for cats to drag
Around the house, smashed congeries.

We limped too long, though, wanting you to stay.
Those storms grew normal as the noise of guns,
Our pulpy hearts leaked better every day.

We acted when you proved yourself a beast.
Saw clearly how to end your life, made plans
To ship ourselves in boxes to the East

Where we attained a bland maturity.
—Then the long coma, hearts annealed, to stare
With glassy eyeballs toward the churning sea.

FICTION IN REVIEW

WHEN Charles Jackson's "The Lost Weekend" appeared in 1944, I wrote about it in this column only very briefly, commending its precise flexible prose but characterizing its theme as essentially unfruitful for a novel. My estimate differed sharply from majority opinion, and led to my being questioned as to what I meant by dismissing any subject as unfruitful for fiction. Since the question was of course apposite—obviously, no subject can a priori be classified as unsuitable for a novel—I am glad of the occasion of the appearance of Mr. Jackson's second book to admit that my choice of language was careless and misleading. I had wished to express, not the opinion that under all circumstances dipsomania was an unfruitful subject for a novel, but simply the opinion that "The Lost Weekend" handled the theme unfruitfully. It was because Mr. Jackson's book failed to make a vital connection between the private universe of its narcissistic and self-pitying hero and the larger universe that contains it that I thought it failed in its job of literature.

I return to this point of misunderstanding because Mr. Jackson's new novel, "The Fall of Valor" (Rinehart, $2.75), seems to me open to precisely the same objection —though in its case there is strong evidence that Mr. Jackson conceived his story with larger meanings than come through in the execution. The theme of the new novel is homosexuality: if Mr. Jackson fails to make his subject artistically fruitful, this does not mean that the homosexual subject is in itself unsuitable for fiction; it has of course been written about very usefully indeed by Proust, Gide, and Thomas Mann. And certainly I do not imply that Mr. Jackson in any way exploits his subject for its sensational value. "The Fall of Valor" is an unmistakably serious literary performance and, despite its inadequacies, must be recognized as a real advance—at least in intention—over the earlier novel.

The story Mr. Jackson tells is of a college professor who, at the age of forty-four and after some years of happy marriage, begins to show a deep sexual separation from his wife. In an attempt to restore their relationship, the Grandins go to Sconset for a vacation. But the holiday, which is supposed to be a second honeymoon, turns out instead to widen the rift between John and Ethel Grandin. On the trip up the Grandins have attached to themselves a newly married couple—Cliff, a marine on sick leave from the Pacific, and his bride, a former student of Grandin's. When Grandin becomes aware of a growing attraction to Cliff, he at first understands his emotions as a response to the romantic appeal of youth going off to fight and possibly die for its country; then he discovers that behind this symbolic emotion lies a direct sexual attraction. He tries to control his homosexual impulse, but the force is stronger than his will to combat it. He makes a sexual advance to Cliff and is rebuffed. The book concludes with Grandin confronting a life of overt homosexuality and the knowledge of the inevitable dissolution of his marriage.

Now in writing a story of this kind Mr. Jackson has set himself a task which is extremely difficult on two scores. He has the initial problem of making the evolution of Grandin's homosexuality, and Ethel Grandin's reactions to it, psychologically convincing. Then he has the problem of making his study something more meaningful than a case history. For, after all, scientific literature is full of psychologically sound records of the homosexual neurosis, and if we are to read Mr. Jackson's novel rather than a textbook, it must be because its study of disease will tell us about more than disease, enlarging beyond the usual limits of a case history our understanding of the world in which illness exists. "The Fall of Valor," however, seems to me to miss fire on both these counts. Its picture of Grandin's deviation from normality and of Ethel Grandin's response to her situation captures our hearts and minds only in the degree that its view of a normal sexual life is compelling—and this is small indeed. The relation between Grandin's fall from valor and the fall of heroes in a valorous war—surely the important fictional idea in Mr. Jackson's book—has only as much significance as Grandin and Cliff can be made to stand for by their own size as individuals—and this too is very little. We compare "The Fall of Valor" with Mann's "Death in Venice," similarly concerned with the sickness of the modern will and with modern man's impulse to self-destruction, to see that the failure of Mr. Jackson's novel to communicate what it set out to is its inability to suggest, as Mann's story suggests throughout, the human grandeur which alone gives importance to human defeat.

Not only the three chief characters in Mr. Jackson's novel but his minor figures as well lack this novelistic stature and make but a poor thing of the human possibility. There are the children of the Grandin's, for instance, or Ethel Grandin's parents, who, occupying so tiny a place in the story, yet fill it not at all. Or there are the Howards, the middle-aged couple with whom the Grandins become friendly in Sconset, who, meant to represent a robust marital happiness, in fact represent marriage as if it were a steaming tub of family wash. Or there is Billie, Cliff's bride, who, supposed to be sufficiently mature to be a college student of Grandin's, is actually so infantile that only a truant officer might be expected to make any consequence of what goes on in her honeymoon bed. But the major responsibility for the inadequacy of "The Fall of Valor" rests, naturally, with its major characters—with the Grandins and Cliff. If the tragedy of Ethel and John Grandin is to matter, and if we are to care that their marriage is destroyed, surely they must matter as persons and their marriage must be shown to be worth preserving. But neither John's professional career nor his personal quality, neither Ethel's wifely emotions nor her emotions as an ordinary member of the community, are of a kind to command respect, understanding, sympathy; and as for their marriage, it appears to be rooted wholly in some absurd mechanical notion of a woman's marital demands and her husband's "duty" to fulfil them. The conception of Cliff is equally unengaging. We are given many convincing evidences of Cliff's own quite unconscious homosexuality. This is a good insight of Mr. Jackson's—his perception of the sexual ambivalence of the ultra-masculine, football-player type of man. Even more impressive is Mr. Jackson's knowledge of what it is that attracts certain men to war. But if Cliff is to represent heroic youth, he must have more than a heroic physique. He must prove to us, as Cliff never does, that he has force as well as physical bulk. His primitivism must not announce itself as silliness, lest he invalidate the attraction which he exercises on Grandin and make Grandin appear silly too.

The current desire to make literature out of psychopathology has occasionally driven writers—Anais Nin is an outstanding instance—to a false poeticism of style by which they try to raise their work above the usual professional case history. Actually, however, it turns out that the poetical effort diminishes rather than increases not only the truth in their fiction but also the poetry, since there is more excitement of the imagination in a bald statement of a scientific observation than in any conjuring with language. Happily, Mr. Jackson's novel indulges in no poetical fancies. Its style lacks the briskness and freshness of the style of "The Lost Weekend": it has a peculiar dead center; but at least it stands up to its job honestly, without conscious or unconscious literary obscurantism. And yet, from the point of view of its content, if not of its prose, it again reminds us of the distance our fiction of pathology will have to travel if it wishes to transcend and outlast our scientific literature of pathology. For in the long run a good case record of a condition like Grandin's sets up just as many artistic overtones as "The Fall of Valor"; from the pen of a Freud or a Ferenczi, even more.

B. H. HAGGIN

THE engineer who had told me about the new Zenith Cobra pick-up informed me that another new pick-up had been incorporated into two General Electric machines: No. 326 (mahogany) or 327 (walnut), a 7-tube console model ($207.60), and No. 303, a 6-tube table model (no price yet). Before hearing them I listened again to the Zeniths. When I had heard them the first time I had judged the frequency-response of the 12H to extend at least to 7000 cycles; this time, with the help of a frequency test-record, I got a more exact idea of that response: after 5000 cycles the high frequencies begin to decrease in intensity, so that the range between 5000 and 9000 is present in the reproduced sound, but increasingly attenuated The sound, then, is well-balanced and rich, but with the sharp liveness created by strong high frequencies smoothed off.

Now that range between 5000 and 9000 is reproduced with greater intensity by the General Electric No. 326; and its sound is therefore more brilliant and live than that of the Zenith 12H. But the sound of the Zenith 12H is more cleanly defined in greater quiet; it is more powerful and solid; and the larger cabinet makes it more spacious. Moreover the lighter weight of the Zenith pickup — ⅔ of an ounce, as against a little over 1 ounce for the General Electric—means longer life for the permanent stylus; and not only need the Zenith cartridge containing the stylus be replaced less frequently, but the Zenith cartridge costs only $2.50 and is inserted as easily as the eraser in a pencil, whereas the G. E. cartridge costs $7.50 and involves soldering. Also, the Zenith has FM, which the G. E. does not have; and it has the finer record-changer.

The G. E. No. 303 that I heard—equipped with the same pickup and changer as No. 326—sounded to me like a very good table model which was slightly out of order; and I will try to hear another specimen, since other table models I have heard recently — the Zenith 5R086 and a non-automatic E. C. A.—have been very poor.

A reader has asked what I meant by the statement—in the paragraph about the E. C. A. automatic table model and chairside model, in my September 21 article—that "In the table model the treble was a little harsh in both machines; also, the chassis is A. C.–D. C. . . . " He should ask the printer what he meant by it; what I wrote was "In the table model the treble was a little harsh. In both machines, also, the chassis is A. C.–D. C. . . . "

Another reader askes what I think of Jussi Bjoerling's voice, which her friends think is not as beautiful as it was before the war, but which she finds as beautiful as ever on the record of Questo o quella that was issued last year. My answer is that the voice of Bjoerling today is not as beautiful as the voice on the record, which was made before the war.

And another reader has asked whether I am aware that the feud between Ernest Newman and the late Carl Engel goes back as far as the review of Newman's "Unconscious Beethoven" somewhere around 1927, in which Engel argued very convincingly that the evidence did not justify Newman's conclusion that Beethoven's deafness had been caused by syphilis. Yes, I am aware of it; and in fact I mentioned it in a Nation article in 1929. While I was in London, in the fall of 1928, Newman, in one of his Sunday articles, discussed people's unwillingness to hear the occasionally sordid truth about the lives of great composers, and cited as an example the fact that when he had proved Beethoven had had syphilis an American critic had objected to his irreverence. This caused me to wonder whether he had seen Engel's review; and I wrote twice to ask him, but got no answer. In the light of the "Bombastes Furioso" appendix I have no doubt now that he had seen the review, and that he had already begun the strategy of that appendix, which I described in my recent article — the strategy of remaining silent as long as Engel said things that were valid and effective and waiting until Engel said something stupid, and of then answering the stupidity and claiming that such stupidity was what he had ignored all these years.

"A landmark of political thought in this century."

— WALTER LIPPMANN

The inevitable result of Capitalism and Communism is a slave state, says Hilaire Belloc in this brilliant argument, first published in England in 1912, and now brought to American readers for the first time. Whether you agree with him or not, his conclusions and remedies deserve the serious consideration of everyone anxious to rebuild a free society after two World Wars. $2.50

Letters to the Editors

Says del Vayo Erred

Dear Sirs: Over a long period of time Alvarez del Vayo has proved himself a shrewd and far-seeing observer of political developments and trends, especially in Europe. His words carry the weight of recognized authority. It therefore seems to me important to point out two misstatements of fact in Mr. del Vayo's Intermezzo in Berlin, which appeared in your August 31 issue. Both misstatements were, I am sure, made in good faith; but both are dangerously misleading in these times when so much depends upon intelligent public opinion based on accurate knowledge of fact.

First: Mr. del Vayo believes that "Colonel Blimp is in command" in the British zone. He thinks that British military officials—contrary to the wishes of Mr. Attlee's Labor government—are opposing Social Democracy in Germany and coddling the reactionary forces. He states that "recently anti-fascist circles in Berlin were stunned by the news that the British had authorized a new party, the Conservative Movement, in their zone. The names of its leaders are enough to raise the hair of anyone who knows Germany—Hugenberg, Wulle, and Count Westarp. Hugenberg, president of the Krupp cartel until 1918, was the real force behind the notorious Stahlhelm, the para-military anti-labor organization which was incorporated into the S.S. in 1934." (He might have added that it was Hugenberg who helped Hitler to power.)

When I read this, I felt sure Mr. del Vayo had been misinformed about Hugenberg's present status; but rather than rely upon my own recent observation in Germany, I checked by cable with one of my colleagues in Berlin. His answer was: "Hugenberg is eighty-five and paralyzed, wherefore permitted to be out of jail but personal movements restricted. Hugenberg is too decrepit to be active politically and anyway is banned. Five months ago Wulle was also banned from political activity because of unsavory past including membership in Hugenberg front and anti-Semitism. Still checking Westarp."

I believe that careful investigation would show that the new Conservative Party is of very little importance and has only a small membership, mostly in Schleswig-Holstein and Hannover. I believe there is nothing particularly hair-raising about it or its leaders. As a matter of fact, according to my own observations, the British Military Government—in spite of a few Blimps—strongly favors the Social Democrats throughout the British zone. Certainly Mr. del Vayo's sensational charge is without foundation.

Second: Mr. del Vayo accuses the British and United States military governments of using food distribution for political purposes. He says:

"Generally speaking, in order to win the favor of the American and British authorities, a German must be in good standing with the church. Politically the party in ascendancy today is the Christian Democratic Union. . . . The Germans must support this party if they want to eat, for the hierarchy controls in large measure the distribution of food packages from abroad."

This allegation seemed to me, on the basis of what I myself had seen, most unfair to United States and British Military Government officials.

To begin with, Mr. del Vayo makes a mistake in lumping the two zones—or even the various parts of each. The British zone elections will almost certainly show the Social Democrats and not the C. D. U. in the ascendancy. In the United States zone the C. D. U., or its equivalent, the C. S. U., predominates in Bavaria and Württemberg-Baden, but the Social Democrats predominate in Great Hesse.

Furthermore, the fact is that any German in the British or American zone is entitled to whatever food his current ration card calls for. It may be the minimum ration, or it may be a higher classifaction. The individual's classification is determined by the German local authorities. The food on which the Germans live is not distributed by the authorities in food packages in either zone. Recently, in July, permission was granted to individuals outside Germany to send such packages to individuals in Germany, but so far as I know these packages play a very small part—not nearly so great a part as the black market. As against these facts, Mr. del Vayo says:

"During the months of May and June Socialists living in areas where they comprise 80 per cent of the population received only 20 per cent of the food packages; the remainder were distributed among the 20 per cent who belong to the Catholic Party."

What areas, specifically, did Mr. del Vayo's informants have in mind? What food packages were there to distribute in May and June? And, if there were any, how large a part did they play as against the rationed distribution?

I know of no major area in the British or American zones where there are 80 per cent Social Democrats, or where any party has that sort of preponderance. If there is such an area, it would probably be somewhere in northwestern Germany, and I suspect that in northwestern Germany Mr. del Vayo would find that the C. D. U. is not a "Catholic party," but a mixed Protestant-Catholic party.

To make doubly certain, I cabled about this charge of playing politics with food. The answer I received read:

"Ration classifications set by military governments, but card distribution left to Germans. Obviously there is a certain amount of favoritism but absolutely no—repeat no—evidence political parties cheating. Russians believe in favoring victims of fascism, intellectuals, and politicos with high ration classification, but British and Americans don't favor anyone."

This does not mean that in the Russian zone one has to belong to the Soviet-sponsored Unity Party in order to eat. It simply means that the Russians do play a little politics with food. All the evidence I can find shows that there is no playing of politics with food at all in the British or American zones, except where an occasional individual gets himself a higher ration-card classification through what would here be called "personal pull."

Let us by all means be critical of ourselves and, if necessary, of our Allies. But let us at least make our judgments upon a basis of fact. That much we owe to the people who are doing an exceedingly tough job in Germany.

A $2,500 Essay Contest

Dear Sirs: The Institute for Religious and Social Studies announces a $2,500 essay contest, the purpose of which is to stimulate investigation into the problems of group adjustment in the United States.

To the author of the winning manuscript, as determined by a panel of judges, the Institute will pay the sum of $2,500, and it will publish the manuscript in a volume to be distributed by Harper and Brothers. Closing date of the contest will be October 31, 1947; length of manuscripts is to be between 40,000 and 70,000 words; further information on the purpose and terms of the contest may be had by writing to the Institute for Religious and Social Studies Prize Contest, 3080 Broadway, New York 27, N. Y.

LOUIS FINKELSTEIN

New York, September 30

The Shortest Avenue

Dear Sirs: While I cannot but agree in general with Reinhold Niebuhr—as much in deference to the man himself as to the soundness of his theses—there are dark places in his recent article which, I feel, need some light and air.

He mentions an "almost pathetic desire for peace in the Western world." If by the "Western world" Dr. Niebuhr means the United States, then all the newspapers and broadcasting networks in that country have united in a conspiracy to conceal those "pathetic desires" from me. The newspapers, more especially, are simply impatient to have at the Russians. . . .

We run headlong into it again among the higher echelons of the American army and navy. (It would be the worst of ostrich-like futility to deny that this is so.) As far as we are able to estimate the wishes of the spiritual leaders of twenty-five or thirty million American Catholics, they are for war with Russia.

If there is any aversion to war with Russia among the entrepreneurs of American big business, then the writer has been reading the wrong American newspapers for twenty-nine years. . . .

A thing that disconcerts my European friends is the vaulting arrogance of the American public; the blatherskites of the kidney of Mr. "Tex" McCreary—whoever he is—who announce publicly but unabashedly that the American generals and admirals, seeing the Russian armies, know now that they can "take them any time at all!"

My friends feel—and rightly so, I believe—that this "selling the Russians short" by an American group of professional warriors, who have heretofore been singularly, even distressingly, errant in their guesses, is the shortest and widest of all the avenues to war.

The Shape of Things

"RED BERLIN" IS AGAIN RED, BUT IT HAS chosen a Social Democratic shade rather than Moscow scarlet. This is the outstanding result of the Berlin municipal elections, which provided the first real test of German political sentiment in relation to the occupying powers. In that city no one of the Allies could exert a predominating influence, and it was the one place in Germany where the populace could make direct comparisons about the four administrations. If any of the major parties had a special advantage, it was the Soviet-sponsored Socialist Unity Party, formed by a merger between the Communists and a Social Democratic minority, since up to now it has controlled the city government. However, the incomplete returns available as we go to press, accounting for about 70 per cent of the votes cast, indicate that the Socialist Unity Party has come in a bad third, with the Social Democrats far in the lead and the Christian Democrats second. In its platform and propaganda the Socialist Unity Party strongly emphasized "German unity," but Molotov badly splintered that plank when, in order to reassure the Poles, he declared that the Oder-Neisse line should be regarded as the permanent frontier between Germany and Poland. In any event, unity was not a genuine issue since it is the common policy of all the German parties. The real dividing line was between the "Westerners" and the "Easterners," and the former have won hands down. This check to Soviet expansion will no doubt cause rejoicing in Washington and London, but it may prove a short-lived triumph unless we take steps to rescue Germany from the social and political rubble of the Third Reich in which it still lies buried.

PROSPECTS FOR THE INDEPENDENCE OF INDIA are brighter today as a result of the Moslem League's decision to join the interim government. The League's action indicates that a measure of understanding was reached at the recent conference between Ali Jinnah and Jawaharlal Nehru. We must not assume, however, that because the first reef has been cleared all will be clear sailing from now on. Despite the political agreement, feeling between Moslems and Hindus still runs high and serious riots are continuing. A wide gulf remains between the plans of the Congress Party for a strong, united India and the Moslem ideal of Pakistan. But Jinnah's decision implies that the Moslems are ready to modify their demands for two Indias in favor of some arrangement approximating that originally suggested by the British mission—a substantial amount of provincial autonomy within a federated India. In any case, the problem of constitution-making will be easier with Jinnah inside the government.

AMERICAN OCCUPATION POLICIES IN JAPAN are encountering increasingly sharp criticism from the Russian, Chinese, and British members of the Allied Council for Japan. It is not so much a clash of opinion on basic directives, in the formulation of which all representatives have participated. It is rather that there is a growing conviction that General MacArthur is displaying too much tenderness in enforcing the directives on the Japanese government. Last week, the Soviet delegate urged that in the coming local elections the Japanese government be instructed to eliminate defects that were flagrant in the general election of April 10. The American member, Ambassador George Atcheson, Jr., rushed to the government's defense with the assertion that its aims were virtually identical with American aims. This reply evoked an icy retort from the British representative, who said that Atcheson was showing a "cordiality" to the Yoshido government which was hardly justified by its performance. Atcheson's attitude provides involuntary confirmation of Harold Strauss's analysis (page 470) of the factors behind the sudden shift in Japanese economic policy. Until recently, our occupation policies have been aimed at freeing Japan from militarist and feudal control. But the objectives seem to have changed, and the American people have a right to an explanation.

THE PITTSBURGH POWER STRIKE HAS ENDED. The independent union involved has voted to arbitrate the issues in dispute. This is a decision which might well have been taken earlier, but for the erratic leadership of the strikers, saving Pittsburgh from a great deal of unemployment and loss of production and averting unpleasant consequences for labor which seem likely to result from the long tie-up. As the dispute dragged on, both A. F. of L. and C. I. O. union leaders (whose sympathies were at first aroused by the injunction granted against the independent union) became increasingly sour. Privately, C. I. O. people have hinted darkly at a plot, pointing out that the striking group was originally a company union and that George L. Mueller, its president, was put through school by the Duquesne Light Company. It is not necessary to accept this colorful but undocumented charge of collusion to believe that the whole irresponsible episode will harm labor and the Democratic Party. By keeping Mayor Lawrence pinned to his desk, the emergency created by the strike removed from the campaign the shrewdest Democratic leader in Pennsylvania. It has given union-baiting Republicans some exceedingly effective ammunition. And, above all, it has set the stage for anti-labor legislation, both in Harrisburg and Washington.

ONCE MORE DR. GALLUP HITS THE NEWS. His sensational analysis of political trends, published in the closing weeks of the campaign, stresses the waning fortunes of the Democratic Party, the shift in the independent vote from the Democratic to the Republican column, and a drop in popularity for poor Mr. Truman so catastrophic that it looks as if he would have a hard time getting elected dogcatcher in Independence, Missouri. We were particularly interested in the sampling on how the vote would divide if this were a Presidential election year. From Dr. Gallup's figures, it would appear that the Democratic majority had dropped from 54 per cent in the 1944 election to a present figure of 47. Now this 54 per cent awakened vague tinglings of memory, and we consulted our research department to see what Dr. Gallup had come up with three weeks before Election Day in 1944. Dr. Gallup's figure was Roosevelt 51, Dewey 49. On the day before election he upped Roosevelt to 51½ and put Dewey down to 48½. The actual vote went 54–46 for Roosevelt. Now Dr. Gallup himself emphasizes the margin that must be allowed for error, and on the basis of his three-weeks-before-election figure it was actually 6 per cent in favor of the Republicans. If it so happened that the error was as wide this time, then Mr. Truman's vote would today be 50 per cent against his Republican opponent's 50 per cent. We are not suggesting that there is nothing in the trend which Mr. Gallup suggests. All we say is that if you are a betting man don't hang your shirt on a Gallup poll.

SO LONG AS SPECULATION WAS PUSHING prices higher and higher, spokesmen for cotton were remarkably complacent about it. But when the bubble suddenly burst and spot cotton fell from 38.90 cents a pound to 33.52 in three hectic days, they cried calamity and rent the air with charges of conspiracy and demands for the investigation and punishment of those responsible. Possibly there has been an organized bear raid, as Senator Elmer Thomas, chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee, has alleged. If so, we must observe that the bulls and the cotton bloc had been asking for it. Raw cotton has not been subject to ceilings and has had all the benefits of a free market, including the attention of speculators whose stock-market activities were discouraged last winter by the ban on margin operations. When the OPA, confronted with the difficulty of holding textile prices in line while the raw material soared toward the stratosphere, sought to increase cotton-trading margins, it was thwarted by the cotton bloc in Congress. Through the summer, indications of a short crop, combined with a huge demand, foreign and domestic, kept the bulls happy and excited; so did the speeches of various Southern state officials who talked cotton up to fifty cents and urged planters to delay sales. But it is in the nature of market booms to grow progressively more vulnerable and the increasing differential between domestic and world prices should have been an obvious danger signal. Many farm products are in an equally vulnerable position and within the next year we shall probably see the cotton pattern duplicated in other markets. If so, it is safe to predict that the Farm Bloc will become as clamorous for government action to raise price floors as it has lately been against government action to hold down price ceilings.

IN THE DEATH OF "VINEGAR JOE" STILWELL the United States has lost not only a colorful hero but an inspired leader and one of its most astute military statesmen. Although many of us will think of General Stilwell primarily as the man who came back to reconquer Burma after admitting that "we got a hell of a beating," the men who served under him will remember him as Uncle Joe, one of the kindliest and most modest men that ever lived. History will undoubtedly emphasize chiefly his remarkable efforts to keep China in the war as an effective ally. General Stilwell's long experience in China and his extensive knowledge of its language and customs enabled him to accomplish what no other Westerner has ever attempted successfully: the training and directing of an efficient Chinese military force. This task called not only for military genius but for statesmanship of the highest order. Fearful lest American material assistance would become a divisive rather than a unifying factor in China—a fear justified by subsequent history—Stilwell controlled the distribution of American supplies with an iron hand. Ignoring both the blandishments and threats of the Chunking militarists, he ruled that supplies should be distributed on the basis of military rather than political expediency. His courageous stand ultimately cost him his post as commander-in-chief of the China-Burma-India theater, but not before Burma had been largely rewon and China saved from Japan's last desperate offensive. Until his death, General Stilwell retained his passionate interest in China. He predicted that Hurley's policy would inevitably lead to civil war and always insisted that the social revolution now under way could not permanently be suppressed, regardless of the scale of American aid. It is deeply unfortunate that America should be deprived of the benefit of his experience and counsel at this critical moment in our relations with China.

Meat and Politics

WHEN a politician who eats, drinks, and breathes politics wants to be particularly mean to another politician he invariably accuses him of "playing politics." So we were not surprised to note that Mr. Truman's radio announcement of meat decontrol was damned by the Republicans, in advance of its delivery, as a "political gesture" designed to influence the elections. That was a safe line to take, even without knowing what the President would say, since it was obvious that whatever he said would have some effect on the voters. Nobody in this country has yet discovered how to hold office without being a politician, and as long as we remain a democracy, nobody is likely to.

What is really troubling the G. O. P. leaders is their uncertainty about the actual effects of Mr. Truman's decision to abandon the effort to hold meat prices in line. It was not an easy decision for him to take. It meant that he would be accused both of making a belated "flip-flop" in policy and of surrendering to big-business pressures. It involved, as he recognized, not merely lifting ceilings on meat but liquidating as rapidly as possible nearly all the economic controls by means of which the Administration had sought to keep the economy on an even keel until production and consumption had reached a rough balance. However, there was no other practical way of bringing meat back to the markets, for the interests holding out for a rise in prices were strongly intrenched and could only be beaten by a long campaign of attrition. But the time factor could not be ignored—either politically, since the meatless millions were apt to hold Democratic candidates responsible for their empty ovens, or economically, since the ramifications of the packers' sitdown had led to difficulties in a dozen other industries.

Mr. Truman, therefore, climbed down with what dignity he could and took the opportunity to remind the people that responsibility for the situation rested squarely on "the reckless group of selfish men who, in the hope of gaining political advantage, have encouraged sellers to gamble on the destruction of price control." The Republicans responded with heat to that charge, perhaps because they realized it contained a damaging amount of truth. Carroll Reece, chairman of the Republican National Committee, retorted that if price-control legislation was bad, the fault lay with the Democratic majority in Congress. That was hardly a good debating point, for as the Republicans themselves gleefully admit when it suits them, they have long since taken control of Congress by virtue of their opportunistic alliance with the Southern Democrats.

Nor can the Republicans deny that they have exploited the meat famine for all it is worth. That is quite understandable; according to the New York Times, they feel, perhaps rightly, that it is the best issue they have had in fourteen years. But they can be blamed for talking about meat to the exclusion of all other questions. They claim that the tide is flowing their way and will sweep them into control of Congress. But they have told us practically nothing about what they are going to do with their majority when they get it. They talk vaguely about sweeping away the "bureaucrats" and releasing business from its chains. But their notion of a "free market" remains, as always, a strictly one-way affair; it does not include giving consumers the benefit of a little more competition. Mexican cattle or Argentine beef will only enter the country over Senator Taft's dead body.

Since the Republicans' hopes of capturing Congress this year and the Presidency in 1948, while not quite as rosy as they and Dr. Gallup suggest, are far from baseless, their lack of a positive program is doubly alarming. The problems this nation faces in the years immediately ahead are numerous and intricate. They are not going to be solved by a reversion to policies that proved futile in 1930. "The fate of the last great free economy in the world," wrote Walter Lippman in the New York Herald Tribune of October 17, "will almost certainly depend on whether business and the Republican Party manage affairs so as to prevent or to bring on another 1929. Some day, therefore, Mr. Taft ought to tell us what he has learned from the twenties, and what he would now do differently when the Republicans come into power."

Will Senator Taft, and some of the other numerous aspirants to Republican leadership, forget meat for a moment and devote one speech before November 5 to meeting this serious challenge from a friendly quarter? In asking this, we don't expect them to stop being politicians. We would only remind them that the flavor of politics can always be improved by an infusion of statesmanship.

Second Chance

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE distance from Paris to Flushing Meadows is a short one as the plane flies, and it is little farther politically. The same tensions flourish in both places; the same issues are likely to explode. In Flushing the victor nations will wrestle with the problem of keeping the peace they were unable to make at Paris, while the people watch with anxiety and little optimism.

The radio talk by Mr. Byrnes and the interview with Mr. Vandenberg on the Peace Conference together provided a coherent and reasoned defense of American policy—and incidentally an answer to Mr. Wallace. Their object was to establish the United States in the role of the firm and friendly supporter of democracy everywhere, and Russia in that of the greedy, suspicious aggressor. Vandenberg even mentioned Munich by way of making his meaning crystal-clear. In this country the statements of both men will be taken at face value by many people. For the provocative behavior of Russia's delegates at Paris has done more than any accomplishments of our own to make the Byrnes-Vandenberg thesis seem convincing. Never has Molotov or Vishinsky or Manuilsky permitted any question to be raised of Russia's motives in its broad security area; and never has one of them granted that an honest excuse might be found for the actions of the West. By their implacable hostility even where policy should have dictated conciliation, they have weakened their case and strengthened that of Byrnes and Vandenberg. But the smooth language used by the two delegates in defending America's role at Paris should not lead us to forget their own record of consistent pettifogging objection to practically everything proposed by the Russians. It is not quite enough to say that they tried only to prevent the Soviet Union from driving beyond the boundaries agreed upon at Yalta and Teheran. The fact is, Messrs. Byrnes and Vandenberg, like Mr. Atcheson in Tokyo, seem to have followed a fixed practice of opposing all Russian demands, reasonable and unreasonable, on the dangerous ground that any success for Moscow would be regarded as a defeat for the West.

That this is a fact and not the dark imagining of one of those "appeasers" referred to by Mr. Vandenberg is indicated by a recent leader in the London Economist commenting upon the Madison Square Garden speech of Henry Wallace. The Economist disagreed with many of Mr. Wallace's remarks, above all with his attempt to make "British imperialism" responsible for the American attitudes he disliked; in countering this view the editorial pointed to the "growing anxiety in London over the persistence and precipitancy with which Mr. Byrnes is seeking occasions to challenge Russia." "To be determined to stand firm against any further advance by the Soviets is one thing," says the Economist; "but openly to provoke and challenge Russian policy is another." It recalled Mr. Byrnes's earlier tendency to "agree with the Russians at Britain's expense," and remarked that while the change since then was undoubtedly an improvement, "many people in this country are asking whether this is not a bit too much of a good thing." That is what some people in America are asking, too, and will continue to ask in spite of the persuasions of Mr. Byrnes and his colleagues.

We have heard a lot, since the Paris conference ended, about the value of facing frankly the "real issues" raised there, the "real conflicts" dividing Russia and the West. Mr. Vandenberg described the difficulty of finding common ground between "Eastern communism and Western democracy." The Moscow radio speaks with equal feeling about the threat to Russian democracy embodied in Western capitalism. But all the "frankness" displayed on both sides manages to evade the issues that really need to be met with some kind of working compromise if peace is to be maintained.

For it is not, as the Byrnes-Vandenberg duet would have us believe, a mere matter of stopping Russia's advance toward the West or the Mediterranean, or of insisting upon democratic procedures in the Balkans. It is also, and more fundamentally, a problem of adapting American policy to the unalterable fact of economic-political revolution in Europe. Put more concretely, it is all right to argue against restrictive trade agreements and the control of international highways like the Danube, but it would be better to make at least an attempt to fit these excellent free-enterprise principles into the context of Europe's shattered economy and the glaring need of a planned, closely integrated system of production and exchange, particularly in the Danube valley. Until we do this, our objections to Russia's exclusive policies will have a sharp metallic sound in European ears, for the economic advantages of "freedom" for the United States are as evident as the advantages of "restriction" for the Soviet Union.

Conversely, it is not enough for Russia to accuse us of seeking selfish, capitalist-imperialist advantages throughout its area of influence; for this, too, will sound phony as long as large contingents of the Russian army graze on the poor lands of Eastern Europe and reparations draw a big proportion of the industrial plant of the area into Russian hands. Soviet influence has undoubtedly hastened the overthrow of the fascist-feudal oligarchy in the border states and supported essential policies of collective control and regional cooperation which the Western powers have done their best to discourage. But at the same time Russia's preoccupation with its own security has largely obscured the issue of revolutionary change—which, in its varied forms, is the one great overriding issue in all of Europe.

At Paris that issue skulked half hidden behind the conflicts of interest between the big powers which were fought out in the discussions of the five treaties under consideration. At Flushing it has a better chance to emerge in its own right. For the Assembly is not a legislative or an administrative body. It is a world forum—the most impressive that could be organized. Since it can discuss and advise but not determine action, its members are free, or should be free, from the necessity which haunted the Peace Conference of thinking only in terms of national advantage. They can attempt to deal with matters under consideration on their intrinsic merits rather than as tests of national or bloc strength. Without truculence and suspicion, without sanctimonious self-conceit, the nations, great and little, can analyze the nature of the conflicting ideas they hold about the world they are trying to reassemble, each in its own imperfect image.

Perhaps when the camouflage is off we shall see that the conflict of social and national interests is too great to be met by compromise or conciliation. But perhaps the nations will find measures of accommodation sufficient at least to tide over the period of reorganization and reconstruction that lies ahead, and allow time for more profound solutions to be reached under conditions of relative stability. It is to this last hope that the delegates at Flushing should address themselves, and I commend to their close attention the remarkable statement on relations with Russia issued last Saturday in New York by the Federal Council of Churches, a body which represents, not the prejudices or interests of a few but the desires of some 28,000,000 Protestants and unaccounted millions of other Americans.

BY ROBERT BENDINER

IV. New York's Political Spectrum

A FEW weeks ago the leaders of this state's Democratic-Liberal-Labor coalition were worried about registration. Unless New York City could deliver a healthy registration, the theory ran, the Mead-Lehman ticket would have only the faintest chance of success—and the prescribed measure of "health" ran from 2,500,000 to 3,000,000. A short but vigorous campaign was ordered by the strategists, and for a week the top candidates of the three parties gave their energies not to flaying Republicans but to exhorting a supposedly sluggish electorate to do its civic duty and go to the polls. C. I. O. locals offered prizes to shop stewards who would bring in reports of perfect registration. Mrs. Roosevelt had a recording made for frequent radio reminders. Registration rallies were held throughout the city. And even Danny Kaye was pressed into service.

When the polls closed, 2,715,563 citizens were safely qualified to vote—a midterm record for the city. But coalition leaders were hardly less worried after the event than they were before. They couldn't be sure whether the remarkably high registration meant that voters were happy about Mead or unhappy about meat. What might have been a paean of joy was no more than a tentative sigh of relief—a cautious satisfaction that at least the ticket now had a chance to pull through, whereas a low registration would have doomed it completely.

G. O. P. leaders were equally baffled and every bit as nervous. The Republican Herald Tribune was editorially circumspect about the "protest" nature of the registration, and in its news columns it played the results without interpretative adornment. The Democratic Times, on the other hand, carried the head: "High Registration Viewed as Augury of Dewey Triumph. Impartial Observers Declare the Rush to Qualify Indicates Anger Against Washington." Other "impartial observers," therefore, were not surprised when the next day the Times announced editorially that it was splitting its vote, favoring Thomas E. Dewey, Republican, for Governor and Herbert H. Lehman, Democrat, Liberal, and American Labor Party, for Senator. The Times is thus sharing what appears to be a widespread tendency to cut across party lines this fall. In the absence of some momentous development between now and Election Day, the sound to listen for on November 5 will not be the rumble of a Republican landslide but the lively crackle of splitting tickets.

This prospect of unorthodox voting appears to be the chief immediate effect of Roosevelt's loss on the politics of the state. The curious compound of disparate groups—economic, political, and racial—which were held together by the Roosevelt magic is showing signs of disintegration. I do not see it crumbling in the kind of disaster that the Republican National Committee talks about, but rather losing a chunk here and a fragment there, for no one powerful reason but for many lesser reasons and out of vague dissatisfaction.

THE THREE-PARTY COALITION

The Roosevelt vote in the state was basically distributed among the Democratic, American Labor, Liberal, and Communist parties, with less sharply partisan strength organized by the C. I. O.-P. A. C., the National Citizens' P. A. C., the A. F. of L., and other independent labor and white-collar groups. And beyond this organized vote were the national, racial, and religious blocs—Negro, Italian, Polish, Jewish, and, through the local Democratic machines, Irish Catholic. From all but one of these groups defections are expected, and it is on the unpredictable size of these chipped-off particles, I believe, rather than on the force of a Republican ground swell, that the results will depend.

The three-party coalition, plus the Communists, is still functioning after a fashion, but the cement is weak and the strains increasingly severe. The A. L. P. and the Liberals avoid mutual contagion and do well to keep from attacking each other during the campaign. In a number of Congressional districts they are running rival candidates, especially in the Bronx, where Ed Flynn, the Democratic boss, not only refuses to accept indorsements of his candidates by the two independent parties but has induced his opposite number in the Republican camp to do the same. Dr. John L. Childs, chairman of the Liberal Party, is just as cool as Mr. Flynn to the coalition of expedience. His organization is certain to get a large enough vote this fall to entitle it to permanent standing as a party, and he looks forward to the day when it can enrol all the "liberal-labor non-totalitarian forces" and run its own candidates, because "there is nothing to choose between machines which make public affairs a private interest." The Communists, who feel they can't afford to get too far away from the old popular-front idea if they are to retain even a minimum of influence, are going along with the ticket, but they are obviously less than exultant about their candidate for Governor—and they openly opposed the choice of Lehman for the Senate. Like the A. L. P., they favored LaGuardia, but the local Democrats, reviewing Fiorello's record as a Republican, shuddered at the thought and insisted on the able but far gentler Lehman, about whom even the opposition can say nothing more damning than that he is "a sweet old gentleman."

THE LABOR VOTE

Against this backdrop of partisan cross-currents the C. I. O.'s P. A. C. is making an earnest effort to keep the labor vote in line. The Wallace affair, the labor-draft proposal, and now the lifting of price controls on meat have reduced enthusiasm for the Administration well below the boiling-point, but the organization is still out to deliver the vote. There is 1948 to be thought of, and P. A. C. leaders want to be in a strong position for bargaining when convention time rolls around.

In spite of the threat of a "grass-roots storm" that would shake the A. F. of L. "to its very foundation," the state federation's Non-Partisan Committee decided after a blistering session to make no commitments. The Republicans professed to see in this a victory, since it was the first time in twenty years that the committee had failed to plump for the Democratic candidate for Governor. The Democrats were less publicly but probably more genuinely pleased, because there is no doubt that the committee sentiment favored Dewey, and its published recommendations would have done Mead no good. Dewey's handling of the elevator strike pleased the federation people, many of whom are also favorably disposed toward Ives. Above all, they are not eager to jeopardize good relations with a state administration that they think all too likely to remain in office. It is noteworthy that when David Dubinsky introduced Mead to the Liberal Party convention, he sedulously avoided any mention of Dewey for fear of antagonizing his fellow-federationists. The A. F. of L. claims 1,300,000 members in the state, the C. I. O. 1,200,000.

Though the state federation has flirted with Dewey, there is no evidence that the coalition will suffer any serious loss on the trade-union front. Both Mead and Lehman are veteran friends of labor, and whatever the political maneuverings of the A. F. of L. leadership, they are counting on the bulk of the rank and file. Where defections threaten to be more serious is among the national and racial blocs.

HARLEM

Probably in no former Roosevelt stronghold are Democratic prospects now bleaker than they are in Harlem. Besides the general post-war letdown and dissatisfaction over food shortages which characterize the state as a whole, Harlem's citizens have a special category of complaints. Although one prominent Negro leader offered the opinion that Truman himself was even more forthright on the question of discrimination than Roosevelt, resentment over Southern influence in the Administration is widespread. More than one Harlemite asked me sardonically how a South Carolina politician could represent American democracy at the peace table, and none had confidence that a Texan Attorney General would break the case of the Georgia lynchings.

Harlem has nothing against Mead and Lehman, but no conviction in their favor either. On the other hand, its papers featured stories day after day on the Ives-Quinn law, which created the Fair Employment Practices Commission. The effects of the law have not as yet been far-reaching, and there is some criticism of the commission's personnel, but by and large it is logically regarded as a major advance, and it is hard to see how Ives can fail to carry the district.

Dewey

Memories in Harlem being no longer than in other Congressional districts of the country, Dewey, too, will cash in on the FEPC, although he scuttled the first anti-discrimination bill back in 1944, when he was lining up Southern delegates for the approaching Republican convention. Similarly credited to the Dewey administration is the redistricting act which in 1944 enabled Harlem's citizens for the first time to elect a Negro Congressman. Actually the redistricting, which helped the Democrats, had been blocked for years by Republican legislatures, but that will not be remembered in the strong Negro drift, which can be checked, I believe, only by intensive Democratic campaigning throughout the district with the aid of such local idols as Mrs. Roosevelt and Henry Wallace.

DEFECTIONS FROM OTHER BLOCS

Other racial and religious blocs in the state are not nearly so solid as the Negro vote, but by and large they were for Roosevelt and now they are sharply divided. A sector of the Irish population is affected by Farley's coolness to the Mead-Lehman ticket, remembering all too well his truculent statement of four years ago that Mead was "not fit to be Governor." This bloc might still be saved if New York's Mayor O'Dwyer were to take a more active role in the campaign. Some Democratic leaders blame O'Dwyer for failing to have made open war on Dewey last year, when the Governor's political fortunes were at an extremely low ebb following the Republican fiasco in the mayoralty campaign. A strong stand by O'Dwyer now, it is believed, might salvage thousands of votes in predominantly Irish districts of Brooklyn and Queens.

The Jewish vote, which became much more of a unit in support of the New Deal than it had ever been before, shows signs of returning to its normal state of division. To some extent disappointment with the Truman Administration over the issue of Zionism has intensified this trend. The Manhattan Zionist Region, meeting in convention a few weeks ago, accused the Democratic Party of failure to carry out its pledges but refrained from offering blanket support to the Republicans. While some ardent Zionists will undoubtedly vote for Dewey as a sign of protest and a warning for 1948, few Republicans are hopeful that the issue will break Lehman's normally firm hold on the Jewish vote.

The coalition ticket stands to gain from the absence of an Italian name on the Republican slate, but this will probably be offset by dissatisfaction among the more religious of the Poles and Slavs over changes that the peace has brought to Eastern and Central Europe—as though that were Truman's fault, much less Mead's. A more solid gain for the Democrats in the way of a bloc vote is seen in the indignation of veterans over Dewey's thoroughly bad record on emergency housing. This sentiment among the veterans is further directed toward the Democrats by the presence on the coalition ticket of Erastus Corning, 2d, who interrupted his term as mayor of Albany to serve as a private in the army. Corning is running for Lieutenant Governor.

DEWEY-IVES PROSPECTS

While Dewey is privately conceded by many Democrats to have the edge on Mead, there is no disposition to let down as the campaign goes into its most heated phase. The independent groups allied with the Democrats are particularly eager to hold the Dewey vote to a minimum. Should he win, the margin of his victory will be the measure of his chances at the next Republican Presidential convention. The G. O. P. has never yet given a second nomination to a defeated candidate, but 1944 was an abnormal year because of the war, and no party can afford to overlook a candidate who can deliver New York's forty-seven electoral votes.

A victory for Dewey, however, is by no means held to assure a victory for Ives or for the Republican ticket as a whole. Lehman is deeply respected throughout the state and has an unparalleled record as a vote-getter, occasionally encroaching even on conservative Republican circles. On the other hand, Irving M. Ives, in spite of a good record in Albany, is comparatively unknown. He is making full use of the Wallace episode to embarrass Lehman, but the issue appears to be a bit too intellectual to lend itself to popular campaigning.

CONGRESSIONAL CONTESTS

In the state's Congressional delegation the Republicans have hopes of making inroads, but no extensive shift is looked for. The probable Dewey-Ives victory in Harlem might normally be expected to cost the seat of Representative Adam Clayton Powell, especially since his Republican opponent, Grant Reynolds, served in the army as a Negro chaplain, is a capable spellbinder, and has been indorsed by Joe Louis. Reynolds may well win, but the most reliable estimate is that Powell will be returned. He starts out with the 15,000 members of his church, the largest Protestant congregation in the country, and has the advantage of an intrenched personal machine. Intelligent opinion in Harlem puts both candidates down as demagogues but appears to rate Powell as the abler of the two.

The seat of Democrat George F. Rogers in Rochester's Fortieth District is gravely in doubt, having been won two years ago by 1 per cent. In the Bronx Boss Flynn's cavalier attitude toward the independent parties has resulted in four-candidate races throughout the borough, and while the split will reduce the Democratic vote appreciably, there is small reason to assume that the Republicans will abandon their ignoble role of permanent minority party in that sector, content to feed on crumbs from the Flynn table as reward for only token opposition at the polls.

The extremely conservative Frederic R. Coudert, Jr., is all too likely to win the seat formerly held by Joe Baldwin, who went down in the Republican purge of liberals. The Seventeenth is as Republican as a Maine village, and Coudert is an odds-on favorite to beat his Democratic opponent, Myron Sulzberger. In Queens the death last Sunday of the Democratic candidate, William B. Barry, added more uncertainty to an already confused picture. The liberal and able Mark Starr is running on the Liberal Party ticket. Unfortunately, the A. L. P. has its own candidate, so that the independent vote is divided. It is not unlikely that with the Democratic substitute nomination deferred and the independents split the Republicans will be able to gain another seat. A three-way race in Manhattan's Twenty-first is even more likely to cost the Democrats a seat. In this contest the Republicans and Liberals are teamed in behalf of Jacob K. Javits, a Fusionist, with opposition from Eugene P. Connolly of the A. L. P. and Dan Flynn, a Tammany Democrat.

Perhaps the most curious and interesting fight in the state is in the Eighteenth, where Vito Marcantonio, who will run on any and all tickets, from Whig to Single Tax, faces the hardest contest of his checkered career. Having run as a Republican, Democrat, and American Laborite two years ago, Marcantonio again made a bid for all three nominations last summer. The A. L. P., of course, obliged, although Vito has been having his troubles in the inner circles of that party, but the Republicans would have none of him, and the Democrats nominated him by a scant 600 votes. During the primary the Republican and Democratic candidates operated out of the same office, and it is likely that many of the votes that went to Marcantonio's narrowly beaten Democratic opponent in the primary will be delivered to his Republican rival, Frederick Bryan, in November. Vito is an adept manipulator, however, and the cagiest opinion in the district is that he will find ways to induce the local Democratic bosses to stay with him and deliver the vote.

Meat on the table by November 5 and an intensive Democratic campaign in doubtful districts may make a material difference in prospects, but as matters stand New York's three-way coalition will do very well indeed to send Lehman to the Senate, hold on to all but one or two of its present twenty-three seats in the House, and keep Dewey's lead down to such modest proportions that the White House will fade from his dreams.

Rankin and the Republicans

BY IRVING M. ENGEL

IN GEORGIA a few weeks ago four people were ruthlessly shot to death in cold blood. One of the men had been arrested on a minor charge but released on bail. The other three—his wife and another married couple—were not accused of any crime. Their only offense was having been born black.

The wilful and brutal killing of four human beings, all unarmed, without the semblance of a legal proceeding, is as un-American an act as can be conceived. We have in the House of Representatives a Permanent Committee on Un-American Activities; yet that committee has taken no steps to investigate the Georgia lynchings.

The reason for this is not far to seek. The guiding spirit of the committee is John E. Rankin of Mississippi, who with the possible exception of his fellow-Mississippian, Senator Bilbo, has done more than any other man in public life today to condone, if not incite, the spirit of race prejudice and hatred that made possible the Georgia outrage. Rankin has not limited himself to attacks upon the Negroes; with equal venom he has spewed hatred on Jews, on aliens, on labor, and on any of his fellow-citizens who were liberal enough to disapprove of John E. Rankin. If intelligent, informed citizens throughout the country were asked to compile a list of the five most un-American individuals in public life today, John Rankin would undoubtedly appear on every list.

The question arises, how is it possible, when we have just finished a war to preserve democracy and are struggling to make a peace in which all mankind shall be free, that a man of the stripe of Rankin is placed by Congress in a position to pass judgment on the opinions, actions, and characters of his fellow-citizens and to persecute and intimidate those of whom he does not approve? The answer to this question is clear on the record. The responsibility for the creation and continued existence of the Wood-Rankin committee lies squarely on the shoulders of the Republican Party. The fact that in this they were abetted by the Southern reactionaries in the Democratic Party does not absolve the Republicans from responsibility.

For some six years or more, down to 1944, the Dies committee, under similar leadership, had been allowed, notwithstanding many protests, to ride roughshod over the rights and liberties of our people. This committee finally became so objectionable that in the fall of 1944 it was resoundingly repudiated. Dies very wisely declined to run for reelection; four of the remaining eight members of the committee were defeated. Decent citizens everywhere heaved a sigh of relief and assumed that the danger of a Congressional Gestapo was ended. However, they reckoned without John Rankin of Mississippi and his friend and ally, Joseph Martin of Massachusetts, the Republican leader in the House. These two men devised a clever scheme—and it worked.

On the opening day of the Seventy-ninth Congress, in January, 1945, a routine motion was made to continue in effect the rules of the previous session. To the surprise of most members of the House, Rankin moved that the rules be amended so as to provide for a Permanent Committee on Un-American Activities. This maneuver had two advantages: First, the motion to amend the rules had to be voted on immediately and could not be referred to a committee. Second, if the motion carried, the committee would be permanent, whereas the Dies committee was temporary and had to be renewed from year to year.

IRVING M. ENGEL is a New York lawyer, writer, and lecturer.

After a brief but bitter debate, the motion was carried by a vote of 207 to 186. This vote was as follows:

For the Rankin motion			Against the Rankin motion
Republicans		137	Republicans		34
Southern Democrats	63		Southern Democrats	44
Non-Southern Democrats	7	70	Non-Southern Democrats	106	150
		207	Minority Parties		2
					186

It will be seen that the Republicans voted more than four to one in support of the Rankin measure, while the Democrats voted more than two to one against it. The Democratic votes in favor of Rankin came almost entirely from the South.

The record of the Republican Representatives from New York is even worse:

	New York Republicans	New York Democrats
For the Rankin motion	15	0
Against the Rankin motion	3	21
Not voting	4	1
	22	22

The Republican Congressmen from New York voted five to one in support of Rankin. Of the three Republicans who had the integrity and courage to vote against him, two—Joseph C. Baldwin and Augustus C. Bennett—were denied renomination by their party leaders.

During most of the life of the Seventy-ninth Congress a petition was pending in the House to bring up a motion to abolish the Wood-Rankin committee. It is common knowledge that the principal reason why this petition did not obtain the required number of signatures was the firm position taken against it by Joseph Martin, the Republican leader.

In his present campaign for reelection Martin is running a close race with his Democratic opponent, Martha Sharp, an able and liberal young woman. His principal weapon in the campaign is the ridiculous charge that Mrs. Sharp is a Communist. The close tie between Martin and Rankin is revealed by the fact that after the campaign got under way the Rankin committee started an investigation of the Unitarian Service Committee and its overseas work. This was chiefly in the hope of finding material that could be used against Mrs. Sharp, who acted as agent for the Unitarian Service Committee abroad in 1940 and again in 1945.

For the relief work which she did in Portugal as agent for the Unitarian Service Committee Mrs. Sharp was decorated by the Portuguese government, which is Catholic and strongly conservative. This alone is sufficient to refute the charge that she is a Communist.

We have here the remarkable spectacle of a committee, headed by a Democrat and professedly seeking to expose un-American activities, itself engaged in the un-American activity of assisting one candidate—who happens to be a Republican—in disseminating false charges against his opponent during a campaign.

Governor Dewey, running for reelection, makes frequent attacks on Bilbo and Bilboism. As recently as September 20 he declared in an address that New York has no place for "the tar brush, the lyncher's rope, and the Klansman's sheet for which Bilbo stands," and that "every real New Yorker is determined that the blight of bigotry shall not turn back the clock." But in all his speeches on this subject Dewey has carefully refrained from mentioning Rankin. The reason is obvious. If he attacked Rankin he would be faced with the embarrassing necessity of explaining away the record of his party in Congress on that subject. In the past few weeks Dewey has been repeatedly urged to take a position against the committee, but he has met these appeals with a stony silence.

John E. Rankin

Mr. Dewey claims that his party has taken over from the Democrats the mantle of liberalism. Republican leaders are constantly charging the Democrats with endangering, if not destroying, our fundamental rights and liberties. These charges must be viewed in the light of the actions of the Republicans with reference to Rankin.

The Republicans cannot escape responsibility by pointing to the fact that Rankin is a Democrat. While the Mississippian nominally wears the Democratic label, an examination of his voting record for the past few years will show that he and the majority of Republicans in the House have consistently voted together. Whether the Republican Party has gone Rankin or Rankin has gone Republican is another question.

To Joseph Martin and the other short-visioned men who, unhappily, control the Republican Party today, it may have seemed clever politics in the midst of the war to clothe the reckless and irresponsible Rankin with the authority of Congress and to send him out on his wild and headlong career of disunity. However, in the long run poor Americanism can never be good politics. If the facts are brought home to the American people they will administer a well-deserved rebuke to the Republican leaders who placed supposed partisan advantage above our fundamental liberties.

The People's Front

IT IS safe to predict that on October 24 the Chilean Parliament will confirm the election of Gabriel Gonzalez Videla, candidate of the Radical Party, as President of the republic. Technically, of course, the Parliament is free to choose either Gonzalez Videla or his opponent, the Conservative leader, Cruz Coke; the constitution provides that when no Presidential nominee has obtained an absolute majority, Congress shall decide between the two leading contestants. If the Chilean legislators should favor Cruz Coke over the leader of the left, no one could accuse them of violating the law. But they would be violating the most elementary rules of political common sense. Such an action could only lead to an uprising that would probably result in victory for the masses, followed, after a few weeks, by a military coup à la Perón. Realizing this danger, the deputies of the Liberal Party, whose candidate ran third, have swung their support to Gonzalez Videla. Evidently they recognized that his 50,000-vote plurality expressed not only numbers but the determination of the workers to advance the democratic evolution of Chile.

The task which faces the new President is a challenge to him and to his party. The Radicals have held the Presidency for the last eight years, with Pedro Aguirre Cerda (1939-1942) and Juan Antonio Rios, who died in office last June. Both men tried hard but failed to achieve any real political or economic gains for Chile; although elected by the popular democratic forces, they were compelled to make one concession after another to the right in order to keep power.

I know Gabriel Gonzalez Videla very well. I saw him in one of those moments which take the measure of a man. When the war broke out, he was Chilean Ambassador to France. The French police, already riddled with fascists, many of them in high posts, neglected the ubiquitous Nazi agents and busied themselves rounding up Spanish Republicans and thrusting them into concentration camps. One day I was ordered to leave Paris and establish residence at least twenty-five miles from the capital; the police did this on the thin pretext of shielding me against a Phalangist attack. I told the Chilean Ambassador that I had to go. Without hesitation he answered: "Not unless you want to. You can come and live at the legation with me." At such a moment this took great courage. When Vichy came to power in 1940, he continued to defend the Spanish Republicans in France with the same zeal. Last month, on the day after the Chilean elections, it was rumored that the right would try to steal his victory; within twenty-four hours he had called a mass demonstration of all the left organizations in Santiago to defend the mandate of the people. Evidently he is still the bold fighter I knew in France.

Gonzalez Videla plans to form a representative Cabinet composed of members of the Radical Party, the Communist Party, the wing of the Socialist Party that supported him, and the Liberal Party and Falange, which opposed him. (Incidentally, the Chilean Falange has no connection with the Spanish fascist organization and has decided to change its name in order to avoid any confusion.) In the coming months we shall probably read a great deal about the "Communist dictatorship" in Chile. If we don't, it will be about the first time that a progressive President south of the Rio Grande has had a good press in the United States; usually the accolades are reserved for the Vargases and other "strong men" of the right. Lázaro Cárdenas, whose Presidency of Mexico was perhaps the most extraordinary event in Latin America since Bolívar, passed before the eyes of the American people rather in the unpopular role of a destroyer of "legitimate" foreign interests than as the great social reformer he was.

Latin America cannot even hope that the more progressive section of the American press will counteract the propaganda of the big news chains. With the exception of The Nation and a very few other publications, American liberals do not seem to care what is happening in the rest of the hemisphere. Day after day columnists and radio commentators describe outrages against democracy in Europe and Asia. But what about the Dominican Republic, where the most revolting dictatorship rules?

In Latin America one of the most significant social struggles in history is taking place; to the dramatic conflict between classes now in progress throughout the world there is added the clash of races, of white and Indian populations. Few people here seem to know that the outcome of this fight in the southern continent will create within the next ten years enormous political problems for the United States.

It is in this difficult period, when Latin America is threatened by Perón's aggressive fascism and torn by internal strife, that Gonzalez Videla takes leadership in Chile. He has the enthusiasm and youthful energy to succeed. His foreign policy is liberal and anti-nationalist. It is an interesting indication of his views that he has already proposed a plan for an over-all American citizenship which would apply equally to the nationals of every American republic. In the U. N. he will favor a strong democratic policy. His domestic program is progressive though not fully developed. Chile faces many economic difficulties, arising largely from itsheavydependence on foreign investments, particularly in copper and nitrates. Even more than most other Latin American countries, Chile is tied to Wall Street. The results are an impoverished proletariat, side by side with a very small group of wealthy families living like the grandees of two centuries ago, and a state of political instability constantly stimulated by a famine of foreign currency. The only way out in Chile, as in many other Latin American republics, is economic planning aimed at freeing the country from the domination of foreign capital. Gonzalez Videla should create a six-year plan for Chile to secure his independence of action during his term of office. The test will be his ability to improve the condition of the country sufficiently to resist the inevitable pressure of the right supported by financial interests abroad.

Postscript on Paris

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, October 16

MR. MOLOTOV had the last word in Paris. Waiting until after the valedictory speech from Mr. Bevin, who commended the conference for having "satisfactorily" accomplished its task of reviewing the five draft treaties and sending them back, with its recommendations, to the Council of Foreign Ministers, the Foreign Secretary of the U. S. S. R. treated the twenty-one nations to a homily in terms as harsh as those of an official party rebuke to deviationists. The conference had been unsatisfactory: efforts had been made to introduce "anti-democratic" clauses into the treaties; "remote" nations such as the British Dominions, India, and Ethiopia had been coerced by dollar-sterling diplomacy into opposing Russian proposals in relation to a Continent in which they had little or no legitimate interest; and certain of the Big Four had been guilty of abandoning some of their previous decisions. Here Mr. Molotov was clearly referring to the significant abstention on the part of Britain and the Dominions in the voting on the article in the Bulgarian treaty defining the frontier with Greece. The Big Four had previously agreed that the frontier should be that of January, 1941; and the Russians were quick to suspect that the British were going back on this decision in order to support at a later date all manner of revisionist claims by Greek monarchists. Bulgaria's interests, Molotov added, would be safeguarded by Russia. In fact, he would make it his business, when the Big Four came to the final drafting of the treaties, to insure that the "incorrect voting" in which the twenty-one nations had indulged would not affect their ultimate terms.

Unless the crossing of the ocean leads to a change of heart as well as sky, Mr. Molotov's attitude bids fair to produce a renewed deadlock when the Council of Foreign Ministers meets in New York. The ministers will, indeed, have to take up their task almost precisely where they left it at the end of their meeting in advance of the Paris conference. On the major issues which were then left open—the "freedom" of the Danube and the status of the Free Territory of Trieste—the Paris debates have done less than nothing to produce a spirit of accommodation: they have merely sharpened the Russian sense of being opposed by an Anglo-American bloc whose satellites extend from China to Peru. The concluding plenary sessions of the conference served merely for a restatement of all the old arguments and for a demonstration that when it came to counting heads the Anglo-American bloc outnumbered the Russian. The resolutions in favor of "equal opportunity" in the Danube valley and of the Anglo-American plan—modified only slightly by the adopted French compromise—for a regime in Trieste in which the governor would have overriding veto powers, and which is described bitterly by the Russians and Yugoslavs as "colonial," were carried by the two-thirds' majority needed to insure that they will receive serious consideration by the Council of Foreign Ministers; but Mr. Molotov has made it plain that though he may be prepared to "consider," he is in no mood readily to agree.

Argument as to rights and wrongs has little point. It may be held that the Russian thesis that commerce and navigation on the Danube should be the exclusive concern of the riparian states is a monstrous affirmation of the principle of closed economies, repugnant to liberal opinion as a system likely to impoverish rather than enrich the world. The reply of the Slav bloc is that in present circumstances "equal opportunity" in the Danube valley means that the economically weak Balkan countries would have no protection against infiltration by rapacious Anglo-American capitalism and the buying up of their key industries by foreign investors, to the detriment of the interests of their people. Equally, it may be argued that when the spokesmen of the Slav bloc contended that the constitution of Trieste should provide for a sovereign assembly and the limitation of the powers of the governor and the Security Council to insuring that the territory's statute was not openly violated, they were proposing a "democratic" solution. The British and American answer is that the democratic machinery envisaged by Mr. Molotov and Mr. Kardelj would be calculated to lead to an immediate vote for the incorporation of Trieste in Yugoslavia, and that the interests of the Triestini can be safeguarded only by keeping the popular assembly in leading strings held by the governor, with armed forces supplied by the Security Council at his call.

Pointing to the apparent British desire to champion monarchist Greece against Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, and Albania, to ostentatious American tenderness toward Hungary and Finland in the matter of reparations, and to the obvious reluctance of the Western bloc to withdraw their troops from the disputable no man's land of Trieste, the Russians have done their best at the conference to pose as the protectors of the new "economic democracies" sprung from liberation. The majorities recorded against them in the plenary sessions' voting scarcely support the view that they have made good their claim outside the ranks of their clique of states. They will clearly make further efforts, both when the Big Four meet to draft the treaties and at the session of the Assembly of the United Nations. The British may expect harsh words from Mr. Molotov about the retention of British divisions in Greece and the Cabinet's decision, announced in Parliament this week, to go on paying for the arming and maintenance of the Royalist Greek army until March, 1947. The United States, as well as Britain, is likely to be arraigned by the Russians for its silver dealing with Franco Spain and for its reluctance—which the British government undoubtedly shares—to take any part in imposing an economic embargo against the Caudillo. He is an optimist indeed who looks to see the diplomatic exchanges of the next few weeks—and these, be it noted, will also be concerned with the future of the Dardanelles—making for greater big-power willingness to compromise in the drafting of the five treaties which the Paris conference has reviewed.

Beyond these treaties, moreover, lies the much more important and intractable problem of Germany. The view of a growing number of Labor M. P.'s, which I give for what it is worth, is that the fusion of the British and American zones of occupation has already proved to be a disaster. It seems likely to lead, if it is not already leading, to the rebuilding of western Germany's economy by the importation of American capital and the preservation of the great combines which nurtured Hitler's war machine—not indeed, under their old ownership, but in British and American hands—instead of along the Socialist lines acceptable to the Labor movement here. Every day that this process of rehabilitating Germany on capitalist lines continues, the chances diminish of any quadripartite solution for the future of Germany as a whole. It is idle for Field Marshal Smuts to express the hope that before another meeting of the twenty-one nations a veto will be placed on "ideologies." The clash between the American conception of the future of "democracy"—indorsed it would seem, by the British Labor government—and the Russian conception cannot be smoothed over by phrases. It is real, and it seems likely to bedevil Europe.

Big Business in Japan

BY HAROLD STRAUSS

WHEN the Civil Information and Education Section of SCAP (Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers) got to work in Japan a year ago, one of the great unknowns was the political temper of the people. Despite the strenuous efforts of various army agencies, the available evidence was contradictory and inconclusive. Some officers expected the potential strength of radical movements to be considerable, while others thought that the leaders had been silenced, jailed, and cut off from contact with the people too long to have much influence. As for the business men, especially those just below the zaibatsu level who had suffered from monopolistic constraints, the old Japan hands among us smugly assumed that they would be our natural allies in setting up a "democratic" free-enterprise society.

What we first encountered was a frantic, ruthless scramble for food and shelter, an individualistic spirit of sauve qui peut in which no political organization could flourish. Political programs and politicians of all brands were treated with contempt and distrust bred by years of cynical dishonesty on the part of the Japanese government. But MacArthur was required by the directives of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to force political consciousness on the Japanese people. (Incidentally, the original directives were extremely liberal and were administered faithfully and vigorously until May, when occupation policies were engulfed by international tensions.) MacArthur met this requirement by heaping responsibilities, especially responsibility for internal economic policy, upon the interim Japanese government, and then encouraging popular criticism of that government. Full civil liberties were restored. Trade unions were nursed along. Radical leaders and intellectuals just released from jail were given radio time and encouraged to revive suppressed publications. By purging the paper-allocation committees, manipulating motion-picture scripts, and controlling radio programs we were able to exert a progressive influence on public opinion. We were even prepared to refrain from opposing a popular movement to overthrow the government.

HAROLD STRAUSS, chief editor of Alfred A. Knopf, spent a year in Tokyo as a captain on MacArthur's staff attached to the Civil Information and Education Division. Two other articles by him on occupation problems in Japan will appear in coming issues.

In order to check on the effects of these measures, the C. I. and E. set up a sizable agency called the Media Analysis Division to report on the political overtones of the press, radio, and movies. Those of us who were connected with this division had an exceptionally good view of the crystallization of the new political forces in Japan. They were not in the least what we expected.

The Socialist and Communist leaders were swept up by the desperate physical needs of the people, and their efforts were diverted from broad social reforms to short-term welfare projects. The worst that the Military Police had to refrain from opposing was a few food riots. The party machinery of the once fairly numerous Social Democrats had been completely destroyed, and it could not be rebuilt on the abstractions of socialism. The intellectuals on whom we had counted to revive such vigorous progressive publications as Kaizo and Chuo Koron fizzled out lamentably. They vilified the Shidehara government vigorously enough, as everyone did, but advanced only the most timid practical program.

Their timidity had many causes, including the fact that they confronted, not a modern industrial society, but a semi-feudal agricultural society with industrial trimmings. Their strongest immediate inhibition, however, came from their inability to believe that Socialist reforms would be tolerated by the greatest remaining exponent of free enterprise. Yet they could see that many measures being enforced by MacArthur were of a progressive nature—some would say willy-nilly—and all through the winter and spring they wrestled mightily to resolve this paradox. Democracy was the key word. The United States stood for democracy. The Japanese learn things by rote, and they had been taught that democracy and capitalism were historically associated. How did socialism fit in? In hundreds of articles they strained and tortured their wits to provide an answer.

Some who claimed to be Socialists tried to prove that there was no real difference between free enterprise and socialism; some said that America was really Socialist and didn't know it. One humorless pedant blamed the paradox on the inexactness of American terminology, suggesting that just as the First Cavalry Division, then conspicuous in Tokyo, had no horses, so capitalist America was socializing its economic life because modern technology needs a mass base. Other writers advanced the Russian interpretation of democracy, or presented the concept of the welfare state. But all this was merely an intellectual exercise, for the conservative business men and bankers, free of such inhibitions, had stolen the principal plank in the Socialist platform and were shouting mightily for the nationalization of basic industry.

This maneuver by big business caused great surprise and, I must admit, some consternation in the Media Analysis Division. In assembling our list of publications for continuous surveillance and analysis we had carefully included a group roughly corresponding to the Wall Street Journal. Some of these were the forthright mouthpieces of banking or commercial interests. Some, not so forthright, we knew to be still surreptitiously financed by the zaibatsu. One particularly interesting magazine had a pipe line to the Ministry of Finance and efficiently tipped off speculators to impending fiscal moves. We opposed attempts to purge such publications, because it seemed better to have them out in the open than underground.

In January we noticed that these publications, with a coordination too perfect to be accidental, began a campaign for a planned economy and the nationalization of basic industries. Sometimes they evinced merely a resigned acceptance of the drift toward socialism, but more often they used a tone of positive advocacy. To cite only a few of the available examples, Jitsugyo no Nippon said: "Rehabilitation through capitalist policy cannot be expected. Only through state control of finance and production is rehabilitation possible." From Daiamondo: "Large-scale industry is essential to Japan's future economy, and with the liquidation of the trusts, that is possible only under nationalization." Again from Daiamondo: "It is no easy matter to restore production in an unsettled society with a limited supply of raw materials. Liberalism and free competition cannot solve such problems, for the competition for perpetually inadequate natural resources will be ruinous. A planned economy is necessary." From Nippon Keizai Shimpo: "Few financiers and industrialists believe nowadays in the old capitalist creed. Even in the United States not a few employers are advocating a revised capitalism. On the one hand, capitalism is undergoing a modification; on the other, socialism as advocated in Western countries does not deny a role to financiers and industrialists."

Keizai Mainichi carried the theme into politics, urging the Liberal Party to drop its out-of-date creed of economic liberalism—that is, free competition. Jitsugyo no Nippon praised the Progressive Party, generally regarded as the most conservative, for neither opposing a planned economy nor insisting upon free enterprise. On several occasions writers borrowed a theme from the left wing and expressed their grave fear that Japan could not make the necessary progress toward socialism while under the guardianship of the United States. In almost any issue of these publications the name of some corporation chairman or banker would be signed to a piece which declared, "Of course socialistic policies are necessary to save Japan today."

By spring the campaign took on new and astonishing forms. A director of a large public-utility company applauded "the tendency of labor groups to assume management of factories." The reason for this extraordinary view, also adopted by other industrialists, was somewhat clarified by Daiamondo: "If labor unions strive only for higher wages and the improvement of working conditions, Japanese industry will be paralyzed and in no position to compete for world markets. But if labor shares in policy-making, it will also have to share in responsibility for maintaining labor costs at a competitive level." But perhaps the most impressive contribution to the campaign was a seven-instalment, closely reasoned and brilliantly written analysis of socialism and its necessity in Japan by Itaro Miura, septuagenarian publisher and editor emeritus of Toyo Keizai Shimpo. Incidentally, the Media Analysis report on this series was withheld from its usual circulation to Allied missions in Tokyo, presumably on the ground that the Russians might learn something about socialism from it. The furor that the series caused, coming as it did from a man who had long been brother and servant to the tycoons, can only be compared to what would happen here if Henry Hazlitt suddenly took up the cudgels for socialism in America.

What lay behind this campaign? Of course I am not suggesting for a moment that all the reactionaries of Japan had suddenly turned Socialist. Nowadays fascists as well as Socialists are accomplished at nationalizing the means of production, but the movement lacked other fascist characteristics. In my opinion it was the counsel of despair, unconsciously shaped by the peculiar instincts of feudal collectivism which are never far below the surface in Japan and consciously motivated by a desire to be bailed out of a catastrophic economic situation. It was something like the rush of American business to the New Deal in early 1933.

Japanese big business had no plans ready for the eventuality of defeat. When the surrender came, those owners, managers, and superintendents in a position to do so plundered their own companies. They hid valuable machinery in mountain caves and removed supplies and inventories to their private storehouses for future peddling on the black market. Almost all Japanese, rich and poor, had been taught to believe that we would loot and bolshevize the country, and tried to get the jump on us. In many cases little remained of industrial enterprises but the bombed-out shells of factories and their equally shaky financial structures. Most businesses and all banks in Japan are bankrupt in every practical sense. War production, in which almost every firm had participated, was financed by government-guaranteed loans from private banks. Since these loans greatly exceeded the resources of the private banks, they had to be rediscounted at the Bank of Japan. In general, the debts of corporations to banks stand at about 150 per cent of their total assets. Since the government has been forbidden to honor its war-time guaranties, the corporations can only go into bankruptcy, manipulate their way out through uncontrolled inflation (also opposed by SCAP), or submit to nationalization. But under normal bankruptcy proceedings the owners of equities in both companies and banks would be wiped out, and the physical assets would pass to the Bank of Japan. This would be equivalent to nationalization without compensation—and needless to say, the idea of "just compensation" underlies all arguments for nationalization.

A second motive was the hope that the physical entities of large industrial enterprises could be held together by the government against the twin Allied pressures for liquidation of the cartels and for reparations. The dispersal of the cartels among small owners would be fatal to heavy industry. And the Japanese, like the Austrians, seem to believe that nationally owned industries will be better able to resist reparations claims. In this, big business is joined by the Socialists, for both pin their hopes on the retention of large-scale industry and the eventual recapture of export markets.

The last tangible motive was the conviction, frequently expressed, that private industry could not possibly compete freely for raw materials in an economy lacking in natural resources and certain to have its imports restricted for a long time to come. With monopolistic rigging to keep down the cost of raw materials no longer possible and with wages booming thanks to intensive unionization, public ownership seemed the only answer.

But there were also intangible motives. As I have said, collectivist solutions are never very far from the Japanese mind. More sinister, there was some evidence that the industrial bigwigs were not at all reluctant to let their property pass to the government since they hoped to control that government again when the Americans with their foolish insistence on democracy were gone. They remembered that they had succeeded in circumventing all the liberal provisions of the Meiji constitution, and they hoped to do no less for the MacArthur constitution.

In June, however, the Japanese capitalists abruptly changed their minds. They were quick to perceive that under the pressure of international events, notably U. S.-U. S. S. R. tension, the whole temper and tone of the occupation was changing. The softening of the American attitude toward the Japanese economy is a story in itself and must be told separately. The effect of this softening upon the Japanese was that big business had no further need for the counsels of despair. It is now opposing a nationalization program.

Price Decontrol and After

UNLIKE many of my friends, I believe that the President chose the best of several bad possible policies when he decontrolled meat and announced that the already existing program of relaxing controls would be accelerated. I do not, of course, share the simple-minded view that when prices are once again determined by supply and demand, so far as private monopolies permit, our economic troubles will be cured. But I do think that there is nothing so bad as a law which cannot be enforced.

Even during the war, when they were strongly supported by public sentiment, government efforts to stabilize the economy and secure a fair distribution of a limited supply of civilian goods were not too successful; both Canada and Britain developed far more effective programs. And with the end of the war Washington put up but a feeble resistance to demands for business as usual. Even before V-J Day many of the important controls which served to check hoarding were abolished, and with the end of the fighting there was a precipitate rush to abolish rationing. These actions were the fault of the Administration, but the biggest responsibility for the breakdown of price control belongs to Congress, which ignored repeated warnings last spring that by delaying action on the renewal of the OPA's powers it was inevitably encouraging producers to hold goods off the market.

The meat famine last June was the most dramatic example of withholding, and its perpetrators were richly rewarded when Congress at the last possible minute passed a price-control bill that the President very properly vetoed. The subsequent price holiday really marked the end of effective stabilization, for the second bill, passed at the end of July and reluctantly signed by Mr. Truman, was an abortion which commanded neither public respect nor public cooperation. It left the hands of the OPA tied in many cases; it discriminated unfairly between different types of goods; it introduced an absurd division of authority; it encouraged an exodus of trained OPA personnel and so disrupted administration of the law. Lacking vitality and threatened with death when the next Congress convened, it inevitably led to a new bout of hoarding.

When stock raisers and packers started their sitdown strike last month, the government was helpless. It had no power to compel the cattle men to send their beasts to market or to force the packers to buy at prices which, they alleged, would involve them in losses. It is all very well to talk of requisitioning steers, but even if the President's war-emergency powers could have been stretched to cover such an operation, the organization of a grand round-up of the Western ranges would have needed months of preparation and an army of federal agents.

With the elimination of ceilings and the discarding of the wage-stabilization machinery, will our economy set off on an inflationary bender? Personally, I doubt it; in fact, it would surprise me if the cost of living rose as much in the next four months as it has in the last four since OPA was hamstrung. What we are likely to get is some wild fluctuations, with prices of different commodities moving in different directions. The immediate response to Mr. Truman's decontrol move was a fantastic jump in livestock prices which, if held, would almost restrict meat-eating to millionaires. But the simultaneous rush of hogs and steers to the markets indicated that such prices could hardly be sustained. At the same time there was a significant break in grains, particularly corn. With the evacuation of overflowing feed lots and pigpens, now that the livestock interests have won their gamble, the demand for corn, which is in abundant supply, is likely to be curtailed to an extent that will reduce its price far below recent quotations. And in the long run corn and meat prices tend to move in the same direction.

Another significant development was the sharp fall in cotton quotations on October 16. Raw cotton, of course, has long been free from any restrictions and has been rising steadily for months, thanks to an unprecedented demand and an unusually short crop. Textile manufactures have been under ceilings, but there has been steady and successful pressure to force them upward. Thus the situation of both the raw material and the end-products has been such as to encourage speculative hoarding. Now it is anticipated that textiles will be among the early candidates for decontrol, and insiders have begun to wonder whether that may not loose a flood of products on the market just at the moment when consumers, having satisfied their most urgent needs, are showing signs of diminishing eagerness to buy.

The textile industry is not the only line of business in which decontrol may bring on the market a sufficient volume of goods to prevent prices from rising very much, if at all. Recently attention has been drawn to the increasing rate of inventory accumulation. The dollar value of all stocks held by manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers is now more than twice as great as in 1939, and, it has been suggested, we may be in for the kind of inventory inflation that produced the 1937 depression. Taking into account the rise in prices and the much greater turnover now as compared to 1939, the inventory total does not seem unduly large, provided that sales to consumers are maintained on the present scale. However, should a sharp increase in prices be met by increased sales resistance, there might very easily develop a rush to dump inventories which represent withholdings for a higher price rather than legitimate trade needs.

In this event it is probable that retailers and wholesalers would cancel orders wherever possible, while manufacturers cut production and pay rolls. That could start the deflationary ball rolling, and once it does start it is likely to gather momentum, for then we shall find consumers holding back in the expectation of filling their needs more cheaply by exercising patience. Many good authorities believe that this is the immediate danger confronting us and predict that by the middle of 1947 we shall have a collapse in commodity markets and seven to eight million unemployed. If they are right the problem to be solved is how to get over the inflationary crest without too precipitate a descent on the other side.

KEITH HUTCHISON

In One Ear

BY LOU FRANKEL

WHAT box-office sales are to the theater, Hooperatings are to radio—a gauge of popularity. Since my mail shows that people will jealously defend their own taste in programs against the taste of the average listener, a brief survey of popularity ratings may be useful in enabling readers to criticize the mass taste intelligently and at the same time appraise their own likes and dislikes. Always remember that program quality will be improved only by listening and then criticizing, not by criticizing without listening.

Network Hooperatings have been compiled since 1934 and are published fortnightly. They are based on coincidental telephone queries in thirty-three major cities in which the four major networks have stations. Since network programs set the pace for both quantity and quality, it is necessary for the output of them all to be available if the conclusions drawn from the answers are to be valid. Geographical, numerical, and educational differentials are allowed for, in accordance with standard research procedure.

In the interest of brevity, the data presented below will be based primarily on evening, sponsored programs—more people listen at night and most of the evening programs are sponsored. Each Hooperating covers about 150 commercial programs, which are graded for popularity from as low as 1.2 to highs of 20 and 30. Ratings are compiled in quarter-hour periods and show the comparative appeal of every sponsored program broadcast during that period.

To facilitate a tabular presentation I have divided all programs into seven categories—dramatic, variety, quiz, news and comment, popular music, concert music, and miscellaneous. The first table shows the relative popularity of each category over the years 1944, 1945, and 1946 to date. It is interesting to note that the figures in the third column, even though the season of peak listening is still to come, confirm previous popularity trends. At the end of the war, news, as was to be expected, fell off badly. Concert music came up.

POPULARITY RATING OF PROGRAM TYPES

	1944	1945	1946
Variety	12.6	10.6	10.1
Quiz	10.6	10.4	.9.4
Dramatic	9.7	9.5	8.6
Popular Music	7.0	7.3	7.6
News and Comment	6.2	6.6	5.4
Concert Music	5.8	5.3	5.6
Miscellaneous	5.5	5.7	4.9

The figures in the following table show what percentage of all programs is available in each of the seven categories.

AVAILABILITY PERCENTAGES BY TYPE

	1944	1945	1946
Dramatic	25.4	29.1	34.2
Variety	18.9	21.0	18.8
Popular Music	17.8	15.0	15.3
News and Comment	16.3	13.9	11.9
Miscellaneous	8.4	7.1	5.8
Quiz	7.4	7.5	7.6
Concert Music	5.8	6.4	6.4

If you compare this table with the preceding one, you will see that the sponsors are buying the programs that audiences prefer. Notice how, as interest in news lagged, the sponsors also shied away from news and comment. Dramatic programs take first place because a hit dramatic idea will get high ratings and does not cost so much as a variety show; there are usually three or four dramatic shows among the first fifteen in the program popularity ratings. When a variety show clicks, it rates higher, but it is more of a gamble and more expensive. Quiz shows cost less to produce but are even more difficult to make jell.

Clearly, the four types of program at the top of each chart are the prime fare of both listener and sponsor. Talk and discussion programs, excellent as they may be, are not sponsored and do not rate; high-class musical programs show a slight upward trend.

Here, then, are the preferences of radio's mass audience. To what extent do they coincide with your own?

WORTH HEARING

COLUMBIA WORKSHOP (CBS, Saturdays). First and still best of the experimental dramatic programs. Was tarnished for a while, but the gleam of quality is coming through again.

MR. DISTRICT ATTORNEY (NBC, Wednesdays). One of the good mystery "drammers" of radio; especially good when it packs a public-service message.

BATTLE OF THE COMMENTATORS (MBS, Wednesdays). Cecil Brown and Merryle S. Rukeyser give a top current event the verbal once over. Stimulating.

GANGBUSTERS (ABC, Saturdays). One of radio's first thrillers and still a favorite. For a taste of what makes radio run, tune in.

DID YOU HEAR?

FRED ALLEN (NBC, Sundays) give commercial radio a going over to the tune of Gilbert and Sullivan's "Mikado"? Superb radio, priceless satire, and expert humor. If you missed it, a note to NBC may get a repeat performance.

The Nation editors have been gratified at the enthusiastic response to the first columns of Lou Frankel. The fan mail has been heavy. Some letters have raised interesting questions that Mr. Frankel will answer either on the letter page or in future columns. We want to make this column as useful as possible to our "listening audience." Write and tell us what you think of In One Ear and suggest topics you would like to have discussed.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Graves's Own Christ

KING JESUS. By Robert Graves. Creative Age Press. $3.

THIS book should have the excellent effect of forcing the poetic intelligence on the attention of the seminaries. Mr. Graves proposes what amounts to a heresy. He does so not through official channels, so to speak, but by means of a "work of art," confronting the Christian imagination directly with the best that a remarkable modern mind can devise to trouble it. This had remained to be done. With hostile present philosophies the church has coped well enough to give its apologists a rather contented air; they have taken small account of the claims of poetry because poetry as an improved religion has persisted in catacombs of its own. Mr. Graves now emerges, courting whatever persecution he can get for the honor of his brethren—all those to whom poetic intuition and intelligence are the highest grounds of belief.

If there were lions to face—or the stake—would Mr. Graves face them? I am inclined to think so. This may indicate how he differs from George Moore, to make the obvious comparison. "The Brook Kerith" is a smooth work of writing (or rather, I believe, of dictation) but scarcely more a challenge to Christianity than the weaker work of Renan. Moore practiced his art, and incidental irony, for its own sake, for pleasure. "King Jesus" is more formidable. What controls the point in this book is a hand neither light nor grave but muscular, intense but ambiguous, arrogant and bland. The unchristened Welsh visionary in the grandson of von Ranke, Robert Graves has a strong regimental quality; I would not put death for poetry beyond him. And he is "original." As one sensible critic has remarked, Graves's "Claudius" books are simply immortal, in the way "Gulliver's Travels" is immortal, steeped in the ultimate literary dye.

The world is so far from obviously conforming to any of the Christian postulates that a true poet, if he deals with them at all, faces great trials of honesty and taste. Unless the spirit descend to startle him, converting the incredible to the assured, he cannot even write as a Christian; but even if he does, his agony amid paradoxes will not soon come to an end. Eliot's poems, profoundly resigned to that agony, are evidence enough of this. At best there is little to choose—and little power of choice in any case—between "what can be done" with faith and without it; and in our time it is not the poetry of faith that excels. The point that I am getting at is that it should be possible for a Christian—but particularly a Christian writer—to find Graves's perfectly un-Christian "explanation" of Christ's life more fascinating than any he ever heard.

The explanation has all the authority of Graves's curious learning. He suggests this himself in his Commentary (not altogether happily, I think, in that he seems to trade for a moment on his reputation as Imperial historian for the Augustan Age). The learning is not only classical, as heretofore, but rabbinical and anthropological as well. Going on the hypothesis that the Roman governor of Judaea must have had a Roman, administrative reason for placarding Jesus as "King of the Jews," and arguing that as a legalist any Roman governor would have been most impressed by considerations of title, Mr. Graves has concluded that Jesus was actually the legitimate heir to the throne of Herod.

It is a theory of great ingenuity, and it is Mr. Graves's own. In support of it he quotes, as one epigraph of the book, Talmudic passages of the second or third century in which Jesus is referred to as "of the wicked land of Edom" and "near to the kingdom." King Herod the Great grew up as an Edomite (of Esau's tribe); Mr. Graves sees his singularly bloody reign as the effort of a lifetime to restore to Edom the birthright lost to Jacob, at the same time restoring to the Jews the worship of Set, the Egyptian sun god, represented in Jewish tradition as Seth, Adam's son. This is all neat enough. Monarchs everywhere in those ages created or remodeled the institutions of religion, and certainly the Jewish kings after Moses were not above adding to the Law. Herod, swayed by his religious madness, might have had such designs as Mr. Graves ascribes to him. He might, too, have murdered his eldest son, Antipater, whose mother was the Edomite, Dora, to fulfil an ancient ritual prescription that the king should sacrifice his heir—as Abraham consented to do for Jehovah.

The cultist survival in Palestine, even under strict Jewish law, of ancient Egyptian and Canaanite religion is one of Mr. Graves's assumptions. Jesus's mother, Miriam, was herself born "under the old dispensation," as the High Priest, Simeon, calls it—conceived by her mother at the Feast of Tabernacles, which was still a fertility festival in the cult of the Great Mother Goddess of the Mediterranean peoples, whose worship had always required ritual prostitution. Graves represents Miriam and the noble Prince Antipater secretly married by the High Priest, who wishes thus to unite the royal line of David and the royal Herodian house. Simeon thinks that their child, born at the close of the fourth millennium, might well be the Messiah awaited by Israel.

I find a good deal of austere charm in the story of Miriam's sojourn with her cousin Elizabeth, her faintness when she hears the report that Antipater's life is threatened by his father, her marriage after his death to the kind old man chosen for her by Simeon, and the birth at Bethlehem at the winter solstice when the tribesmen of that region believed that not only the sun but time stood still. Graves endows the child Jesus in Egypt with a prodigy's powers of mind and will and more than a prodigy's command of the supernatural. These powers are understood, however, as attributes of supreme royalty: of the sacred kingship with which Jesus is to be anointed (christos). In Graves's version Jesus's godhead is never by himself or others conceived as equivalent to Jehovah's; it is, rather, similar to the divinity of Dionysos or of the Babylonian Tammuz. He is not the Word incarnate, for Mr. Graves rejects "the late and propagandist" Gospel of St. John, but an incarnation, in the historical, intellectual, and ascetic man, of mythical attributes and destinies: a sage, a poet, a "wonder worker," and a magnificent immortal spirit whose perfection has but one flaw, a flaw fatal to his Messiahship.

Jesus's mission, as he understands it, is to destroy, on Jehovah's behalf, "the power of the Female," that is, of the Great Goddess who is "mother, bride, and layer-out to fallen man." He conquers Anger, Fear, and Lust in his forty days of trial in the wilderness, conquers the Goddess's priestess, Mary Magdalen, in her underground House of Spirals, and when he takes as his queen the third Mary, Lazarus's sister, he maintains his chastity, denying her a child. But his inflexibility is his undoing, for he must then restore Mary's dead brother to her by pronouncing aloud the Holy Name of God, and for this he knows the penalty: he must lay down his life for his friend. Jesus fails, therefore, because he is wrong in believing that the Female's time is done. His defeat makes him a sharer not only in human death—which he seeks, aware of its necessity—but, it is powerfully implied, in the whole mystery of human destiny and effort.

With this skeletal theme the gospel according to Mr. Graves is enacted in a Holy Land to which we have never been before (just as his Rome was an unsuspected city)—a vexing province of fanatics to the cynical Romans, a mountainous garden to the people, God's footstool to the seers and scrupulous expounders of the Law. Those who believe in Jesus's kingship and witness his ritual laming and anointing in a grove of the terebinth oak are Kenite tribesmen, nomads, inheritors of the older faith of Mesopotamia and Canaan, which is compatible also with the religious wisdom of the Essenes, in whose monastery Jesus has prepared for his mission. There are brilliant passages of exposition on Old Testament texts, on astronomical lore and linguistic and symbolic magic—the wisdom of which Jesus is portrayed as a divine master. Besides all this, most but by no means all of the New Testament incidents and sayings are given new meanings in Mr. Graves's context. It is a triumph of perverse plausibility to have made Judas the intelligent disciple whom Jesus commands to betray him; only in this case it is the "late and propagandist" gospel of St. John—elsewhere disavowed—that Graves follows in reporting the incident.

At this point criticism can perhaps begin by noting that the logic pursued by Mr. Graves in his gospel is a "poetic" logic—that is, a rationale of accepting what is consistent with a certain effect and rejecting what is not consistent with it. I hope I have acknowledged sufficiently that the effect achieved in "King Jesus" is quite a wonderful one; and I hope, too, that in speaking of poetic "effect" generally I convey no disrespect, for I understand by it all the validity a poem can have. What is so intensely interesting here is that a mind convinced of that validity and of no other, trusting, that is, to the odd personal vision as best arrived at and therefore hostile by its very nature to the claim of public validity made for Christian truth, should seriously propose an esoteric alternative to Christianity as more satisfying to human intelligence and should at the same time affront the intelligence when necessary, demonstrating time after time the palpable distortions his faith compels him to practice on the simplest matters of record.

Mr. Graves has written this book, as usual, with the pen of a contemporary, an Alexandrian scholar named "Agabus the Decapolitan," and this is a shield for Mr. Graves, since an unknown quantity of his statements about Christ and the Christians can be laid to Agabus's limitations of sympathy and information—or rather to his dismissal of such limitations as actually exist in favor of hypothesis presented as fact. Mr. Graves constructed his account of the relationship between Jesus, Jehovah, and the Great Goddess largely on the basis of recent archaeological studies in Palestine. The known facts are fragmentary and the subject of cautious monographs. It appears that some details of some Jewish observances resembled the prior rites of the heathen—for example, booths of greenery at the Feast of Tabernacles recalled the Mesopotamian and Canaanite fertility festivals. With such data to go on, Graves's imagination, traversing the historical darkness like lightning from horizon to horizon, created a religious Israel all his own.

The lay reader may leave to the seminarists the task of examining this book in detail, but two examples may be noted as typical of Mr. Graves's method. In each case Agabus the Decapolitan is speaking in his capacity as a kind of intelligence officer to undeceive posterity.

"In a somewhat obscene passage in the book of the Prophet Ezekiel is to be found Jehovah's bill of divorcement against his two partner-Goddesses, who are there named Aholah and Aholibah." In Ezekiel, Chapter 23, these names are expressly given to Samaria and Jerusalem, and have nothing to do with goddesses; the passage concerns Jehovah's displeasure with the behavior of Israelite communities.

CONGRESS AT THE CROSSROADS

by DR. GEORGE B. GALLOWAY

Staff Director, Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress

THOMAS Y. CROWELL COMPANY

432 FOURTH AVE. • NEW YORK 16

"His [Jesus's] usual preface was the twice-repeated Hebrew word Amen, which literally means 'He was firm' and which he used in the sense of 'Jehovah has firmly declared.' The Gentile Christians, wishing to exalt Jesus into a God, translate the irksome Amen merely as 'Verily.' . . ." For all its assurance this is perfectly wild. Not only was there a Hebrew adverb, Amen, meaning "so be it" or "surely," but in the Gospels Jesus invariably followed it by attributing to Himself, not Jehovah, what He was going to say with the words "I say to you."

When the intelligence report is submerged in the narrative, Mr. Graves writes with suavity and beauty, and it is certainly true that he has, as he says, great respect for Jesus. But in passages like those I have quoted there is not only inaccuracy but, as they multiply, a certain anti-Christian pettishness or uneasiness that all Mr. Graves's powers cannot quite dispel. It is, I think, only a consciousness on his part that although the Christ of the church simply won't do for him, his Christ really won't do for anyone. Orthodox Catholics, he concedes, "can afford to disregard my story as irrelevant to their faith; Catholicism is an incontrovertibly logical system of thought, once it is granted that many of the events mentioned in the Gospels transcend human understanding and must therefore be taken on faith"—a premise he says he rejects. But the absurdity of this position must be clear to him, for his Jesus brings Lazarus back to life and himself survives death, and the comparatively minor miracles reported in the Gospels transcend human understanding not more but less than some of the purely magical events Graves has substituted for them. He has, in effect, rejected the infinitely abstract mysticism of St. John's Gospel in favor of a mysticism concerned with oak trees—fragrant to the imagination but theologically not in the same class. BRIEFER COMMENT

A Plan to Bell the Cat

AN INTELLIGENT CONSERVATIVE'S PROGRAM for full employment and capacity production is offered by Harold Loeb in "Full Production Without War" (Princeton, $3.50). Mr. Loeb, author of the "Chart of Plenty" and the "National Survey of Potential Product Capacity," set out to see how the potentialities revealed by his investigations could be translated into actualities. In the process he acquired an enormous respect for the price economy, without, however, losing faith in his goal. He came to the conclusion that planning and the restoration of free competition were alike impossible, and that the only hope was to make the existing system of monopolistic competition produce full employment and abundance. This book tells why and how. It is closely reasoned, and deserves careful study by both progressives and conservatives. It is therefore a great pity that it is not more readable. There are far too many repetitions, involved sentences, pedantic phrases—Ph.D. jargon.

Mr. Loeb's argument starts from the fact that efficiency is constantly increasing. This makes possible increased wealth, which might be "released" by lower prices or higher wages, but in the main is not and can't be. Instead, it gives us unemployment and depression. The cure is the creation and distribution of new money. But if the spending of this is left to "private agencies," too much of it will go to increasing plant and equipment ("excess capital formation") and too little to consumer goods. Hence the necessity for a broad, "non-competitive" public-works program, taxes to prevent excess capital formation, and a steadily rising minimum wage, with a minimum family income of $4,000 as the goal. This is ingenious, coherent, and logical—though keeping the works program "non-competitive" might present unsuspected difficulties. But would "free enterprise" accept it? That is a question Mr. Loeb seems hardly to have thought of. Yet it is crucial. EUGENE FORSEY

Race and the Church

BUELL G. GALLAGHER, professor of Christian ethics at the Pacific School of Religion, candidly acknowledges the moral bankruptcy of the Christian church so far as its attitude to the non-Caucasian races is concerned in "Color and Conscience" (Harper, $2.50). For when Bilbo declared, without being repudiated by the church, that the white man was the custodian of the gospel of Jesus Christ, he did not know or rather preferred not to remember (a) that St. Paul fundamentally opposed any division of Christianity along racial lines, (b) that until the seventh century a considerable percentage of Christians were colored people, including some of the greatest Christian theologians, and (c) that the identification of Christianity with the Caucasian peoples, an obvious deviation from Christian principles, merely afforded a cheap excuse for bringing the black heathen "under the gracious civilizing influences of the Christian faith—to save his soul by buying his body, thereby profiting the master in this world and the slave in the next."

The author warns that the colored peoples, all over the globe, outnumbering the whites two to one, are fed up with white imperialism and world domination, and he demands for them full social and political freedom now: "A peace built on white supremacy is the guarantee of tomorrow's global war on race lines." A first step in the direction of progress would be the abandonment of the fundamental confusion between supremacy and superiority: "The first is an undeniable fact of the present world; the second is an invention of the mind to defend the first." Church and school should stress that while differences between individuals exist, there is no such thing as superior and inferior races.

Turning to the American scene, the professor insists that equality of opportunity without social equality, which more liberal-minded whites are willing to grant the American Negro, and the meeker ones among the colored people are ready to accept, would not solve the problem. The caste system must be utterly destroyed: "The real significance of color caste lies not in color, but in caste. With caste removed, color ceases to have irrational overtones attached to it." Even Bilbo's slightly more liberal colleague from Mississippi, Senator Eastland, would be shocked by the author's quite logical demand that all taboos be removed from intermarriage between colored people and whites.

A church without Christian ethics is dead, the professor exclaims, and in this ardent and sincere appeal to Christian conscience he urges clergy to abandon the dangerous identification with white supremacy which he regards as a serious internal threat to the church itself. One deplores that in this otherwise comprehensive study the economic undercurrent behind the cry for white supremacy is not emphasized. It is less ignorance than racial egotism that makes men like Bilbo and Eastland, as well as their ilk abroad, stubbornly cling to the folly of racialism. It is the old fallacy of post hoc, ergo propter hoc. Professor Ashley Montague recently suggested that the theory of racism was precipitated by the slaveholders' necessity to prove the inferiority of the slaves in order to ward off the dangerous arguments of the Abolitionists. Hitler admitted to Rauschning that he knew in the scientific sense there was no such thing as race, but that he needed that precarious concept to further his plans. Professor Gallagher should remember that the church will fight against color bias efficiently only from the moment it prefers to be the spokesman for all those that labor and are heavy laden rather than to be a tool of the rich.

An Analogical Empiricist

WILLIAM JAMES WROTE in his Hibbert Lectures: "Let empiricism once become associated with religion, as hitherto, through some strange misunderstanding, it has become associated with irreligion, and I believe that a new era of religion as well as of philosophy will be ready to begin." So spoke the prophet, and one wonders why the naturalists have not had to sweat as much blood in explaining it away as the Catholics in making palatable the Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani. Perhaps the answer lies in James's cautious, equivocal, un-Kierkegaardian approach to the whole question, which has not satisfied the orthodox either inside or outside the fold.

In "Religion of a Scientist" (Pantheon, $3.50) Dr. Lowrie of Princeton, Kierkegaard's translator, has undertaken to introduce the work of James's chief source of inspiration in religious matters, Gustav Theodor Fechner. In the preface to the one other book of Fechner's available in English, "The Little Book of Life After Death," James speaks of him as "a philosopher in the great sense of the term . . . one of those multitudinously organized crossroads of truth." In this day of specialization, of the great and the "smelly little" orthodoxies, Fechner will appeal to most readers as a charming curiosity, a dealer in probabilities and the cosmological quien sabe. Psychologists may remember him as the founder of experimental methods in psychology and the notion of the "threshold"; physicists may have heard of his theory of psycho-physics, or botanists of his work on the soul life of plants, later elaborated by Francé; but very few will think of this immense scientific labor as only the groundwork for a new natural theology. Like Goethe, despite his inductive precision, he relied chiefly on reasoning from analogy: Goethe called it "graciously disposing one to belief." And as in Goethe also, there are overtones of Spinoza, Plato, and a Leibnizian optimism. An autumn haze of mid-nineteenth-century confidence mellows all of Fechner and makes him a strange cross between Emerson and William James. The materialism of the time was cruder and easier to combat than our modern materialisms; the faith-for-faith's-sake argument seemed more innocent than it does now.

Dr. Lowrie had an almost hopeless task in attempting to distil the essence out of Fechner's fifty-one published works, which range from minute discussions of plant mores to poetic rhapsodies and pseudo-medical lampoons on such subjects as A Proof That the Moon Is Made of Iodine. The book leaves you unsatisfied—and a little bewildered—which is what the editor seemed to intend. I found his commentary lively and interesting. R. W. FLINT

FICTION IN REVIEW

FOR some reason the wonderful central idea of Kenneth Fearing's "The Big Clock" (Harcourt, Brace, $2.50) calls to mind an otherwise unmemorable novel, "The Chinese Room," which could boast a character who experimented on his own mind by writing himself anonymous letters. In Mr. Fearing's anti-detective story—since we always know whodunit, Mr. Fearing's book can scarcely be called a mystery—the basic notion is even more beguiling. Here a young man is appointed to supervise a hunt for himself, though he knows that to discover himself means death. Unfortunately, the resolution of this dilemma is not equal to its invention: the conclusion of Mr. Fearing's novel is as fortuitous as the arrival of the marines in an old movie thriller. But we cannot have everything, even in books whose only purpose is entertainment, and despite the letdown of its ending, "The Big Clock" is one of the pleasantest suspense stories to appear in a long time. And this is not a matter only of its central device. There is also its light-fingered but telling satire of the intellectual high jinks that go on high in the offices of Crimeways, where the hero is employed. Of the several novelists who have had their fun with a certain fabulous magazine empire, Mr. Fearing is the most intelligent and economical.

Disappointment is an inadequate word to describe the chief emotion with which anyone who enjoyed Christine Weston's "Indigo" will read her new novel, "The Dark Wood" (Scribner's, $2.75). Mrs. Weston's book has several threads of narrative. First, it is the story of a young war widow who refuses to believe that her husband is dead until she meets another man with an uncanny resemblance to him. Second, it is the story of this resembler, a veteran who has returned from the war to find that his wife no longer loves him. Third, it is the story of the resembler's wife and her attempts to get a divorce so that she can marry her noncombatant lover. But neither separately nor in their interweaving do any of these threads guide us to whatever Mrs. Weston had in mind when she conceived her novel—except that one comes to suspect she was probably trying to say something healthy about readjustment to post-war situations. The very dense "wood, which by no path was marked" through which Mrs. Weston's characters wander is equally uncharted for her readers.

In T. H. White's "Mistress Masham's Repose" (G. P. Putnam's Sons, $2.75) a little orphan girl of ten who is being reared by a cruel governess and a wicked vicar discovers an island inhabited by the descendants of Swift's Lilliputians. Her guardians want to capture the tiny creatures for a circus, but with the help of a benevolent cook and an eccentric scholar the little girl outwits these exploiters. This is one of those books—on which the English seem to have a corner—designed for children of all ages. But also in the way of such English fantasies, "Mistress Masham's Repose" is far better than it sounds in outline. It is literate, graceful, and malicious, not merely whimsical, altogether a really charming contrivance. DIANA TRILLING

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

EUGENE O'NEILL'S first play in twelve years is "The Iceman Cometh," now current at the Martin Beck Theater. The performance starts at 5:30 in the afternoon and runs, with a short intermission for dinner, until the conventional 11 p. m. Probably not more than half of the theatergoing public gives more than reluctant consent to the accepted proposition that O'Neill is first among American playwrights, but most of the members of even that reluctant half go grumbling to the appointed playhouse at the appointed unaccustomed hour. If Mr. O'Neill has so much as the normal human love of power, then the spectacle presented must in itself be sweet. No other American dramatist would dare ask what he asks. In all the world only he and Shaw can give what amounts to command performances and have the command obeyed. Before the curtain went up on the first night, tickets had been sold many weeks ahead, and even the grumblers will fight for the privilege of being allowed to grumble.

In the daily press the old irreconcilable differences of opinion were again spread out at full length. In one evening paper the bewildered reader might learn from the reviewer of the published text that "The Iceman Cometh" is a ponderous, incompetent bore and on an adjoining page find the drama critic expressing the opinion that it is, on the contrary, one of the indisputable masterpieces of modern writing for the stage. Precisely this difference of opinion just as sharply expressed has, moreover, been the prevailing rule since the days, now some three decades removed, when Mr. O'Neill's earliest pieces were being performed at the Provincetown Playhouse. And it is a significant fact which I have never seen noted that no one ever thinks of him as merely a pretty good playwright or maintains that he is, let us say, the second- or third-best American writer for the stage. By common and this time enthusiastic consent, he is either the first or the twenty-fifth, either great or contemptible. And though this, of course, does not prove that either the one judgment or the other is sound, it remains nevertheless a point in his favor. Even the very worst judges seldom confuse the excellent with the pretty good, and genius is almost never mistaken for mediocrity, though it is, often enough, denounced as incompetence.

The new play will not change anyone's opinion. Twelve years may have set Mr. O'Neill a little more firmly in his ways, may have made him even less concerned than before to placate any spectator whose expectations are not those which he is able to fulfil, but "The Iceman Cometh" might have been produced in 1934 instead of 1946 for any observable difference between it and its predecessors in theme, or mood, or technique. Here, in the back room of a saloon below which no lower depth exists, a group of broken men await the coming of a traveling salesman who has promised them a share in one of his periodical drunks. Presently he appears, strangely transformed, to announce that he has saved himself and that he is prepared to save them. They must stop putting off until tomorrow that first step on the road back which each has for so long been promising himself, and for a time it seems that the traveling salesman is some sort of Third-Floor-Back or Stranger-in-the-House. But presently it appears that the reform he has in mind is of no conventional kind. What he wants is that each should destroy in himself the last torturing hope, learn once for all that he cannot ever do what he has thought of doing, and then, like the traveling salesman himself, accept the freedom which comes when the last illusion is lost. How he himself has lost it is the dramatic secret not revealed until near the end, and it need not be told here, but among the group to whom he preaches only one, or possibly two, becomes his convert. The rest return to the bottle with whose help they can still delude themselves, and the moral seems to be that freedom from illusion is the freedom of death, that the man who has conquered the liar hope has conquered life also. Because the action takes place in a saloon, "The Iceman Cometh" has already been compared to Saroyan's "The Time of Your Life," and it has also, more reasonably, been compared to "The Lower Depths." But in theme at least the more meaningful parallel is with "The Wild Duck," where "the life illusion" is similarly presented as the shameful prop without which most men, at least, cannot stand.

Eddie Dowling, for the Theater Guild, has staged the play with great care, and though there is really no star, no virtuoso performance likely to entertain the spectator to whom the play is not in itself interesting, it is set forth with full competence and in a fashion which should make it impossible not to judge it on its own merits. How, then, can it be that the judgments are so wildly diverse; how can the work possibly seem to two reasonably competent people a masterpiece on the one hand, a monstrous imposture on the other? How can the whole corpus of the author's writing and his standing as a playwright be the subject of a similar dispute, if, indeed, two discourses which seem never to meet on any common ground can be called a dispute?

The only possible explanation seems to me to be an irreconcilable difference in standards and expectations, and it may as well be admitted that many of the things which have always been said about O'Neill's plays and which will be repeated about this one are true as far as they go. In certain senses of the term O'Neill is not a good writer. He has never learned, perhaps never cared to learn, the disarming ingenuity which enables many to make even a foolish story seem diverting, and taking himself with full seriousness, he has never attempted to disarm criticism by the mock-modest assumption that he is, after all, only a popular entertainer. He lacks wit in even the broadest sense of the term, and his dialogue, far from being poetic, is often heavy in a way that remotely suggests the heaviness of Dreiser. I said once and I am willing to repeat that for a man who possesses genius or something very much like it he is singularly devoid of that mere talent which Shakespeare, let us say, so abundantly possessed. For the sake of argument at least I will also admit that the nihilism of the present play was more modish twenty years ago than it is today and insist that the question of his intellectual profundity is not really relevant. If these admissions constitute an indictment from which there is no acquittal, then there is no more to be said. A dozen playwrights can write plays sparkling with all the virtues that O'Neill never remotely suggests. But a reputation even grudgingly granted has already, in thirty years, been somewhat tested by time, and it has survived the absence of almost every secondary support. The uniqueness of O'Neill's position testifies to the uniqueness of his quality. His somber power continues to assert itself and cannot be dismissed. What distinguishes him is not skill and it is not, primarily, intellect. What does set him apart is a depth of passionate sincerity, an intensity of emotional conviction, almost monumentally impressive. There is, in all probability, no other playwright to whom the plays which he writes mean so much—not in terms of fame or money or in terms of the legitimate joy of the artist in performing his function, but in terms of the feeling and the conviction which they express. Obviously to O'Neill the tragic sense of life is an overwhelming and ever present reality which envelops everything and beside which nothing else counts. And to the fact that he does, in spite of everything, manage to convey that tragic sense the grumbling presence of his detractors pays its tribute.

Films

JAMES AGEE

IT IS interesting to compare Marcel Pagnol's "The Well-Digger's Daughter" with the popular American film "To Each His Own." Both examine at some length the consequences of having an illegitimate child, and both, in their very different ways, are highly designed and artificial. But the American film, for all its polish as a production and in spite of a good many glints of secondary reality, struck me as one of the most false and unpleasant movies in years; whereas the French film, pitifully raw as a production—it was made during the German occupation—and showing its own fair quota of worse faults than that, has about it a very remarkable amount of truth and beauty.

"To Each His Own" is so little worth talking about that I will make few more comparisons: let it suffice that from the moment the girl knows she is pregnant she acts like the moral coward nearly everyone in Hollywood and in the audience requires her to be, and that every plot complication and tear jerk from there on proceeds from, and exploits, premises of cowardice, cynicism, and the rottenest kinds of sentimentality. In "The Well-Digger's Daughter" it never once occurs to the girl, or to her father, or to anyone else that she must avoid the consequences or be tricky about them, and most of the rest of the picture, proceeding from this simplicity, remains equally real and touching. There is a beautiful scene, for instance, in which the girl tries to tell her casual lover of her sadness in being no longer a virgin, of her sense of separation from her family. There is a very painful scene in which the workman brings his pregnant daughter—and her five younger sisters—before the parents of the young man; these parents, true to their shopkeepers' mentality, cannot conceive that he has come for anything but blackmail, and manage to infect the father with their own assumption that the girl is a promiscuous liar. And there is a wonderful scene in which these parents, who have just learned that their son has died in the war, first see and desire to help their grandchild. Such scenes as these are written and played with a gentle and pure feeling for outrightness and comedy which makes all that is most serious in them extremely unaffected and poignant. In later scenes, significantly, when the story goes questionable—with the son's unexpected return, and eagerness to marry the girl—the acting goes rocky too. Even the late Raimu, as the girl's father, an actor with matchless discretion, as a rule, about when to neutralize the sentimentality with something dry, hard, and practical, puts on an old-fashioned gagging smirk which must now cause his ghost one of the few blushes it ever need suffer. And the delightful clown Fernandel, who has been finely sympathetic as the second-string suitor, shoves his head in the window for the punch-line with all the quality that used to be got by making Buck Jones's horse flare his lip and cross his fore hoofs at the final clinch.

In at least half of this film, however, it is so happy to see people behaving like human beings in a basic, moving, difficult situation that I thoroughly understand and like what Archer Winsten means when he writes that such a film can be made only by the pure in heart. And mainly I agree. But to an extent even much that I like in this film, and in its whole French kind, makes me uneasy. I'm not too fond of the fondness for nature symbolism—the bread in "Harvest," or here, the contrast-collaboration between aviation and well-digging. But I could let that be. What bothers me more is that something goes a little fishy about the purity of attitude in which the people are seen—good and true as it is, essentially. This sense of honoring the basic needs and experiences and values, of delighting in the animal innocence of unspoiled people, is hard though I hope not impossible to have without some taint both of sophisticated patronage and of snobbish, pseudo-respectful sentimentality, and without depending upon and stimulating those attitudes, however obscurely, in the audience. At its queasiest the attitude seems to read: "We're all just more or less good animals—or anyhow they are, and how we like and envy them." It is more worldly wise and more genuinely humane, but it makes me think of the attitude of the nicer Southern people toward "darkies"; it even sets some faint bells blurring over in the Hitler corridor, where all such simplicities are, I gather, sincerely yet perversely venerated. I think there is much in these simplicities that requires our veneration, but that for people sophisticated enough to feel the veneration, there are many hidden traps.

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

THE Monte Carlo Ballet Russe, during its brief fall season at New York's City Center, presented a new ballet, "The Bells," which made one feel sorry for the dancers who had to make themselves ridiculous in it. Also, Balanchine's "Serenade" was restored to the repertory, but in a condition which indicated that it had not been rehearsed enough. Insufficient rehearsal of a company which included many new dancers was one of the things that made the performances of other works less brilliant than they had been; another was the injury that kept Danilova out of the performances—with consequences that would have been less serious if the management did not persist in operating without enough leading dancers. In addition there was the injury to Tallchief. And as though the company were not sufficiently unnerved by all these things, there was the loss of Balaban, who had provided the dancers with the secure musical foundation they needed, and his replacement by Boutnikoff, who made things difficult for them with tempos that were excessively fast or excessively slow when they were not erratic.

At the Metropolitan Opera House Mr. Hurok has presented a combination of (1) the De Basil Ballet Russe, (2) Markova and Dolin and their group taken from Ballet Theater, and (3) Eglevsky and Hightower. The De Basil repertory has been performed by the De Basil personnel; Markova has danced in "Pas de Quatre," "Giselle" (which I have not yet seen), and the new "Camille" with additional dancers from the De Basil company; Eglevsky and Hightower have danced classical pas de deux by themselves, and have contributed the "Bluebird" pas de deux to the De Basil "Aurora's Wedding." Since most of the De Basil repertory and personnel are poor the results have been rather unsatisfactory evenings—for example, an evening in which the crude performance of Stroganova in "Swan Lake" was followed by Lichine's "Cain and Abel," one of the worst ballets ever seen in New York, then by "Pas de Quatre," in which Markova and Hightower danced with Stroganova and another poor dancer, Morosova, and finally by the interminable hubbub of Massine's "Fantastic Symphony."

One of the slightly better evenings began with the hubbub of Lichine's "Francesca da Rimini"; then came Taras's "Camille," which I thought was much better than his "Graziana"—more individual and ingenious in invention—and which had a superb setting by Cecil Beaton and was beautifully performed; then the "Black Swan" pas de deux with Eglevsky and Hightower; and finally "Graduation Ball," which was badly horsed up, but which had the charming "Giselle and the Scotsman" episode, beautifully done by the company's most talented dancers, Stepanova and Tupine. They danced in "Les Sylphides" another night, and also in "Yara," which had good music by Mignone, beautiful settings by Portinari, and choreography by Psota that was delightful in the gay early scenes but boring when it got solemnly symbolic; and while the principals in "The Blue Danube" were not very good, the over-all effect was pleasant, largely because of the original setting and costumes that De Basil retained when Massine took "Le Beau Danube" away with him.

Ballet Theater lost Markova, but it retained Kaye and Alonso, who are highly accomplished dancers; it lost Eglevsky, but replaced him with Youskevitch, who is a more elegant classical dancer; it got back Laing for the Tudor ballets, and Tudor himself to rehearse them with the many new dancers. The result was a strong company which, in the more intimate Broadway Theater, has given precise, finished, and at times brilliant performances of Tudor's "Lilac Garden," "Pillar of Fire," and "Romeo and Juliet," De Mille's "Tally-Ho," Robbins's "Fancy Free," and other works of this kind that I care less for, such as "Robbins's "Interplay" and Kidd's "On Stage." There have been also, thus far, beautiful performances of "Swan Lake" with Kaye and Youskevitch, a hair-raisingly brilliant "Black Swan" pas de deux by the same dancers, and other lovely pas de deux by Alonso with Youskevitch and Kriza.

But Balanchine's two works have come out less well. In "Apollo" Alonso, Kaye, and Fallis have remained and have been excellent, but Youskevitch doesn't yet know his part well enough and hasn't danced it long enough to fill it out into the sustained flow that Eglevsky achieved. But even with this lessened effectiveness the work is still the glory of Ballet Theater's repertory, which the management might recognize by not always putting it first on the program, to be wrecked by late comers. And the management may be critized for not only putting "Waltz Academy" first every time but for treating it very shabbily otherwise: its subtleties and strokes of wit in dance terms require the utmost precision of execution to come off; but it has been given with many new dancers who have not been rehearsed sufficiently, with Fallis who is unable to do what Kaye used to do in her part, and with Alonso who dances in the wonderful pas de deux so languidly as to deprive it of the brilliance it used to have with Gollner and Hightower.

The new version of "Pas de Quatre" is charming, and was well-danced by the group headed by Alonso, whose own feats of quietly achieved point-balance were comparable with Markova's, but whose performance did not have the wit of Markova's. "Les Patineurs" has very bad music by Meyerbeer, an over-cluttered setting and rather ugly costumes by Beaton, and choreography by Ashton that is amusing for a while, but too slight for its length. And that is all I have seen so far.

P. S. I have seen Ballet Theater's new production of "Giselle," with settings and costumes by Eugene Berman, effectively revised choreography and staging, and performances by Alonso, Kaye, and Youssevitch that make it one of the most excitingly beautiful and powerfully dramatic pieces of "ballet theater" in recent years. Don't miss it.

Letters to the Editors

Conscription a Necessity?

Dear Sirs: A veteran whose memories of service life are by no means all pleasant, I nevertheless believe wholeheartedly that conscription is both a moral and a practical necessity for the difficult years to come. Current opposition to the bill seems to be based on two romantic fallacies: (a) that military training "maintains the war system" through fear, and degrades the religious and political fiber of the nation; and (b) that conscription inevitably entails an armament race and aggressive imperialism. These arguments are essentially the same as those of the pre-war utopian pacifists and isolationists, based on a negative fear of moral contamination rather than a candid appraisal of moral and physical resources. They tell us that instead of depending on the services to teach citizenship, we should inaugurate a "real" citizenship program in our educational system, ignoring the fact that military life is one of man's oldest and most effective educational systems. Nobody expects the army alone to make citizens, but it can be a step toward understanding of the meaning of community. . . .

There are frivolous arguments on both sides. Nobody wants conscription to create health or better citizens as if we were living in a political vacuum. It is necessary because, while we are what we are in a world not yet ready to forswear the arbitrary use of power for nationalist ends, we must keep our power within the moral control of a democratic process rather than leave it in the hands of a few professionals. . . .

It is time we stopped equating military life with its abuses; this war made it clear that the abuses arose chiefly from irresponsibility of command and the excessive privileges of command rather than from any more fundamental defect of democratic organization. There is no basic reason why peace-time military life should be any more degrading than, say, fraternity life in the colleges. . . .

Why must we be more purist in this field than in our economic life? Certainly, the ultimate end of an army is to fight, but the aim of any competitive activity is the destruction of its opponents. Freedom from fear must always be a relative thing; the plain fact of the present is incipient anarchy that can only be overcome by a gradual healing of moral and ideological wounds over a long period of time. A realistic policy recognizes that preparedness through limited conscription is a means to that end.

Conscription is, of course, only a temporary expedient and useful only while larger world military organizations are in the planning stage. Perhaps its greatest use will be as a link between

Dear Sirs: May I congratulate you on the new weekly radio page, which, I learn, is to be a regular feature of The Nation. In Lou Frankel you have one of the best-informed men in this field. He knows the subject of radio broadcasting, and, perhaps because his ideas coincide so closely with my own, I think his point of view is absolutely sound. Uphold's Rachmaninov

Dear Sirs: Whether one agrees or not with the commendations or strictures of your Records department conductor, there is no doubt of his seriousness about music. It is therefore the more provocative that in a recent article Mr. Haggin referred to the Second Concerto of Rachmaninov as "trashy." I am at a loss to understand how anyone who has heard this masterpiece rendered, either by Rachmaninov himself or another, can dismiss it so unqualifiedly. That it contains passages of frank sentiment does not, in my opinion, detract from its merit. Music is preeminently the voice of the soul and its deepest emotional claims, and it is understandable that Concerto No. 2 should have been used for its dramatically poignant content as background to a number of films. The earliest instance of this, I believe, was in "The Scoundrel," the Hecht-MacArthur picture starring Noel Coward. There is a depth and organic unity to this particular work of Rachmaninov which justifies its present vogue and which will undoubtedly catapult it to immortality.

Could it be that Mr. Haggin finds no echo in himself of the experience embodied in Rachmaninov's darkly beautiful piece? Could it be that mass popularity itself offends him? One final comment: if films can stimulate music appreciation in "those who are receiving their musical education from the films," should Mr. Haggin curl his lip?

The Shape of Things

IS MR. CHURCHILL JUST TRYING TO MAKE our flesh creep by his portentous remarks about the size of the Soviet army in Eastern Europe, or is he seriously implying that Russia is planning early physical aggression? Expressing alarm about the rapidity of British demobilization (a year ago he was chiding the Labor government for not releasing men fast enough), he alleged that the Soviets were maintaining 200 divisions on a war footing in European countries outside Russia and demanded confirmation or denial of his figures. When the government spokesman confessed inability to give exact numbers, Mr. Churchill charged "evasion" and asked for formal talks between government and opposition leaders—a step taken only in the event of a grave crisis. All this seems to us an unnecessary and provocative ringing of alarms at a moment when the first international necessity is a reduction in tension. It is known that there are large, too large, Russian forces in Eastern Europe, but Mr. Churchill's estimate of 2,500,000 to 3,000,000 seems way out of line. In an article in the New York Times of September 29, Hanson Baldwin put Russia's armed forces at about one-third of their peak war strength of twelve to fifteen million and estimated the total outside Soviet frontiers at "more than 1,500,000." This, however, included considerable numbers in Korea and Manchuria. Moreover, the Soviets appear to be reducing rather than increasing their armed strength. The 1946 budget for the U. S. S. R. cuts military expenditure to little more than half the 1945 total, and a new demobilization order—the fourth within the last six months—has just been announced. Most suggestive of all is accumulating evidence of a shortage of man-power in Russia's fields and factories, a shortage which endangers fulfilment of the Five-Year Plan and limits Russia's ability to fulfill Mr. Churchill's ominous predictions.

A STORM IN A GLASS OF RUSSIAN TEA WAS whipped up by the recent report that in the U. N. Atomic Commission Professor S. P. Alexandrov had made radical proposals for a worldwide survey of uranium resources "that even went beyond some phases of the United States control plan." The immediate response to this sensational report gave some indication of the eagerness of the American people to detect a change of heart in the Russians, who have consistently stood firm on the Gromyko plan for national as opposed to international control. It now appears that the Alexandrov "proposal" was wrenched from its context in the amicable and informal discussions which are being carried on in the private sessions of Committee 2. As far as we can learn, what the Soviet delegate was discussing was the problem raised by the differences between high-grade and low-grade ore and the relative availability of uranium that might depend upon the varying efficiency of extractive methods. As King Gordon pointed out in The Nation of October 19, the Atomic Energy Commission has made some headway by carrying on its discussions on the technical level with specific reference to the main phases of the control problem: (a) diversion of materials, (b) clandestine operations, (c) forcible seizure of installations. This is hardly the stage in negotiations when sensational "revelations," however well-intentioned, should be sought for. Political differences or concessions will doubtless emerge later. Meanwhile, let's give the commission a chance to reach what agreement is possible on the practical details of control.

FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS SEEKING CREDIT from the United States put themselves in a false position when they simultaneously applaud attacks on "dollar diplomacy." But the State Department became equally involved in contradictions when it expressed its resentment at such attacks by cancelling a loan previously offered to Czechoslovakia. This action, coupled as it was with inspired hints that only "friendly" countries could expect future aid, obviously seemed to confirm the charge that American wealth was being mobilized as a political weapon. Perhaps it was realization of this fact that caused Mr. Byrnes at his press conference on October 22 to deny he had adopted a policy of withholding financial aid from countries within the Russian sphere. American credit facilities, he said, were limited and would therefore be reserved for countries which were both needy and friendly. Contradicting the earlier State Department explanation, he added that cancellation of the Czech credit was due to the fact that need for it was less urgent than had originally been supposed. This statement seems to us to fall far short of a clear and constructive foreign-loan policy. What is required, we would suggest, is a declaration that all borrowers will be expected (a) to use credits in ways that will not damage American interests; (b) to adopt policies calculated to promote trade with the rest of the world and to facilitate eventual repayment; (c) to offer proof that their political systems are reasonably stable. Adoption of such criteria for credit applicants would be far better than attempting to divide sheep from goats on political lines and would be more in keeping with the spirit of the non-discriminatory economic program we are now championing at the preliminary International Trade Organization meeting in London.

O. JOHN ROGGE, SPECIAL ASSISTANT TO THE Attorney-General, has been dismissed from his post because he made known facts about the Nazi Fifth Column in the United States which he had gathered while on an official mission to Germany. Possibly Mr. Rogge was technically guilty of insubordination when he disclosed the contents of a report which Attorney-General Tom Clark has decided to suppress but his action was a public service. On the other hand, the Attorney General owes a full explanation of his conduct to his employers, the people of the United States. Why was he so anxious to wrap an iron curtain around a document which apparently includes much pertinent information about the ways in which the Nazis organized their propaganda in America and sought to influence the 1940 election? Was it because the report, on the basis of evidence gathered from Nazi files and officials, names some well-known American names including that of Senator Wheeler? And why did he refuse to allow Mr. Rogge to reopen the grand-jury investigation of Douglas M. Stewart and George T. Eggleston, publishers of Scribner's Commentator, after evidence had been found that their magazine was subsidized by the German government? Was he afraid of embarrassing the Reader's Digest which now employs Mr. Eggleston? These are questions which Mr. Clark must answer if he does not wish to forfeit the confidence of those whose legal interests he is supposed to safeguard.

MR. ERNEST BEVIN'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE House of Commons debate on foreign affairs took the form of a 109-minute global flight in the course of which he alighted briefly in almost every troubled area in the world. Unfortunately, his observations in the main were as superficial as those of most tourists; they neither added to what he had said on previous occasions nor inspired much hope that the problems touched on were approaching solution, with the possible exception of that of Indonesia. However, when he landed in Germany the British Foreign Secretary had something new and important to say. In regard to the future constitution of Germany, his ideas seem fairly close to those recently outlined by Secretary Byrnes. Both desire a federal set-up akin to that of the United States with a central government exercising certain reserved powers and the states retaining authority over all other matters. There is also Anglo-American harmony on the subject of the Potsdam Agreement and when Mr. Bevin said it must either be carried out as a whole or replaced by a new agreement, Mr. Byrnes surely murmured "Amen." But Mr. Bevin's proposals for the socialization of German heavy industry may well have caused perturbation in Washington. It is true that many American officials, possibly even Mr. Byrnes, are reluctantly beginning to recognize that the prerequisites of a viable free-enterprise system do not exist in Germany today. But very strong opposition is to be expected from American business men including the influential groups that have large investments in Germany. The United States, therefore, probably will not hurry to assist in the delivery of a new socialist economy; Russia, strange as it may seem, is not likely to be overly cooperative unless assured of more reparations; France continues to give priority to the question of divorcing the Ruhr from the Reich. Consequently, Mr. Bevin's plans can only be carried into effect if and when they are incorporated within a much wider agreement between the Big Four.

JOHN L. LEWIS HAS MADE WHAT MUST SEEM to him an extremely smart move in threatening to call his miners out on strike on November 1 if the government fails to reopen contract negotiations. By breaching the present contract on a technicality, he has obtained the jump on the C. I. O. in the inevitable scramble for higher wages started by the lifting of price control—which, incidentally, he advocated. He has blocked the expected return of the mines to their owners and forced President Truman into a difficult dilemma on the question of general labor policy. Doubtlessly most important of all, from his point of view, his action threatens to turn the tide against the Democrats in three key senatorial contests. He probably even views with satisfaction the likelihood that a coal strike would increase inflationary pressures by delaying full industrial production indefinitely. We have no sympathy for Lewis's tactics, and we should like nothing better than to see his unscrupulous maneuver fail. But we hope that the government will not be jockeyed by the anti-labor press into a position of resisting the miners' legitimate claims. The dispute involves the interpretation of two specific points in last summer's agreement: the assessment basis for the retirement fund and the scope of vacation pay. In both instances, the union has a case which merits examination.

Three Problems for Peacemakers

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE opening of the United Nations Assembly in its improvised quarters at Flushing Meadows was marked by a cordiality that seemed more than merely formal. Part of the credit for this should go to President Truman, whose friendly speech of welcome and warning was in encouraging contrast to the complacent remarks broadcast by Mr. Byrnes and Mr. Vandenberg on their return from the Paris conference a few days earlier. Mr. Truman made an urgent plea for a prompt settlement of the critical issues before the Assembly, insisting that the peoples of the world, exhausted by war and still oppressed by fear, would not be patient with delays and unnecessary wrangling. He acknowledged the existence of sharp differences among the Allied powers but emphasized the dangers in a division into geographical or ideological blocs, pointing out that the Council should be used "as a means for promoting settlement of disputes as well as for airing them" and that "the exercise of neither veto rights nor majority rights can make peace secure." In short, he asked for agreement.

If the temper displayed by the President were to dominate the meetings, we might hope that the Assembly would serve as an example to the Big Four and the Council, both of which will begin deliberations next week. Unfortunately, Mr. Truman's address was not the only keynote struck as the Assembly opened. In Brighton Mr. Attlee made a speech to the British Trades Union Congress, bristling with harsh comments on Soviet and Communist tactics and attitudes, which was surely as ill-conceived and ill-timed a bit of oratory as Mr. Churchill could have produced. Happily, its effect was dramatically altered next day when the T. U. C., by a four-to-one vote, repudiated the government's policy on Spain in a resolution calling for the severance of all economic and diplomatic relations with Franco; while a broad resolution criticizing the Attlee-Bevin foreign policy as a whole was defeated by only a three-to-two margin. Frederick Kuh, writing in PM, reported that the vote "was a shock to Bevin and his Cabinet colleagues," who did not expect "approximately 40 per cent of Britain's organized workers to express publicly their grave concern at the government's role in foreign affairs."

The Nation is happy to announce that, beginning next week, Vera Micheles Dean, Research Director of the Foreign Policy Association, will write a weekly eye-witness story of the proceedings of the United Nations General Assembly.

Mr. Bevin, Kuh said, would arrive in New York for the U. N. meetings "with his position in Britain seriously weakened."

Perhaps the action of the T. U. C. will speak louder than Mr. Attlee's words. It is hard to believe that the Bevin policy, so closely linked with that of Mr. Byrnes, will continue unchanged in the face of such formidable opposition in the labor movement of Great Britain—which forms, after all, the government's chief constituency. In any case, a test will soon come on the Spanish issue, raised by Trygve Lie in his outspoken report to the Assembly.

SPAIN

Mr. Lie's bold demand that the United Nations formulate a plan to help the "reestablishment of a democratic regime in Spain" went far beyond what is customary in an official report. Since the question of Spain is still technically on the agenda of the Council, the Assembly may discuss it but not make any recommendation to the Council. But Mr. Lie's move was not a casual or irresponsible one. The issue is stalemated in the Council and might stay there indefinitely unless the Assembly showed clearly its concern and desire for action. Mr. Lie's other obvious purpose was to indicate that the Assembly could give "comprehensive guidance" to the agencies and members of the U. N. in their relationship with the Franco regime: a clear recommendation that the Assembly put a stop to the vacillating policy of various agencies, including the World Court, regarding Franco Spain.

Whether the Council will relinquish the Spanish issue to the Assembly no one can yet say. The chief opposition has come from the Russians, who want to keep important matters in the hands of the Council, and who also suspect with good reason that the Assembly, under British-American pressure, might kill the issue or vote a watered-down resolution that could only strengthen Franco. It will take clear evidence that the Assembly really means business to induce the anti-Franco members of the Council to agree to drop Spain from the agenda. One can safely predict that some days will pass before things have crystallized and next moves have been decided upon; it may even be that the interested powers will deliberately delay action until after the American and French elections on November 5 and 10.

Meanwhile, Franco's representatives here and in Spain show signs of great perturbation. The hysterical statement put out by the embassy in Washington was without diplomatic precedent. For the official representative of this fascist state to charge the Secretary General of the United Nations with secret plotting and "unwarranted aggression" is an act of impudence which is certain to bring a sharp reaction against his government. But it is easy to understand the annoyance of Franco's friends. After the Council fiasco of last June they were justifiably unprepared for the vigorous irruption of the Spanish issue in the Assembly.

SOUTH AFRICA

But Spain is not the only controversy to invade the meetings at Flushing. The first battle in the General Committee occurred when Field Marshal Smuts asked to have India's complaint against South Africa removed from the agenda. It is easy to understand why the veteran South African leader wishes to block an airing of the long-standing grievances of Indian residents of South Africa, which culminated last summer in the passage of an act designed to segregate them in restricted areas. Public defense of such legislation will no doubt be embarrassing to Marshal Smuts, who would rather orate about liberty and justice as abstract ideals than discuss their application in his own bailiwick. What is worse, from his point of view, is that the sordid facts about South African racial policies, which any debate must reveal; are not likely to forward South Africa's desire to incorporate within its Union the mandated territory of Southwest Africa.

In the General Committee, Smuts argued that the Indian question should be taken off the agenda because Article 2, paragraph 7 of the Charter forbids interference by the U. N. in matters "essentially within the jurisdiction of a state." But the Charter also stresses the pledge of members to respect human rights and freedoms "without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion." And if that is not enough to permit the U. N. to investigate alleged violations of civil rights within a state, the Indian government also charges specific violations of treaties in which governments now incorporated within the Union of South Africa pledged full citizenship rights to Indians brought in to work in the sugar plantations. Finally, the dispute is of such a character as to "impair friendly relations among nations," for it has already led to a termination by India of trade relations with South Africa. This fact alone, it seems to us, compels the Assembly to debate the question and recommend action to the Security Council.

VETO

The other important issue precipitated in the Assembly was the perennial, all-but-insoluble issue of the veto. But, curiously, the controversy over this disputed item seems for the moment to have lost most of its acrimony. After some initial resistance Vishinsky withdrew his objection to an Assembly debate and by so doing joined his colleagues in the Council in a position which allows the smaller powers to air their various criticisms while at the same time safeguarding big-power control and the veto.

This does not mean that debate will be worthless. The veto may be, as the London Times says, "the inevitable corollary of a voting system on major issues in international affairs," but it has not accelerated action or produced unanimity. The trouble is, no practical alternative has so far been proposed, for the substitution of a simple majority rule is unthinkable in present circumstances. The best one can hope for is a more serious effort, or possibly an agreement, on the part of the big powers, to exercise restraint and adopt practices which will tend to bring about decisions without the necessity of a showdown. Such a change implies more private negotiation and less public demonstration. Open covenants arrived at with a certain degree of secrecy seem to offer the best present chance of agreement among the nations.

In any case, we can take it for granted that the veto will remain in force for the time being, no matter what the Assembly may say or do. One would almost think that Russia's delegates might for once lean back in their seats and let their Western allies do the talking, for this time at least they will not be left alone.

The Voters' Turn

ACCORDING to Senator Claude Pepper, the greatest danger to the Democratic Party in next week's election is "the sense of defeatism which the opposition has been able to instil in certain quarters through one of the shrewdest propaganda campaigns ever employed in American politics." The defeatism is there, all right, and if it is purely the synthetic product of Republican strategists, then they have indeed been shrewd beyond all expectations. But this analysis seems to us to credit them with far more ability than they have actually displayed and to blame the Democrats too little for the incompetence, timidity, and lack of imagination that have marked their own campaign.

On the basis of the reports we have printed in the survey of Pre-Election U. S. A., completed in this issue, we are admittedly none too hopeful, but it is not so much the prospective results that concern us as the depressingly low level on which the battle has been fought. In the year in which the peace, if any, is to be framed, practically no candidate has bothered to discuss foreign policy—unless hit-and-run jabs at Russia come under that heading. In this year of transition from war to peace, no candidate has seriously faced the intricate problems of inflation, of labor-management relations, or of how to prevent the most disastrous economic crash in our history. The Republicans have been too busy proving that their opponents are directed from Moscow and exploiting a hunger for meat among the best-fed electorate in the world. The Democrats have spent their energies denying a communism they had never embraced and badgering the Administration into scrapping controls for the sake of votes. In a world charged with atomic energy, a national campaign has been fought in the shadow of a meatball.

If the campaign has been craven and uninspired, it does not follow that the results will be unimportant. On at least three counts they will be as far-reaching as any in the country's history. First, a victory for the G. O. P. will be interpreted, by Democrats as well as by Republicans, as a popular mandate to scrap most of the New Deal. Second, a Republican Congress—or even a Republican House and a Democratic Senate—will mean a stalemated government for two years, during which the voice of the United States will be all but meaningless in the council of nations. Third, a number of key committee chairmanships will fall to reactionaries like Taft, Bridges, Taber and Knutson. And fourth, the way will be cleared, organizationally and psychologically, for a Republican Administration in 1948. The fate of liberal Republicans during the past year should leave no illusions as to what that development would mean. The purging of Charles La Follette, Robert La Follette, Joseph Clark Baldwin, and other liberal Republicans (plus the shocking campaigning of Wayne Morse, which Richard Neuberger touches on elsewhere in this issue) underscores the difference that exists between the two major parties—even if the Democrats have not covered themselves with glory in the campaign.

For the most part, we have concentrated our attention in these pages on those states that have the largest number of doubtful Congressional seats—Connecticut, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Ohio, California, and New York. There are numerous other contests of importance which we were unable to treat in such detail. Besides the election of senatorial nominees Tone, Guffey, Huffman, Rogers, and Lehman in the states named (Illinois has no senatorial contest this year), we hope for the return of Kilgore (West Virginia), Tunnell (Delaware), Briggs (Missouri), Murdock (Utah), Mitchell (Washington) and O'Mahoney (Wyoming) to the Senate and the election to that body of Erickson (Montana), Donart (Idaho), McMurray (Wisconsin), McGrath (Rhode Island), and Brunner (New Jersey). In addition to the liberal candidates for the House that have been discussed at some length in these pages, we want to put in a last-minute word for such consistent New Dealers as Traynor of Delaware, Hook of Michigan, Celler of New York, Murphy and Kelley of Pennsylvania, Forand of Rhode Island, Savage of Washington, and Biemiller of Wisconsin.

Like everyone else, we are unable to account for the remarkably high registration reported from industrial centers in all parts of the country. Since we will know within a week whether it represents a "resentment vote" or the tireless energy of such organizations as the P. A. C. and the League of Women Voters, there is no point in further speculation. But there is no question that it is democratically desirable to have that registration on the books. Whatever its inspiration, we hope it will be used to the limit. Now that the campaign orators are finished, it will be a relief to hear from the voters.

When the Birds Come Home to Roost

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, October 24

AS IF the fevers of the political campaign, defeatism over foreign policy, and soaring prices were not enough trouble for us all, top government economists have added a new disquieting item. They say that the accumulated facts point to an economic recession next spring or summer.

Both Democratic and Republican campaign orators have brushed aside this new problem. No one in Washington or outside has suggested what might be done to brace the country against the coming shock. The prospect is made darker by the possibility that the Republicans will gain control of the House. Any remedial legislation offered by the Administration would then have to run the gauntlet of such old-line conservatives as Representatives Taber, Wolcott, and Knutson, who in the event of a G. O. P. victory would control the powerful Appropriations, the Banking and Currency, and the Ways and Means Committee.

The professional economists of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, the Department of Commerce, and the OPA expect a few more months of inflation before the decline. They say, "We are just going into the last high wave now." They forecast rising food prices till late winter (according to the Department of Agriculture) or till summer (according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics) and then a downward trend. Clothing costs, they believe, will move up during the winter, but manufacturers and merchants will be forced to restore the moderate-price lines; higher-priced clothing is not selling well. They foresee general rent increases. The break in prices, they agree, will come in early or late spring.

There is disagreement on how severe the recession will be. The more optimistic economists regard it as a steadying economic factor which will bring a normal adjustment of prices. Others fear that many small businesses, retail, wholesale, and manufacturing, will be wiped out.

The OPA frankly admits that for some weeks prices will continue to go up. Paul Porter has said it will be impossible to "quarantine one segment of the economy against rising prices." By the end of the year, the OPA estimates, only 40 per cent of cost-of-living items will remain under control. Among them will be furniture, clothing, automobiles, building materials, metals, and rents. Increases will be granted in these fields.

Wage controls will be dropped, except in isolated cases. The Wage Stabilization Board, if it remains, will have only representatives of the public as members, and will arbitrate, not fix wages.

The economists mark the stages of inflation by the time when Congress virtuously removed excess-profits taxes; when John Snyder, then Reconversion Director, overruled Chester Bowles and granted steel a price increase of $4 a ton; when Congress allowed the two-month price holiday in July and August; and when holes were torn in the OPA bill finally signed by the President. Now they report a weakening of the four factors that entered into the inflationary pressure—namely, supply running far behind demand, production bottlenecks and low inventories, record high take-home wages, and record savings.

The Department of Commerce experts on inventories say that the period of bare shelves is coming to a close. Industry is beginning to accelerate production. Take-home pay has dropped alarmingly. Savings are being dissipated. A Federal Reserve Board study of liquid assets reveals that savings are unevenly distributed. People in the highest income bracket, who make up 3 per cent of the spending units of the nation, hold 23 per cent of the aggregate liquid assets. Those in the lowest income bracket, 20 per cent of the spending units, hold only 7 per cent of the assets.

One of the most important causes of the expected decline in prices is a psychological one—consumer resistance. Economists who keep in close touch with the merchandising picture report that consumers will refuse to buy high-priced or shoddy goods once goods return to the shelves in abundant supply. A story is told about a large Chicago department store which was unable to sell household appliances. A merchandising consultant was called in. He advised, "Take all but two off the counter, and you'll sell." He was right. Customers are looking over the goods that are not scarce, asking prices, comparing them, and in many cases walking out. The economists predict that many small businesses which jumped in and got goods on the market in a hurry will be wiped out in the recession, together with the inexperienced merchants who took whatever they could get and now have their storerooms filled with products that are not going to move. Even with respect to food prices some cautious optimism is expressed. One official put it this way, "I could sure eat a $3 steak today, and perhaps tomorrow, but by the next day I think my appetite wouldn't be so insistent. I should say that the butcher is going to sell a lot more stew meat than steaks." The Bureau of Agricultural Economics believes that meat prices will be back to summer levels—though these were not low—by mid-winter.

There is one big if in all the predictions about prices dropping—if there is not another round of wage increases after strikes paralyzing basic production. John L. Lewis is threatening to start the process. He has issued another one of his thundering ultimatums to the government as operator of the coal mines. Unless the government agrees to reopen the contract and discuss wages, there will be a coal strike on November 1. A coal strike would shut down steel mills, which are still far behind on orders, and manufacturing plants all over the country. Apparently John Lewis does not give a hoot about the effect on the nation's economy. He would launch his attack at a most critical moment for the Administration; a coal strike on the eve of the elections would raise the deuce with the Democrats. Since Congress is not in session, no immediate threat of anti-labor legislation hangs over his head as it did last spring. If Lewis succeeds in getting a wage increase, other unions will be forced by rank-and-file sentiment to press for similar raises.

And if there is another round of wage increases, the price spiral will go higher, and the collapse will be that much worse.

Pre-Election U. S. A.

BY ROBERT BENDINER

V. Pennsylvania Portents

Pittsburgh, October 21

SUCH comfort as can be found among the Democratic leaders of this second most populous state of the Union rests on a dubious political axiom which a veteran of the Harrisburg legislature passed along to me. "We Democrats," he confided, "never figure to win on our own brains, but on Republican stupidity."

If the formula were not far too simple, Democratic prospects here would be excellent, because the Grand Old Party in Pennsylvania is outdoing itself this year. At the very start of the campaign Ira T. Fiss, Republican Speaker of the House, thought it a good idea to expose the national origins of one of the opposition's nominees. "Why, their candidate for Lieutenant Governor," he said, "is a full-blooded Italian. He spells his name D-e-n-t. How many t's there are after that, I don't know." Later, by way of a forced apology, Speaker Fiss explained merely that "little things like that slip out." Another Republican extolled his party's choice for Governor on the ground that he was a Protestant. And in Philadelphia, Republican Boss Joe Pew needlessly stirred up the old Roosevelt following by referring to the late President as a "Pied Piper" a few of whose "political rats" were still on the loose and in need of extermination.

These are only a few of the oratorical gems that have studded a campaign in which foreign relations, atomic controls, and a peace-time economy have been blandly ignored so that justice might be done to the more pressing issues of godliness and the threat of a Soviet Pennsylvania. Republican Governor Edward Martin is appealing for Joseph F. Guffey's seat in the Senate with the twofold thesis that Democrats are merely fronts for communism and that God is on the side of the Republicans. His party's state chairman announced at one stage of the campaign that William Z. Foster was about to be brought into Pennsylvania to stump for the Democratic ticket; whereupon the Democratic strategists dredged up the fact that the Communists had supported the Republican nominee against William C. Bullitt in the Philadelphia mayoralty campaign three years ago. They also charged, for good measure, that the Republicans had made a deal with the Communists to bestow the "kiss of death" on the Democratic Party.

"No matter what they say about one another," sagely editorialized the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, "we can't believe the Democratic or Republican candidates in Pennsylvania are Communists. . . . And we won't believe that they are statesmen either until they lift the campaign from its present depths. . . ."

In this murky atmosphere it is the Republicans that stand to gain, their own stupidity notwithstanding. The state is traditionally one of the most Republican in the country, and in the absence of clearly defined and rousing issues—not to mention the absence of leadership on the Democratic side—it threatens to slump back into the torpid condition which for decades made its politics the private preserve of such eminent statesmen as Boies Penrose, Andy Mellon, and Boss Vare.

His most ardent supporters privately concede that Senator Guffey has only an outside chance to be reelected. "He is up against one of the best campaigners in the country," one of his supporters admitted to me, "with unlimited funds and a well-organized state machine. That is a combination almost impossible to beat." It is no reflection on Guffey, whose New Deal views go back to the days of Wilson, to concede that it was Roosevelt who carried him into office, no other Democrat having represented Pennsylvania in the Senate since 1875. It is just as true that while Guffey has gone down the line for the Administration, he has, as master of the state's patronage, made many enemies within the party. At the end of Governor Earle's term of office a savage intra-party fight broke out over the succession, and while a peace was eventually effected, the scars remain, with parallel Democratic organizations existing in some districts and patronage used for factional purposes. The coolness of some of Guffey's old opponents was an insignificant factor while Roosevelt was around to impose unity, but now the old hostility is emerging again. Most of it is private and beneath the surface, but there is also an organization of "Anti-Guffey Democrats."

Joseph F. Guffey

Governor Martin has, besides the advantages already cited, more platform appeal and, almost as a matter of course, a vastly better press. Guffey suffers, in fact, from an unusually rough treatment in the papers, derived in part of course from their political character but in no small measure also from his inability to handle reporters. Martin is much smoother—and more deceptive. An ardent upholder of "free enterprise" who doesn't believe the world has moved an inch since McKinley was shot, he has a talent for wrapping up his politics in moralistic packaging. He is opposed to such devices as the FEPC, he will tell you, because good-will must come from the heart and not from a statute.

Martin, too, has his intra-party troubles. These culminated during the campaign in the bolt of John Shroyer, former Secretary of Highways and Martin's rival for the nomination. Shroyer, who is State Commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, jolted the G. O. P. a month ago when he chose a twenty-three-station radio hookup to lash out at the Martin administration. Counts in his indictment of his own party included the bungling of a veterans' program, which "has been a miserable failure and is now a sorry mess," the killing of an FEPC bill, graft, and control by men who resort to "the easy prescription of 'leave it to the federal government' and then damn the federal government for spending money."

Telling points, all of them, but it would take more than one such episode to give confidence to the Democrats of Pennsylvania on the eve of this election. Generally speaking, I found them hoping rather than hopeful, with nervousness particularly marked in the Philadelphia area. The farm districts in the east and central parts of the state are almost incurably Republican, while the mining and industrial counties here in the southwest are for the most part certain to remain Democratic.

Philadelphia is the crucial spot that will determine the outcome of the Guffey-Martin race. It will also determine whether Pennsylvania's next Governor is to be Colonel John S. Rice—a capable though colorless liberal who went down the line for Earle's New Deal measures—or Attorney General James H. Duff, who is as independent as a man can be with the backing of the Pew-Grundy machine, which is to say, as independent as a trusty in a progressive prison.

Philadelphia gave Roosevelt a plurality of 210,000 in 1936, a margin that fell to 150,000 in 1944. The best the Democrats hope for now is to take the city by 50,000. They figure that this will be enough to allow Guffey and Rice to squeeze through in view of the normal Democratic returns in the Pittsburgh and Scranton areas. Less partial observers are not inclined to believe that the Democrats will get even that much of a lead.

Registration in the city, as in most industrial centers, is abnormally high, but entirely unpredictable. On the surface it favors the Republicans, but Philadelphia has had local Republican government for fifty-three years, and its thousands of firemen, policemen, street-cleaners, and municipal clerks register Republican as a matter of safe practice and then vote as they wish. It is expected of them, and the same goes for employees of the Pennsylvania Railroad, the banks, and scores of large corporations. On the other hand, the Democrats are not counting too hopefully on a switch to pull them out of a bad spot.

No other city in the country offers so magnificent a target for Congressional gains as Philadelphia presents to the G. O. P. This traditional Republican city has a solid delegation of six Democratic Representatives, an undreamed of phenomenon in pre-Roosevelt days. No one of these seats is now beyond Republican reach, though two of them appear to be reasonably safe. Local Democratic officials privately concede two and consider two others doubtful. The Republicans are more or less counting on adding four to their bag, and it is most unlikely that they will get fewer than three. Philadelphia liberals hope that among those who weather the gale will be young William Green, Jr., of the Fifth Congressional District. One of the thirteen men in the House to oppose the Truman labor-draft bill, Green put in as active a first term as any freshman Representative on record. With a solid background of k. p. at Camp Lee, he was in no mood for demagoguery in the Veterans' Committee and made himself a painfully sharp thorn in the flesh of Chairman John Rankin.

Four silk-stocking districts on the outskirts of the city are worth watching because of a band of crusading New Dealers who are campaigning with a zeal that recalls the high old days of 1934 and 1936. Vernon O'Rourke, Henry Chapin, Edgar Campbell, and William L. Batt, Jr., make up the gallant quartet, and I predict that they will all be heard from in the future, even though only O'Rourke is thought to have much of a chance this year.

In the Eleventh District, centering around Wilkes-Barre, Representative Daniel Flood will need more than his good voting record to get by, but there is a chance that the Democrats will pick up a seat here in Pittsburgh. Unless there is a Republican landslide, Eberharter and Buchanan, Democrats, will certainly be returned from this city, and, in addition, the Twenty-ninth District may well be swung away from the G. O. P. This district went Republican by only a thousand votes two years ago, and the race this time is between Democrat Harry L. Davenport, a liberal business man and secretary of the local Chamber of Commerce, and John McDowell, a small publisher with a reputation for racial prejudice that will not help him in an area with a sizable Jewish population.

The long-drawn-out power strike here will probably not affect the outcome in the Congressional races, but it has unquestionably harmed the Democratic state ticket as a whole. In a campaign that is weak enough in any case it has removed from action one of the party's shrewdest campaigners—Pittsburgh's Mayor David Lawrence. The semi-paralysis of the city for a month will inevitably reduce the expected Democratic margin here, throwing an additional burden on the party in Philadelphia. And that staggering organization seems to me hardly fit to carry the load of another ounce, even though I don't share the despairing view, to be heard in surprising quarters, that "when Franklin D. Roosevelt died, the Democratic Party in Philadelphia died with him."

VI. Retrogression in Ohio

Columbus, October 24

AT a private luncheon with friends here a few weeks ago, "Honest John" Bricker made a remark that has been widely repeated throughout the state—and rightly so, for it reveals magnificently the mind of Ohio's Republican nominee for the Senate. "I hear," said Mr. Bricker, with serious concern, "that the Socialists have gotten to Bob Taft." When an anachronism like Taft can be considered touched with the Marxian virus, it is no wonder that Jim Huffman, Bricker's mild opponent in the Senate fight, can be palmed off as a Communist and the P. A. C. held to be all but synonymous with the N. K. V. D. That is the level of Bricker's intellect, and the level of the campaign in this state.

In several respects the Ohio campaign is even more dismal than Pennsylvania. In the first place, Bricker has less intelligence and less personality than Martin, and he adds an extremism that is not common among seriously considered Presidential aspirants. Running for the Vice-Presidency in 1944, he announced that he would accept the votes of Gerald L. K. Smith and his followers as being as good as any other votes, and he barely had the grace to reject a proffered place on the ticket of Smith's own lunatic party. If he could, he would scrap every last vestige of those government controls that mark boundaries for private enterprise and would otherwise fulfil the fading dreams of such good friends of his as E. T. Weir, of National Steel. Typical of the Bricker mentality was his announcement last week that "definite proof has now come from Moscow that the campaign of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee in this country is being directed from Communist Russia." The proof? An unidentified Russian commentator said that "the election of a Republican Congress would be a national disaster."

What makes the campaign peculiarly depressing, aside from Mr. Bricker, is the absence of any vigor in the opposition. Huffman is a pleasant and able man, with a good voting record in the short time he served in the Senate, but he is not pressing the fight home. His chief campaign issue is Bricker's "absenteeism" from the Governor's desk during the months he campaigned for the Vice-Presidency in 1944.

Huffman's weakness would be less serious if there were anyone else on the ticket to rally the Democratic forces. But the reverse is the case. Governor Frank Lausche, once a bright hope of Ohio Democrats, has followed so peculiar a political line that he has dissipated an enormous reserve of popularity and may well lose the governorship to a nonentity. Apparently fancying himself a kind of LaGuardia, Lausche has adopted an "independence" that takes the form of ostentatiously snubbing his best friends and supporters. To demonstrate that he has no tie to labor, which was largely instrumental in sending him to Columbus four years ago, he has leaned over backward so far that the P. A. C. has refused to indorse him for reelection. P. A. C. leaders hope, nevertheless—and obviously expect—that labor will vote for him rather than for Thomas J. Herbert, "an echo of the Taft-Bricker-National Association of Manufacturers machine," whose election would be a "major tragedy."

John Bricker

Lausche's attitude has produced uneasiness within the Democratic Party as well as in labor circles. Having declared himself a "free man" on accepting the nomination, he conducts his campaign from separate headquarters and has been making his chief appeal to rural audiences on the county-fair circuit, taking the industrial centers for granted—perhaps too much for granted. Recent statewide polls show his popularity in the big cities dwindling rapidly, but he is still a slight favorite to win. Seventeen out of the eighty-eight counties in the state were enough to elect him last time, and he is counting on them to repeat.

These same polls show Bricker far ahead, and I met no one who would have put a dollar on Huffman's chances. It is not too much to say, in fact, that the Democratic Party in the state is close to demoralization. The only really vigorous effort to contest a Republican walkover is being made by the P. A. C., which amounts to more here than in states with brighter prospects. From its handsome new offices in this capital comes some of the most effective election propaganda that I have seen anywhere. The organization has been extremely vigorous in all the industrial centers of the state with the exception of Cincinnati, which ironically is Jack Kroll's home town as well as Senator Taft's. The two largest industries of that city—Procter and Gamble and the Cincinnati Milling Machine Corporation—are not even organized, thanks to paternalistic labor policies, and the town itself is characterized by one of its liberal citizens as "an old men's home with a nice low tax rate."

The Democrats hold six Congressional seats in Ohio, and they will have to fight hard to hold more than half of them. The doubtful three are now filled by Walter B. Huber (Akron), Edward J. Gardner (Hamilton), and William R. Thom (Canton). Two Democratic seats in Cleveland and one in Youngstown are safe unless there is a G. O. P. landslide, and a few optimistic Democratic leaders talk of capturing those now held by P. W. Griffiths (Marietta) and Homer A. Ramey (Toledo). As matters stand two weeks before the vote, the Democrats will be well off to retain Lausche in the Governor's Mansion and to salvage half their Congressional delegation, not counting Senator Huffman.

Whatever the outcome, the P. A. C., in this state at least, can feel that it has accomplished something. Thousands of rank-and-file unionists to whom politics not so long ago were a complete blank now have a real feel for the mechanics of the business—telephone brigades, registration lists, transportation to the polls, watchers, and the rest of the apparatus that once was the exclusive domain of professional ward-heelers. It will all come in handy again. As one Ohio liberal remarked, "We are conserving our strength for 1948; we are realistic about 1946."

The California Derby

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

Los Angeles, October 20

FEW election campaigns in California have been so confused as the curious political contest that has been going on here since the June primaries. The Democrats have been floundering around like chickens with their heads cut off; indeed, since Governor Warren captured both party nominations in the primaries, the ticket has actually been without a head. With no gubernatorial candidate and missing the unifying influence of Franklin Roosevelt, the Democratic nominees are conducting free-lance guerrilla campaigns, making whatever personal alliances seem expedient, being very inaudible about the national administration, and avoiding other Democratic nominees as much as possible.

The Republicans, faced with a heavy Democratic registration, are sedulously imitating Governor Warren's successful "non-partisan" pose. Seeking to trick the large Democratic majority, they are masquerading as liberals, whereas the Democrats, sensing a swing to the right, are stressing their conservatism and respectability. With party lines not being emphasized by either side, scarcely existing in fact, it is difficult to forecast the results.

Ever since a system of cross-filing was introduced in 1913, party regularity has declined in importance as a factor in California politics. On June 5 California elected not only a Governor at the primaries but also a Secretary of State, a Controller, a Treasurer, the four members of the Board of Equalization, twelve of the state's twenty-three Representatives in Congress, fifteen of the twenty state Senators, and sixty of the eighty members of the Assembly. The effect of cross-filing blurs party lines in California more than in any of the other states where it is permitted—Maine, Massachusetts, New York, and Vermont—because of the heavy newcomer vote, which has been a major factor in every election since 1920.

For United States Senator present odds favor Will Rogers, Jr., the Democratic nominee. In the primaries Senator William Knowland received 740,849 votes (514,667 Republican, 226,182 Democratic), and Rogers 705,070 (501,634 Democratic, 203,436 Republican), Ellis E. Patterson, who contested the Democratic nomination with Rogers, received 362,963 votes (76,151 Republican, 286,812 Democratic). Assuming that there will be no sharp shift from the primary vote, Rogers should be able to overcome his 40,000 deficit by capturing most of the Patterson votes. He should also get a sizable share of the 177,377 "decline-to-state" registrations. Knowland is not a popular figure in California, and the efforts of the Republicans to "humanize" him, in the manner of Governor Warren's face-lifting operation of 1942, have not been successful. Rogers is a clever politician and an excellent campaigner, with an attractive platform and radio manner. On domestic issues he has taken a consistently progressive position, but he has had little to say on foreign policy other than to favor a vague "middle-of-the-road" line. Quite outspoken about Palestine, an issue close to his heart, he has also characterized the regimes in Spain and Argentina as dangerously totalitarian. Although Rogers has annoyed some liberals by his unblushing opportunism, it must be recognized that he is waging a vigorous uphill fight. He should win.

Governor Warren

With respect to the two high state offices—those of Lieutenant Governor and Attorney General—the situation is extremely complicated. Since Governor Warren is a likely Republican nominee for either the Presidency or the Vice-Presidency in 1948, the Lieutenant Governorship has assumed exceptional importance. The Republican nominee is Judge Goodwin Knight of Los Angeles, who shares the ideological convictions of John Bricker. The Democratic nominee is State Senator John Shelley of San Francisco, a likable, popular man, long prominent in the American Federation of Labor. He had a good progressive record in the legislature, but he has been conducting a curious campaign, uttering warm praise for Governor Warren and a certain amount of double-talk about the major issues. Shelley should win, however, and for the same reason that Rogers may be expected to—because he has the support of the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. In the race for the Attorney Generalship, the Democrats have an excellent candidate in Edmund G. Brown, the district attorney of San Francisco, but the Republican nominee, Fred N. Howser, district attorney of Los Angeles, has the advantage of an indorsement by the A. F. of L. The most unlikely successor to Robert W. Kenny that could be imagined, Howser has backing from doubtful elements and lavish financial support.

In the Congressional contests reports from northern California are somewhat confused, and I shall refrain from commenting on them. In southern California such outstanding liberal Representatives as George Outland, Helen Gahagan Douglas, Clyde Doyle, and Ned Healy seem assured of reelection. (Chet Holifield and Cecil King, both progressives, were reelected at the primaries.) In the Twentieth District the Democratic nominee, Everett G. Burkhalter, has a good chance to defeat Carl Hinshaw, one of the most reactionary Republicans in Congress. The Representatives who face the toughest fights are E. V. Izac in the Twenty-third District (San Diego) and Jerry Voorhis in the Twelfth.

In the Sixteenth District Emmet G. Lavery, the liberal candidate, was defeated in the Democratic primary by Harold Harby. Liberal elements in the district then decided to conduct a write-in campaign for Ellis E. Patterson, the incumbent. As a result, support for liberal Assembly candidates in the district and also for Rogers, Shelley, and Brown has been weakened. Naturally the conservative Democrats have resented the effort to run an independent candidate against the Democratic nominee. Because of this split, the likely winner in the Sixteenth District is Donald L. Jackson, Republican.

Perhaps the most significant development in California politics this year has been the remarkable growth of liberal sentiment in the San Joaquin Valley. In the primaries John G. Terry, a school teacher, came within a few hundred votes of defeating Alfred J. Elliot in the Tenth District. Without newspaper support and with only a meager campaign fund, Terry conducted an exciting campaign. Had it not been for a "pastoral letter" urging his defeat which was read in the Catholic churches, he would certainly have won. In the other San Joaquin district, the Ninth, Dr. Hubert Phillips of Fresno State College is putting up a magnificent fight against Representative Bertrand W. ("Bud") Gearhart and has a slight—but only a slight—chance to win. For the information of Mr. Ickes, who recently indorsed Gearhart, it should be said that Dr. Phillips is one of the outstanding progressives of the state, with a long record of consistent liberalism.

Some of the Democratic candidates viewed the recent visit of Henry Wallace with very meager enthusiasm. Most of the southern California Congressional nominees welcomed it, but one of these, Jerry Voorhis, let it be known that he wished Mr. Wallace would tend to his duties as editor of the New Republic. It was obvious that Messrs. Rogers, Shelley, and Brown shared this view. Pro-Wallace sentiment is apparently strong in Los Angeles and San Diego counties, relatively weak in the rest of the state.

A few comments, in the nature of postscripts, should be added to complete this report. The A. F. of L., with handsome billboards advocating the election of Warren (Republican), Shelley (Democrat), Howser (Republican), and Rogers (Democrat), is the likely winner of the November election in California. Of the state initiative proposals, Number 11—to establish a state FEPC—has aroused most interest. In the last few weeks big-business groups have used the radio and billboards to denounce the FEPC as a C. I. O.-P. A. C. measure. Actually the proposal has the widest possible church and civic support. The campaign to put it over, however, has lacked imagination and boldness. If the measure wins, it will be a minor miracle. Finally, I can report that Colonel James Roosevelt, despite some serious initial blunders, is doing a good job as state chairman of the Democratic Party. Some of the bitterness of the primary fight seems to have disappeared.

The Pacific Northwest

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Portland, Ore., October 24

FEW regional leaders of the Democratic Party doubt that a Republican will be elected President in 1948 if the Truman Administration continues its vacillating course. All hope of preserving the advances in conservation, reclamation, and public power made in the Pacific Northwest under President Roosevelt apparently depends on electing the Democratic candidates for the United States Senate in Washington, Idaho, and Montana.

In all three contests these Democratic candidates are known liberals; the Republicans are reactionaries. In Idaho, State Senator George Donart, Democrat, is pitted against Representative Henry C. Dworshak, who voted against extending the reciprocal trade agreement, against the British loan, against price control, against civilian control of atomic energy, and for the Case anti-strike bill. In Washington the thirty-nine-year-old Senator Hugh B. Mitchell carries the Democratic colors into the field against Colonel Harry P. Cain, demagogic mayor of Tacoma. Across the 800-mile width of Montana, Leif Erickson, forty-year-old conqueror of Burton K. Wheeler, is opposing a colorless Republican rancher named Zales N. Ecton. Mitchell, Donart, and Erickson all support public power and regional authorities patterned after the TVA. This is important in an area where swift mountain rivers hold captive half of America's hydroelectricity. Mitchell drafted the bill for a Columbia Valley Authority. Erickson is chairman of the committee for an authority for the Missouri. Utility money is flowing like a torrent to check their efforts. If these men win at the polls, the Northwest may be able to save its power program even with a Taft or Dewey in the White House.

What are the prospects? Erickson will probably be elected; after Wheeler's elimination the G. O. P. was left with only a second-stringer to finish the game. An eleventh-hour break could decide the Idaho race for either side. The Mitchell-Cain contest is in the lap of the gods; Seattle gamblers are wagering a timid $10 to $9 on Mitchell. In the final analysis, the size of the vote probably will be the determining factor. If the labor vote is at the polls on November 5 instead of at a movie or beer parlor, the liberals running on the Democratic ticket will win. Yet it may take oxen and wainropes to drag it there.

Because the state of Washington is the most populous, prosperous, and strategically located in the Pacific Northwest, its Senate seat is the great prize of the 1946 elections. The issue is as clear as spring water. Harry Cain, a former Young Democrat, gives away nylons to get women to his Republican rallies, where he delivers a say-nothing speech which might serve as a caricature of a typical political oration. Hugh Mitchell is often too honest for his own good. He was one of three Senators to vote against the so-called Petrillo bill, giving as his reason that it "seemed based on Petrillo's unpopularity and not on sound legislative principles." With practically no assistance Mitchell has brought the CVA from the region of dim hopes to the point where even the cautious Secretary of the Interior, Julius Krug, has indorsed it.

One of the anvils Mitchell must carry in his knapsack is the bitter rumpus in Seattle over the alleged communism of Representative Hugh De Lacy. Attacks on him are dismissed by De Lacy as "red-baiting," but many newspaper readers remember that he was the only delegate at the 1940 Democratic convention to rise from the floor and oppose the renomination of Roosevelt—he feared the President would plunge the nation into an "imperialist war." A lot of people know what this sort of talk meant, and though in the past the Seattle district has been good for Democratic majorities as high as 40,000, De Lacy will be lucky to win by 5,000 votes, if he wins at all. This will affect the whole ticket, and Mitchell needs a head start in Seattle to offset inevitable Republican majorities in the orchard valleys east of the Cascade Mountains.

What will happen to Representative John Coffee of Tacoma, after the $2,500 check episode which hit the headlines late in the summer? Coffee is expected to win, despite the fact that his Republican opponent is trying to make him out a combination of Jesse James and Dick Turpin. I talked to many of Coffee's constituents, and they told me they thought he had been foolish rather than venal. He will hardly win by the decisive margins of the past, but his liberal voting record probably will carry him across a perilous passage in his political career.

Liberals of both parties in the Columbia Basin are heartsick over the apostasy of Senator Wayne Morse, who has spoken for both Cain and Dworshak. Inasmuch as Mitchell is indorsed by every trade union in the state of Washington and Cain has been charged with backing an anti-strike initiative measure in 1938, Morse's attitude seems to need explaining. After Morse predicted that California's anti-public-power Republican Senator Knowland would lick Will Rogers, Jr., "hands down," Glen Taylor, the senior Senator from Idaho, commented drily, "Mr. Morse was evidently under heavy pressure from the Republican National Committee. There are not enough thumbscrews in the world that the Democratic National Committee could apply to make me speak for Bilbo or Pappy O'Daniel because they are Democrats." Morse's closest friend, an attorney for the A. F. of L., insists he never would have spoken against Mitchell and Donart had he not been ill. But the Woodworkers, the largest C. I. O. union in the West, has announced that it has "written Morse off the books as a liberal."

The Alaska election, held early in October ahead of the big snows of the Yukon and Tanana valleys, has not cheered the Democrats. National interest was focused on the favorable vote for statehood, but more significant was the balloting for members of the territorial legislature. Not since 1930 have the Republicans packed even a featherweight punch in Alaska. The present territorial House of Representatives has twenty Democrats and four Republicans. On October 8 the people of Alaska spun the wheel around. They elected fourteen Republicans and ten Democrats.

Four times the Northwest gave majorities to F. D. R. matched nowhere else outside the South. Driving through the region these last weeks of the campaign, I have tried to find out why the Democrats have slipped so badly. After all, the Democratic Party authorized construction of the huge dams at Grand Coulee and Bonneville, which brought large-scale industry to the Northwest. People are reasonably prosperous. There may be a scarcity of tenderloin steaks, but no one is hungry. Why, then, are the candidates of the Democrats in danger? Why will it be difficult to get out the whopping vote essential to Democratic success?

The answer, I think, lies in the lack of fire and courage in the national Administration. People are indignant over high prices, shortages, and the lack of low-cost housing for war veterans, but the President has been unable to dramatize the Machiavellian role played by the Republicans and Southern Democrats in bringing about this situation. I have yet to meet one voter favorably impressed by Truman's lifting of meat controls. Business men scold him for waiting so long. Housewives whose husbands earn $200 a month ask how they can pay nearly a day's wages for a pot roast.

The Republicans, incredible as it may seem, are citing 55-cent bacon-and-egg breakfasts just across the border in British Columbia as argument for a political change. "Had enough?" they ask, pointing out that roasting chickens are 30 cents a pound in Vancouver and that the excellent dinner at the exclusive Empress Hotel in Victoria costs only $1.65. Of course, they neglect to say that Canada has price controls which would make the average American business man think he was manacled hand and foot.

Hugh Mitchell

Democratic finances simply don't exist. The party in Oregon lacked the $300 to buy a message in the official "Voters' Pamphlet." Hugh Mitchell has about half as much radio time as Harry Cain. A battered sound truck driven by Glen Taylor and his wife is the principal Democratic weapon in Idaho. Many New Deal appointees, once generous campaign contributors, now keep their wallets in their pockets.

Another albatross about Democratic necks is Mr. Truman's apparent indifference to local issues. People here are more concerned about water for irrigating their crops than about world-shaking issues on the other side of the globe. On the eve of every election Roosevelt always had something to say about developing the vast resources of the Columbia River. Truman has not indicated that he is any more aware of the Columbia than of the Orinoco. The voters of the Northwest had become accustomed to a Democratic Administration which advocated public power, demanded forestry conservation, and strove to end discriminatory freight rates and other monopolistic practices holding back the region's development. All this seemed to end with the death of President Roosevelt.

"The country don't need two Republican parties," I was told by a Northern Pacific brakeman, coupling freight cars on a siding above the irrigation canal at Yakima.

Illinois: McCormick and Kelly

BY MILBURN P. AKERS

Chicago, October 25

ILLINOIS elects twenty-six members of the national House of Representatives on November 5. Only the delegations from New York and Pennsylvania exceed that number. So Illinois, politically apathetic, lacking even the drama of a senatorial or gubernatorial contest, may be a determining factor in the political make-up of the next Congress. Currently the state is represented by fifteen Republicans and eleven Democrats, but it has an unusually large number of so-called marginal districts. As the desultory campaign nears its end, with the G. O. P., headed by Robert R. McCormick as publisher of the Chicago Tribune, and Governor Dwight Green, alternately seeking to frighten the electorate with the specter of communism and to arouse its wrath over shortages, the people, jingling more money in their pockets than ever before, show little or no interest in the issues, bogus or real.

Before analyzing the situations existing in the reputedly marginal districts, I should explain that the state has not been redistricted since 1901. The Congressional result, therefore, will not necessarily reflect the political sentiments of the people of Illinois. Cook County, ordinarily a Democratic stronghold, has approximately 52 per cent of the state's population. But Cook County has only nine Congressional districts wholly within its boundaries. A tenth lies partly in the county and partly in suburban Lake County. Fifteen lie wholly within the other 100 downstate counties. The twenty-sixth Representative is chosen by the electorate at large. Not only is there unequal representation as between Cook County and downstate but also as between districts in both areas. Population disparities range from the Seventh District's 914,053 inhabitants (1940 census) to the Fifth District's 112,116. Both those districts are in Cook County. Downstate's Twentieth District has but 162,528 inhabitants, while its Eleventh has 385,207. Thus only the vote for Congressman-at-Large can be used to evaluate political sentiment in the state as a whole.

The marginal districts include the post of Congressman-at-Large, currently held by Mrs. Emily Taft Douglas, a Democrat; the Third (Chicago), now represented by Edward A. Kelly, Democrat; the Ninth (Chicago), won two years ago by Alexander Resa, Democrat; the Twenty-second (East St. Louis), recaptured from the G. O. P. two years ago by Melvin Price, a G. I. Democrat; the Second (Chicago), now represented by William A. Rowan, a Democrat; the Nineteenth (downstate), represented by Rolla C. McMillen, a Republican; and the Twenty-first (downstate), represented by Evan Howell, a Republican. Only Democratic optimists calculate that either the Nineteenth or the Twenty-first, currently held by Republicans, will go Democratic. Predictions of upsets in those two districts are based largely on the fact that the Democratic nominees have put up a good fight. The two districts went Democratic at the peak of New Deal strength but returned to the Republican fold long ago.

Thus the situation in Illinois reduces itself to the fact that the Democratic Party cannot reasonably count on gains and that it will be extremely fortunate to retain the eleven seats it now holds.

Results in at least three of the five marginal districts now held by the Democrats are highly doubtful. In the order of Republican expectations, these are the Third and Ninth districts and the at-large seat. Downstate's Twenty-second (East St. Louis area) is a toss-up. Chicago's Second District, although slightly debatable, would go Republican only in event of a landslide. In Chicago's Third District Edward A. Kelly—no relation of Mayor Kelly—is hard put. The district includes industrial areas, ordinarily Democratic, and Cook County suburbs, ordinarily Republican. It went Republican in 1942, sending the red-baiting Fred Busbey to Washington, where he supported the activities of the Dies committee. Two years ago the large outpouring of liberals in behalf of Franklin D. Roosevelt enabled Kelly, who had previously represented the district, to recapture it. In the last session of Congress Kelly, who had previously given full support to Roosevelt, voted with the Republicans and Southern Democrats on a number of crucial questions. In the current contest, therefore, in which Busbey is again the G. O. P. nominee, Kelly inspires little enthusiasm among liberals, and his reelection, without such support, is problematical.

In Chicago's Ninth District the able and liberal Alexander Resa, the incumbent, is opposed by Robert Twyman, a personable Republican business man who has waged an effective campaign on very conservative tenets. Twyman is a newcomer to Chicago politics, though he was once secretary to the late Senator New of Indiana. Liberals and labor groups are giving nominal support to Resa, but liberals of all categories have been slow to move in the current campaign. Resa, for example, carries whatever burden there may be in an indorsement from the P. A. C. without the compensation of any great activity in his behalf by what some Chicago politicians ruefully refer to as the Political Inaction Committee.

Emily Taft Douglas, an able campaigner and a sincere and effective liberal, has the unusually hard task of winning reelection from the state at large. Two years ago, running against the notorious Stephen A. Day, she picked up a plurality exceeding that given by Illinois to Roosevelt. Long active in the League of Women Voters and other civic organizations, she has much independent support. She will probably get a Cook County plurality of something like 150,000. That will be enough only in the event that widespread apathy downstate prevents her opponent from coming to the Cook County line with the normal G. O. P. plurality of 200,000 to 300,000. The odds, what with a Republican trend downstate, are against her. Possibly her own independent strength can pull her through.

The Twenty-second, the only downstate district represented in Washington by a Democrat, is an even bet. It has two heavily populated industrial counties, St. Clair and Madison, and three rural counties, Bond, Washington, and Madison. The rural counties are expected to give Calvin Johnson, the Republican nominee, a plurality approximating 7,000. An outpouring of labor votes in Madison and St. Clair for the incumbent, Melvin Price, will be needed to retain the seat for the Democrats. Johnson won the seat in 1942 and lost it to Price in 1944. Chicago's Second District, now represented by William A. Rowan, Democrat, was long considered debatable, but in recent days the Democrats have become more confident.

To return to the contest for Representative-at-Large, Mrs. Douglas's Republican opponent, William G. Stratton, served one term in Congress (1940-42) and then was elected state treasurer. He has an ultra-conservative, ultra-isolationist record, and with "Ham" Fish and Stephen A. Day, was involved in the Viereck-Frank episode. But on the basis of past performance he must be reckoned no mean vote getter.

Stratton has spent most of the campaign in red-baiting, and he finally overstepped himself when he sought to link Mrs. Douglas—native-born Illinoisan, product of the state's school system, daughter of the late sculptor Lorado Taft, and wife of an eminent University of Chicago economist—with Moscow. His own record of association with Viereck then became an issue. Before that, on account of his brief war-time navy service, it had been largely ignored.

Such Republican worthies as Chauncey Reed in the Eleventh District, Leo Allen in the Thirteenth, Noah Mason in the Twelfth, Anton J. Johnson in the Fourteenth, and Leslie Arends in the Seventeenth have nothing to fear. They come from districts which went Republican during most of the New Deal peak years. Probably all incumbent G. O. P. Representatives from the state will be reelected. Broadly considered, the group stands for Tribune isolationism, Tribune reaction, and Tribune red-baiting. Without exception, they acknowledge the leadership of Robert R. McCormick.

Uninspiring as the fact may be, present hopes to keep the state's Democratic liberals in Congress rest largely on the vote-getting ability of Chicago's notorious Kelly machine. The P. A. C. has not bestirred itself, and other liberal groups, with the exception of the small but active Independent Voters of Illinois, appear to have lost their effectiveness since Roosevelt's death. Boss Ed, incredible as it may seem, is being called on to save whatever vestiges of liberalism may remain in Illinois. Sic transit gloria!

The Soviets Clean House

BY WALTER DURANTY

IN THE present flurry about Soviet Russia much is being made of an "internal upheaval" in that country. We are told that the dread word "purge" was allowed by the Moscow censor on, I think, June 28, and that since then the newly named Ministry of State Control (ex-OGPU, ex-NKVD) has been doing a wholesale job of "purging" in many fields. Although we are also informed that "unlike other Soviet upheavals, notably those of the mid-thirties, the sentences so far reported have been confined to prison terms and fines," the tone of dispatches is ominous and in tune with other alarums and excursions of the anti-Soviet orchestra.

However, all this talk about "purges," now and in the past, ignores the fact that the "purge"—or chistka, as the Russians call it, literally meaning "cleansing"—is an essential feature of the principles and conduct of the Russian Communist Party and was in operation as far back as 1920. The chistka was then used to cope with the somewhat indiscriminate admission of new members to the party during the civil war (1918-20); by 1920 more than twenty thousand "undesirables" had been placed on probation or expelled. The test which Communists must pass was threefold, dealing with faith, works, and conduct—that is, knowledge of and belief in Marxist doctrine, obedience to party rules and instructions and performance of party duties, and personal behavior so scrupulously correct as to bring no slur upon the party name.

WALTER DURANTY is the distinguished foreign correspondent whose dispatches appeared in the New York Times for so many years. He lived in Russia from 1921 to 1934 and is author of "I Write as I Please," "The Kremlin and the People," and "U. S. S. R."

At various later periods exceptional stress was laid upon one or another of these three points, but serious dereliction in any of them was enough to warrant expulsion or a period of probation. Thus there was a very sharp purge in 1921, when Lenin's New Economic Policy (N. E. P.) was opposed by many of his followers. This purge was so severe that the membership of the party was reduced from 732,000 in March, 1921, to 532,000 in March, 1922. And the decline did not stop there, for the Twelfth Party Congress in April, 1922, represented a membership of only 386,000—scarcely more than half the 1921 figure.

The mechanism of the purge was as follows: Every party member, high or low, was called before a meeting of his cell, or unit, to answer the questions of a board of examiners appointed by the Central Committee. Other fellow-workers, friends or relatives, including non-Communists, might be present, and the Communist being examined could appeal to them for support and corroboration of his statements. The examiners might also appeal to the "audience" to confirm or deny complaints and generally to illumine each case. This was the system before Lenin's death, and it has been continued since within the party.

In the fall of 1924 a nation-wide drive was undertaken against the profiteers, Communist and non-Communist, who had exploited the New Economic Policy. Scores of thousands of "Nepmen"—private business men—and party and non-party officials were arrested and punished for crookedness and for taking or giving bribes. State organizations of investigation and punishment, like the Peasants' and Workers' Inspection Committee, the Criminal Police, and the OGPU, formerly known as Cheka, conducted this drive. It was not a party purge—this distinction is important—but simply an effort to correct abuses which had developed because the party leaders, notably Stalin and Trotsky, were already engaged in a struggle of persons and power and methods caused by Lenin's serious illness and imminent death.

I venture to suggest that the present "internal upheaval" in Russia is like what happened in 1924—that is, a general cleaning out of the cobwebs and mess which accumulate in any house when its occupants are so deeply preoccupied with something else that they have no time to keep it in order. In the last five years the U. S. S. R. has been fighting for its existence. That was what counted most. Now that the war is won, the Russian leaders have time to look around, and they see rust and moths and corruption and even places where thieves have broken in to steal. Doubtless they also see that the enormous number of new party members, welcome and useful during the war, requires some sifting—now that the war is won. That would be a party purge; and so we have today the dual process of a party purge, or chistka, and the punishment of non-party members for the many sorts of misconduct and abuses which are the common response of human imperfection to the double temptation of greed and opportunity.

It is not surprising that American public opinion and its informants in the press and radio should misunderstand the present state of affairs in the U. S. S. R. Apart from the censorship and the confusing effect of such factors as the shortage of consumers' goods, transportation difficulties, and the presence of millions of refugees from the western provinces in the Urals, Siberia, and Central Asia, there is the bewildering memory of the treason trials and so-called Great Purge in the years 1936 to 1938. The whole tragic story of that vast and panic witch-hunt has yet to be revealed. It was not a party purge in the usual sense of the phrase, although it was primarily concerned with party members and, as in 1921, reduced the party membership by more than one-half. Nor was it mainly, as in 1924, a national housecleaning. In a sense it was both, but it was something else. It was an explosion of national suspicion and fear which shook the country to its roots but also destroyed the network of foreign intrigue and fifth-column activity, native and foreign.

There is a further point which merits consideration. I refer to the Cheka, or OGPU, or NKVD, or, as they call it now, Ministry of State Control, that subtle organization which often changes its name but never its character—or its purpose and methods. From the very beginning, when Lenin early in 1918 appointed Felix Djerjinsky to head the Cheka (Extraordinary Commission) against counter-revolution, that body—with all its names—has been far more than a secret police or an intelligence service. It has been that of course, but it has also been, first, last, and always, the executive arm and the vigilant watchdog of the Soviet state, the right hand and obedient servant of the ruling force in Russia, which is the Central Committee of the Communist Party, and of the Politburo which runs the Central Committee—and therefore of Stalin, who runs the Politburo.

On certain occasions foreign public opinion has been led to believe that this particular organism of the Bolshevik system was the power behind the throne, an imperium in imperio. Once perhaps, for a moment, this fancy may have been true, when Yagoda dared to dream that a dog could bite its master. So Yagoda was shot. Before him and after him—perhaps even during that moment of his extravagant dream—the Cheka, OGPU, NKVD, or present Ministry of State Control has always been the swift sharp sword of the Kremlin.

The People's Front

FEW people can undergo the test of power and emerge unchanged. This is truer in Europe than in the United States. Here politics does not have the same prestige; a successful American business executive or professional man seems to feel that a government job is something one accepts only in time of war or some other national emergency as a patriotic duty and with a certain feeling of condescension. As a rule, the men most susceptible to the effects of power are those who least expected to fill a post of authority: the newspaperman who never dreamed of leaving the city room, the militant of the left who never in his life saw the inside of any official building except a jail, the professor absorbed in the search for a new philosophy, or hormone, or star. Taken out of their usual surroundings and set down in a ministry, or embassy, or Military Government office, such men too often become transformed—conceited and unbearable.

Italy's new Minister of Foreign Affairs is not one of these. I saw Pietro Nenni three months ago in the Italian embassy at Paris; he was then vice-president of the Italian Council of Ministers, but I had no difficulty in recognizing the man who used to rise at meetings of the Second International in pre-Munich days to defend the uncompromising Socialist position against the revisionists; who during the Spanish war crossed the border time after time to go to the front with the milicianos. In Paris in August he was even carrying, stuffed in the pocket of his raincoat, the beret Basque he used to wear in 1938; when he had to go to see one of the big shots at the Peace Conference, he would exchange it for a stiff black sombrero which between times hung solemnly in the cloakroom of the embassy and which he never succeeded in putting on properly.

This was my first meeting with Nenni since January, 1940, when I left him struggling with the French bureaucrats to put across his plan of mobilizing the Italian anti-fascists in France for service on the Allied side. To make his situation even more difficult, he had just sent a bitter letter of resignation to the executive committee of the Second International because of its vacillating position on the Spanish issue. Yet he was at odds with the Communists as well, for he would not accept their position on World War II; from the outset he maintained that this was a struggle every Socialist must support.

When France fell, Nenni stood high on the list of those demanded by the Axis police. Indeed, he had three Gestapos on his trail—German, Italian, and Vichy French. I succeeded in establishing contact with him through mutual friends in New York, and we obtained the promise of an American visa for him. Nenni got word to us that he would not leave France. He wanted to keep in touch with the anti-Fascists there and in Italy and to be on hand when the final struggle began. Eventually he was delivered to the Italians and sent to prison. His journey through Italy turned into a triumphal progress. Even the Fascist guards who had him in charge treated him with sympathy and respect, and the railway workers made no attempt to hide their joy at his return.

Nenni's extraordinary courage is concealed by his simplicity and strong dislike of theatrical gestures. Three weeks ago, when an angry crowd of unemployed, in which it was easy to detect the presence of provocateurs, rioted in front of the Viminale Palace in Rome, the first official who went out to face the demonstrators was Nenni. I can sense as if I had been there the quick presence of mind with which he intervened to prevent a disastrous clash between the police and the people.

This will surely not be the last riot for Nenni. It takes courage, in this critical period for Italy, to assume the duties of Foreign Minister. There may come a moment when Nenni will find everyone against him, including his own Socialist Party, in which he must count upon the criticism of the rightist group around Saragat and of the perfectionists led by Ignazio Silone. He may also find himself in disagreement with the Italian Communists. Nenni considers the division into two blocs a permanent menace to peace; while he is friendly to the Soviet Union he is determined to maintain the best possible relations with the West, as his recent cable to Secretary Byrnes clearly indicates. On the other hand, his position has been strengthened by the political pact just concluded between the Socialists and Communists. The joint program calls for extirpation of Fascist remnants, nationalization of monopolistic industries and services, liquidation of big estates, and, in foreign affairs, collective security. This is a personal victory for Nenni. With the two Marxist parties working together on domestic problems and laying the groundwork for substantial gains in next spring's parliamentary elections, he can expect more solid support from the left for his foreign policy. Even on the Trieste issue he showed no sign of discouragement in Paris, no indication of allowing that trouble-spot to become another Danzig. Latest developments seem to justify his hopes. Although the Yugoslav delegate to the Peace Conference declared that his country would never sign a treaty depriving it of Trieste, Marshal Tito, in a recent interview with Philips Price, British Labor M. P., has said he does not object in principle to having Trieste become a free territory provided its constitution is satisfactory and the enclave fairly defined.

Nenni's big problem will be the Christian Democrats, who hold 211 of the 557 seats in the Constituent Assembly. After a two-day debate in the Chamber, they came out against acceptance of the peace treaty drafted in Paris. Nenni hates the treaty as much as they do, but he favors ratification combined with continued efforts to secure revisions as soon as the international situation eases. He knows he is in for the most unpleasant time of his life. But he asked for it; he insisted on being Foreign Minister. Nenni is used to plunging into the fight when things look darkest. Knowing him as I do, I am confident that, unlike some other radicals who have tasted power, he will not forget that he is a Socialist.

DEL VAYO

BY LOU FRANKEL

THERE was a time when almost any radio man would admit, in the privacy of a bar or the secrecy of an inner sanctum, that CBS was the top network in the business. NBC might have more good programs, but CBS was smarter in its public service and its ability to come up with new programs.

Four or five years ago things began to change. Then, about three years ago, William S. Paley, the president of CBS, went to war, first with the OWI overseas, later with the Psychological Warfare Division of SHAEF. And from that day on no one in the business would bet a dime on the future of the once top web.

Today the situation has changed again. For last week Mr. Paley, now chairman of the board of CBS, served notice that he was back in the saddle and his network would once again be out in front.

On Tuesday, October 22, Bill Paley stood before the first big meeting of the National Association of Broadcasters' twenty-fourth annual convention, in Chicago, and said in effect, "A lot of people are saying a lot of bad things about us. Some of them are honest, others are not, but a good deal of what they are saying is true, and it's about time we admitted it and took steps to clean house."

To the assembled radio men—fresh from a shave, a shampoo, and a snifter after a night of carousing in the full Legion-convention sense of the word—it was an unexpected slap in the face. The president of CBS had faced up to a problem they were ducking—and they knew it.

Some of what Bill Paley said is arguable, at least to this critic. But everything he said was honest, frank, and important. If you would like to read the full seventeen pages of his talk, write to CBS at 485 Madison Avenue, New York 22, and they will send you a copy. I have space only for his most effective salvos:

"The most persistently repeated charge against broadcasters is that we permit advertising excess. It is my opinion that we are guilty. True, competition for economic survival has been very fierce in certain instances. But that does not excuse too high a percentage of commercial copy or material which is irritating, offensive, or in bad taste.

"A broadcaster may have felt impelled by economic considerations to take a few more announcements or another commercial here and there. Getting no immediate reaction from the listening public he may have repeated the process until he lost perspective on what was excessive or obnoxious.

"You do not need me to tell you that this is bad radio and bad advertising. Certainly, it's not the advertiser's fault, but the broadcaster's. Nor am I pointing the finger at stations only. Let me frankly admit that even network standards would be higher if one network or another had not yielded to the pressure of competition.

"Turning to the field of public-affairs programs, perhaps our real failure has been in not devoting to them the same high quality of showmanship, good writing, ingenuity, and imagination as we devote to entertainment shows.

"The growing volubility of our critics cannot be disposed of simply by our deciding in the privacy of our own offices that they don't know what they are talking about.

"We must admit in advance that not all our critics will be silenced no matter what we do, but that does not excuse a do-nothing attitude. I have no doubt that if we frankly face and recognize this as our collective responsibility, we are neither so shortsighted nor so incompetent that we cannot find a forward-looking and workable solution.

"When our accomplishments are given as much emphasis as our faults—we will find that the record of most broadcasters will be a matter of real pride. And I say most because the record of some is not a matter of pride.

"We have reached a point where it is incumbent upon the whole industry to be concerned with the good name of the whole industry, and if that means pointing directly to certain units in the industry, then let's not be afraid to do so.

"I should like to see people angry when they are angry at particular stations, particular programs, particular offenders, and not at all radio. That is intelligent discrimination, and that is what is often lacking in radio criticism."

These quotations are lifted out of context. They are not all in the sequence in which they occurred. And of course they are not nearly all that Mr. Paley had to say: he made some extremely pertinent remarks about radio critics, of which more next week.

Mr. Paley's speech was important because it marked the return to active participation in American radio of a strong force for good. It also set a gauge by which every intelligent radio listener can judge his station and by which radio can judge itself.

Even if nothing else happens before the N. A. B. convention comes to an end, this meeting of the radio trade association will have been a success. For by putting radio on the spot Bill Paley also put his network on the spot.

The current issue of Variety carries a headline, "Radio Must Reform—or Else." With this staring the broadcasters in the face, you can bet your mortgage that Paley will back his words with action. And anything that CBS does the rest of the industry will have to match on a competitive basis.

The Nation has been receiving inquiries about the present status of television. Mr. Frankel plans to devote a future column to the subject. However, he would like to know how many Nation readers have television sets in operation and how general is the interest. If you have a set, will you please send us a postcard.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Great Precursor

THE DRAWINGS OF LEONARDO DA VINCI. With an Introduction by A. E. Popham. Reynal and Hitchcock. $10.

AS BOTH an artist and an event in history Leonardo da Vinci offers paradoxes. These are brought to view even in his drawings—which happen to be the most authentic evidence we have as to his genius, since the authorities tell us that almost every one of the paintings still attributed to him has been altered seriously by the hand either of another artist or of time. Thus the book at hand becomes doubly valuable, even to those more interested in Leonardo as a personality than as a painter.

Remarkable in these drawings is the amount of intellectual will manifested by a taut, deliberate line, by contours that describe a form as if asserting a final truth. Here, immediately, is the first paradox. Was not Leonardo among those who did most to deliver Italian painting from conceptualization and carry it farthest on the way toward explicit emotion and naturalism? Did it not go out of fashion after him for painters to be intellectual? Where are the Piero della Francescas, the Uccellos, and the Mantegnas of the Cinquecento? But like many of the paradoxes attaching to Leonardo, this one can be plausibly explained by his "uneven development." Born in 1452, he never quite succeeded in escaping from the intellectualist Quattrocento, although he was, essentially, not of it; and despite his instinctive naturalism he was unable to attain the uninhibited passivity that made it possible for the next generation of painters to render a pictorial world so "natural" that its space became continuous with that in which the spectator moved.

Leonardo's will was not only the will to know and to understand but also the will to power. Where for his predecessors, Piero and Uccello, graphic definition had been primarily a way of identifying nature's essence, its perfection and harmony, for Leonardo it was a form of control over his environment. In his drawings we see a struggle between the Quattrocentist ideal of harmony and his own instinct for immediate, physical control. Yet he seems to have been too impatient to make the unreserved, if temporary, surrender of the intellectual will without which the sensory truth cannot be assimilated. Although in his notebooks he upheld the primacy of the unmanipulated evidence of the senses, he continued to believe in geometry as the supreme and a priori key to visible reality. Hence the vestigial stylization in his drawings, the cramped, but rhythmic, faintly Sienese arabesque of Quattrocento painting, which, although a great excellence in its own time, represents a frustration for an artist whose temper and ambition no longer belong to the fifteenth century.

Some of Leonardo's frustrations, as well as his unresolved contradictions, arose from his own temperament no less than from his historical position. His preoccupation with knowledge and power goes hand in hand with a certain coldness or detached impersonality, of which evidence is to be found in both his drawings and his notebooks. Yet his revolutionary contributions to painting were an emotional naturalism that inaugurated the High Renaissance, and his sfumato, which by swathing forms in soft, voluminous shading not only moved them into "real" space but made the emotion they bore more explicit. And yet who but a cold nature can calculate best when it comes to a question of dramatizing and exploiting emotion? And is it not also characteristic of a cold nature that, when called on to display emotion, it should resort, as Leonardo did, to sentimentality and exaggeration?

There is, however, a kind of valid feeling in Leonardo's seemingly most objective drawings. But it appears as puzzling to us as it proved troublesome, no doubt, to the artist himself. It is the alienated and the unsympathetic, and is expressed in depictions of violent struggles, of catastrophes by fire and flood, of invented facial types and facial deformities, of war chariots with revolving scythes that litter the ground with human limbs, and in the directions in his notebooks on how to paint a battle scene—but most particularly in his anatomical studies, which convey, as modern anatomical plates do not, the idea of a callousness that does not come altogether from the fact that these studies were done from life by a consummate draftsman in a period in which hardly anyone as yet had acquired the habit of viewing the insides of a human body detachedly and with curiosity. The mirror-maker who denounced Leonardo to the Pope for his anatomical drawings may have had ulterior motives, but I believe I can understand why he felt he had a good case.

The most precise definition I can give of the feeling I detect in Leonardo's drawings and writings is that it is the result of self-withdrawal, of an unwillingness or inability to commit or reveal himself. His appetite for mystification would bear this out. (And by mystification I do not mean merely his practice of writing from right to left; after all, Leonardo was left-handed.) He was able to put emotion into his art more outwardly than anyone before him because it was not his own emotion but emotion that he chose for his not-self. He was able to write more copiously than any other artist of his time because he kept himself out of what he wrote. He willed because he assigned the performance of the acts of his will to his not-self.

Relatively few of the drawings reproduced in this book are finished works of art in the sense of being placed and executed in relation to the size and shape of the page. Many are preliminary sketches, notations, studies, and the like; others are sheer rumination, revery, wish-fulfilment, thinking. They amount to works of art only in the limited way that isolated passages of verse do—or even less, because their presumptive wholes never saw existence.

As I have said, most of these drawings are not quite free of the Quattrocento. The recurring types of the fierce, masculine, mature man and his contrast, the soft-chinned, effeminate youth; the flower-pieces, the landscapes, and especially the drawings of water in movement seem governed by notions of ideal types, or of abstract, mathematical harmonies. (The Quattrocento, while it drew from nature, corrected its observations according to a set of ideal, generalized patterns, drawing the arm and the tree instead of an arm and a tree.) Leonardo does not seem to have been comfortable with the remnants of a style that by his time, and particularly for him, had become equivalent to stylization. Had he been comfortable, his drawing would have been more mannered—like Botticelli's—which it is not at all, and would have betrayed the unity, self-indulgence, and repose that go with mannerism. But Leonardo's draftsmanship is rarely at ease; its revery as well as its will is nervous, almost convulsive. Its invention transcends the Quattrocento by far, and only its execution relapses into it—in the tapering of a limb, the folds of a gown, or here and there in an ornamental, slightly abstract rhythm and compression. And yet even here the truth and emphasis are too strong to be decorative in the Quattrocentist manner.

Leonardo was endowed with the talent of a great draftsman, but we can appreciate that talent only as a potentiality. He left behind very few really great drawings, and most of those in the present book are but samples and demonstrations of talent, not its achievements. Those of them done most directly from life appear the most spontaneous and incisive: his male nudes, his female heads, and even his studies of drapery—which seem slightly stylized only because taken, as Vasari says, from clay figures draped with rags dipped in plaster. On the other hand—and here we meet another paradox—the best complete drawing in the book, in my opinion, is a more or less architectural sketch for the perspective of the unfinished "Adoration of the Magi"—notwithstanding its over-drawings, guiding lines, and erasures. And yet again, this drawing happens to be one of the most Quattrocentist of all, even though its conception, a wide, horizontal composition converging into depth, was to be taken up and repeated by Raphael and others in the sixteenth century.

The famous Burlington House cartoon of the Madonna, St. Anne, the Jesus child, and St. John, made as a sample sketch for an altar-piece never executed, is considered by many the greatest and most genuine surviving example of Leonardo's genius. About this drawing, magnificent in the pictorial and emotional unity of its rhythms, there is nothing whatsoever of the Quattrocento. Although its volumes round off deeply into the third dimension, they are perfectly controlled on the picture plane, with the Quattrocentist handling of volumes as protuberances to be organized frontally like a bas-relief left far behind. And yet I feel something impure, mannered, cloying in the elongated figures of this drawing, in the faces, and in the sugary sfumato that haloes them. The emotion is sent too exclusively and too far in one direction, becoming unbelievable for the purposes of art; the artist seems to be staking his effect on the spectator's weaknesses as well as on his own skill. In the end, this charcoal drawing, like Michelangelo's Sistine frescoes, constitutes one of those rapes of the medium that result in something splendid and extraordinary but that leave us admiring the scale and force of the artist's nerve more than his art. And since these works have such a deleterious effect upon artists who come afterward, they amount almost to acts of hostility toward art.

We know how much Michelangelo preferred sculpture to painting and how he complained at the task set him in the Sistine chapel, and so his hostility can be accounted as more than accidental. Leonardo's reluctance to commit himself fully to any of his pursuits—as indicated by such external evidence as his inconstant interests, his lack of perseverance, and his very neglect of the rudimentary physical aspects of his métier—may be interpreted as the sign of an unconscious hostility toward accomplishment in general, not only toward art. Whatever the personal facts concerned, it is as if Leonardo, once having embarked upon his revolutionary ventures, lost heart and became resentful when he saw that these were but beginnings that would have to be left to others for realization. And so for him the main question became that of proving and demonstrating his gifts rather than of creating works.

His faculty for divining the obsessions and challenges of the future led him into paths down which he could take only the initial steps. Just as his art, while reaching far ahead in conception, remained trapped between Quattrocento and Cinquecento in its embodiment, so in natural philosophy his genuine positivism, which anticipated so much to come, could of itself achieve little for lack of a scientific method; while his inventions and engineering projects, which manifested a very modern desire to exploit nature rather than propitiate it, came to nothing for lack of a source of power more generous than pulleys and cog-wheels. Leonardo arrived too early. "Tell me whether anything was ever finished?" he wrote more than once.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

The Witnesses

NOT SO WILD A DREAM. By Eric Sevareid. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

THIS is the kind of book that most sincere journalists write or want to write—have to write in order to maintain their sincerity and their balance. On two levels, both the superficial and the profound, these books—which naturally enough take the autobiographical form—allow the journalist to try to tell what he really saw and felt, what was actually happening: in other words, to report what the censors cut out and what the writer himself was at the time unable to express. The model for these books is perhaps Vincent Sheean's "Personal History." Eric Sevareid presumes to speak for his generation, as Sheean did for his: he achieves a genuine success. The defects of his story can be related to the defects of his generation. It is entirely to the credit of his honesty that the contradictions in his attitudes are revealed as clearly as his positive beliefs are affirmed. As I recall Sheean's book, and compare it with "Not So Wild a Dream," the most striking difference seems to be in the personal tone. The former generation, feeling itself more in tune with history—and for other reasons as well—was more individually responsive and assertive. On the other hand, Sevareid reveals, for instance, a shocking disdain of bohemianism. Also, he is too polite to those he attacks. His analyses are often vitiated by an excessive moralism: the words "clean" and "obscene" occur frequently in meaningless contexts. I think today we carry a greater load of guilt.

Why? Because the world is a more horrible and hopeless place to live in, and because the desire to escape from it has multiplied while the opportunities for doing so have dwindled. (And society is more and more incorporating escapes from itself within its own structure.) The feeling of guilt appears, of course, as a sense of responsibility, and so Sevareid remarks, "Mine is a time without choices"—meaning the choice has already been made. But in his particular reportorial role he also speaks of "my familiar niche as participating witness without the responsibility of decision." He is continually feeling inferior to militant leftists and to more conventional men of action like army officers. He is, for some reason, paralyzed: he cannot do what he says he wants to do, and he cannot fully want to do what he does.

Sevareid's long book is primarily an account of his relation to the war and of the experiences he had reporting it. He was in a good bit of it: the Sitzkrieg; the defeat of France; the London blitz of 1940; Africa, India, China; North Atlantic convoy; the Italian theater; the invasion of southern France; and so on—the account ends with the crossing of the Rhine. A long chapter chronicles his life in the Burmese jungle, where his plane crashed on the way from India to China. The best part of the book is that concerning the criminal Italian campaign. The reporter responded to the war in Italy deeply, almost as a G. I. His picture of the inept, pretentious generals—especially Clark—is excellent.

For Sevareid, as for most honest liberals, the war was what has been called a "negative" necessity. It became increasingly clear, after the Darlan affair, that this meant the sacrifice of all positive possibilities for the sake of the military destruction of German power. And in the end not even fascism was destroyed, but only its armies. It was a war without self. There was only an enemy, and the victors had nothing to be victorious about. (This lack of self is the blight of our civilization. "Not So Wild a Dream" is proof of this, but more by implication than otherwise.) Now, in the post-war world, the central problem, because of the atom bomb, is even more exclusively pure survival than it was during "the war for survival"—so the author is forced to conclude. And also with these words: "All that America truly meant, all that Americans had perished for, would be devoid of consequence or portent unless the image of society that America showed the world was that of the little Velvas as I had known, remembered, and cherished them." The reality is survival; the dream is the image of Velva.

Velva, North Dakota, is the town where Mr. Sevareid was born.

A Simple Story

AS HE SAW IT. By Elliot Roosevelt. Foreword by Eleanor Roosevelt. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.

THE thesis of this curious and lively little book is that Franklin Roosevelt, anticipating a mortal struggle between Great Britain and the Soviet Union, regarded Britain as much the greater menace to the world in which he believed. Elliott Roosevelt accompanied his father to the meetings at Argentia, Casablanca, Cairo, and Teheran. From each conference he reports—in direct quotes—the President's consistent and detailed suspicions of British perfidy. Churchill figures as combined buffoon and villain, endlessly scheming—generally to the detached amusement of the President and his son—to divert the United States from the war against Germany to the war against Russia. Hearing the British military and naval leaders on board the Augusta, Elliott found himself wondering—this was before Pearl Harbor—"whether it was the British Empire's purpose to see the Nazis and the Russians cancel each other out, while Britain grew strong." Stalin makes a reassuring entrance at Teheran, something like the wise old uncle from Australia in the Horatio Alger books. "Listening to Stalin's quiet words, watching his quick, flashing smile, I sensed the determination that is in his name: Steel."

We have not drifted away from Franklin Roosevelt's position in recent months, Elliott feels; "we are being shoved away from it, by men who should know better." Moscow gave Elliott the impression "that the Russians were almost childishly eager to get along with us." Joe Davies "demonstrated how simple the job of cooperation with the Russians is." Elliott believes we must get back on his father's track; his own specific recommendations resemble the general foreign-policy program at present advocated by such groups as the Independent Citizens' Committee of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions and the Communist Party.

The problem of the exact truth of this representation of the late President will have to await further documents. Eleanor Roosevelt's noncommittal foreword comes closer to giving Elliott's thesis a brush-off than an indorsement. She describes the book as "one observer's first-hand account," which will furnish future historians with "some" of the material for a final evaluation. "I am quite sure that many of the people who heard many of the conversations recorded herein interpreted them differently, according to their own thoughts and beliefs."

The author's discussion of his sources will not satisfy historians. It is never clear where he is writing from notes, where from memory. Some of the language ascribed to Roosevelt, as Harold Laski and Henry Commager have pointed out, is inherently implausible. It is hard to believe that F. D. R. worried day and night over Britain but never expressed a single misgiving over the U. S. S. R.; and the broad picture of his views fits a political line in just a bit too pat a fashion. Yet such a detail as Roosevelt's strange admiration for Pat Hurley ("I wish I had more men like Pat. . . . If anybody can straighten out the mess of internal Chinese politics, he is the man") serves no current political purpose and is probably reported with full accuracy.

The question of the nature of Roosevelt's views is not, of course, to be answered by spirit conversations, in Mr. Adamic's later manner, or by inner moral conviction, in the manner of those idolators of the late President who refuse to believe that he was the man his son makes him out to be. It is a matter of factual determination, and not all the returns are in. Elliott Roosevelt may be perfectly right. Jonathan Daniels, who was in the White House during this period, appears to back him 100 per cent. Eleanor Roosevelt, on the other hand, does not seem to be sure that it is all this simple; and Sumner Welles gives the same phenomenon of the collapse in United States-Russian relations after Roosevelt's death a somewhat different and very much more sophisticated explanation.

One answer is that Roosevelt was an intricate and many-faceted person—somewhat more complex than many of his observers, even maybe than some of his sons. If it turns out that the late President was not so systematically suspicious of the British and trustful of the Russians as this book suggests, then Elliott Roosevelt has written an infinitely mischievous book and has performed no service to his father's memory. But one must caution against an a priori acceptance or rejection of the thesis of "As He Saw It" simply because it coincides with or contradicts current political interests.

In any case Elliott is not burdened by doubt as to whether he is presenting the full truth. As F. D. R. observed—according to Elliott—of the son of Winston Churchill, "It must be wonderful to have so few misgivings."

The Lesson of Defeat

FOR ALL MANKIND. By Léon Blum. The Viking Press. $2.50.

THE prestige of Léon Blum can only be increased by his latest book, "A l'Echelle humaine," now excellently translated by W. Pickles under the title, "For All Mankind." In a Vichy jail soon after France's defeat, Blum had the courage and the vision to prepare for a Fourth Republic. His book was not written in self-justification but to point out to the rising generation "what can be learned from our mistakes, our illusions, and our misfortunes." In his analysis of the past he shows the balanced judgment of the philosopher and statesman, in his outlook for tomorrow the staunch optimism of the believer in democracy. "Fascism cannot last," he wrote in the darkest hour, "for two thousand years of history cannot be reduced to nothing in a decade."

He spares not even his own party, or the working class that was not ready to sacrifice its interests to those of the community; but the main responsibility for the general collapse of French society is put upon the bourgeoisie, a governing class that no longer knew how to govern, that was afraid of change, mediocre and selfish, jingoist yet willing to accept the policy of appeasement and later of collaboration. Blum foresees a second revolution that will displace a decayed class "unable to adjust its rigid temperament either to the necessities of industrial production or to the needs of democratic government." He saw clearly that the lack of cohesion among the bourgeois parties made for governmental instability, for irresponsibility, dishonesty, and bitter rivalry. Only stable parties can "respect in opposition the code of behavior from which they in turn will benefit when they become the government."

The people, wrote Léon Blum, will be the heirs of the Third Republic. They will assure the triumph of social democracy, a creed that insists on the free development of human personality as much as or more than on planned production and consumption. This political and social democracy is not possible in a state of international anarchy; indeed, "if war did not leave us at least with a determination never to accept it as inevitable, we should have to despair of the human race." A really effective international power, a superstate, must be created. This implies a concordat with Russia, perhaps the integration of that nation—as well as of Germany—in the European community.

"For All Mankind" is further proof that the great idealists of today are the only true realists.

Here are uncensored facts about Tito and Mihailovich — startling evidence behind Yugoslavia's political belligerence. Rebecca West says: "Told with commendable courage . . . David Martin has scrupulously followed fact. I can vouch for that."

Ochs sent copies of the article to his numerous cousins and uncles and aunts. And had Ben to lunch in the sacred upper room.

Nothing of this delightful nature is to be looked for in the worshipful pages of the latest biography of Mr. Ochs ("An Honorable Titan, Biographical Study of Adolph Simon Ochs," by Gerald W. Johnson, Harper, $3.50). Mr. Johnson, professor of journalism—whatever that may be—at the University of North Carolina, once wrote a book called "American Heroes and Hero Worship," and in this last work he sets earnestly about to make of the most unlikely material a new entrant for the Horatio Alger Hall of Fame.

From the post-Civil War days when young Adolph started methodically making money as a printer and publisher in Chattanooga, Honorable Reader is conducted by Mr. Johnson to the Honorable Titan days on West Forty-third Street. For reasons best known to a professor of journalism, Mr. Johnson finds it necessary to apply such words as "strong," "democratic," even "great" to the shrewd little character who at the turn of the century discovered there was a fortune to be made in printing all the dreary stuff that was littering up the floor of the city rooms of his rival publishers. For this enterprise he gathered together a staff of infinitive-splitters and hanging-phrase addicts who developed what soon came to be recognized with horror as the Times style. This consisted of telling the entire story in the lead, repeating it ad infinitum in the body, and, after a turgid summation, documenting it on page 36, col. 2, by printing everything the speaker said and the delegates resolved. To this was added the small-town success formula of printing as many names as possible, even though the holders were merely paying guests at the annual dinner of the Advertising Space Buyers' Marching Club and Sunday Morning Breakfast Association. So that, like Rubin's "From a Sandwich to an Institution," the Times became an object of awe, and American newspaperdom had its first experience with the "millennium of the minnows."

Though toward the end of his career—honorable enough in all conscience, without Mr. Johnston's protestations—an occasional piece of good writing did shine out from the serried columns of his paper, Mr. Ochs was vigilant in preserving the formula; so that today, eleven years after his death, the Times continues its triumphant and titanic way in printing all the news that is fit to, in the opinion of graduates of the tame-cat schools of journalism and tired liberal editors, print.

Two Key Books on the Vital Problem of Housing

NEW CITY PATTERNS

By S. E. SANDERS, Director City Planning Research, FWA, PBA, Washington, D. C., and A. J. RABUCK, City Planning Research, PBA, Washington, D. C.

Here is one of the most fascinating books ever written on the subject of urban design problems. Thoroughly practical and realistic, New City Patterns contains a profusion of illustrations ranging from the seamy side of blighted areas, through low-cost and medium housing projects, to the more ambitious developments expected in the near future. The book features able discussions of metropolitan planning commissions, and the exact methods to be followed to insure that each new development or improvement shall coincide with a carefully predetermined plan. 8½" x 11". $8.00

HOUSING and CITIZENSHIP:
A Study of Low-Cost Housing

By MAJOR GEORGE HERBERT GRAY, F.A.I.A., A.I.A., Consultant in Architecture and City Planning

This important new book presents a sound, well-coordinated plan for low-cost housing in both urban and rural areas in the United States. Backed by his intimate acquaintance with low-cost housing here and abroad, and based on the thesis that healthy and responsible citizenship is dependent on adequate living accommodations for all the people, the author attacks the problem of rent, and discusses all the sociological implications of the "ill-housed third" of our population. 46 full-page plates. 8½" x 11". $7.50

The Planned City

I CAME TO CITY PLANNING through the historical and aesthetic approach: how to preserve the traditional charm of Paris, without any sacrifice of convenience. But I soon realized that art had a social aspect. Urban blight and disintegration are symptoms of a moral disease; they are ugly, because they denote meanness and confusion. I have not lost interest in noble or picturesque planning, à la L'Enfant or à la Sitte. But I think less in terms of imposing civic centers and grand vistas, more in terms of slum clearance, rehousing, and transportation.

So I read "New City Patterns," by S. E. Sanders and A. J. Rabuck (Reinhold Publishing Corporation, $8), with eagerness and delight. It analyzes the causes of urban blight and proposes definite remedies. The treatment is intelligent, functional, realistic in the true sense of the term. It makes us realize evils which we might prefer to ignore—shacks in the shadow of the nation's Capitol—and possibilities that were ours, if only we had the wit and the will.

Acceptable solutions are not utopian. They have been worked out in Germany, England, Switzerland, Holland, as well as in this country. What is needed is a planned economy, the bugbear of our rugged individualists. The profit motive, unlimited, is responsible for the excessive coverage which makes the core of Manhattan blocks hideous, even on Park Avenue. The mitigated profit motive yields mitigated results: let us say Purgatory. The authors note that if Stuyvesant Town were to house decently its proposed population, it would need three times its assigned area. So government must step in "by outright subsidy or by other methods."

Subsidy is a capitulation to the profiteers. It cannot go very far: you can hardly expect landowners to subsidize urban redevelopments which will compete with their own property. The single tax and straight socialism, which the authors do not discuss, provide solutions which are frankly "radical." The question is to be aware of the evil and of its causes: and this is done excellently in "New City Patterns." When a disease has been properly diagnosed, the most conservative doctors are not afraid of drastic methods.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IT IS a commonplace of the textbooks that "Lady Windermere's Fan" is a bad play. One usually adds, of course, that it is enlivened somewhat by a liberal sprinkling of Oscar Wilde's best epigrams, and the present reviewer has retailed these easy opinions on various occasions. He feels pretty sure, however, that a good many other people will be as surprised as he to discover from the current revival at the Cort Theater that this much-maligned old semi-classic is astonishingly viable on the contemporary stage. We were, it seems clear, precisely half wrong. "Lady Windermere's Fan" is hokum of the most abandoned sort. But it is good hokum, not bad.

The obvious machinery of the plot, which seems on the printed page to clank cumbersomely along, actually revolves with well-oiled precision, and the stagiest of its climaxes are quaintly effective. When, for example, Mrs. Erlynne, that most perfectly Victorian of shady ladies, destroys her reputation anew by coming out from hiding in the wicked lord's "rooms" and thus saves the honor of her long-lost daughter, who is hiding in another corner, it is all in the truly grand style of artificiality. The calculated effect is so perfectly achieved that one all but envies those audiences who saw it in the early nineties, when the so eminently usable mythology involving "pure" women and dazzling, "dangerous" men could still be taken as part of a living religion.

We ought, we know, to despise utterly such obvious claptrap and such shamelessly false moralizing. Despite the inappropriately perverse sparkle of the witty interludes, "Lady Windermere's Fan" is in general conception a perfect example of everything Ibsen and Shaw were born to destroy. If Wilde wrote it with his tongue in his cheek he ought to have been ashamed of himself. If, as seems more likely, his originality exhausted itself at the end of an epigram and he was simply unable to form a fable which would point in the same direction as his wit, then it was a confession of weakness to fall back as he did upon a plot which must have become stale a generation before his time. But to see this artistic monstrosity given a fair chance on the stage is somewhat to understand something which often puzzles the industrious student of now forgotten theatrical successes. Intelligent people could stomach such nonsense because it was theatrically usable nonsense. One long passage in "Lady Windermere's Fan," the conversation between the men just before Mrs. Erlynne's sensational entrance, is the most dazzling series of witticisms which any British playwright had achieved since the days of Sheridan at least. But neither in its own day nor in ours is the brilliance of such displays exclusively, or perhaps even chiefly, responsible for the effectiveness of the play. It "goes" quite as much because of what is intellectually contemptible as because of what is intellectually admirable.

I am not taking the excellence of the present production for granted, but the fact remains that it is, however skilful, something which has been conceived as an almost completely straight presentation of the play Wilde wrote, not as a new "interpretation" or as an ingenious, spoofing perversion. Possibly Cecil Beaton's romantically splendiferous costumes and settings are rather more an interior decorator's dream of what a Victorian interior ought to have been like than they are actual recreations of such an interior. Delightful as they are, they may carry a faint suggestion of admiring parody. But even so it is no more than a mere suggestion, and the production as a whole succeeds because it seems to take the play on its own terms and to give it a fair chance. When, for example, Wilde in all seriousness permits his erstwhile wicked lord to lapse into some such quintessential Victorianism as the wistful remark that "we are none of us good enough for the women we marry," the present production plays up the sentiment for all it is worth, and the same is true of the most theatrical of the climaxes. But the result is that the spectator finds himself taking it all in and enjoying the whole thing much more than any mere reader of the text is likely to suppose possible. On the program eight different performers are starred or featured, but acting honors should go, especially, to Penelope Ward as the charming prig Lady Windermere herself, to John Buckmaster as Lord Darlington, to Estelle Winwood for a very crisp comedy performance of the minor role of the Duchess of Berwick, and—in the last act though not, I think, in the earlier ones—to Cornelia Otis Skinner as Mrs. Erlynne.

Of the week's other revival, "The Duchess of Malfi" (Ethel Barrymore Theater), much less can be said. In addition to the fact that both plays are old favorites of the anthologists there are other remote parallels between them: the one is in some respects as typically late Elizabethan as the other is typically late Victorian, and Webster's highly theatrical use of such Elizabethan standbys as the wicked cardinal, the sinister malcontent philosopher, and the power-mad duke is somewhat analogous to Wilde's use of the woman-with-a-past, the pure-woman-who-almost-falls, and other figures dear to the stage of his time. One might even go farther and point out that just as Wilde's play is at least partially redeemed by wit, Webster's is redeemed by poetry. But the very fact that "The Duchess of Malfi" is so much farther removed from us in time makes it harder to acclimatize in our theater, and the present rather casual, rather perfunctory production hardly achieves the task. Elizabeth Bergner plays the title role as an ingenue, and her coyness is only occasionally effective; Canada Lee, as the malcontent, proves that a Negro can successfully make up in white face, but his performance is hardly electric. Two or three of the more sensational scenes do come off pretty well, but as I left the theater I heard one young man protesting defensively to his companion: "After all, it's no duller than a lot of Shakespeare."

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

COLUMBIA has issued a set (628; $3.85) of Mozart's Concerto K. 365 for two pianos, played by Vronsky and Babin with the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra under Mitropoulos. It is a beautiful work; but performance and recording make its beauty difficult to perceive. The orchestral part gets heavy-handed treatment from Mitropoulos, and comes off the records as though through several thick cloths; the piano parts are played without sensitiveness or style or, occasionally, evenness in passage-work, and come off the records with a dull, percussive sound. Some of the surfaces of my copy are gritty, and there is some wavering of pitch.

On the other hand Columbia offers clear, bright, and sonorous recording of Milhaud's Suite Française, performed by Milhaud himself with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Set X-268; $2.85)—though the sound is more brilliant on some sides than on others, and is badly balanced in the "Ile de France" section. I am aware of the expertness with which the unpleasantly acrid music is contrived, but I don't find it interesting. The orchestra plays well.

Another set (X-270; $2.25) offers a group of four popular Strauss songs—"Ständchen," "Allerseelen," "Zueignung," and the saccharine "Morgen"—sung by Lotte Lehmann. The voice is lovely (I suspect it is the voice of several years back, judging by the bloom and opulence that the voice of today no longer has), and is used with exquisite art; and Ulanowsky's accompaniments, when not too subdued, are good. The performances are well-reproduced; the surfaces of my copy are noisy.

Lily Pons's singing of All' fors' è lui from "La Traviata" in the set entitled "Paris" (638; $3.85) is tremolo-ridden, and the orchestral accompaniment provided by Kostelanetz is feeble. The other things in the set are "La Marseillaise," "Parlez-moi d'amour," the Vernon Duke "April in Paris," and so on.

Victor has issued Grieg's Symphonic Dances Opus 64, performed by Sevitzky with the Indianapolis Symphony (Set 1066; $3.85). The music is engaging; the performance good; the recorded sound heavily sumptuous.

I expected to enjoy the Victor Herbert songs that Dorothy Kirsten sings with Russ Case and his orchestra and chorus (Set 1069; $3.85), and was surprised to find them without appeal for me. There must be a lot of other people who do like them, or Victor would not be issuing the set; and so I will report that Miss Kirsten sings them well to the customary ornate accompaniments, and that the performances are well-recorded.

I have received the first of twelve recordings that will be issued by Concert Hall Society, Inc., in limited editions of 2,000 copies to subscribers who will pay $100 (plus tax) for the series. The company states that it is setting out to record worth-while music of the past and present that has not been recorded by the big companies; that unlike those companies—which contract with performing artists for the exclusive rights to their services—it will first plan a year's repertory and then engage the artist most suitable for each work; and that it will press only 2,000 copies of each recording on vinylite because no more can be pressed without loss of the high quality that it guarantees its subscribers.

The first work of this year's series is Prokofiev's Quartet Opus 92, which has surprised me—after his other recent products—with a second movement and a finale that are superb. But the remainder of the series includes Brahms's Piano Sonata Opus 1, which is a horror; Debussy's Sonata for cello and piano, which is a late work and not good; Copland's Piano Sonata, of which I have found two hearings more than enough; and a number of works by Stravinsky, Bartok, Bowles, William Schuman, and Barber, which one would want to hear in order to decide whether one cared to own them. The Prokofiev Quartet seems to be performed well by the Gordon Quartet, except for the harsh sound of Gordon's violin, which may be caused by the recording. But the Gordon Quartet is not the group most suitable for this work, any more than Garbousova is the cellist most suitable for the Debussy sonata, or Ray Lev the pianist most suitable for the Brahms sonata—the truth being that Concert Hall Society can use only performers who are not under contract to the big companies, and that from these it has made good choices and some poor ones (Zighera of the Boston Symphony or Maas of the Paganini Quartet would have been a discriminating choice for the Debussy sonata). As for recording, the sound of the Prokofiev is remarkably clear and brilliant to the point of harshness, which may be caused by Gordon; and the vinylite which permits this quality also provides the quiet in which

MODERN MUSIC

Music and Composers of Our Time

By Max Graf

This book is from the pen of one of Europe's foremost music critics and deals with the development of music of the twentieth century.

Leading personalities in the music world of our era, composers and musicians alike, are brought to life in these easily readable but most authentic chapters. The artistic lives of our great performers are brought close to us by a man who knew them well.

But the vinylite used is not the normal black kind but the red kind similar to Victor's, which stores up electric charges that fill the grooves with dust that has to be cleaned out before each playing (with the edge of a soft-bristled handbrush pressed lightly across the grooves of the rotating record); and the vinylite requires the pickup of the phonograph not to weigh more than one ounce.

The Shape of Things

THE APPOINTMENT OF DAVID LILIENTHAL to head the American Atomic Energy Commission is the outstanding act of the Truman Administration. No post today has greater importance. Mr. Lilienthal's familiarity with the problems of atomic control is matched by his distinguished record as director of the TVA. The other four members represent a wide cross-section of American life. Robert Bacher, the only scientist in the group, was Dr. Oppenheimer's assistant on the Los Alamos project and carries the indorsement of the Federation of American Scientists. W. W. Waymack is well known as the liberal editor of the Des Moines Register and Tribune. Sumner T. Pike was an appointee of President Roosevelt to the Temporary National Economic Committee and the Securities Exchange Commission, where he showed courage and integrity. Lewis L. Strauss, a banker, served during the war as one of the chief advisers to Secretary of the Navy James Forrestal. Perhaps the most significant feature of the new commission is its civilian make-up. For the problems of atomic control are neither primarily military nor scientific: they are related to the well-being of the whole American people and—at least until an international authority is constituted—to the well-being of the people of the world. The national development of atomic energy must be closely tied to international control, and it is highly important that Mr. Lilienthal was chairman of the committee that drew up the report on which the Baruch plan was based. It is to be hoped that those who have opposed the Baruch plan recognize in the head of the Atomic Energy Commission a man who is distinguished by his achievement in linking the development of vast natural power to the furtherance of high human objectives.

GORDON CLAPP AS THE NEW DIRECTOR OF the TVA will carry on the traditions of his predecessor. It is greatly to Mr. Truman's credit that he chose for this key position a man who has already proved his competence over a period of thirteen years in the service of the Authority. Coming to the Tennessee Valley from Wisconsin, the home state of David Lilienthal, he entered the personnel department and was largely instrumental in working out the collective-bargaining system which has maintained labor relations at a high level. Since 1939, he has occupied the position of general manager. He commands the confidence of his associates in the TVA and is recognized by the people of the valley as one who has fought their battles in the past and can be counted on courageously to advance the purposes to which this great public enterprise has been dedicated.

"LET THE PRESS LOOK AFTER ITS OWN affairs," a Conservative M. P. pleaded, opposing a House of Commons resolution calling for a Royal Commission of Inquiry into the finance, control, management, and ownership of the British press. But one reason why such an inquiry is needed in Britain, and would be equally valuable here, is that the press as an institution has to a large extent abandoned the practice of self-criticism. In the days when newspapers were small and personal they seldom hesitated to call attention to one another's misdeeds. But now that publishing has become really big business, with huge investments at stake, there is a tacit understanding that dog does not eat dog, and any paper can slant or suppress news without much risk of exposure from its competitors. Freedom of the press, it seems, is freedom to discuss and investigate any matter of public interest except the press itself. This being the attitude, it is not surprising that proposals for a government-sponsored study of the newspaper industry evoked anguished cries in Fleet Street. Titled publishers charged that the Labor government, resenting criticism, was plotting to abolish freedom of the press. Working newspapermen, however, applauded; they knew how much their freedom to report the news accurately had been curtailed by the necessity of catering to the ambitions and whims of power-drunk newspaper proprietors; they knew the insecurity which concentration of newspaper ownership had brought to their profession. In the House of Commons, journalist members of Parliament moved and seconded the resolution calling for a Royal Commission. In a free vote, with the government whips called off, it was approved by 270 to 157. So at last some daylight is to be thrown on the dark recesses of Fleet Street.

WELL, IT'S BEEN A FINE FREE ELECTION. American citizens—except in the South—have had every opportunity to vote Democratic or Republican. Each party has been solidly pledged to the free-enterprise system. In the majority of cases, the candidates have been picked by the party machine. The heretics in most instances have been retired to the pasture, the heretical parties shoved off the ballot. It should be a lesson to those other democracies which have lost faith in the capitalist way of life and have even permitted labor parties and socialist parties to come to power. Take New York State, for instance. Under radical pressure, independent parties have come into being, and at least three—American Labor, Liberal, and Communist—have got on the ballot. And in every case their members and adherents have had the inalienable right of voting for the chief Democratic Party candidates on their own party line. At the Congressional or State Assembly level they are occasionally urged to vote for a good Republican or for a candidate bearing their own label. Not so, however, other parties whose independence has gone beyond the limits of decent American political behavior. The Socialists, for example, who are known to distrust both the free-enterprise system and the two time-tried parties, have, through petition, the legal right of getting on the ballot. But the law is conveniently framed so that a technical mistake—the wrong color of ink, the wrong color of paper, a single mistake in an assembly district—can invalidate the petition. Naturally, Democratic judges and lawyers, well versed in the law and the American way of elections, discover those errors. So New York Socialists, in contrast with some millions of their British, Canadian, Australian, French, and Scandinavian cousins, who talk about building a new society, find Election Day a rather dull affair. What they don't realize, of course, is that in this country we've had our revolution —as any Tammany chief or daughter of the said revolution could tell them.

THE PANIC ON THE COTTON EXCHANGES has subsided, but the sycophantic courtiers of "King Cotton" are still looking for a scapegoat instead of digesting the lessons which the incident provides. Thus, Tom Linder, Georgia Commissioner of Agriculture, asserts that "a drive by Washington" was responsible for the market break. "Speculators," he naively explains, "had nothing to do with the drop in prices; they were all bullish." That, of course, was just the trouble. Spurred on by the wild talk of Mr. Linder and others, who said cotton was worth 70 cents a pound, aided and abetted by Congress, which prevented an increase in trading margins, speculators bought futures recklessly. The turnover in future contracts during the month preceding the break was terrific, amounting to around 6,000,000 bales, which compares with visible stocks of 16,500,000 bales.

It was not only big-time gamblers like the now notorious Mr. Jordan who were plunging; reports from New Orleans say that farmers, doctors, merchants, and other non-professionals had caught the fever. In addition, textile manufacturers in many cases refrained from hedging their purchases of cotton in the hope of big inventory profits on a rising market. Under such circumstances even a small setback in prices is sufficient to launch a wave of profit-taking. That, in turn, drops quotations far enough to start involuntary liquidation, which in a top-heavy market rapidly becomes cumulative and continues until all the weak holders are eliminated. In the present instance, the situation seems to have been restored at a point that leaves cotton well above parity. And since current supplies are low in relation to demand, the short-term outlook is quite favorable. On the longer view, however, high-priced cotton must expect fierce competition both from foreign crops and synthetic fibers. Friends of the Southern farmers should help them to put their house in order instead of promising them the moon.

Doubled and Vulnerable

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE tone of Mr. Molotov's speech last week was hardly disarming. It was the speech of a man trying to pick a fight rather than reach an agreement. It seemed intended to offset any impression of good feeling that might have been created by Stalin's shrewd and balanced answers to the questions submitted by Hugh Baillie of the United Press. It was the speech of a man who lacks any sense of the minds of the people with whom he must deal. For surely if he had that invaluable sense, which Franklin D. Roosevelt possessed in such incomparable measure, he would know that his hostility and truculence are bound to build up resistance to his whole position. And this is doubly unfortunate, for many of Mr. Molotov's criticisms of Western policy were fully justified, and many of his proposals excellent, deserving honest consideration in an atmosphere of cooperation. If friends of the Soviet Union could persuade its spokesmen in the United Nations that a strategy of conciliation would advance Russia's legitimate ends and strengthen its bargaining power, they would be doing that country and the cause of peace a great service.

Luckily, Mr. Austin had the good sense to decline combat with his Russian colleague. He parried Molotov's attack in a very brief rebuttal and then dealt directly and without animus with the chief points raised by the Soviet delegate. He indorsed the proposal for a general reduction in armaments, insisting however on the necessity of "a system of inspection and other means to protect complying states against the hazards of violence and evasion." Which leads, of course, to the impasse created by Russia's objections to the American plan for atomic control. He agreed that the veto power should not be abridged, although he looked forward to some future modification of its use in situations that "merely threaten peace and security." This limitation would have ruled out the veto as applied by Russia last summer in regard to the resolution on Franco Spain. He accepted Molotov's demand that the Allied powers report on the number and strength of their military forces in non-enemy countries, but wanted the plan widened to include all armed forces, "whether at home or abroad," a suggestion obviously designed to reveal the strength of Russia's forces in the occupied countries.

These are fair, if arguable, counter-proposals. They will undoubtedly produce sharp debate in the Assembly, but the issues involved should not be dodged. On the questions of trusteeship, also raised by Mr. Molotov, Mr. Austin's reply was necessarily far less satisfactory. He said the United States hopes that the U. N. Trusteeship Council can be organized immediately to take over mandates established by the League of Nations. This is a harmless necessary hope, but it so pointedly avoided the problem of the Japanese mandated islands and of the colonial and strategic areas taken from Japan and Italy that the American position was exposed in all its embarrassing nakedness. The world knows already that this country wants to hang on to the Japanese islands for security reasons, and that powerful influences in the War and Navy departments have so far been able to exercise a veto power over efforts of the State Department to go through the motions, at least, of operating through and under the United Nations.

Drawing from life by Oscar Berger

Senator Warren R. Austin

It is nothing less than a catastrophe that this country, honestly opposed to territorial imperialism, ready at the slightest provocation to attack imperialistic tendencies in other nations, should be the chief obstacle in the U. N. to the creation of a system—and a most conservative, halting system at that—for subjecting the foreign possessions of the great powers to international supervision.

With several of the other specific questions raised by Mr. Molotov—notably Spain, Iran, Greece, and the World Federation of Trade Unions—Mr. Austin made no attempt to deal. Since his speech had been prepared in advance, the omissions can perhaps be excused, but the effect was to leave most of the good cards in the Russian hand. The great controversial issues before the Assembly, the issues which will test its power to hold the Allied world together, were laid before the delegates by the Soviet Foreign Minister. By contrast, Mr. Austin's careful discussion of the details of the United Nations constitution inevitably sounded somewhat legalistic and remote from the hard realities.

Particularly unfortunate was his failure to take up the question of Spain, for our delegation had plenty of forewarning that Spain could not be ignored. For once we could have taken the initiative in a matter which so profoundly concerns the interests, and the conscience, of the democratic world. Four times this nation has joined in pronouncements attacking the Franco regime as a fascist tyranny and an Axis creation. But when an effort is made to convert denunciation into action, we willingly let other powers assume leadership. This time, our timidity has driven us into an awkward position. Mr. Molotov supported the statement of Trygve Lie that previous "general declarations against Franco" were "absolutely insufficient" and criticized "certain great powers" for having taken upon themselves "the moral responsibility for the failure to take action in respect of a dangerous hotbed of fascism in Europe." That same day, without warning, Dr. Oscar Lange, the Polish Ambassador, with the support of Mr. Molotov, moved in the Council that the Spanish issue be dropped from the agenda so that it could be considered by the Assembly. This was followed next day with a proposal, submitted to the General Committee by the delegates of Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Norway, and Venezuela "that the relations between Spain and the United Nations be put on the agenda . . . as a separate item." The next move, less than twenty-four hours later, was again made by Poland. Wincenty Rzymowski, Polish Minister of Foreign Affairs, submitted two motions to the Assembly, the first calling for severance of relations with Franco Spain, the second barring Franco representatives from all agencies of the United Nations. The resolutions were passed to the Political and Security Committee where they will be discussed in open hearings.

What this adds up to is a broad agreement, in which East and West are equally represented, that the "accursed question of Spain," as Vishinsky described it, must be settled in the U. N. without further delay. Will this country continue to search for meaningless formulas of admonition or disapproval in order to stave off decisive action? Shall we force the smaller nations of Europe to look eastward for help? The events of the last few days should have convinced the most case-hardened appeasers in Washington that the time for stalling is definitely past and that the United States must either support the opposition to Franco in the Assembly or surrender its claim to democratic leadership.

Food and Trade

ALTHOUGH Soviet Russia's obstructionist tactics in the United Nations Assembly have been blazoned in the headlines, comparatively few Americans are aware that the United States has been the bad boy in the vital discussions of famine control in the U. N. Food and Agriculture Organization. At the Copenhagen Conference of the FAO in September, thirty-three nations, including the United States, accepted in principle the plan for a world food board drawn up by Sir John Boyd Orr, director-general of the FAO. The primary purpose of this board would be to eliminate alternate glut and famine in world food supplies by establishing food reserves adequate for any emergency and by stabilizing prices on a worldwide basis. In a word, it would apply the principles of the ever-normal granary and the AAA to what is essentially a world problem.

At first the United States hesitated; then it accepted the plan at the Copenhagen conference. A sixteen-nation preparatory commission was named to draw up detailed recommendations. At the first meeting of this commission, held in Washington simultaneously with the U. N. Assembly meetings in New York, the United States exploded a bombshell by repudiating its indorsement of the Orr plan and advancing no alternative program of its own. The American objections to a world food board, as advanced by Under Secretary of Agriculture Norris E. Dodd, were negative and defeatist in character. While agreeing that some international action to fight famine is desirable, Dodd declared that the Orr plan was too complicated, too costly, and unworkable because of the ill effects of government intervention on agricultural supply and demand. These are the kinds of objections that are constantly being made to any proposal to ameliorate the ruthlessness of the economic cycle by people whose economic thinking became rigid in the nineteenth century. But the objections come with ill grace from the representative of a government department which has successfully administered a similar program on a national scale for the past fourteen years.

British comment on the American reversal has been bitter. The New Statesman and Nation says that "in its mad rush back to selfish capitalism" the United States has apparently decided to walk out on economic cooperation just as it walked out on the League of Nations.

As far as motive is concerned, this judgment is probably too harsh. Behind America's change of front one can easily detect State Department fears that planned distribution of basic foodstuffs would conflict with efforts to promote freer trade through the projected International Trade Organization. We share the State Department's desire to see a worldwide relaxation of man-made barriers to commerce as one step toward improved living standards and the promotion of economic stability. Quota systems and other administrative devices for controlling trade will have to be cut down if the volume of international trade is to be substantially increased. But the department's objections to the world food board seem to be wholly doctrinaire, with no recognition of the significant difference between restrictive nationalistic controls and international controls which have as their aim the stimulation of production and trade. The International Monetary Fund and Bank, whose purpose is the stabilization of world currencies, also exercises a type of control over trade. Some laissez-faire economists have objected to the international monetary program on this ground. But most economists support the program as a means of combating economic nationalism. If interference with the harsh operation of the law of supply and demand can be justified in the interest of monetary stability, surely it is justified as a means of overcoming famine and its twin scourge, depression caused by undistributed surpluses.

Nations at Work

BY VERA MICHELES DEAN

The Opening Debate

Flushing Meadows, November 1

THE United Nations organization, still without a permanent home, has been forced by circumstances to start functioning before the rubble of war has been cleared away by Allied peacemakers. As a result, the U. N. from the start has had to deal with some of the unfinished business of war, while striving to elaborate long-term programs for the peace-time development of the international community. The General Assembly has thus become a sort of complementary peace conference, a forum for the exchange of grievances by the great powers and for the expression of complaints by small nations against the great.

While this situation gives the U. N. debates, both in plenary sessions at Flushing Meadows and in committee meetings at Lake Success, a character of bristling belligerency, it also endows them with a strong, indeed acrid, sense of reality. For the three main issues that have emerged in the course of the Assembly's discussions—the veto, trusteeship, and disarmament—all reflect the varying ideologies and political traditions of the member nations, and reveal the basic difficulties of effecting the necessary transition from untrammeled national sovereignty to genuine international cooperation.

VERA MICHELES DEAN, research director of the Foreign Policy Association, will contribute weekly reports on the proceedings of the U. N. Assembly.

The fundamental problem about the veto is not its possession by the five permanent members of the Security Council but the use that has been made of it by Russia. To that extent, the attacks on the veto, voiced with particular vigor by Australia and New Zealand, may well appear to Mr. Molotov as attacks on the U. S. S. R. The truth of the matter is, as should by now be generally apparent, that the Charter's provision about the veto merely acknowledges the fact that the United States, the U. S. S. R., and the British Commonwealth of Nations (with France and China included by courtesy) have each sufficient power to block action by the United Nations if they decide to do so. This does not mean that the U. N. would thereby be prevented from acting against an aggressor nation; for, as is sometimes forgotten, Article 51 of the Charter states that "nothing" in that document "shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense, if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security."

It is understandable that small nations with a long tradition of political democracy should regard the veto as a dictatorial device, and prefer a vote by majority. This view, however, confuses democratic representation within a nation, where all citizens have the equal right to vote, with equality of nations in the international community, irrespective of the fact that one nation may have a population of four hundred million, like China, another only two or three million, like some of the republics of Central America. If a change is to be made in the method of voting in the Security Council, then some system of weighting national votes must be devised. What is needed, actually, is less casting of votes, which points up differences between nations, and more attempts by the great powers to arrive at agreement through compromise.

Agreement, however, will require the kind of give and take between nations which, as Alexandre Parodi of France rightly pointed out in discussing the veto, is at present still blocked by differences of ideology that generate mutual mistrust. The two greatest powers in the U. N., the United States and Russia, add to this mistrust by indicating, every time their good intentions are put to the test, that they think of international cooperation as primarily one-way traffic. Senator Austin, for example, was just as eloquent as Mr. Molotov in urging the formation of the Trusteeship Council. Yet American admonitions to countries holding League mandates are considerably weakened by Washington's failure to make the beau geste of placing former Japanese mandates in the Pacific islands now occupied by the United States under the supervision of the U. N. Nor should it be forgotten that Russia too is a "colonial" power—with the advantage that its colonial populations, of Central Asia, for example, are accorded the rights enjoyed by all citizens of the U. S. S. R. Consequently an inquiry into the often asked question whether or not these populations have the advantages advocated by Moscow for the inhabitants of colonial territories would constitute an inquiry into Russia's domestic affairs.

Similarly, there is no doubt that all the great powers would agree with Mr. Molotov on the advisability of reducing armaments and diverting expenditures for armed forces to the pursuits of peace. The real crux of Mr. Molotov's disarmament proposal, however, concerns atomic-bomb demobilization. It represents an attempt, by throwing open a general discussion of armaments in the Assembly, to circumvent the specialized discussion of the bomb carried on by the Atomic Energy Commission of the U. N. But by whatever method the United Nations proceed eventually to reduction of armaments, there must be, as Senator Austin pointed out, two conditions: agreement on placing adequate armed forces at the disposal of the Security Council, a matter on which Russia has hitherto been silent, and provision for effective international inspection.

Meanwhile, in the opening discussions of the budget committee, both the United States and Russia, which had not hesitated to expend billions of dollars and rubles in national resources on the waging of war, displayed marked reluctance to risk relatively insignificant sums on the insurance against war represented by the U. N.

The Roots of Discord

BY MARCEL HODEN

Paris, October 15

SOME eighteen months have elapsed since the San Francisco conference, and fifteen since the Potsdam meeting. During this period the Allied governments have striven unceasingly to establish the basis of peace and to create an international organization that will assure the maintenance of peace. The Council of Foreign Ministers met at London in September, 1945, and the General Assembly and Security Council of the United Nations in January, 1946; the Foreign Ministers of the United States, Great Britain, and the Soviet Union conferred at Moscow in December, 1945; the Security Council has been sitting in permanent session in New York; during the spring and summer of 1946 the Big Four met again in Paris, and from July to October the Peace Conference was held there; now the United Nations Assembly is holding its second session in New York. One is forced to conclude that these efforts have not been very successful, for never since 1938 has there been more talk of war. Indeed, after the alarm was sounded by Henry Wallace, the situation seemed so critical that Marshal Stalin, Messrs. Bevin and Eden, President Truman, and Secretary Byrnes felt obliged to declare emphatically that the threat of war was imaginary, or that it had been whipped up by groups interested in spreading such fears, or that war was not inevitable. This war psychosis, whether or not it has been deliberately fostered, would not be so widespread in both Europe and America if the masses did not feel that the Allied statesmen had failed in their task. Since there can be no question of the good faith and the sincere desire to succeed of all concerned, one asks what errors of conception or method, what mistakes in tactics, what weakness and ineptitude have prevented all these meetings, MARCEL HODEN was principal private secretary to the Secretary General of the League of Nations from 1930 to 1938. During the war he was foreign editor of France, the French daily newspaper published in London, and military commentator for the B. B. C. and the American Broadcasting Station in Europe.

discourses, and deliberations from accomplishing their end of liquidating the war and building the peace.

The United Nations organization was conceived for a peaceful, stable, orderly world. President Roosevelt thought of it not as a field of conflict for the great powers but as the focus of their cooperation. The men who wrote the Charter, remembering the experience of the League of Nations, had the foresight to exclude from it any reference to the preparation or the application of the peace treaties. Those matters, they felt, should be handled in conversations and negotiations among the powers involved. In the same spirit the authors of the Charter had taken care to write into the Dumbarton Oaks agreement the definite stipulation that the Security Council, unlike the old League Council, should not intervene in the early stages of a dispute but should be the court of last resort after all attempts at conciliation through bilateral negotiation or the mediation of a third party had failed. When the Charter was drawn up, Roosevelt and Stalin and probably Churchill assumed that no appeal would be addressed to the Security Council without preceding or immediately following discussions among the representatives of the permanent members of the Council, especially of the United States, Great Britain, and the Soviet Union. That was the procedure at Geneva. No serious issue was presented to the League Council until after preliminary agreement—on the way the problem was to be presented and on the possible solutions—had been reached between France and Great Britain, the nations which were the driving force of the League.

It cannot be repeated too often that without preliminary understandings among the great powers, constant adjustment of their interests, and rigorous observance of the Charter's provisions, the Security Council is doomed to impotence. Hence its failure in the case of Iran and, as an inevitable consequence, in the cases of Greece and Indonesia. Whatever the cause of these disputes—and one can, for example, reproach the Soviet Union for not having respected the letter of a treaty—none of them should have been brought before the Council except for the purpose of having that body verify the existence of an accord already reached by the parties directly interested. The issues of Iran, Greece, and Indonesia, particularly the first two, are matters which a shrewd and prudent diplomacy would have known how to settle outside the U. N. They touch vital interests which no amount of public discussion can satisfy or make disappear; they can be resolved only if they are considered as part of the general situation, for which a basis of bargaining must eventually be found.

The whole course of events since the close of the war is the result of this error. And one can include, perhaps the atomic bomb, whose use Roosevelt, according to reliable witnesses, would not have authorized. In the minds of those responsible for its use, the bomb would not only end the war with Japan quickly but also serve as a warning to the Soviet Union and, above all, prevent it from getting its share, as agreed upon with Roosevelt, from the defeat of Japan. But—though certain people may think otherwise—the atomic bomb was not and is not a predominant factor in determining Soviet policy. Stalin's reply to the questions asked by Alexander Werth of the London Sunday Times proves that. Moscow's attitude toward the peace settlement seems to have been largely determined by a shift in American policy. Mr. Byrnes's speech of February 28, 1946, Churchill's address at Fulton a few days later, and the comments they drew from American and British papers were interpreted in Moscow and throughout the world as announcing the reestablishment of the Anglo-American dyarchy which had been supplanted at Teheran by the British-American-Soviet triumvirate.

Washington's sudden, decisive volte-face and the deployment of American naval and air forces which followed did not immediately affect Soviet policy. But at the end of May Molotov publicly denounced the "Anglo-American bloc." Apparently in the interim the deliberations of the four Foreign Ministers had convinced Moscow that the Anglo-Americans were planning to go farther than merely reject the claims which the Soviet government had believed to be legitimate after Washington and London accepted Moscow on an equal footing. In the attitude of the British and American diplomats toward the peace treaties for the countries of Eastern Europe Russia saw an indication that Washington and London intended to challenge its claim to the fruits of victory, to nullify with the aid of elements disposed to counter-revolution the political and social transformations effected in the border countries, and to restore regimes hostile to the Soviet Union in these regions. This time it was not simply a question of the Soviet Union's place in the post-war world but of its very security, as conceived by the Soviet leaders. From that moment suspicion and profound distrust were awakened in the Russians, making them more and more intransigent, more and more indisposed to a cooperation which in their eyes was tantamount to subordination. The British and Americans, for their part, relying on unverified reports from divers emigration and opposition circles, believed that the Soviet Union was so weakened that they had only to reject any compromise to force it to yield. One may even wonder whether the American and British delegations were not deliberately seeking a rupture. As one New York paper put it, "Rather an impasse than a compromise."

The utilization of the U. N. for purposes which that institution was never intended to serve, purposes contradictory to its charter, and the return to a system of Anglo-American dyarchy explain the deterioration in Big Three relations and consequently in the world situation. Mr. Byrnes may have urged the calling of the Peace Conference in the hope that it would lend a "democratic" character to the preparation and adoption of the peace treaties, but certainly the impression was soon created, and not only among the Russians, that the American and British leaders intended to use the debates to mobilize world opinion against Soviet policy. One is tempted to believe that at one moment Mr. Byrnes thought of intrusting to the U. N.—which is utterly incompetent in such a matter—the task of drafting the treaties. In any case, the Peace Conference, conceived and conducted not as a diplomatic congress but as a parliamentary assembly, was unable to modify in any considerable measure the texts submitted by the Big Four, still less to find acceptable solutions for problems on which the Big Four had reached no agreement. Turning the weapon of publicity against his Anglo-American partners, Molotov went over the heads of the delegates and addressed himself to the world, presenting in the most precise, frank, and vigorous language heard in a long time an outline of Soviet policy as opposed to British and American policy. It would be a mistake to think that his words were completely lost on the world.

Let us hope that the proper conclusions will be drawn from the lessons of the Paris conference. To judge from his address to the American people on October 18, Mr. Byrnes has reflected on the results of his program. At the U. N. Assembly the American and British delegations may shortly have an opportunity to clarify their position on an important point. Several representatives of the small nations have already raised the question of the veto. In the present state of international relations, suppression of the veto power would be fatal to the functioning if not to the very existence of the U. N. Contrary to the general opinion, the use of the veto is not against the interest of the small or medium powers. One might say that the veto is the counterpart in the peace of the demand for unconditional surrender which Roosevelt and Churchill adopted as their line in the war. Through their adherence to the policy of unconditional surrender—Stalin was not present at Casablanca when it was formulated but subscribed to it later—the protagonists in the anti-Hitler, anti-fascist struggle agreed not to enter into any negotiations with the Axis to bring about a compromise peace. For the Allies the Casablanca formula was both a restraint and a guaranty. The same is true of the veto. This right which has been accorded to the "Big Five" imposes on each of them the obligation to do nothing against the others but always to seek formulas of agreement and compromise. Another of its purposes is to remove the temptation to build up artificial and ephemeral majorities. From this point of view, the veto right, far from jeopardizing the sovereignty of the nations which do not enjoy it, may be considered a safeguard of their independence and freedom of action. Someone has said that the small powers can disturb the peace but only the big ones can destroy it. Nothing could be more true. All wars between small nations have been settled by the big powers.

Moreover, contrary to another widely held opinion, the veto right does not make the Security Council impotent in critical cases. Unanimity—that is, a generalized veto—was required in the Council of the League of Nations, and when Fascist Italy, then a member of the Council, attacked Ethiopia, the unanimity rule prevented the Council from naming Italy as the aggressor and from applying the sanctions provided by the Charter. This difficulty, however, was circumvented: the members of the Council, not the Council itself, held a meeting which the Italian member did not attend, and each of them, as a representative of his country, declared that in his opinion the Italian government was guilty of an act of aggression which necessitated the application of sanctions. The Italian government did not fail to point out that these declarations were ineffective since one of the fundamental provisions of the Charter had been violated. But the important thing was that they registered the determination of the British government and, to a lesser degree, of the French government, then headed by Laval, to declare war on Italy, if necessary, in order to wrest from it the fruits of its aggression. London's attitude secured the adhesion of fifty-two other nations. Acting outside the rules of the Charter, they proclaimed Italy to be guilty of aggression and agreed to impose sanctions. The same procedure could be followed if one of the members of the Security Council were found guilty of an aggressive action. Then the question would be, not whether the veto applied in such a case, but whether the other powers were ready to use arms and whether they were capable of forming a coalition to prevent the act of aggression. In the final analysis aggression poses a problem of will and force, not of juridical rule.

The mistakes of a technical and political nature committed since the end of the war are not irreparable. But for the United Nations to survive and develop and to give the world peace, several conditions must be fulfilled. First, Big Three unity must be restored. Secondly, the Charter of the United Nations must be respected by all and not used for purposes that are alien to its intention; it would be dangerous to try to modify it at this time. Finally, there must be a courageous, frontal attack on the problem of liquidating the war. In his message of October 18 Mr. Byrnes said he did not consider the status quo sacrosanct. American diplomacy must give practical application to this statement by offering to serve as mediator between the British and Russians.

MacArthur in the Paddy Fields

BY HAROLD STRAUSS

GENERAL MacARTHUR'S land-reform program has backfired so badly that it may offset all his constructive achievements. Militarism has always drawn its real strength from the rural areas of Japan, where the mentality of the inhabitants is so backward and the conditions of their life so oppressive that they look upon an army career as a noble and desirable escape. Feudalism has not been conserved by despotic political control alone; it is deeply rooted in the thoughts, sentiments, and usages of the villagers. As an editorial in a leading Japanese magazine declared in an ominous but representative vein, "The hard labor and poverty of the farmers unwittingly fostered the tendency toward feudalism and strengthened the rapport between the farmer and the soldier which offered militarism its base. A recurrence might nurture hopes of revenge for our race, and so would be inimical to peaceful policies." But up to the present the villages, in democratic elections, still persist in returning the old officials to office.

The Supreme Commander and his staff (SCAP) recognized in a general sort of way before they set foot in Japan that they had to break the back of rural feudalism. But they made no advance preparations for doing this, either by developing plans or by procuring qualified personnel. Thus there developed one of those situations which, even though they are the rule rather than the exception in the army, always seem to be importations from Never-Never Land.

The Natural Resources Section, the logical agency, had a galaxy of production experts but none who would touch a socio-political problem such as land reform. It refused the job. The next choice, the large, vigorous, and influential Economic and Scientific Section, was geared to handle only financial, industrial, labor, and scientific problems, and it too begged off. The baby was finally deposited on the doorstep of that haven for orphan problems, the Civil Information and Education Section.

At that time C. I. and E. was staffed with young men quite capable of publicizing the programs of other SCAP agencies but not expected to develop programs themselves. Nevertheless, the writing of the land-reform directive became the responsibility of a C. I. and E. captain who had been a Chicago newspaperman and a lieutenant who had done some radio-script writing. It was not the fault of these gentlemen, and it is no slur upon them, to say that what they knew about the technical problem of land reform in Japan could have been balanced on the tip of a chopstick.

HAROLD STRAUSS, chief editor of Alfred A. Knopf, served a year in Tokyo in the Civil Information and Education Section of SCAP. Two weeks ago he wrote on Big Business in Japan. A third article will appear in the near future.

Though they painstakingly interviewed all kinds of Japanese farm-association officials and agricultural experts, their approach remained primarily American. They envisioned turning the oppressed tenant farmers into freeholders who would acquire the sturdy, independent views of yeomen. To many of us this objective seemed unexceptionable at the time. The government was to be required to force the sale of large land holdings, and to facilitate the purchase of land by tenant farmers through cheap credit and easy payments. This, I said to myself, is something we could use in America, especially in the South. I too was thinking in terms of America, where a modicum of the spirit if not always the means of independence is to be found, and land is plentiful.

The original draft of the government bill which embodied in detail the requirements of the broad SCAP directive was prepared by an official of the Japanese Ministry of Agriculture who had once been imprisoned as a Communist. It was "radical" in the sense that it limited land ownership to a maximum of 7.5 acres. At a Cabinet meeting held later this figure was raised to 12.5 acres, which would have left more than a million tenant families without land.

The Japanese conservatives and most farmers were content with the bill. And the Japanese liberals also, whether influenced by their constant sycophancy or by the same fundamental misconceptions which plagued SCAP, at first accepted its basic principles. For instance, Rikizo Hirano, who had been expelled from Tokyo Imperial University some fifteen years ago for radicalism, announced that the bill would democratize rural life, ameliorate the food situation, and improve relations between landlords and tenants. True, he joined other progressives in attacking subordinate provisions: it was psychologically wrong to frame the bill merely as an amendment to the hated and regressive war-time Farm Land Adjustment Law; under the 12.5-acre limit the million families unable to purchase land would slip from tenancy to the lower status of farm hands; the persons best able to take advantage of the easy credit terms would be the small landowners now holding less than 12.5 acres; the agricultural associations, which were intrusted with supervision of the forced sales, were known as the tools of the war-time government and the landowners; worst of all, the spirit of the law could be easily evaded by transferring excess acreage to relatives.

Serious as these criticisms were, SCAP believed that they did not touch the basic conception of the reform and that specific points of administration were better dealt with by Japanese political action than by a new directive. It was strengthened in this view by the editorials in supposedly progressive papers; one in a labor journal said, "By SCAP directive agricultural revolution has been made the foundation of the reconstruction of Japan. Past Japanese imperialism can be traced to the exploitation of poor peasants."

Perhaps the wide acceptance of the principle of the bill sprang from the general belief that the Potsdam Declaration required the de-industrialization of Japan. Teiji Katsuta wrote that "there is no alternative but for all the people to engage in farming," and similar extreme statements were common. At any rate, the bill was enacted and became effective on February 1. Shortly afterward SCAP had to recognize that the evasions foreseen by Hirano and others were actually occurring, and one of its spokesmen expressed discontent with the situation. This statement released a flood of denunciations of the whole program.

The first open attack on small-scale farming as an ideal —a criticism which cut to the core of the SCAP directive—came from the excellent left-wing magazine Nippon Hyoron. "If the intensification of small-scale farming is achieved," it growled, "then at best Japan will become a silk-producing colony of the United States. Such a program would wed agricultural areas to feudalism and reaction." A legal journal, Horitsu Shimpo, produced convincing evidence that the bill was a replica of others that had turned out to be fiascos, especially of the infamous measure in the early Meiji era which stilled popular clamor by selling land to tenants at high prices under mortgages and by permitting foreclosure when payments could not be met, as was soon the case. A relatively conservative contributor to Horitsu Shimpo predicted stuffily that "undesirable landholding may ensue," and that "the inevitable laws of supply and demand and the fundamentals of human nature will eventually cause tenants to revert to their old status again." In truth, the SCAP directive which had seemed so admirable on first reading had naively played into the hands of the Japanese reactionaries, who had had long experience in meeting demands for land reform.

Japanese liberals must share the blame with SCAP. It was typical of their blundering and vacillation that the same Hirano who in December had scratched SCAP's back was in March denouncing the principle of small landholdings: "Past reforms have always aimed at creating small holders. But to these small holders the land itself was as heavy a burden as rent to the tenants. The life of a small holder is nothing but a vain effort not to lose his land and a constant reduction of his standard of living." Another commentator said: "The act is the incarnation of the traditionally reactionary policy of the Ministry of Agriculture. Small-scale ownership is the citadel of jingoists who despise reform, admire the army, and clap their hands for a strong foreign policy." Like the other liberals who now attacked the act, this writer concluded that "only mechanization, which in turn is possible only after the organization of large collective farms, can make rural democracy possible. Although the farmers have always been anxious to own land, past reforms have been initiated to protect landowners and rich farmers in times of deflation. Tenants were raised to the status of small holders in periods of cheap money and were forced to surrender their land when depression set in. The present program is no exception."

Almost overnight scores of progressive writers joined in the attack. Many, like Hirano, had to eat their own earlier words. One of the leading economic experts, Kiyoshi Tsuchiya, had written in December that "the creation of landed farmers will destroy feudalism. Here is a solid basis for democratic development." But in May he was denouncing the reform as "a half-hearted compromise engineered by reactionary forces." A famous Socialist on the staff of Tokyo Imperial University concluded that "the government reform plan aims neither at enlarging the scale of management nor at socializing management; mere possession of land is, needless to say, not socialistic. The small-holder system has a connection with absolutism, and therefore the Japanese government has long sought to create small holders." Another prominent progressive said that "the government's program might be a step forward if these were the days of black reaction, but at a time when democracy is ascendant, it is only a breakwater against real agrarian revolution."

The conclusion of most progressive theorists was that the standards of living of the Japanese farmer could not be raised until farming was mechanized, and that mechanization was blocked by excessively small holdings. SCAP studies of the problem reached the same conclusion. But in spite of this, SCAP did not act. More surprisingly, neither the Social Democratic Party nor the Communist Party withdrew its support of the basic principles of the land-reform act; both contented themselves with attacks on its corrupt administration. They even maintained their initial insistence that 7.5 acres rather than 12.5 acres should be the legal maximum. So anomalous was the situation that the same theorists who had rejected the principle of small holdings were forced, when speaking under party auspices, to demand the smaller maximum. At the very most, some of them were allowed to advocate simultaneously a guaranty of "the right of tillage," which would give tenants far greater legal protection without destroying the identity of large landholdings and potential mechanization. One said, "If the right of tillage is secured, and if effective tenants' unions are organized, it is not decisively important for tenants to own land."

As the general election approached, the Communists sought to underbid the Social Democrats by proposing the ridiculously uneconomic limit of 3.75 acres. In this sheer political opportunism they were joined by the Soviet member of the Allied Council for Japan, General Derevyanko, who certainly might have been expected to understand the retrogressive nature of small holdings. The mathematics of his proposal to make land available to all tenant families required, because of the sheer scarcity of tillable land and the ever-present population pressure, a maximum limit somewhat under 7.5 acres. The politics of his proposal required recognition that the Japanese peasants, like peasants all over the world, aspired to land ownership.

Of course it was short-term political expediency that underlay the confusion. The best estimates are that 60 per cent of the rural population supported the land-reform program, while most of the rest wanted to be more secure in their tenancy and to be permitted to pay their rent in cash, as the act stipulated. As for collectivization and mechanization, such ideas were far beyond their political horizons. Thus the Marxist parties, in making a bid for rural support, were forced into an equivocal position. Some of their spokesmen were so embarrassed that they attempted explanations. I remember Shin Takano produced one, couched in elephantine Communist phraseology, which referred to "social contradictions" that necessitated simultaneously appeasing the bourgeois inclinations of the peasants and driving for the socialization of the land system.

The behavior of Japanese left-wing politicians can be explained if not excused as opportunism. But the behavior of SCAP cannot be justified. While it is denouncing the old militarists, it is fertilizing the soil in which a new spirit of militarism will thrive. While it is setting up a fine-sounding new constitution, it is fostering in rural areas the spirit that will evade its provisions. "Forty acres and a mule" may have a grand sound to American ears, but the application of this slogan, born in a spacious land, can only bring disaster in narrow Japan. The only acceptable farm policy is one that will simultaneously raise both the standard of living of the Japanese peasants and their productivity. Lack of such a policy must have one of two results: either Japan will remain permanently an expensive ward of the United States, or it will be obliged to resume the drive for export markets, based on sweated labor and backed by rural militarism, which led to war.

Southern Boom, Cotton Bust

BY A. G. MEZERIK

Atlanta, October 29

COTTON prices have crashed. In a period of days market declines have swept away $425,000,000 of the South's most important economic stake. Nine million families are directly or indirectly dependent upon cotton for their livelihood, and all Southerners will feel the effect of the shadow spreading from the exchanges. Always the gateway to the South, Atlanta is today a vantage point from which one can see a depression around the corner. Watching a crisis in the making is a curious thing, made doubly so because the South is at present in the best financial condition it has known since the Civil War.

A. G. MEZERIK is the author of "Revolt of the South and West," which was recently reviewed in The Nation by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. He is now traveling through the South and Middle West gathering material on economic and political conditions.

The South has nibbled away, during the war years, a sizable chunk of its indebtedness to the North. Mortgages, bonds, notes, and other loans have been paid off, reduced, or refinanced. Interest rates have eased. The town of Winder, Georgia, initially paid 8 per cent on its bond issue of $20,000; recently this issue has been refinanced at 1¼ per cent. Athens, Georgia, has reduced, in similar fashion, its interest load from 6 per cent to 1¼ per cent on an issue of $100,000.

A steady stream of money has been pouring out of the South and into the coffers of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia banks; into the New York and the Metropolitan insurance companies; into Hartford and the Prudential. But this time it is not the old, monotonous colonial story of money going out of the South and nothing coming back. This outflow has been helpful, for as debts have been cleared, the interest load, always onerous for the South, has decreased. The debt-free collateral is capital, and together with cash now held by Southern capitalists it constitutes a tidy sum with which independent operators in the South can venture investments in Southern industry. These are the developments which have contributed to a novel and welcome feeling of optimism among Southern business men.

Yet it's all relative; the South, by Northern standards, is still very poor indeed, and though its debts have been reduced, the overwhelming bulk of Southern industry, transportation, and commerce is still controlled by Northern capital. The recent purchase by Northern interests of Southern-owned textile mills at a price of $19,000,000 indicates that absentee ownership is still very much in the picture. However, Southerners can afford to smile about this invasion, for at $19,000,000 the obsolete textile equipment involved in these sales is so terribly overpriced that the new owners can never hope to make money except at present short-lived inflationary sales prices. But this is an exception, not the rule. Monopoly during the war strengthened its hand everywhere, including the South. So the South will continue to ship out huge sums, in interest and profits.

Meanwhile the new prosperity, slight though it is, has been felt by both farmers and industrial workers. In Georgia the record of the three months ending June 30, 1946, bears out this trend. The total paid to wage-earners by businesses employing eight or more workers was two and a half times the amount paid in the similar quarters of 1939 and 1940. The wage bill, $205,000,000, was larger by $13,000,000 than the amount paid in the same period in 1945, when the war was still on. The total number of employees in 1946 was about 30 per cent above the pre-war average. Textiles, the largest Georgia industry, employed 106,000 persons in June compared with 90,000 in pre-war years.

New and wholesome efforts are being made by Southerners. Three young Southerners are putting together a slick, modern, Time-style weekly dedicated to Southern affairs. The three men are liberals, and a mass publication such as their projected Pace, designed as it is primarily to reach Southern business men, is a new field for liberals. Philip Hammer, William R. Davlin, and Charles G. Helfenstein are the men involved, and their interest and influence are typical of those of the new Southern progressive.

All this is due to the tiny release from driving poverty brought by the war years. Even the old-line conservatives have relapsed a bit. Their attitude toward the C. I. O. Southern organizing drive has been tempered. There have been no repetitions of Harlan County, of Bibb County, or of Mississippi, and I do not think there will be—although depression may temporarily sharpen the the conflict. The outcome of the Columbia trials in Tennessee dramatizes, more than anything else, the fact that the old venomous anti-Negro and its allied anti-labor attitude is losing its grip. Fifteen years ago it would have been difficult even to imagine the acquittal of twenty-three out of twenty-five Negroes standing trial.

Despite Talmadge's victory in Georgia, the political picture is not all dark. It is true that the liberal and progressive forces, ordinarily the most valiant of Southerners, have been badly shaken by the Talmadge victory, but the political facts do not justify their deep gloom. James V. Carmichael, Governor Talmadge's opponent, did win the largest popular vote. And this was more difficult than it sounds. The opposition to Talmadge was split between ex-Governor Ed Rivers, who had a fairly clean labor record, and Carmichael. Add to this that Carmichael was neither a good leader, a progressive figure, nor a popular spokesman. In fact, in some trade-union circles Carmichael was characterized as almost anti-labor. Obviously no one was able to work up a crusading zeal in his support; yet the progressive feeling throughout Georgia—intent on defeating Talmadge—was strong enough to give Carmichael the biggest vote.

Governor Arnall and some of his associates are not as clear as they might be about these reasons for Carmichael's defeat. They tend to place the blame on the Southern liberals instead of on the unit system which euchered Carmichael out of the victory he actually won. They also forget Carmichael's own weakness as a candidate—a human failing on their part, since they picked him. Finally they ignore the cost of making a series of alliances with old-line Democrats who were committed only to staying in public office and who deserted Arnall's ship for a cosier deal with Talmadge. Little is heard of these basic reasons for Talmadge's victory. Instead, the liberals are blamed for not working harder and for not being "hard-headed, practical" politicians.

The liberals momentarily feel that there is no hope under Talmadge. Some even talk of leaving the state. But they needn't leave and they shouldn't, for the truth is that there are more progressives than reactionaries in Georgia, and the Carmichael vote should have proved it to everyone. In fact, there are more progressives in the South than ever before. "Big Jim" Folsom rode into office in neighboring Alabama by promising an administration like that given Georgia by Arnall. And Governor Arnall is more popular in the South than any Southerner has been since Tom Watson. He is in demand for lectures in nearly every town. The farmers and workers want to hear what he has to say, and they welcome his progressive approach. However, in Georgia, Talmadge will be in office and not Arnall. And of course he will be reactionary. He will favor, as much as he dares, the "hate" movements, and he will deliver to the big Northern corporations who were his supporters. Talmadge has already promised Thomas L. Camp, executive of the Georgia organization of railroads, the secretaryship of the state senate. In that job Camp will be in charge of all bills. But Arnall has really sparked a Southern populist movement, and if it seems to people in Atlanta, so close to the scene, to be in permanent eclipse, that feeling will pass.

Aside from the political, there are important economic and social liabilities in the Southern pattern today. More even than in the North the housing shortage has affected the urban areas. This is reasonable enough in the light of the much higher birth rate in the South. Whites and Negroes alike suffer from lack of housing, but with this explosive difference. In Atlanta Negroes constitute one-third of the population and are constricted into one-eighth of the land area—which makes the situation acute. Incidents have already occurred. In one block where Negroes succeeded in buying all the property except eight houses and a church, two of the new tenants have been threatened with death and one Negro has been manhandled. On another street shots were fired into one house and others were damaged. No arrests were made.

Yet these tensions too have been lessened by the increased prosperity. The South's economic pie is larger than it has ever been: more pieces are available and each is larger. The furious scrabble for a tiny part of the pie has in the past played into the hands of the political demagogues, racists, quislings, and industrial and agricultural barons who used the "divide and conquer" technique to perpetuate their rule. And this brings me back to my starting-point, for the economic pie is beginning to grow smaller again.

Cotton—still the base of the Southern economic pyramid—is way down. The effect of its dizzy fall will be profound. And the signs of inflation's withering touch are already plain. The number of persons who could afford to buy more than the barest necessities has only recently expanded, and on them the effect of rapidly rising prices is instantaneous. One can almost see the buyers driven out of the market. Of course the demand for all kinds of goods will continue to be great, but as prices mount, here where purchasing power is thinnest, the effective demand visibly diminishes. It is not just because folks need food and shelter and clothing that we have scarcities, but because people have money and can afford to buy the things they want. Each day the soaring prices leave fewer people in the circle of those able to buy, and each day the scarcity grows less. Soon it will no longer be scarcity but glut; people will still want things but have no money to buy them with. In the South, home of the poorest of American poor relations, that day is again just around the corner.

In the Wind

THE WIND DEVOTES ITSELF THIS WEEK TO a compendium of worthy utterances, both by men and by institutions. Heading the list is Court Asher, publisher of X-Ray, who recently referred to General Eisenhower as a "Swedish Jew."

MEANWHILE, editor Luka Palamarchuk of the Ukraine's Radyanska Ukraina told a New York Times reporter that "there is no criticism of Josef Stalin in Soviet newspapers, because Stalin never does anything that merits criticism."

A MAN was interviewed by the University of Denver's National Opinion Research Center the other day. He was asked: "Do you think Negroes are as intelligent as white people?" He answered: "No." He explained: "Some Negroes you couldn't learn anything."

H. W. PRENTISS, JR., who seems to have earned his own regrets, said in a recent address: "Unfortunately, freedom and physical luxury seem to be congenitally incompatible." Mr. Prentiss, who ought to know, is president of Armstrong Cork and past president of the N. A. M.

A PROCLAMATION by Thomas E. Dewey of New York named the week before election as that state's "Apple Week."

THAT SAME PRE-ELECTION WEEK, the Wayne County (Michigan) Republican Finance Committee expressed its fear of a repudiation, by the county, of Senator Vandenberg. "This," quavered the committee, "could have awe-inspiring repercussions."

AND THE RESEARCH STAFFS of three California industrial-employment commissions have announced breathlessly to Governor Warren that unemployment in California dropped in September and that "the chief reason for this rapid decline in unemployment was the large expansion in employment."

"SO LITTLE," says the Pennsylvania Railroad in a pamphlet urging raises in freight rates, "has never before meant so much to so many."

A SMALL SQUIB in the New York Herald Tribune announcing the resignation of Victor Emanuel, director of General Aniline and Film Corporation, carried this headline: "Resigns Dictatorship."

CLASSIFIED AD in the Bridgeport (Connecticut) Telegram: "A Master Baker seeks a new position. Have good bread formula. . . . Can handle union and other un-American element. Pay-roll padding if desired."

SAM GOLDWYN, who ought to be used to this sort of thing, spreads two pages of blurb for his new movie, "The Best Years of Our Life," in a recent issue of Time, the infallible magazine. "In the beginning was the word," starts the advertisement, with an asterisk after "word." At the bottom of the page: "* Genesis."

The People's Front

TO TALK about fascism today is, for many Americans, like talking about yellow fever. The disease is out of date, and, in any case, an extremely boring topic. Of course they show a certain tolerance toward the Spaniards: "Those poor people still have Franco to contend with; so it is understandable that they should be obsessed by the specter of fascism." On the whole, however, their attitude is one of distaste, as if the Spaniards, suffering from amoebic dysentery, had committed the faux pas of describing their intestinal irregularities more graphically than etiquette permits. But now an outstanding American, O. John Rogge, has come forward to tell his compatriots that the fascist amoeba is not confined exclusively to third-rate countries; that even a powerful democracy like the United States has its carriers of infection—a Montana Senator or the president of a powerful trade union. It is important that an American should have formulated this J'accuse, an American who until now was considered eminently qualified for a high post in the Department of Justice. The most important point in the whole story is Mr. Rogge's warning that "the fascist danger to the United States is not past." As a matter of fact, many Europeans believe that the threat has actually increased since the end of the war, both in this country and abroad.

Much has been written about the attempts of the old fascist parties to come back, but few Americans are aware that side by side with these political organizations are movements whose aim is to defend monopoly capitalism against the determined efforts of the left parties which are now pushing political democracy in the direction of an economic democracy opposed to the oppression of cartels and trusts. One of these movements is synarchism, not to be confused with the organization that has spread over Mexico and found its roots in local political rivalries and clerical-agrarian reaction. Synarchism as a worldwide conspiracy is attempting to take over the functions of the fascists in those countries where the latter cannot operate openly or to ally itself with existing fascist groups.

Michael Sordet, in a remarkably documented article, The Secret League of Monopoly Capitalism, published in the scholarly Swiss review, Schweizer Annalen (No. 2, 1946-47), gives us a full description of the synarchist movement in Europe. He describes the synarchists as "the representatives of international high finance," who not only helped to bring fascism to power in Germany and to provoke the war, from which they reaped enormous profits, but who contributed to the defeat of France and the rise of Pétain and his traitorous clique.

His account of the organization in France reads almost like a detective story. Le Mouvement Synarchique d'Empire (M. S. E.) was founded in Paris in 1922, a few weeks before—what a singular coincidence!—Mussolini's March on Rome. Its original promoters numbered seven, three of whom have since been identified as Baron Leo de Nervo, with connections in some fifty financial and heavy-industry enterprises, Maxime Renaudin, a financier known to represent international Catholic interests, and Jean Coutrot, a close friend of Marshal Pétain. The M. S. E. is rigidly aristocratic in structure: members are recruited in powerful big-business circles and are expected to enrol new adherents from among their friends. Every precaution is taken to insure secrecy: if a person seems desirable because of his position, he is subjected without his knowledge to a careful investigation that may last for several years before he is asked to join. The probe covers the most intimate details of his life—family relationships, love affairs, hobbies, opinions expressed in conversation, emotional stability, and so on. The candidate has no contact with the organization until the day he is invited to sign up; at that moment he makes the acquaintance of a single member, the person who solicits his application. Then he receives a copy of the "Pacte synarchiste révolutionnaire," a hundred-page booklet, bound with a sealed gold band which bears two identifying numbers—his own and that of his sponsor. About the organizational set-up and the policy-making bodies, he is told nothing.

Frenchmen in general learned of the existence of the M. S. E. in the summer of 1941 when Jean Coutrot died under mysterious circumstances which were never cleared up. A collaborationist newspaper, l'Appel, which carried the announcement of his death, revealed at the same time that most of the ministers and generals in the Vichy entourage belonged to this secret society. Coutrot had told an intimate friend that the directing body of the M. S. E. consisted of four people, but he mentioned no names.

What are the contents of the "Pacte synarchiste révolutionnaire," so vigilantly controlled? The most important section provides for the division of the world into five great fédérations impériales, or sociétés mineures des nations. Metropolitan Britain and its colonies and dominions make up one. The federation of pan-American nations comprises the United States and the other countries of the Western continent with the exception of Canada. The pan-Eurasian federation consists of the Soviet Union, including all its Asiatic republics but excluding Finland and the Baltic states. The pan-European-African federation takes in Western Europe, including Finland, the Scandinavian and Baltic countries, and the African continent excluding the British colonies. China and Japan head the pan-Asiatic federation.

The creation of five completely autarchic economic units would make trade agreements between nations superfluous. More important to the M. S. E., Russia would be politically dwarfed by the European bloc with its 450,000,000 inhabitants, its highly developed industries, and the rich resources of the African hinterland. As for the internal structure of the various countries, the synarchists intend to replace the parliamentary system in the present democracies with the corporate state.

Starving the Customers

CONTROLS are falling like the autumn leaves; those beneficent monarchs of the market, supply and demand, are reclaiming the kingdom of prices from the tyrants of OPA; production is booming and profits are soaring; the seers tell us that the New Deal night is over and the Republican Party about to recapture its heritage. Why, oh why, then, is there so much melancholy in Wall Street? Why are the bears dancing triumphantly around the stricken bulls? What is the fly in the capitalist ointment now?

Well, that is not hard to guess; it's those rapacious trade unions that are spoiling everything by insisting that with the lid off prices their members are entitled to more wages. Workers in automobiles, steel, rubber, textiles, coal, and many other industries are preparing to ask for higher pay to offset the higher cost of living. Consequently many employers fear that they will either have to pay up, a painful prospect, or face a new and costly round of strikes.

Hoping to head off these awkward demands, or at least to prepare public opinion to resist them, the spokesmen of business have started a heavy barrage of propaganda. One favorite argument is that the rise in the cost of living during the past year is solely due to the increases in wages which labor, aided and abetted by the government, extorted from industry last winter. Actually the extent of those increases has been greatly exaggerated. It is frequently implied that the pattern was set by the 18¼-cent raise obtained by the automobile workers, but figures recently published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics show that only 25.6 per cent of the workers in all manufacturing industries received increases of 18½ cents or more per hour. The following table shows how others fared:

10 cents to less than 18½ cents	37.9 per cent
5 cents to less than 10 cents	13.5 " "
Less than 5 cents	1.7 " "
No increases	21.3 " "

A further breakdown of the BLS figures shows that there is no exact correlation between industries giving the largest wage increases and those which have advanced their prices most. For instance, 28.5 per cent of the workers in the paper industry, where prices have risen very steeply, have had no increases. It is also interesting to note that the industries with the largest percentages of workers receiving no increases are among those which have returned particularly favorable profits in the past year. They include food products, furniture and finished lumber, paper, and chemicals.

In the case of non-manufacturing employment, the experience of the workers has been even more unfavorable. No less than 48.4 per cent in wholesale trade, 63.6 per cent in retail trade, and 67.9 per cent in service trades have remained at their V-J Day pay levels. It is not surprising that the big retailers, enjoying something like double their pre-war turnover, are making profits on a stupendous scale. What is curious, though, is that they continually grumble about the shortage of labor; it doesn't seem to have occurred to them that those "immutable" laws of supply and demand may apply to labor as well as commodities.

The most important instances this year of a price increase definitely keyed to a wage increase was the additional $5 a ton granted to the steel industry by the OPA as part of the bargain by which the steel strike was settled. Because of the extent to which steel enters into the costs of other industries, the settlement of this dispute has been quoted as a prime example of the way in which rising wages exert an inflationary influence. It will be hard to sustain this contention, however, now that the third-quarter report of United States Steel has been published, for it shows that labor costs per ton of products shipped during the period were less than before the steel strike.

For the whole of 1945 Big Steel's labor cost per ton—this includes salaries, social-security tax, and pensions—was $45.4; in the third quarter of the current year it was $44.3. It follows that the $5 price boost was not required to cover increased labor costs; it was, in fact, largely added to profits. After deducting non-recurring items, the corporation's net earnings for the quarter amounted to $29,529,000, or $6.62 per ton shipped. This compares with a profit return of $3.15 a ton for the whole of 1945.

At first sight this may appear something like a miracle, but the explanation is fairly simple. During the three months ending September 30 Big Steel operated at 94.3 per cent of capacity, whereas during 1945 it attained only 82 per cent of capacity. That meant the spreading of fixed costs—a large item in an industry like steel—over a considerably bigger tonnage and an automatic improvement in profit margins. In addition, the fall in labor costs per ton, despite the increase in wage rates, indicates a very considerable improvement in labor productivity. This improvement is probably general throughout the industry; at least, sharp advances in third-quarter profits are common to practically all the steel concerns so far reporting.

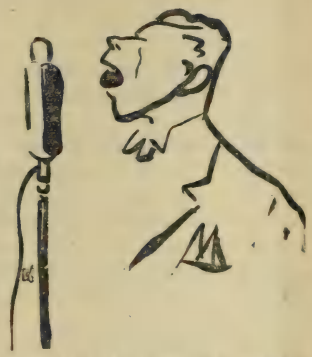
I have no doubt that Philip Murray and his colleagues of the United Steel Workers are studying these figures carefully, and that when they open their wage negotiations they will argue that profits are ample to provide for a wage increase even though prices remain unchanged. Countering this claim, steel magnates will undoubtedly contend that the profits flowing from near-capacity operations are transient; so that higher wages would in fact compel higher prices and lead to further curtailment of demand.

The fear that rising costs will "price their products out of the market" is common to many industries today. It may not be unjustified, but those using it as an argument against wage increases overlook the fact that the main force sustaining demand, and making possible the economies arising from full production, is the workers' purchasing power. Unless, therefore, the present erosion of real wages is checked, business is likely to discover that it has starved its best customers.

KEITH HUTCHISON

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL



THOSE who read the newspaper quotes from the recent speech of William S. Paley, chairman of the board of the Columbia Broadcasting System, at the N. A. B. convention, must admit that they packed a punch that rocked the broadcasters back on their heels. Paley concentrated his attention mainly on the industry—its sins and its virtues—but he had something to say about critics and about the more discriminating listeners who make their protests vocal. Though we may disagree with some of his conclusions, they are all worthy of the careful attention of radio critics, professional and amateur. So far as I know, his was the first attempt made by any of the leading figures in broadcasting to analyze the intellectual's reactions to radio.

Paley began by welcoming criticism, particularly the bylined critical reviews as distinct from the superficial carpings of people who, after listening to a couple of programs, style themselves experts. He concedes (the heretic!) that not all critics are cranks and that many are honest and objective in their intentions. Even those who are constantly sniping at the advertising aspects of radio do so not from malice or personal prejudice but from a lack of understanding of the complex nature of radio. For American radio faces a dilemma. Primarily, it is a mass medium and must serve the masses. Secondarily, radio must serve the specialized interests of various minority groups. The primary character of radio as a mass medium coincides with the advertiser's desire to sell his merchandise to the mass audience.

We should remember—even though Paley makes no mention of it—that in its diaper days radio was what the trade calls "highbrow." Not until radio developed mass-appeal programs did it show signs of healthy growth. With the airing of prize fights, Presidential election returns, Amos 'n' Andy, and Rudy Vallee, radio boomed, and simultaneously became bait for the advertiser and poison to the intellectual. Broadcasters showed an increasing tendency, therefore, to sell out to the advertisers and to cut to a minimum the brain-power and air time devoted to programs designed to please minority listeners.

For Paley this situation is highly unsatisfactory. Radio has a responsibility to this minority even if, as the industry is organized, their claim is classed as secondary. "We all recognize the simple truth," he says, "that you cannot have a healthy democracy without minorities. You can't even have democracy. The vigorous existence of minorities is not only inevitable; it is necessary to the democratic process. . . . As broadcasters, we must never lapse into the position of conspiring, even unintentionally, against minorities."

This may sound like a sop to the critics, but anybody who knows Paley knows that he means just what he says. Whether the majority of radio men understand it and believe it is another question. The degree to which radio has been convinced by Paley and the critics that it has been guilty of over-commercialization will become plain in the program schedules of the next six months. Back home the broadcasters will have to decide how much of the high principles discussed at the convention can be applied. Some will make a start at reform. Others will continue to duck the issue and try to put the blame on the advertisers.

There is another pertinent point that Columbia's president made: the discriminating listener makes little effort to inform himself of the availability of good programs. He takes great pains to select a newspaper, buy a book, or choose a play, but when it comes to radio, the dial becomes a substitute for a program guide.

Paley carries it a step farther: "The music lover who queues up to get a gallery seat for an opera is likely to be the first one who will attack radio because Toscanini or Rodzinski aren't standing by in the radio station to begin waving their batons the minute he flicks his radio on. If minority groups would take a tenth as much trouble as they willingly take in getting what they want from magazines, newspapers, books—as well as from concerts and lectures, I believe we would be applauded rather than abused. From many of these latter functions they return to their homes after midnight—yet they criticize radio if a program they particularly like is broadcast after 10:30 p.m."

To which a listener might well reply: "Perhaps I'd sooner sit home and listen to the concert or opera instead of going out and getting home after midnight. But why should I have to wait until 10:30 for a good program? And where are these programs you speak of? Where are they listed?"

This brings up a minor defect in radio publicity that should be remedied. The daily newspaper listings, with very few exceptions, are extremely sketchy. And even though a handful of stations sell program booklets to their listeners—for example, WQXR, WLIB, and WYNC in New York—nowhere is there anything to compare with the British Broadcasting Corporation's program booklets in the detailed information they provide. (By the same token American radio has nothing to compare with the BBC's "Third Program," which is especially designed for the discriminating listener, but that is a story that will be told in this column on another day.)

The sooner radio admits these weaknesses the sooner radio can move to correct them. Paley and people like him are doing their best to spread the word to others. Meanwhile it is also up to the intelligent listener to temper his demands with a reasonableness that takes into account some of the problems confronting radio. At the recent N. A. B. convention not only the Paley speech but the adult approach of both broadcasters and the Federal Communications Commission to the problems of regulation showed that a sizable percentage of radio's top men are growing up.

Meanwhile let's keep our eyes peeled, our tempers cool, and our ears cocked. The next move is the broadcasters'.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Working Day at the Splendide

HOTEL BEMELMANS. By Ludwig Bemelmans. The Viking Press. $3.

AT THE Hotel Splendide, where all the waiters speak French, the basic relationship of our society is seen naked and pure. The man on the assembly line at General Motors is after all in a very complex position; in a sense he really is just as important as the president of the company—he too is "essential," he too can think of himself as a man who makes automobiles rather than a man who sells his labor to General Motors at so much an hour, and he is not absolutely compelled to admit that the difference between his rewards and the rewards of the president of the company is an accurate reflection of his value. There is no such complexity about the Hotel Splendide. The Splendide is an institution that ministers to the comforts and vanities of the rich, precisely so that the rich may enjoy the sensation of their own importance. It is exploitation idealized, without even the irrelevancy of a tangible product to cloud the image: the efficient operation of the Splendide produces not an automobile but a feeling of well-being in the breast of someone who has a lot of money. And if the receiver of comfort is to be distinguished by the fact that he has money, the giver of comfort is to be distinguished above all by the fact that he does not have money. For in the absence of an aristocracy—and nothing about the Splendide is clearer than the absence of an aristocracy—there is no good reason for anyone to work in such an institution, except to make money. No concealment is possible: one man serves another because he gets paid for it.

The waiters at the Splendide would talk to themselves as they went to and from the kitchen, formulating dreadful insults not to be spoken in the dining-room; at the limits of patience, they could spit in somebody's food before serving it; they could celebrate discreetly when a guest died. Their satisfactions were fugitive and peripheral; one waiter derived pleasure from brushing the back of his hand against the behinds of fat women. Server and served dwell in an atmosphere of hateful intimacy and mutual exploitation, and the feelings of the server are painful and confused: he hates the best people, but at the same time he feels that they are the best, and he looks down his nose at the second-best; after a while his only relief is to spend his vacation at some other hotel ordering somebody else around.

While Ludwig Bemelmans was assistant manager of the banquet department at the Splendide, one of his subordinates, a man who had been a waiter all his life, began to crack up. At a magnificent dinner, when the guests included Otto Kahn, Bernard Baruch, Secretary Lansing, and other giants, this old waiter stood on the balcony biting his nails, and when the assistant manager came up, he said, "Give me two machine-guns, one on this side and the other over on the other side. I'll cover the doors and get them as they try to get out, just like with a hose up and down—brrrrrr—and the other gun can spray the speakers' table—brrrrrr—brrrrrr—brrrrrr, Table No. 1—brrrrrr, Table No. 2—aim for the plates, shoot through the table, hit them in the stomach so they suffer a while. Here are our enemies. Ecrasez l'infâme! Liberté, égalité, fraternité!" The assistant manager sent the man home to take it easy.

Now Mr. Bemelmans never really entertained the idea that two machine-guns might be an appropriate response to a banquet. He has no real passion about the Splendide, and therefore no real vision of its meaning. He breaks his experience up into segments, one thing after another, and there is never the power of feeling and imagination to make the segment embrace the whole. (Think of Chaplin.) If the picture of the whole does emerge, it is only by a process of inference from the particulars; so far as Mr. Bemelmans is concerned, you are free to think of the Splendide as an accidental and queer institution on the margin of society. He himself is in the picture; he has still the snobbery of one who knows how food should be served: in his mind the abomination of the Splendide gets overshadowed by the greater abomination of somebody bringing in a service of cheap red dishes for a Jewish wedding, and when the management takes the red dishes over and calls them the "ruby service" (with an extra charge), it is to him as if the Splendide had allowed itself to be corrupted.

Mr. Bemelmans has a special and individual talent; it is very easy to be charmed by him. But one feels in the end that his humor is always a technique for taking lightly what is serious, that he is concerned less with understanding the object before him than with feeling that he has seen through it, that his humor is a personal way out. He is therefore neither as funny nor as profound as his material requires him to be. True humor is least of all a way of taking things lightly; on the contrary, it is a way of taking things particularly hard, for it looks always at our saddest humiliations and it does not compromise. The Splendide is a terrible place, and terribly funny; Mr. Bemelmans has had to reduce it, because he is not capable of dealing with the terrible. In this he is like his fellow-humorists of the New Yorker, who have had to turn self-consciously solemn now that their universe can no longer be seen through but demands to be understood; the true humorist is not so embarrassed in the face of death and suffering—death and suffering are his subjects.

A Southern History

THE EPIC OF LATIN AMERICA. By John A. Crow. Doubleday and Company. $5.

THERE is a long-standing argument as to whether it is not insulting to lump all the other American republics as Latin America, in the course of which a patriotic Latin American will usually point out that we have not yet thought of writing a history of Anglo-Saxon America in which the modern history of Canada and the United States would be treated as if there were no boundary line. That might be a very good thing; in fact, eventually we may have a history of America, emphasizing the parallel movement of our national histories in this hemisphere, pointing out our similarities rather than our diversities. What is principally good about this new survey of Latin American history is that it does deal with that history in a general way, so that the average North American reader—who usually needs to learn everything—can see the whole picture before he drowns in detail.

There could hardly be a story more fascinating than that of the Spanish and Portuguese in the New World. The way Spain built up the first modern empire, initiating all the errors of the theory of empire, and organized the first modern missionary movement, the clash between European and indigenous cultures, the various racial and economic and intellectual and political problems and attitudes which resulted, are but the more interesting for our long ignorance of them. And the history of the Latin countries, though it goes back a century farther than ours, is somehow closer to the surface there. Why have they been backward in industry? Because Spain allowed no industry to develop in its colonies. Why has united effort been so difficult among them? Because all contacts, and especially trade, were forbidden between the colonies in order to maintain their dependence on the mother-country. Why did Latin America so long remain out of touch with the times, politically and intellectually, when they had printing-presses, bookstores, and universities long before North America? Mainly because they had at the same time an active Inquisition. The church's temporal power and control of education, the survival of a feudal land system, the immensity and the character of the indigenous population—such elements of Latin American history are the problems of modern Latin America. Every American, of whatever country, ought to know the whole story of the American revolutions against European absolutism and against inequality and injustice—a story fortifying in its inevitability.

Any expert reading this volume will find in his own field curious lapses and lacks; but one must admit that the author is dealing with a very large subject, in both territory and time, and that many of its aspects have not yet been adequately treated by the experts. It is unfortunate that his survey depends entirely on secondary sources, for the original source material is extraordinarily rich, and even for the general reader a seventeenth-century traveler's eyewitness account is a good deal more interesting than the report of another modern historian.

Readers of a book like this ought to be encouraged by a well-arranged bibliography to follow through what it offers; for the same reason there ought to be more maps, and more detailed maps. On the other hand, the book is easy to read, and broad in its conception of the subject matter of history. If the author is weakest in cultural matters, where his dependence on published opinion leaves him occasionally ambiguous and arbitrary, he is strong in his sympathy. Furthermore, the general attitude toward the differences and the parallels between our history and theirs is usually just, and it is particularly on this score that one recommends the book to the common reader.

FICTION IN REVIEW

ALTHOUGH all of Arthur Koestler's books are tied together by their common concern with the large moral-political problems of our time, especially those on the intellectual left, there is an unusually close connection between his last novel, "Arrival and Departure," and his new novel, "Thieves in the Night" (Macmillan, $2.75). "Arrival and Departure" was about a young man so torn between his desire to act upon his political convictions and his desire to retreat into a life of private satisfactions that he suffered a functional paralysis and had to be psychoanalyzed. In the course of his treatment Mr. Koestler's hero discovered that an important part of his political impulse had a neurotic source. His story ended, however, not with the assertion of his ability to pursue his political course on an unneurotic basis, but with something quite else again—with his refusal to be deterred from political action by any question of motive. "Arrival and Departure," in other words, was an up-to-date version of the old reason-versus-religion opposition, with psychoanalysis proxying for reason and with the free radical impulse proxying for religion. Its conclusions could be summed up as follows: that the therapy for indecision is not to seek further clarification but to seek further blindness; that the definition of free will is the freedom to ignore the uncomfortable logic of determinism; that the cure for doubt is not knowledge but—as in the classical theological instance—more faith.

"Thieves in the Night" takes up where "Arrival and Departure" left off. I do not mean that it has the same setting and characters. Mr. Koestler's new book is set in Palestine, and its central character and authorial advocate is a young Englishman living in a Jewish commune. But despite the fact that "Thieves in the Night" is very informative about the complex Jewish national situation, I think that to read it as only a study of this immediate problem is to read it in far too limited a context. "Arrival and Departure" ended with Mr. Koestler's protestation of his faith in the life of action. "Thieves in the Night" is a statement of the articles of this faith: it tells us how Mr. Koestler thinks we ought to act. Its program is applicable not merely to Palestine but to the whole world.

The period of Mr. Koestler's story is 1937-39; its hero is a half-Jew who has removed to Palestine after an unpleasant sexual episode with an anti-Semitic Englishwoman. Being not entirely Jewish by birth, Joseph is enough of an emotional and intellectual outsider in Palestine to be able to view what goes on around him with a range and objectivity of which his wholly Jewish comrades are incapable. While he takes full happy share in the life of his commune, he becomes increasingly aware that it will require more than dedication to insure its survival and growth. Little by little he becomes convinced, on the sound evidence which is public record, that the British are selling out the Jewish homeland to appease the Arabs, that Palestine is another Czechoslovakia. When the German refugee girl whom he loves is raped and killed by the Arabs, and the deed, instead of being allowed to disappear in the government files, is avenged by the Jewish terrorist organization, Joseph finally formulates what has long been germinating in him—his sympathy with the people who are in favor of direct political action. He joins the terrorist underground, the Stern group that has broken off from Haganah, the old moderate Jewish defense organization.

This is of course a very bare sketch of "Thieves in the Night." Anyone acquainted with Mr. Koestler's work will know with what skill and daring the outline is filled in, the circumstantiality with which Mr. Koestler's novel suggests the multitudinousness of the Palestinian scene, the philosophical ingenuity with which it traces Joseph's intellectual development. In a day when all reporters are political philosophers, Mr. Koestler is really distinguished for his grasp of political complexities, his dialectical power, his journalistic flair. Leaving out of account its moral point, "Thieves in the Night" is an extraordinary weaving together of the many tangled threads—Jewish, Arab, and British—that make up the Palestinian pattern and a remarkable docu-

I have assumed the duties of Administrative Chairman of the Political Action Committee for Palestine, Inc. The Committee, which bears no relation whatsoever to any other Political Action Committee in this country, is a vigorous, young, militant group of Jews and non-Jews in all walks of American life. This group has devoted itself to the task of the immediate repatriation of European Jews to Palestine and the recognition of the Jewish National State by the United Nations.

I am a Christian and because of this I do not conceive my position as merely an honorary post. On the contrary, I intend to devote most of my time toward achieving the purposes of the Committee.

Let me give you the reasons for my decision to join the Political Action Committee for Palestine in an active capacity, and what led me to it. It is not a strange decision from one who visited the concentration camps in Europe and has seen the lethal houses which consumed six million Jews.

FOOLISH OSTRICH

How long can we bury our heads in the sands like a foolish ostrich and still remain men? How long can we accept with a shrug of our shoulders the horrible torture and murder of six million men, women and children and still remain Christians? How long can we allow the pitiful remnant of a tragic people to rot in concentration camps and still be Americans? How long can we procrastinate with injustice and still believe that justice will prevail? How long can we look upon the machinations of other nations and watch them invade, enslave, torment and destroy a tiny nation, whose citizens have given us so much of our religion, our morals and countless other priceless gifts, and still remain a democracy, dedicated to the Four Freedoms and the Atlantic Charter?

THE BLOOD OF MY ANCESTORS

I, for one, believe that justice, freedom and peace are indivisible in the international organism, and a spot, however small, where we allow injustice, slavery and war to continue, will develop into a malignant cancer which will devour us all.

I, for one, can no longer witness the tragedy of the Jews and the world's shameful unconcern for their fate. The blood of my ancestors who came to this country when the greatest metropolis in the world was a village, who helped build our nation, who helped free it from the tyrant's yoke, who helped unite it again, calls to my conscience and will not give me rest. It urges me to fight in a cause made holy by a river of innocent blood.

AWAKEN MY NATION'S CONSCIENCE

I shall henceforth devote my time and my energy to awaken my nation's conscience, even as mine has been awakened. I shall not weaken or tire until I see our brethren, the Jews, allowed to enter their Homeland, Palestine, and become a nation, free and independent, as our Government and the Governments of fifty-one nations, including Great Britain and the Arab States, have vowed it shall become.

In order that my efforts be more effective, I have assumed the Administrative Chairmanship of the Political Action Committee for Palestine, whose compelling program is the following:

SEVEN KEYS TO POSTERITY

1. To promote and foster by political and educational means, the recognition by the United Nations, of European and Palestinian Jewry as an ethno-political entity.

2. To advocate and effect the United Nations' recognition of Palestine as the national territory of this ethno-political entity.

3. To promote, urge and advocate the immediate repatriation to Palestine of the Jews in Europe.

4. To render aid, understanding and sympathy to those Jews in Palestine oppressed and persecuted by the Mandatory power because of their political views.

5. To urge withdrawal of British forces and civil officials from Palestine.

6. To demand elimination of Arab interference in Palestine's political situation.

7. To insist that no forces other than the Security Force of the United Nations should set foot on Palestine soil.

GIVE ME THE TOOLS AND I WILL DO THE JOB

This is a program which speaks for itself—in righteousness, justice, honor and freedom. It is a program which requires untiring labor and devotion. It is a program which requires funds and more funds to do the job and so I appeal to you as an American to join me in this struggle and contribute whatever your conscience dictates.

It is my intention to leave shortly for England where I plan to confer with members of the British Government. I will also fly to Palestine for the purpose of investigating conditions there and in the concentration camps outside of Palestine, including Cyprus and Eritrea.

As a member of Congress, I plan on my return, to report to our Government and to the Committee and the American people.

WHY NOW?

We are asking help now—instead of making an annual appeal—because the solution we believe in, is a political solution. WE WANT TO DO MORE THAN GIVE TEMPORARY RELIEF. We want to remedy the evils that exist today. When we remember that the six million Jews who perished received relief, charity and pity and that we are NOW no longer "burdened" with their care, we realize that their plight called for, not palliative action, but a basic remedial solution. We know that only effective political action will eliminate the need for yearly appeals for relief funds. Help us achieve that action by your support today. Fill out the coupon below and enclose your contribution. We do not employ paid officials or executives. All services are rendered on a voluntary basis. EVERY DOLLAR, EVERY CENT, GOES TOWARD THE EFFECTUATION OF OUR PROGRAM.

ment of bold social observation, being the only novel I know which consistently refuses the common fictional myth about Jews.

But unfortunately its moral point must be very much taken into account, and it must also be examined in a larger focus than that of the Palestinian situation. Appearing just now, when feelings about the Jewish homeland are running especially high, "Thieves in the Night" is bound to arouse a very intense response. I think this excitation of a particularly Jewish response is regrettable. For implicitly and at times even explicitly, Mr. Koestler's novel defends not merely the use of terror in Palestine; it also defends the principle of terror. And the fact that it weights its case for direct action with the emotions which most of us feel about the immediate Jewish tragedy obscures these wider meanings. It blinds us to what I should have thought would be the main concern of a philosophical novelist—the vital difference between passionately meeting the demands of a particular time and place and the promulgation of a "rational" program of passion.

As I understand it, the present situation in Palestine is so critical that even the most modern factions have been forced to capitulate, if not subscribe, to the use of extreme methods of self-defense. But surely this does not justify the formulation of a philosophy of extreme action, at the comfortable distance of literature and political theorizing. It is not at all the same moral thing to be a Jew confronted by an Arab with a gun in his hand, or an anti-Nazi confronted by a Nazi with a gun in his hand, or a Negro confronted by a white lyncher, and to be a writer with a pen in one's hand. We have all of us learned in recent years if we did not know it before that there are certain situations in which extreme action is demanded, when to stop to scruple is to be destroyed; this bitter knowledge does not sanction us to forget that moral reflection is still our everlasting duty so long as we have even the illusion of safety. Certainly it is the duty of the novelist not only to remind us of the difference between the emotions of exigency and the emotions of premeditation, but also to remind us of the moral consequences of exigent conduct upon the individual who is forced to it. In the sense that "Thieves in the Night" ignores the fact that morality is relative to distance, it is as much an unpleasant emotional indulgence and an offense against moral taste as all the this-is-the-way-to-kill-Nazis novels produced at a several-thousand-miles remove from the Nazi horror. And in the degree that it fails to concern itself with the tragedy of violence it is morally irresponsible.

Far from undertaking its tragic business, the last section of Mr. Koestler's book plays only with the standard melodrama of terrorism. In "Thieves in the Night," as always in the novel, it is finally the atmosphere surrounding its principles, rather than the principles themselves, that influences our judgment. The members of Mr. Koestler's underground take a wry amusement in referring to themselves as "Jewish Fascists." (This is of course the name by which they are called by Zionists of other complexion.) But if the reader experiences any sympathetic wryness at this designation, it must certainly disappear as the novel goes into its detailed description of the organization of the terrorist movement—its military hierarchies and discipline, its schoolboy oaths, its face-slapping ("That will teach you to hold fast to your gun"), its general smell of Nazi Blutbruderschaft. "The Hebrew underground began as a purely political movement," Joseph writes in his journal, "and has developed more and more mystic accents. Simeon showed me yesterday some of Yair-Stern's poetry. It has a strange archaic fervor—quite untranslatable:

> My teacher carried his praying-scarf in a velvet bag to the synagogue:
> Even so carry I my sacred gun to the Temple
> That its voice may pray for us.

. . . Though he tries to hide it, Simeon has an almost religious admiration for Yair-Stern. He seems to regard him as a kind of gunman-messiah." Well, Mr. Koestler's Joseph may find it difficult to translate the poetry of terrorism from Hebrew into English. I find it disconcertingly easy to translate it into its essential meaning in any language.

Here, then, in actual practice, is the faith that triumphed over reason in "Arrival and Departure"—and a curious form of religious dedication it is. But it is not peculiar to Mr. Koestler; on the contrary, it represents a growing tendency among what we could once call liberal intellectuals. The assimilation of violence to salvation is perhaps not a new idea. The conjunction is new, however, for thinkers of the left political persuasion. Necessity may make soldiers of us all, but only the profound moral confusion of our times could suggest calling a fighter in the cause of freedom a gunman-messiah.

THE STORY OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

Told by Those Who Fashioned It

Reported by CHARLES W. ERVIN

Illustrated by JO DAVIDSON

Here in 50 pages the Fathers tell you why they fashioned the Constitution so that the minority could secure and keep control of the Government. It's a most illuminating story told by the chief actors in the cast.

"The Story of the Constitution proves that we shall have to learn how to express the popular will more rapidly and more decisively in the interest of the general welfare."

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THERE was a long period in the history of the English theater when the repertory was almost as standardized as that of the opera house or the concert hall today. New plays were somewhat more frequently offered than new musical compositions are now, but the leading theaters took their reliance upon Shakespeare, Jonson, Otway, and a number of now lesser-known writers as much for granted as your orchestras now take for granted their reliance upon Beethoven, Brahms, Tschaikovsky, and the rest. Most of the plays offered could not be called revivals because they had not for years been at any time long off the stage. While there does not seem any immediate likelihood that we shall return to quite that state of affairs, the number of old plays produced or announced for production on Broadway this season does suggest a harmless speculation. How many written during the last sixty years could be not merely successfully revived but incorporated into a standard repertory? How many, that is to say, would one not only "like to see again" but possibly like to see a dozen times or more—even on the assumption that new companies and new productions would give them from time to time at least as much novelty as a new conductor's interpretation of the Pastoral Symphony? Some of the big successes now current—"Life with Father," "Harvey," and "Born Yesterday"—may look more possible now than they will five years hence. How about Shaw, or O'Neill, or Sidney Howard, or Maxwell Anderson? How many of their plays—and my question is not merely rhetorical—could one see as often as your operagoer hears "Aïda" or as the eighteenth-century theatergoer saw not only some of Shakespeare but also "The Orphan" and even, God save the mark, "The London Merchant"?

One modern play which seems a more likely candidate than most for a place in a real repertory is Synge's "Playboy of the Western World." The revival now current at the Booth Theater is not, to be sure, really first-rate. Burgess Meredith is acceptable enough in the leading role, Mildred Natwick confirms again the impression that she can never fail to give an amusing performance, and Eithne Dunn, a newcomer from Ireland, has a good deal of charm. Nevertheless, one somehow gets the impression of a rather miscellaneous assortment of styles; and the joyous lilt of the speech, which the mere reader of the text cannot fail to catch and which the Abbey company translated into sound, is only occasionally caught. Yet for all that, it furnishes a delightful evening, and it makes one realize that one might happily see it again and again, not merely because it is better than most modern plays but also because its excellence is of a special and now uncommon, if not unique, kind.

Synge wrote it, of course, both in accordance with a theory and as a sort of protest against what he regarded as the essential wrongness of the modern drama. Egged on by Yeats and Lady Gregory, he proclaimed his conviction that neither drawing-room comedy nor sociological drama could have the universal appeal which great plays should have, and that only the myths of a folk or the daily life of a simple society could furnish subjects having the requisite universality. He added that the speech of the peasant was the only speech of the modern world which had escaped the deadening influence of too much abstract thinking; and thus, by a sort of Q. E. D., he was led to leave Paris for the Aran Islands. For once an abstract theory seemed to work. "The Playboy of the Western World" really is one of the few modern plays capable of interesting a cultivated and intellectual audience while at the same time remaining comprehensible at almost any level of sophistication. To enjoy it one does not need to know any one of the hundreds of things which Shaw or Ibsen or Wilde or Garson Kanin demands. There is nothing timely about it and, for all its local color, nothing which demands any exclusively local knowledge for its understanding.

One is tempted to believe that an audience from the Homeric Age would find it entirely comprehensible; and one is quite sure that such an audience would find nothing essentially unfamiliar in the story of the revolt of a son against a father. Neither is there any doubt that the exuberant picturesqueness of speech which runs riot throughout the play is poetically joyous in some fashion which no modern "poetic" drama ever approaches, or that the language itself affords a delight wholly different from that which the best and driest wit of Shaw or Wilde can give.

Perhaps Synge did not accomplish all this because of a theory. Lady Gregory, with the same convictions, never got beyond the somewhat self-conscious folksiness which we associate also with the American "regional" play. Yeats, deliberately or in spite of himself, turned to a different kind of poetry, which, whatever its virtues, is certainly far less accessible; and even Synge himself never produced during his short life another play nearly so good. But if the theories did not produce they do define the unique qualities of this particular comedy. It achieves a universality which seemed to have become impossible in the modern theater, and it makes more comprehensible the fact that Shakespeare was able to be the darling of the groundling as well as of the courtier.

JAMES AGEE

THE DARK MIRROR" is a smooth and agreeable melodrama about twin sisters (Olivia de Havilland, sweet and dry), and a psychiatrist (Lew Ayres) and a detective (Thomas Mitchell) who find out which one is an insane murderess. The detective work involves ink-blot and word-association tests and an amusingly sinister tandem of oscillating pens which register concealed emotions as one of the sisters talks. The picture could have been more exciting if Nunnally Johnson and his colleagues had risked more subtlety and puzzlement in the psychologizing, the situations, and the everyday performance of the sisters, but it is fairly clear that they were worried about just such risks and decided to eat-and-have only bits of the frosting instead of the whole cake. As far as they go with it, they do it very intelligently. I like the illusion of relaxation Mr. Johnson can create in dialogue which is actually very tightly designed, and I very much like Olivia de Havilland's performance. She has for a long time been one of the prettiest women in movies; lately she has not only become prettier than ever but has started to act, as well. I don't see evidence of any remarkable talent, but her playing is thoughtful, quiet, detailed, and well sustained, and since it is founded, as some more talented playing is not, in an unusually healthful-seeming and likable temperament, it is an undivided pleasure to see. I wish I could speak as respectfully of Mr. Ayres's performance, in his first film since the war, as I feel toward his performance during the war, but it seemed to me to be done wholly from the outside. Although I can remember very good work of his, perhaps he was never vocationally an actor; now, in any case, he seems no longer to be doing work he can care for: a predicament in which I and probably most of two billion other people can sympathize with him profoundly, without being eager to watch a sight so unhappy and so familiar.

I can't understand the excitement over "The Jolson Story." Without for a moment thinking they had anything to do with jazz, I have always liked Jolson and his style and most of his songs, and I still like hearing them on the soundtrack; and I suppose Larry Parks does about as well, as the visual Jolson, as anyone except the original would be likely to. Evelyn Keyes has always seemed to me one of the more attractive and capable girls in Hollywood, and one of the most neglected, and it is good to see her again, even in a role which can use so little of what she has, and which misuses most of that. I would probably enjoy William Demarest as Little Eyolf; so I had no great trouble liking him here. In fact, I have nothing in the world against this picture except that at least half of it seemed to me enormously tiresome. The other half is pleasant enough, but no more. The trouble is, it is here nearly as hard to separate the pleasant from the boring as to get the cream out of homogenized milk.

The Museum of Modern Art is screening a gigantic historical anthology of movies; the program started the middle of last September and will finish a year from next December. I could, and in the course of time may, regret and criticize quite a few omissions and inclusions, and some of the ways of classifying the films—for instance, the bewildering inclusion of "Der Dreigroschenoper" under the rubric "Pabst and Realism." And I feel that when the historians get to work on anything, arteries begin to harden, in the subject and in the people interested. Yet there is hardly a program in the bunch that doesn't offer some film I have seen and would highly recommended for re-seeing, or to anyone who missed it; or some film I want to see because through incarceration in one school or another, or inability to milk or steal the price of admission, I had to miss it myself. During the next two weeks I particularly recommend the following, to those within radius: Von Stroheim's "Foolish Wives," Flaherty's "Nanook of the North," "Wild Bill Hickok" with William S. Hart, Thomas Ince's "The Last Card," James Cruze's "The Covered Wagon," "Grandma's Boy" (Harold Lloyd), and "Sherlock, Jr." (Buster Keaton). "Foolish Wives" is fiercely trashy, but along with the trash there is some brutally shrewd atmosphere and sexual realism and comedy. "Nanook" has a beautiful simplicity, cheer, and hardiness which no subsequent documentary has improved on and which most have lost or perverted. I missed "Wild Bill," but I didn't miss the late William S. Hart, and I think that at his best he was in his face and his way of handling himself almost as mythically and finely racial—or I suppose I have to say national—as Lincoln. Hart is in "The Last Card," too, which I also missed, and that is the only film by Ince, who was as great in his way as Griffith, that the museum is able to show. Some of "The Covered Wagon" looks pretty embarrassing now, though I still think the frontier-comic work of Ernest Torrence and Tully Marshall has grandeur, for all that it is corny; but all that is massive and detached from characters and character-plot is tremendously strong, moving, and beautiful. The chase and fight in "Grandma's Boy," as I remember them, are a high point in melodramatic slapstick, thanks importantly to the terrifying face of Dick Sutherland

Portrait of a Spiritual Hero

By RUDOLF KAYSER

Preface by

ALBERT EINSTEIN

THIS is more than the true life story of one of the world's greatest philosophers. It is also a history of Europe's political upheaval of the 17th Century and an Odyssey of the Jews of Spain and Portugal.

Born in Holland in 1632 of Portuguese Jewish parentage, Spinoza's eventful life was a constant struggle and search for intellectual freedom and honesty. In the background is the great drama of war-torn Europe and the fall of the Dutch Republic, the "little America" of the 17th Century, which offered the fleeing Jews an asylum.

"A book that is much needed in our time. It will bring comfort and gladness to its readers and will inspire them to a new belief in mankind. Spinoza for me was always a great source of inspiration and this book gives me a vivid picture of this great figure in Israel."

as the villain; and Grandma's Civil War flashback is achingly funny. "Sherlock, Jr." is not one of Buster Keaton's funniest—none of his full-length films were—but it is about a hundred times as funny as anything made today. Some of the houses, yards, and streets are even more beautifully photographed than was usual in the old comedies. And one chase gag, involving a motor cycle and a long line of ditch-diggers, is hair-raising both in its mechanical perfection and as a piece of better-than-conscious surrealism. I am sorry the museum isn't showing Lloyd's finest comedy, his paralyzing first version of "Safety Last," a piece about a human fly which is as staggeringly fast as machine-gun fire. I'm even sorrier that the museum, or some dime theater, isn't showing every short film Keaton ever made, night and day, over and over. Barring only the best of Chaplin, they seem to me the most wonderful comedies ever made.

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

IN THE years since I heard Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos" in Vienna there have been occasions when one or another of the German musicians and music-lovers now in this country, cross-examining me on my tastes, has exclaimed, "You don't like 'Ariadne'! But have you looked at the score?" and has proceeded to describe to me some of the marvelous examples of Strauss's craftsmanship. The expertness and assurance of that craftsmanship were something I was immediately aware of as I listened to the performance of "Ariadne" at New York's City Center recently; and they were even a pleasure to hear—for a while; but presently I was cursing that ability to go through all those elaborate motions of music-making endlessly with nothing to say and with nothing said. It pains me to think of the time and effort and conscientiousness that went into the production of this sterile work, and that might have given us a production of, say, Mussorgsky's original "Boris Godunov."

The work was competently staged, and the orchestral framework provided by Halasz was excellent; but much of the singing was poor. Virginia McWatters, the Zerbinetta, stopped the show with her spectacular agility and accuracy in the florid and high passages of Grossmächtige Prinzessin; but the middle range of her voice was unpleasantly harsh. Ella Flesch, the Ariadne, sang flat and with excessive tremolo—a combination that was torture. And the closing scene brought the absurdity of Ariadne listening with ecstasy to the constricted bleating of Vasso Argyris, the Bacchus. The only good singing by a principal was that of Polyna Stoska in the role of the composer: she has a fresh, powerful voice which does not yet show the effects it may show later of the way she drives it. And I should mention the lovely voices of two of Ariadne's three attendants—the contralto and one of the sopranos. (I have just read Olin Downes's statement, in a Sunday article, that Flesch sang at the first performance "under a slight indisposition which made vocalism difficult at moments," and Argyris was suffering from severe laryngitis.)

Wagner's "Meistersinger" has its dull stretches, and it may exhaust one with its diffuse and repetitious long-windedness; but it contains much of the loveliest and best music he ever composed; and of this music Columbia gives us Sachs's two monologues, the second-act Was duftet doch der Flieder and the third-act Wahn! Wahn!, sung by Janssen with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra under Breisach (Set X-269; $2.85). The bloom is off Janssen's voice, but it is in better condition on these records than it was in the broadcast performance I heard two years ago: it can produce a sustained tone that is steady, agreeable, and sonorous; and it lends itself to Janssen's sensitive phrasing. Breisach provides no more than a routine accompaniment; and the sound of the performances on the records is rich, spacious, and clear, with good balance of voice and orchestra.

Brahms's Sonata Opus 120 No. 2 for clarinet or viola and piano is one of the many works of his that I find mechanically contrived and dull. Columbia offers a performance of it by Benny Goodman and Nadia Reisenberg (Set 629; $3.85); and what musical life there is in the proceedings is created by the piano-playing of Miss Reisenberg; for Goodman merely produces successions of clarinet notes without phraseological inflection or even sensuous beauty—though I am aware that the lack of sensuous beauty may be the fault of recording which deprives the sound of the piano of its rich resonance. Aside from this the recorded sound is good: spacious and clear, with excellent balance of the two instruments. Some of the surfaces of my review set are gritty.

In another set (649; $4.85) Oscar Levant plays a number of pieces by Chopin: the Etudes Opus 10 Nos. 3, 4, 5, and 10; the Nocturnes Opus 9 No. 2 and Opus 15 No. 2; the Berceuse; the Polonaise Opus 40 No. 1; and the Valses Opus 64 No. 2 and Opus 70 No. 1. Levant handles his instrument less brutally in these performances than in others I have heard; but rapid passage-work is often blurred—whether by his fingers or by faulty recording I cannot say. Far worse than this, however, is the lack of any feeling for continuity and coherence in the progression of sound in time, and of any artistic discipline—in performances that are full of erratic, wilful, senseless changes of pace and sonority. The sound of the piano on the records is bright but cold with a wide-range Brush pickup; with the limited-range Astatic Tru-Tan the treble is weak and the sound dull. Some surfaces of my review set are noisy.

The Union of American Hebrew Congregations has sent me a volume entitled "Israel Sings" ($15 plus express charges), which contains liturgical music arranged from manuscripts in the Birnbaum Collection by Dr. Eric Werner of the Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati, and sung by Cantors Frederick Lechner, Abraham Shapiro, and Emil Rosen, and by Pearl Besuner, Roberta Segal, and the 70th Anniversary Choir, with instrumental accompaniments. "INDISPENSABLE!" Says William L. Shirer "INDISPENSABLE . . . for those who want to get the confusing facts of contemporary history straight."

this type of music I can hazard only one musical judgment of the set—that I find an incongruity between the old melodies and the modern and occasionally operatic style of the accompaniments provided by Dr. Werner. I asked someone who knows a great deal about the music how the melodies would be sung in an orthodox synagogue, and he answered, "Without accompaniments"; but then he added that a modern singer finds it difficult to sing without harmony, and there is no objection to accompaniments written by composers with a feeling for the styles of the melodies, like Achron. The performances seem good to me; and they are well recorded on black vinylite—which means that they should be played with a pickup weighing no more than one ounce. And considering the price of the records I would criticize the use of the whole first side and parts of the other sides for the narration of material that is printed in the accompanying booklet.

"Suicidal Idea"

Dear Sirs: Reading in the papers about the latest fantastic weapons of war, I often wonder how responsible statesmen can even talk of discontinuing the occupation of Germany. Knowing the gift for technology of the Germans and knowing the desperate fanaticism of the Nazis, we should squarely face the fact that the occupation of Germany will be necessary until the nebulous day when nationalism has no further grip on the German people.

I don't believe that the Western powers or Russia would let loose such terrible weapons (perhaps only out of fear of retaliation), but I can imagine the Nazis doing so in desperate hatred and thirst for revenge.

It is about time that Russia and the Western powers stopped playing with the suicidal idea of using a rearmed Germany as an ally in the conflict between East and West.

From the Spanish Border

Dear Sirs: A five weeks' stay in Andorra, recently ended, has given me evidence of the great present fact about Spain—namely, that events there are moving so fast that crisis can hardly be far away. . . . The gears are in mesh and the machine is turning faster and faster. Crisis is developing in part through an intolerable crescendo in living costs, coupled with growing corruption and persecution.

The Spanish rationing system is quite inadequate and must be supplemented. The only source for such supplementation is the black market. . . . The contrast of prices with wages is the crux of the situation. Women workers in the Catalan textile mills are paid 12 pesetas a day (about 90 cents). Last winter, neither men nor women in the industry worked more than three days a week because of the lack of electric current. In one of the textile mills, when they are paid at the end of the week, the employer almost forces the women workers to buy certain foodstuffs from him, principally beans and fish. Both are half rotten. Thus, while paying out with one hand, he cashes in with the other.

Hunger, semi-starvation, and malnutrition are general among the workers and are on the increase. Very many people are sick in Spain today because of sheer hunger. Tuberculosis is rife, especially among the children. . . .

Corruption, extortion on a large and a petty scale, persecution—all are practiced by state functionaries high and low, flamboyantly and brutally. The main offenders are the execrated Guardia Civil, the Secret Police, the tax inspectors, and other minor agents. It is a common practice for a civil guardsman to buy articles in a shop and sell them outside on the black market.

In the midst of local conditions approximating famine, it is known to Catalonians that both olive oil and rice—food staples in Spain—are being exported. I learned in Andorra that Barcelona dockers had discovered that large quantities of olive oil for export were being camouflaged in tins labeled "Nestlé." Rice, they found out, was packed in ten-kilo sacks labeled "chemical products."

I had a demonstration of the cynical falsity which any national "referendum" as to Franco's popularity within Spain would involve. A token "referendum" was taken in Catalonia in preparation for Franco's appearance there in connection with military maneuvers. Special agents went from house to house in every town and village, exacting the signatures of every person of either sex above the age of fifteen on a document stating that the signers were glad of the Caudillo's visit.

The insolent outrages and injustices, petty and great, now increasing in Spain suggest that Franco is deliberately seeking to bring about a general uprising in order to quell it thoroughly. Spain is a nightmare. A fierce awakening cannot long be delayed.

Dear Sirs: Now that the army has declared a draft holiday and it is virtually certain that the Selective Service Act will be suspended until it expires on March 31, 1947, it would seem that no excuse remains for keeping conscientious objectors charged with violation of the act in prison. Furthermore, the five thousand or more who have been released are still branded as felons and consequently deprived of important civil rights in many states and barred from the professions. A Presidential amnesty to all objectors to war and conscription is the one way promptly and comprehensively to remedy this situation.

The Shape of Things

SINCE OPA WAS CLEARLY DYING FROM THE multiple wounds inflicted on it in the past four months, the President was well advised to put it out of its agony. Once controls had been abandoned over a wide area of the economy, it was not possible to maintain them in other sections. That could only lead to the diversion of materials and labor from the production of articles subject to ceilings to those enjoying a free market. Moreover, once it was certain that controls were on the way out, it was natural for producers still under ceilings to hold goods off the market until they would be free to charge higher prices. With both production and inventories at new post-war peaks, the effects of the President's move on the general price level may be less serious than many people fear. In some lines, where shortages remain serious, prices will rise sharply, but since it is probable that over-all production pretty nearly balances total available purchasing power, such increases will reduce the capacity of consumers to absorb other goods. Hence, prices of articles which are relatively plentiful, or the consumption of which is postponable, may tend to decline: that is to say, there is reason to expect a period of sharp price fluctuations in both directions rather than a sharp jump in the cost of living.

✶

THE GRAVEST DANGER ARISING FROM THE abandonment of controls is its probable effect on the housing situation. Although rent ceilings are to remain, Mr. Truman indicated that they would probably have to be raised, and the real-estate interests will certainly now redouble their efforts to boost revenues. Yet a rise in rents would give a justified impetus to demands for higher wages and prove the surest way of setting off an inflationary explosion. OPA investigations have shown that, thanks to 100 per cent occupancy rates and to reductions in service, most landlords are in a better position than before the war. Only if and when prices as a whole move to a substantially higher level, should they be permitted to raise rents. Meanwhile, it is all too probable that veterans will be forced to pay more for new houses, even though the $10,000 ceiling is to be maintained for the present, together with the system of priorities and allocations designed to channel building materials into low-cost housing. Thanks partly to measures taken in the past year by Housing Expediter Wilson W. Wyatt, production of some building materials has been greatly expanded. But adequate supplies of many essentials are still lacking, and a free market may well increase the difficulty of their procurement. For instance, although the steel industry is operating practically at capacity, demand is far from satisfied. Manufacturers of the many building components made of steel may therefore be forced to pay more for it in order to outbid the hundred and one other steel-using industries. That kind of thing is going to add to housing costs and so is the shortage of skilled workmen, to secure whom many contractors have been paying illegal premiums above union scales. In these circumstances, it is going to be hard to avoid an increase in maximum prices for houses; it will be impossible unless restrictions on non-essential building are rigidly maintained.

THE REPUBLICAN VICTORY HAS LED TO A good deal of despondency and alarm in Europe. Of course, it is understood that foreign policy in many important aspects has bi-partisan support in this country and was not an issue in the election. However, as James Reston has pointed out in the New York Times, the Republicans have underwritten the political phases of the Administration's international program but are not committed to its economic phases. The British loan, for instance, was opposed by a majority of Republicans in both houses, and there is no reason to suppose that the G. O. P. has lost its faith in high tariffs. It is extremely doubtful whether the new Congress would be willing to ratify an International Trade Organization charter framed in accordance with the State Department's draft now under discussion in London. Of course, the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, against which a majority of Republicans voted, remains in effect until 1948 unless repealed—an unlikely contingency since not enough votes could be mustered to overcome a Presidential veto. But knowledge that there is no guaranty of permanence in the lower-tariff trend which began in 1933, may make the eighteen foreign countries with which multiple negotiations are to begin next April chary of granting concessions. Moreover, a Republican Congress is going to hamper American economic foreign policy in another way. In Britain, the Dominions, and many European countries it is a firmly held conviction that the greatest obstacle to economic cooperation with the United States is not the tariff but the fundamental instability of America's economy. The rush to abandon controls which we may now expect and the hostility of the Republicans to economic planning are likely to induce efforts by foreign countries to insulate themselves from the next American depression. Nothing could be less reassuring to the world at large than Mr. Hoover's pronouncement that America is "again moving to the goal of free men" in which he so successfully imprisoned us during his Presidency.

THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA, WHERE ONLY white men enjoy the rights of citizenship, wishes to annex the territory of Southwest Africa (which it has held under a League of Nations mandate since the last war) and so obtain a new supply of native helots to work in its fields and mines. Supporting this proposal in a committee of the U. N. Assembly, Marshal Smuts, South African Premier, declared that the native population of the territory had been consulted by special commissioners and that a large majority had indicated approval. What he did not explain was that only tribal chiefs and headmen, who are subject to removal by government officials, were consulted, which gave the proceedings about the same value as a Hitlerian plebiscite. Marshal Smuts sought to bolster his case by favorably comparing his country's procedure with that of Russia when it annexed the Baltic states without consulting "the comity of nations." While two wrongs do not make a right, it is worth noting that the inhabitants of the Baltic states enjoy full Russian citizenship. But with what rights and privileges will the 300,000 natives of Southwest Africa be endowed after annexation? E. S. Sachs, prominent South African labor leader, answers that question on page 554. They will enjoy the right to be indentured for work in the mines at a cash wage of 35 to 45 cents a day, the right to live in segregated areas, the right to go to church provided employers consent to sign a pass, the right to be represented in Parliament by a white man. How Marshal Smuts, a godly man, reconciles racial dictatorship in South Africa with the U. N. Charter is a secret known only to him and his maker. But whatever arguments he may offer in defense of his proposals, the U. N. should flatly refuse to extend South African rule until present conditions of discrimination are ended. The United States ought to be leading this fight: unfortunately it has forfeited the opportunity by its own cynical proposals for the Pacific mandates.

WITH WORLD FOOD OUTPUT UP SEVEN PER cent from 1945, most Americans apparently believe that the need for belt-tightening on our part has passed. But recent reports from the International Emergency Food Council and the Department of Agriculture indicate that a new crisis, nearly as severe as last year's, may be expected in the spring. The situation in Austria is particularly grim. Domestic supplies are far below the pre-war level and are sufficient to sustain a daily ration of only 800 calories. Even with UNRRA aid, half of the population has been getting no more than 1,200 calories of rationed food, and the announcement that the amount will be temporarily raised to 1,550, as in Germany, caused great public rejoicing. In the British zone of Germany, substantial imports from the United States have been necessary in order to bring the level of nutrition up to this minimum figure. Elsewhere in Europe, conditions are reported to have improved somewhat over last year, but there are forecasts of possible famine in Rumania because of drought and continued shortages in Italy, Yugoslavia, and Greece. Famine reports have been received from three provinces in South and Central China. For the world as a whole, the current supply of food grains remains 12 to 14 per cent below demand. International shipments of fats and oils are only half of the world demand, and sugar production is still 15 per cent below the pre-war average. Plans to meet next year's crisis are even less adequate than last year's bungled efforts. UNRRA is scheduled to terminate its activities in Europe on December 31, and the proposals for continuing its functions under the U. N. have become hopelessly snarled in politics. If international action proves impossible, the United States, singularly blessed with bumper crops, must be prepared to finance substantial relief shipments for yet another year.

Picking Up the Pieces

IT WAS exceedingly shrewd of the Republicans to focus last week's election on the question "Had Enough?" The returns indicate beyond doubt that the voters have had enough—but because of the magnificently calculated vagueness of the question nobody can say just what it is that has sated them. Have they had enough jobs, enough protection against the ups and downs of the business cycle, enough security for their bank savings, enough cheap electric power and land reclamation, enough freedom to organize in labor unions, enough cooperation with other nations in the promotion of world peace? Or have they only had enough of weariness after a long and bitter war, of vexations that are an inevitable part of the transition to peace, of that sagging of the spirit in high places and in low that marks the end of a monumental national effort?

The Republicans are in power now and free to interpret the results as they choose. But in spite of the magnitude of their victory, they will be taking a long chance if they ignore the emotional reaction of a tired people in favor of a strictly political interpretation; if, in short, they flatly assume that they have a mandate to destroy the achievements of the Roosevelt era. They won control of Congress not because the country longed for Republicanism—whatever that might be— but because in almost every state in the country a vote for the G. O. P. was the only way in which a hazy discontent could be expressed. Where this was not the case, as in New York, the minority parties of the left ran up impressive totals. The American Labor Party had one of its best years, the Liberal Party won a place on the ballot with a substantial vote of 181,000, and even the Communists enjoyed a boost to almost twice their usual modest return. It is worth noting, too, that in a number of cases victorious Republicans had campaigned, some genuinely and some strategically, on more or less liberal platforms. Typical of this group are Senators-elect Thye of Minnesota, Ives of New York, and Flanders of Vermont; and Representatives-elect Bender of Ohio, Javits of New York, and Fulton of Pennsylvania.

Whatever the motivations of the voters, the returns are admittedly devastating in their effects on Congressional personnel. On the thin credit side of the ledger are the victories of McGrath, elected to the Senate from Rhode Island, and the return to that body, all by narrow margins, of Kilgore, O'Mahoney, and Chavez—the triumph of the Senator from New Mexico being welcome primarily because it spares us the spectacle of Pat Hurley in action on Capitol Hill. We are grateful, too, for the return of a quartet of California liberals—Havenner, Holifield, King, and Helen Gahagan Douglas —though such other good Californians as Tolan, Outland, Voorhis, Healy, Doyle, and Izak will be missed.

Melvin Price (Ill.) and Mike Monroney (Okla.) narrowly escaped defeat, and Denver succeeded in bucking the tide by replacing a Republican with John Carroll, a progressive Democrat. So did Worcester, Massachusetts, which dropped a conservative isolationist in favor of H. D. Donahue, a Democrat indorsed by the P. A. C.

That about completes the good news of November 5. Connecticut's four liberal Democrats are out—a particularly sad loss in the cases of Herman Kopplemann and Mrs. Chase Woodhouse. Emily Taft Douglas, of Illinois, is to be replaced by William G. Stratton, an extremist of the McCormick school. And Martha Sharp in Massachusetts took a bad trimming at the hands of Joe Martin, who will now ascend to the Speaker's chair. Other important casualties in the House are Hook and Rabaut of Michigan, James Delaney of New York, Flood of Pennsylvania, Neely of West Virginia, Biemiller of Wisconsin, and Coffee and Savage of Washington.

In the Senate, such stalwarts as Tunnell, Murdock, Mitchell, and Guffey are gone, as well as such milder New Dealers as Huffman and Briggs. Potential Senate liberals like Rogers, Donart, Lehman, Erickson, McMurray, and Bunker were swamped in the Republican tide and will have to try again. Meanwhile, the Taft-Wherry-Butler nucleus of diehard Republicans in the Senate will expand to take in such luminaries of the right as Martin, Baldwin, and Lodge from the Atlantic states; Kem, Jenner, Bricker, and McCarthy from the Middle West; Ecton and Dworshak from the Mountain States; and Watkins and Cain from the Far West.

Without attempting to minimize the gravity of the shift in Congress, it is still possible to see in the Republican sweep a paradoxical ray of hope: the coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats which so bedeviled both Roosevelt and Truman is not likely to survive for long. The Southerners could indulge in this device as long as their own party was in power. With committee chairmanships and patronage safely at their disposal, they could afford to play fast and loose with party regularity. The picture is very different now. They have already lost their chairmanships, and if their party is defeated in 1948 they will lose much of their patronage, too. But that result is precisely the objective of the Republicans, who no longer need their Bourbon allies now that they have a working majority of their own. For a few months, the Coxes, Rankins, and Georges may be expected to help the Republicans frustrate the President. But as we move into the shadow of the 1948 election, they will once more see the advantages of party loyalty.

The point is important not because such solidarity has any ideological advantage for liberals—if anything, the contrary is the case—but because the development could greatly strengthen the hand of a hard-pressed President. The coalition was strong enough to override a veto; the Republican majority alone is not. In this technical fact may lie the salvation of Harry Truman. If he uses the veto, and the threat of the veto, with shrewdness and courage, he may get better results from an opposition Congress than from an undisciplined mob of legislators only theoretically controlled by his own party. He has the choice of taking a strong lead, with the hope of preserving the prestige of his office and his party, or of allowing the government to wallow for two years in uncertainty—with sure defeat at the end of the road and something like national paralysis en route.

Toward a New Beginning

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE election put a seal on what had happened long before. The era of Roosevelt had declined prior to his death; it had ended when he died. Last week the nation only summarized the accomplished fact, in totals of votes cast, in men elected and men defeated. The unreality of an interlude which deceived no one in spite of pious appeals to the Roosevelt name and tradition was exploded, and the particles came to earth in their natural political shape.

Now, looking back from the vantage point of defeat, we can scrutinize more sharply the era we have lost. We shall be able to see how much of the New Deal was solid gain and is fixed by law and custom beyond possibility of destruction by Roosevelt's successors, how much was vitiated from the start by the inner conflicts of what Henry Wallace still hopefully extolls as "democratic capitalism," and by the necessity of working through a machine so cynically concerned with power and perquisites as the Democratic Party. We can mark the disintegration of many of the Roosevelt reforms under the impact of war, an inevitable process, hastened by the need of appeasing the dominant business interests in the country and by the capture of the chief policy-making jobs in government agencies by Republicans and anti-New Deal industrialists. We can begin to calculate the effect of the immensely increased power over national policy of the military, a normal concomitant of war but no less a danger in any democracy. And, finally, we can trace as if on a military map the retreat of the machine Democrats from advance positions which had become politically exposed into comfortable rearguard posts, sheltered behind the euphemistic camouflage of "bi-partisanship." The Roosevelt era died bit by bit. Now that it has been officially interred, despite the nominal survival of Mr. Truman, progressives are free to abandon both pretense and illusions and get to work laying the foundation for a new beginning.

For they cannot go on living in the shadow of their great leader or try merely to resurrect and refurbish the New Deal. During the campaign, it was natural that they should have invoked the name, and even the voice, of Roosevelt. It was all they had left to cling to. For the future, it will not be enough. The progressive movement will never be rebuilt on the basis of a program improvised piecemeal to meet the successive crises of a worldwide economic breakdown. Today's problems are different. The New Deal is old and largely out of date. One doesn't prime a pump that is overflowing; one devises means of controlling the surplus—directing it into dry furrows or empty cisterns. One doesn't rest on a system of legislation to protect labor's right to organize and bargain collectively at a time when anti-labor feeling is riding high on a tidal wave of strikes. Instead, one takes a running start and tackles the whole system of wages, prices, and productivity in terms of labor's firmly established power and its right to a voice in the control of industrial production.

These are items. They only illustrate the inadequacy of the old New Deal to cope with the problems created by our incredible post-war productive capacity and our obsolete methods of distributing the things we produce —problems which will be multiplied to incalculable totals when atomic energy begins, sooner perhaps than we think, to be plugged in to the industrial machine. New thinking is needed, new planning for the organization of America's economic life and our relationship with a world in revolution. The Republicans, busy consolidating their new-won gains, busy reducing the few remaining New Deal strong-points, will offer little competition in constructive political ideas; nor will the old-line Democrats, struggling to hold on to a power already lost. The next two years are likely to be a period of futile truce or inter-party bargaining. Nothing better can be expected while, at worst, the country may be plunged into an interlude of reaction expressed in all the ugly forms that marked the years of Harding. Only the progressives, inside or outside the two old parties, will be free to face the necessities of the situation.

Let us not fool ourselves in this hour of appraisal. The routed progressive forces in America are not equipped with a program or even prepared to unite on any program. They have emerged from the election reduced in strength, splintered and dispersed. The old struggle with the Communists in the unions and in the political groups is gathering fresh impetus. Strong leaders are lacking. The most effective men on the liberal wing are themselves so much the children of the pre-war era that they may not be able to provide the ideas and dynamics for a new start. The groups that fought for the election of progressives in this last campaign—the two Political Action Committees, the Independent Citizens' Committee, the Liberals and the Labor Party in New York, various unions and independent voters' groups throughout the country—had only two things to hold them together: the heritage of the New Deal and their fear of Republican rule. No common program; no organizational unity; no effective leadership. Defeated, they must start from scratch, for the fight they have just lost was only the start of a much tougher one ahead.

In some ways it would be a comfort to believe the prediction of the omniscient Alsops, printed in the New York Herald Tribune two days after the election, that a left-wing third party was about to emerge from the débâcle. They even reported that the coming organization was already named—the "People's Party." If we could believe all this, at least the present political scene would have more coherence. But it is hard to credit. The only third-party proposal I have heard about is definitely anti-Communist, related to the Liberal Party in New York.

As for the progressive leaders who gathered in Washington last week under the chairmanship of Henry Morgenthau, their tentative proposals for broader coalition definitely excluded the possibility of a third party. A later meeting will be called to develop a plan of co-ordinated action, in and out of Congress. But nothing in the history of the groups involved, or in their leadership, suggests that any systematic social-political program, much less a new party, is in the making.

This was to be expected. Neither the reorientation of ideas demanded by the period we face nor the integration of forces on the left can be hastily improvised. Both will mean hard work by individuals and groups all over the country. In this effort, The Nation intends to take an active share. Even before the election, a conference of liberals on the West Coast called by the Nation Associates produced an immense amount of creative thinking on the issues that last week's vote crystallized in such concrete form. We hope to conduct similar discussions in other places. And in the pages of The Nation we shall analyze the practical as well as the theoretical problems that confront democratic Americans. Harold Laski's series, beginning in this number, will be a significant contribution to our analysis. Attached to no man or party, we can comment without constraint upon issues and leaders, programs, parties, and strategies. Out of such discussions, in which we warmly invite our readers to join, we shall formulate as the weeks pass The Nation's program for a new American progressive movement.

[Can the progressives regain effective control of the Democratic Party or are they faced with the difficult alternative of attempting to organize a third party? What is the probable future role of Henry Wallace and Claude Pepper? Miss Kirchwey will discuss these questions in next week's issue.]

The Past Recaptured

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, November 9

FOR sixteen long and hungry years Republican national headquarters have looked out forlornly over a changing Washington. Housed in a prim, red-brick mansion wedged incongruously between a row of fashionable women's dress shops and a cafe, the Republicans have marked time in an atmosphere as decorous and nostalgic as an old lady's home. Tuesday night the famine was over. By nine o'clock sleek limousines were gliding down Connecticut Avenue and stopping before the mansion. Well-dressed elderly men and women stepped gaily into the hall, giggled at the sign, "Had Enough? Vote Republican," and hurried into the long room where the posted returns showed a clear sweep.

A special train was rushing through the Midwest on its way to Washington. President Truman and a few friends were listening to the returns. By ten o'clock they knew the worst. The President had lost both the House and Senate. The little world that Harry Truman had inherited on an April afternoon had fallen apart. But if the news undermined the President's stubborn good humor, he gave no hint of it the next morning and waved gaily to people in the Washington station. Since then he has clothed himself in a curious silence.

During the last few days his friends have been trying to draw a new picture of Harry Truman. They are picturing a ruggedly independent man with no strings attached to him, a man who will act clearly and boldly for the good of the nation, let the chips fall where they may. With or without a new Truman there will certainly be changes in downtown Washington. The exodus of men and women who worked under Roosevelt will be accelerated. None of them want to stay for the investigations by Republican-dominated Congressional committees and the lean budgets they must work with.

Only the desperate pleading of Mr. Truman will be able to keep Secretary of War Patterson, Secretary of the Navy Forrestal, Secretary of Labor Schwellenbach, Secretary of Agriculture Anderson, or Postmaster General Hannegan in the Cabinet. Whether Byrnes remains depends upon Vandenberg, who may think it convenient to let Byrnes take the rap for any unpopular decision the Senator pushes on him. More than ever, the Secretary of State will be a creature of Vandenberg.

Patterson and Forrestal have no desire to preside over the inevitable reduction of the army and navy under the Republican budget-cutting program; currently, the top bet for running the War Department is another Missourian, Assistant Secretary for Air Symington. Mournful Lew Schwellenbach knows he would have an almost impossible task to get unions to cool down in the face of restrictive labor legislation. The Agriculture Department will be run by the House and Senate agriculture committees, and even Clinton Anderson, for all his good humor, does not look forward to that; Under Secretary Dodd is a possibility for his position. Bob Hannegan was tired of Washington long before the elections.

On the Hill Vandenberg will be the honorary G. O. P. leader as president pro tem of the Senate. He does not care for the more active and trying role of floor leader. A big scrap is already developing over this job, with the dyed-in-the-wool conservative Kenneth Wherry and the liberal Wayne Morse both out to chop down Bob Taft. Wherry has never forgiven Taft for approving the compromise OPA bill after getting his formula for manufacturers included, while farm products were left to the discretion of a decontrol board. Morse considers Taft an old-line reactionary. Actually, Taft will be something of a divided personality in the Eightieth Congress. Conservative as he is, he has a coldly logical mind to which liberals can appeal. And he is a candidate for President. The great test of whether the Republican Party can enfold liberals will come with the selection of the chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee. The ranking man, Arthur Capper, is too old—he will soon be eighty-one. The next in line is George Aiken of Vermont, who has never sought to hide his admiration for many New Deal programs and personalities.

In the House it is a cinch that Joe Martin, loyal member of the Old Guard, will be Speaker, but the real power will be down on the floor in the majority leader. Two men are after the job—the big and noisy Clarence Brown of Ohio and Charles Halleck of Indiana, a keen strategist. Brown is the more popular of the two, but it is generally acknowledged that Halleck is the smartest G. O. P. back-room operator in Washington. John Taber, who hates to see a Democrat spend a dollar of public money, will be chairman of the Appropriations Committee. This means that every bureau downtown will have to kneel and grovel for funds. Jesse Wolcott who directed the attack on the OPA, will run the Banking and Currency Committee. If there are any controls left by January, Wolcott will get rid of them in short order Charles Eaton, the white-haired and gentlemanly doctor, will head the Foreign Affairs Committee and will follow the line laid down by Senator Vandenberg. J. Parnell Thomas, red-faced friend of John Rankin, will be in a seventh heaven all his own, running the Un-American Activities Committee. Harold Knutson, the grumpy conservative and isolationist from Minnesota, will sit on the tax policy. There will be one good effect of the elections. Edith Nourse Rogers, a great champion of the disabled veteran, will head the Veterans' Committee.

The Republican program is no mystery. Taxes will be cut, perhaps 20 per cent. The federal budget will be cut as much, if not more, with particular emphasis on army, navy, and occupation costs. Whether the United States will be able to have any occupation program in Germany or Japan is doubtful. The Republicans are already working on restrictive labor legislation. Senator Joe Ball has a handful of bills which would outlaw the closed shop and emasculate the Wagner act.

The only positive suggestion for a way out of the dilemma of the next two years has been advanced by Senator Fulbright of Arkansas. He wants Mr. Truman to appoint a Republican Secretary of State and then resign. He believes the G. O. P. should have full responsibility for government. Otherwise, said Fulbright, "each party will try to blacken the other. . . . The long-term effect will be to create the impression that democratic processes are bad and all its officials are blackguards. This will not do the democratic system any good."

Both the White House and the Republicans are wildly unenthusiastic about the Fulbright proposal. The President's friends think it is insulting to him, and the Republicans say Fulbright is trying to put them on the spot.

This morning one of the reporters gathered in the White House lobby waiting for the Cabinet meeting to break up gave a good description of the atmosphere since Tuesday. He called it, "an air of desperate futility."

Trusteeship: Military Model

Lake Success, November 9

THE draft trusteeship and agreement for the Japanese-mandated islands in the Pacific which the United States government transmitted on November 6 for the information of the ten other members of the Security Council, as well as of New Zealand and the Philippines, is hardly the beau geste which friends of both this country and the U. N. had been hoping for. Under the draft agreement the United States would become sole trustee for the three groups of islands—Marshalls, Carolinas, and Marianas—and would have administrative, legislative, and jurisdictional authority over the territory "as an integral part of the United States."

The mandated islands, however, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, would be designated a strategic area, which means that the area would be subject to the supervision of the Security Council, except for political, social, and educational matters, with respect to which the Security Council shall "avail itself of the assistance of the Trusteeship Council."

The U. N. Charter (Article 82) provides that "there may be designated, in any trusteeship agreement, a strategic area or areas which may include part or all of the trust territory to which the agreement applies." The United States was thus acting within the terms of the Charter in requesting designation of the Japanese-mandated islands, which played an important part in the strategy of the Pacific war, as a strategic area. The phrase in Article 3 of the draft agreement about administration of the islands as "an integral part of the United States," however, opens the way for the charge by other nations that this constitutes a disguised form of annexation. Also open to criticism is Article 13 of the draft trusteeship agreement, which states that the islands can "from time to time" be specified by the administering authority "as closed for security reasons." By Article 14, however, the United States undertakes to apply in the trust territory the provisions of appropriate international conventions. This can be interpreted to mean that if an agreement is reached by the Atomic Energy Commission for international inspection, such an agreement would be applicable to the islands.

The draft trusteeship agreement, with its emphasis on national security, obviously represents an attempt to effect a compromise between the views of the State Department, which favored trusteeship by the U. N., and those of the War and Navy departments, which demanded outright annexation. The State Department deserves credit for its unremitting efforts to have this country fulfil the spirit and not merely the letter of the Charter concerning trusteeship. Praise, too, should be given to John Foster Dulles, American spokesman on the Trusteeship Committee of the General Assembly, who pressed the Administration to break the silence it had maintained on the subject—a silence that made it highly embarrassing for Mr. Dulles to urge other nations holding mandated territories (Britain, France, Belgium, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa) to submit draft agreements concerning their territories, and thus clear the way for the creation of the Trusteeship Council. Addressing the Trusteeship Committee on November 7, however, Mr. Dulles made it clear that if the U. N. did not accept the draft agreement submitted by the United States, this country would continue de facto control of the mandated islands. As the French say, "C'est le ton qui fait la chanson." The United States would in any case have retained control over the islands. But by making its claim in a different tone, it could have displayed the kind of moral leadership that is sorely lacking in the General Assembly.

Of far-reaching political significance was another statement made by Mr. Dulles in connection with trusteeship, when he defined a phrase in the Charter that has given headaches to international experts. This is the phrase in Article 79 which states that "the terms of trusteeship for each territory to be placed under the trusteeship system, including any alteration or amendment, shall be agreed upon by the states directly concerned." Previous discussions had indicated that Russia considered itself in the category of "states directly concerned" and might invoke its veto power in the Security Council to prevent acceptance of draft agreements covering former League mandates or other non-self-governing territories that might be placed in trust with the U. N.

Mr. Dulles made it plain that this country, while regarding itself as "directly concerned" in the disposal of mandated territories, notably in the Near East and Africa, would waive the right to veto proposed agreements provided other states—and that meant Russia—did likewise. The American proposal as outlined by Mr. Dulles is that the Trusteeship Committee should establish a small subcommittee to hear the views of all interested countries on proposed trusteeship agreements, and that after asking the views of the mandatory power on proposed amendments it should report to the General Assembly on whether or not a given agreement ought to be accepted. This procedure would avoid the ticklish decisions as to what states are "directly concerned" but would permit all interested parties to be heard. Opposition to this proposal is expected not only from Russia, which would stand to lose another forum for the expression of its views on colonial questions, but also from the Arab nations, which consider themselves "directly concerned" in the British mandate over Palestine.

The American Political Scene

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

I. The Case of Harry Truman

London, October 30

TO THE foreign observer of the American scene, the outstanding characteristic of the landscape is the absence of effective leadership. There is nowhere any clear sense of direction. There is a confused babel of noises from which emerges no decisive note. The White House may have the best of intentions, but Americans watch it rather to see the mistakes it will make than to hope for the guidance it might offer. In any serious sense the Cabinet has ceased to exist. If it meets from time to time, there is no evidence to suggest either that it is asked for or that it attempts the formulation of coherent policy. The Congress may have taken the bit between its teeth, but no one can say where it is going except that it will not follow, if it can help it, any road down which the President is going. Little seems left of that deep national interest in the activities of Washington which, in the era of Franklin Roosevelt, made the White House the inescapable center round which the effort of the nation was built.

HAROLD J. LASKI is one of the leaders of the British Labor Party and the author of many books on government. This is the first of three articles in which he will present the conclusions he reached in the course of a recent visit to America.

It can never be repeated too often that without Presidential leadership the American political system intensifies every centrifugal possibility a society can seize. The separation of powers in the American Constitution has always offered the Congress an interest divided from, if not antagonistic to, that of the President. After twelve years in which the legislative has been very obviously subordinate to the executive power it is perhaps natural enough for Congress to seek some redress of the balance. But it is no serious part of the inherent genius of Congress to offer a coherent lead. It is too little a really unified body, too much a divided empire within which there are separate provinces almost incapable of systematic articulation, to work out a plan of action which seeks to cover the whole realm of policy. The Congress, to put it briefly, is hardly organized to be a body with one predominant mind. It knows how to be against something; even more, it knows how to be against someone. It has learned with considerable effectiveness how to be an organ of critical investigation. But the very fact that it is separated in a final way from the executive process is fatal to any effort on its part to formulate policy as a coherent whole.

It was not to be expected that President Truman would possess the authority of his predecessor. He lacked both his overwhelming prestige and his unique experience; even his years in the Senate had given him no intimate sense of the range of Presidential activity or of the speed with which decisions are required. He inherited a body of massive problems, both international and domestic, with but few of which he had any serious acquaintance. His obvious good-will was no substitute for his equally obvious lack of experience. He showed fairly soon that he did not know how to build a team of advisers whose collective counsel would be an efficient substitute for his own inner uncertainties. He was too easily tempted to believe that the men whom he knew well would be able out of their friendship to compensate for inadequate knowledge of the complex issues he had to face. He had never been trained to lead. He had never been accustomed to mobilize public opinion against a Congress which had taken the bit between its teeth. He did not know how to continue the Roosevelt tradition of insisting that no vested interest could exert an independent authority against the determined will of a President who knew both what he wanted to do and how he wanted to do it. There were always uppermost in his mind, first, the knowledge that he was not the direct choice of the American people for the Presidency, and, second, the inner doubt whether he was fitted for a place he had never sought for himself. In the result, he has not been able to utilize the élan which is inherent in the office itself when, as Theodore Roosevelt showed, it falls unexpectedly to a man who is anxious for its responsibilities.

President Truman is a weak President because he has not the special kind of resolution which makes a strong President. He would like to be on good terms with everyone; he cannot make up his mind that a strong President must begin by realizing that much of his strength consists in his choice of enemies. This irresolution has been made evident most clearly and most painfully in two episodes. It has emerged in his handling of the problem of Palestine. Once he agreed to set up the Anglo-American Commission of Inquiry, he had obviously acquired a right to share in the decisions to be made about its recommendations. That was even more the case since he was aware that the British Foreign Secretary had given the members of the commission an undertaking to implement its recommendations. His right, moreover, was reinforced by a strong resolution of support for him from both houses of Congress and by the fact that British policy in Palestine was a grim and obvious failure. Yet he allowed himself to throw all his cards away by an irresolute unwillingness to step into the center of the picture and demand that attention for his proposals which would have been commensurate with the influence he might have exerted. He assumed the posture of a dissatisfied complainant when it was open to him to insist upon his right to share in the making of direct decisions. And the weakness of this attitude was the greater because it increased the victimization of the very people he was anxious to assist.

His irresolution over the episode of Mr. Wallace's resignation was even more striking. It is no doubt true that Mr. Wallace, through sheer bad strategy, made both the President's position and his own about as difficult as possible. It is not easy to defend a speech which flagrantly contradicted the policy pursued at Paris by Mr. Byrnes under the obvious authority of the President. It is still less easy to see why the speech was made many weeks after it was likely to alter a direction behind which, for good or ill, was not only the reputation of the Secretary of State but also the support of those Senatorial representatives upon whom President Truman would later have to rely for the approval of the Paris treaties by the Senate.

It ought to have been obvious to Mr. Wallace that his letter and speech alike were mistimed: their relevance was to a period before June 15, when Mr. Byrnes began his negotiations in Paris. But whatever the weakness of Mr. Wallace's timing, he was entitled to say that he delivered the speech only after he had obtained the permission of the President to do so. Neither the speech nor the letter which preceded it was in any sense an act of disloyalty to the Administration. Their implications were crystal clear. They meant a root-and-branch rejection of the major principles of Mr. Byrnes's foreign policy. But that foreign policy was not only that of the President himself; it was also, at least by inference, supported by Senators Connally and Vandenberg and thus the policy which later both parties in the Senate would ratify. It therefore followed that Mr. Wallace's speech not only revealed a deep rift within the Cabinet but also, in so far as it had Presidential approval, was a direct censure upon the official Administration policy in Paris.

President Truman could not have it both ways, though for a few days after Mr. Wallace's speech it seemed as if he was very anxious to have it both ways. To the outsider he appeared to want to retain Mr. Wallace, in part as the main remaining symbol of the Roosevelt tradition and in part as his chief link with the labor support so vital to the strength of his Administration. But that would have had three important consequences. It would have cast doubt upon the authority of Mr. Byrnes as the chief American negotiator at Paris; it would have been tantamount to a Presidential repudiation, especially after their protest, of Senators Connally and Vandenberg; and it would have left the world in grave doubt about the substance of American foreign policy. If, in short, there are two announced and conflicting tendencies in the President's Cabinet, where decisions have to be taken, he must choose between them. President Truman did not need to ask for Mr. Wallace's resignation, but his only practical alternative was to invite the resignation of Mr. Byrnes, with the high probability that this would be followed at least by that of Senator Vandenberg.

No one can have watched the curious maneuvers of the few days between Mr. Wallace's speech and the President's request for his resignation without seeing that Mr. Truman was striving hard to avoid the choice to which he was driven. But no one can fail, either, to see that the President himself, by permitting Mr. Wallace to make the speech, had created the position in which the choice was inescapable. And the observer was left in the difficulty of not knowing whether the President's choice was made because he approved of Mr. Byrnes's policy or because he thought its rejection would lead later to difficulties—with a Senate of unknown composition—which he might not be able to overcome. The unmistakable outcome of this curious episode was to create doubt as to whether the President had any clear mind of his own in the vital realm of international affairs.

He followed events; he did not lead them. That was shown in dramatic fashion in matters of major domestic importance. His handling of the threatened railroad strike showed that he had no clear sense of direction in the field of labor; he trusted to the chance that some improvised compromise would emerge. His handling of the maritime strike was lamentable since it jeopardized, through the hold-up of supplies, the whole process of world economic recovery and the safety of those stricken countries which are dependent upon UNRRA for maintaining something like a decent standard of living. His abject surrender of price control over the issue of the meat shortage carried with it the clear implication that the forces of big business had now been given their head. His plaintive denunciation of their selfish neglect of the common well-being did nothing to remedy the fact that he did not know how to control a situation in which prices would obviously rise and the workers fight desperately for increased wages to keep as close as might be to rising prices. The President did not seem to know, as his predecessor had known, how to organize the support he could have obtained for the continuance of price control if only he had offered evidence that he proposed to fight. The truth literally was that he did not enter the battle until he had already lost it. What was worse, he did not even lose it in such a way that the responsibility for the results of his defeat would be placed where it belonged. The main public emotion which followed the abrogation of the controls was not the sense that he had been fighting men who were plainly in the wrong but that he had never really entered the battle with a serious will to victory.

If the President of the United States is unwilling to lead, there is no one who can take his place as leader: that is a clear corollary of the American system of government. The Cabinet cannot lead because it has no coherent existence unless it serves a President who makes his purposes plain. The Congress cannot lead because both its constitutional position and its traditional habits make it essentially an instrument of negative control rather than of positive direction. The political parties cannot lead, partly because they are incomplete alliances of divergent interests, and partly because the enforced unity of a Presidential campaign is required to make their direction clear to the electorate. Nor is there any power in any private citizen or organization, however important, to do more than compete for a public attention the interest of which is centered, not upon those who seek for influence, but upon those who have the power to decide. If the President does not know what to do, the American system leaves a vacuum which his hesitation allows to be filled by pressure groups lacking, perhaps, any regard for the public need; and these groups may seek to prevent his later recovery of the initiative, of which he should never lose hold.

We are only now beginning to see the price that not merely the United States but the whole world has to pay for Mr. Roosevelt's death. In a period of continuing crisis no voice speaks for the American people with unchallengeable authority. It may be true that President Truman is anxious to preserve the heritage of his predecessor and to carry on his policies; no one need doubt the benevolence of his purposes or his appreciation that the times are serious. What is lacking is the sense that the President has, in any realm of policy, clear objectives he is seeking to reach. In the absence of such defined objectives the political scene has become a bewildering chaos of competing voices which prevents the United States from acting with a directness and intelligibility proportionate to its strength. Where, under Mr. Roosevelt, the ship of state was bound for a recognizable destination, under Mr. Truman no one quite knows whose hands have grasped the helm or for what port they propose to steer. Everyone waits for signals which do not come.

It is not clear what America proposes to do in Germany or the Far East; it is not clear how far its responsibilities will be engaged in the Middle East and Southeastern Europe; it is not even clear how genuinely it is seeking for a modus vivendi with Russia. If America's proposals for the control of atomic energy are reasonably plain and, at least in essence, an admirable basis for discussion, the meaning of its demand for bases, its experiments at Bikini, and the use of its navy and its air force raise complicated questions. So, too, do its decision to withhold help not merely from states like Poland, where it doubts the validity of proposals for free elections, but from Czechoslovakia, whose friendliness to Russia has in no wise impaired the reality of its democratic institutions. On the international plane at least it is difficult to argue that there is any single principle of action round which American policy is built. Rather does that policy emerge as a patchwork quilt the bits and pieces of which are put together without any attempt at a uniform pattern. Yet it is a uniform pattern in American policy that the world most needs if it is to settle down with the speed that is urgent for recovery from the impact of war.

The absence of a single principle of action is not less noticeable in the American domestic scene than in the international. The President has lost the initiative in Congress and with it the moral ascendancy he requires over his own party. He compels the attention of public opinion, but he has lost the certainty that he can mobilize it. If he has not broken with labor, he has at least subjected their relations to an acute strain. When the Congressional elections are over, he will still have to make up his mind whether he will seek to be the Democratic candidate in 1948 and, if so, whether he will run on a platform which would entitle him to stand as Mr. Roosevelt's legitimate heir. If he decides not to run, he must at least seek a way through the present confusion which will enable his party to enter the campaign of 1948 with enough inner unity to have some prospect of success. At the moment, certainly, it looks as if his failure to give a lead had prepared that atmosphere of disillusion and inertia in which a fatigued electorate expresses its dissatisfaction in the choice of a wholly negative candidate like the late President Harding.

It would be a disastrous choice both for America and for the world. But it is pretty certainly an inevitable one unless Americans, in the next two years, are offered a recognizable choice between liberalism and reaction. For if there are to be two more years in which the direction is uncertain, the principles blurred, the leadership hesitating, the party machines will fall back on that vicious principle of "availability" which turns a Presidential election into a gamble with an unpredictable outcome. That would be a major misfortune, the consequences of which might well be disastrous.

The one thing the world now needs is that powerful states should adequately assess their responsibilities and take proportionate action about them. That requires the kind of leadership which is not afraid either of great purposes or of great experiments made in their name. It is the doubt whether President Truman has grasped this necessity that is giving the initiative in American politics to the very influences over whom Mr. Roosevelt was four times victorious. It is urgent for President Truman to realize that nothing less than this is at stake in the next two years. Somehow, that is the battle for which his forces must be prepared.

The Mufti's New Army

BY ANDREW ROTH

Jerusalem, October 25

A NEW factor is increasing the danger of explosion in Palestine's supercharged atmosphere. As you skirt the barbed wire and dodge the armored cars that fill the Holy City you see a profusion of uniforms—the olive drab of the famous Sixth Air-Borne, the kilts of a Highland outfit, the red shoulder patches of General Anders's Poles, and the tall, Turkish-style hats of the Palestine police. But the most menacing is the plain khaki of two newly organized Arab para-military bodies —the Nejada (Rescuers) and the Futuwa (Power). They pretend to be nothing more than older Boy Scouts, but obviously they hope to be the Arab answer to the Irgun and the Haganah.

ANDREW ROTH, author of "Dilemma in Japan," is on his way to the Far East and sending regular reports to The Nation from his stops along the way. His last article was on Egypt. His next will be a study of Jewish and Arab leftist movements.

The Futuwa and the Nejada together, with their fewer than 10,000 young men, are much smaller than the Jewish groups and are inferior in organization and training. Some persons therefore minimize their importance and the "anti-Zionist boycott" which they have been supporting. A favorite story in Palestine today is about three Arabs who entered a Jewish musical-instruments shop in Haifa. After the usual bargaining they bought a trumpet and then asked if they could leave by a rear door which opened on a little-used alley. The manager refused this request but made no objection when one man went around to the alley and received the trumpet from his friend through a back window. Some hours later an Arab parade passed by, complete with brass band. Among the leaders was our friend the trumpeter, marching under a banner which proclaimed, much to the amusement of the Jewish shopkeeper: "Boycott all Zionist goods!"

Any amusement over the Nejada and the Futuwa should have ceased at the end of September when it became known that the two groups were being fused and were holding secret meetings in a walled villa in Alexandria under the tutelage of Haj Amin el Husseini, ex-Mufti of Jerusalem. In the hands of the Mufti, who is probably the most dangerous firebrand in the Arab world, even a few thousand men can be extremely powerful. He is reported to have had only 1,500 regulars at his disposal in the Arab rebellion of 1936-39.

Any activities directed by the Mufti are bound to arouse Palestine's Jewish population to a high pitch of fury. They know of his anti-Semitic utterances over the Axis radio during the war, including the 1944 broadcast in which he shrilled: "Arabs! Rise as one and fight for your sacred rights. Kill the Jews wherever you find them. This pleases God, history, and religion. This saves your honor. God is with you." The Hebrew press here has reported very extensively the discovery by the American army in Germany of conclusive documentary evidence that the Mufti constantly goaded the leading Nazis to speed up the extermination of Jews in gas-chambers in order to reduce the number who might want to emigrate to Palestine.

Jews and Arabs alike are more than suspicious about how the Nejada and Futuwa came into being. Neither body makes any secret of the fact that they have arms and are practicing their use. Members are given their uniforms free and wear them openly. This is strange, for according to the Official Gazette of November 15, 1945, it is a crime punishable by life inprisonment to wear "any article of clothing or other article likely to be mistaken for any [foreign] uniform," and the Nejada-Futuwa uniforms are American army surplus. Furthermore, in the Official Gazette of February 21, 1946, the High Commissioner published the decree that "no person shall, except under the authority of a written permit granted by the Inspector General of Police, wear in public any distinctive dress or article of clothing or emblem . . . which indicates or purports to indicate that the wearer thereof belongs to any social or political organization." These groups are definitely political organizations since they pledge allegiance to the Arab Higher Executive Committee.

At a recent press conference in Tel Aviv, Richard Stubbs, the British spokesman here, announced that the High Commissioner had decided not to apply at present the clause in the Defense Regulations concerning the wearing of uniforms, and that only uniforms "likely to be confused with those worn by members of His Majesty's forces" would be considered illegal. When I repeated this to a well-known Arab lawyer in Jerusalem he smiled wrily and told me there were men still in prison who had been jailed in 1936 merely for possessing Boy Scout uniforms. I asked him why he thought the authorities were permitting the formation of the Nejada and the Futuwa, and he replied emphatically: "There are three reasons: first, to provoke Arab-Jewish conflict; second, to act as a check on leftward developments among the Arabs; and third, to prepare Arab forces for an eventual war with Russia." He told me that as an old friend of the Mufti he was asked to join the Futuwa but had refused, saying, "If you really wanted to fight for Palestine's liberation you would be organizing an underground army."

The suspicion that these organizations are being formed with the agreement, if not at the instigation, of the British authorities is based not only on British willingess to waive the ban on uniforms and to ignore the possession of arms but also on the type of Arabs sponsoring them. The Futuwa is headed by Kamil Arekat, who is the son of an Arab police official and was himself an inspector in the C. I. D.—which everyone here refers to as "the Gestapo." Its political sponsor is Jamal Husseini, the Mufti's nephew. When he was returned to Palestine by the British from his detention in Rhodesia he had hardly alighted from his plane before he began bitter attacks on the Zionists. Arab leaders noted that he was not attacking the British policy as he used to and tried to discover just what was his new line. Most of them concluded that he was only a slightly disguised salesman for an Anglo-Arab alliance, and as a result his prestige is badly damaged. The younger generation of Arab nationalists feel that British domination is a much more important enemy than Zionism.

The suspicion of a British connection extends to the Mufti himself, and a number of responsible Arabs subscribe to the belief that the authorities are preparing his return to Palestine as a safely anti-Soviet Arab leader when the time is ripe. They point out that as long ago as January British political intelligence officers in this area were urging the Mufti's "escape" from Paris to Egypt or the Lebanon. It is also noteworthy that during his stay in Alexandria the Mufti has allowed himself to be interviewed in person for publication only by the London Times Middle Eastern correspondent, Brigadier Cyril D. Quilliam, who happens to have been Britain's chief intelligence officer in the Middle East during the war.

The Mufti is much more clever than Jamal Husseini and has not yet given any open sign that he has come to an agreement with Britain. He still has tens of thousands of fervent supporters in Palestine who will flock into the Nejada and the Futuwa if he gives the word. What is encouraging, however, is the degree of skepticism about the Mufti which exists among the younger, better-educated Arab nationalists. I spent an afternoon discussing the Mufti with young Arabs of varying shades of opinion, and they all supported one of their number who said: "We Arabs have learned in the last few years that our older, wealthier leaders are not dependable fighters for our freedom. They weaken and come to terms if their interests are threatened. We intend to fight the British for our freedom. If the Mufti wants to lead the fight, we are with him. If he doesn't, we'll fight him as well."

What to Do with Neurotics

BY MARTIN GUMPERT

NEVER have I taken a worse beating than after the appearance of my article against placebos in The Nation of September 14. Friends stopped me on the street to reproach me, and I was almost overwhelmed by angry, scolding, or insulting letters. There were a few approving ones, to be sure, but—honesty compels the admission—very few. The protests came, with scattered exceptions, from the defendants in the case—that is, from physicians who prescribe placebos; approval was expressed by the victims of such treatment, the patients who had been deceived by placebos.

Most of my colleagues seemed horrified that in this age of psychosomatic medicine I had apparently never heard of neurotic and functional ailments and the need for psychotherapy in medical practice. But I object to this objection. And I refer to a statement by Dr. R. F. Mackey which I quoted in a previous article: "There can be no doubt that the misdiagnosis and mismanagement of the so-called functionally ill patient is the medical scandal of the day."

It is true that the majority of ailments for which medical help is required are caused by or connected with emotional or mental disturbances. My colleagues believe that the use of placebos—suggestion by deceit—is legitimate psychotherapy. I insist that it is cheap and unscientific psychotherapy and that though some immediate good results may be accomplished, there is a possibility of greater harm when the victim perceives the fraud. Who would not lose confidence in a physician after discovering that his prescription was only sugar? And does anybody seriously believe that a neurotic or psychosomatic condition can be as efficiently treated by suggestion as by honest methods of psychotherapy—that is, by thorough investigation of the cause and efforts to correct it?

The emotionally maladjusted citizen is the greatest social calamity of our time and, since citizens are patients, the most vital problem of medical practice. The invasion of neurotic patients into every field of medicine and the tremendous need for psychotherapy cannot be met by placebos. Efficient methods for treating the emotional impact of sickness without the use of fallacious suggestion can be taught, though it must be admitted that the facilities for teaching are sadly lacking. At this moment of crisis, psychotherapy is in a state of complete disorganization.

Dr. G. Brock Chisholm has said that this country needs 20,000 psychiatrists.* Of this number 3,000 are available, and as many as 200 more a year may be produced by existing training facilities. "If the population could remain constant both in numbers and in needs, and if it could be arranged that no psychiatrist would retire or die, there could be enough psychiatrists to meet the treatment needs in about eighty years." This psychotherapeutic reality is, indeed, grotesque. Millions of people need treatment, and only a few thousands can get it—at an exorbitant price and a tremendous sacrifice of time. The hours devoted to psychotherapeutic instruction in our medical schools are appallingly inadequate. Postgraduate training in the field is limited by bureaucratic, financial, and dogmatic restrictions. If psychiatry is to fulfil its urgent social duties, it must develop methods which can be applied to poor and rich, which require a minimum of time, and which can be used by an intelligent and cooperative general practitioner. Preventive psychiatry must be developed into a living science, and social conditions which today are responsible for a mass epidemic of neuroses must be investigated and "treated" by expert psychiatrists.

In the present upheaval of physical and mental unhappiness, we should not forget that the human mind has a miraculous power of balance and survival. Many neurotic symptoms are limited to short periods of personal or social catastrophe and are improved or cured by the patient's own effort as soon as the "emergency" is over. The tendency to start a psychotherapeutic treatment of many years in the presence of such symptoms is full of dangers. Though improvement often cannot be denied, psychotherapy can develop into a lifelong occupation for the patient and finally bankrupt him.

Psychiatrists are of course skeptical about the psychotherapeutic ability of common practitioners, but the results the latter have obtained, even now when so few of them have had special training, speak loudly in their favor. Dr. Peter G. Denker, of the Department of Neuropsychiatry, Bellevue Hospital, New York, has just published an account of 500 cases of severe psychoneurosis, leading to complete disability, that were treated by general practitioners. His investigation showed that there was no significant difference in the therapeutic success obtained by practitioners, psychiatrists, and psycho- analysts. The result was even slightly in favor of the general practitioners—71 per cent of their cases "apparently cured" within two years of onset against 63 per cent of 1,000 analytical cases. This is most reassuring. It would seem to prove that, up to now, no certain or superior method of psychotherapeutic treatment has been developed. The efficiency of psychotherapy seems to depend on the individual physician's personality and effort rather than on his adherence to a specific school of psychiatric thought.

Psychoanalysts are today scarcer than bacon. There is hardly a chance for a poor neurotic fellow to buy himself a good analyst or to devote as much time to his treatment as would be required by psychoanalytic doctrine. If we recognize the public importance of psychotherapy for our social structure, we must educate more and better psychotherapists in our medical schools and integrate psychotherapy into the general practice of medicine and into our institutions of public health. We shall then have a better chance of overcoming the present wave of mass neurosis—without the harmful help of placebos.

The U. N. and the People of Africa

BY E. S. SACHS

ONE of the declared aims of the Charter of the United Nations is: "To achieve international cooperation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion."

In 1944 the International Labor Organization, which is now a section of the U. N., held a conference at Philadelphia. Nearly all the nations of the world with the exception of the fascist states were represented, and a document known as the Philadelphia Charter was adopted with great enthusiasm. The charter states as one of its fundamental principles that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed, or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity," and that "the attainment of the conditions in which this shall be possible must constitute the central aim of national and international policy."

Recent events clearly indicate that the destiny of mankind, and especially of colonial peoples, is being determined not in accordance with the noble principles enunciated at San Francisco and Philadelphia but rather in accordance with more mundane considerations, such as military strategy and "life lines."

The vast African continent has always been a forgotten region. Shamefully divided up among a number of colonial powers, black Africa remains entirely neglected, inarticulate, and friendless. References to Africa in recent months have been almost entirely limited to the strategic importance of Cape Town and Cairo or to the development of air bases on the west coast, huge military centers in the east, and naval bases in North and South Africa. Little thought is given to the terrible fact that between Cairo and Cape Town, Dakar and Mombasa, a hundred million people exist in a state of social misery, political oppression, and economic exploitation.

These hundred million black-skinned members of the human race enjoy no human rights and no fundamental freedoms. They are permitted no voice in determining their own fate. They are compelled to live in primitive tribal backwardness, serving as vast reservoirs of cheap labor for rapacious mine owners and big farmers. Apparently the principles of liberty, equality, and fraternity and the ideals of human freedom enshrined in the American Declaration of Independence have only a narrow geographical significance.

For decades the black people of Africa have been "the hewers of wood and drawers of water" for their foreign overlords. But what is most sinister is the fact that economic development and increased prosperity for investors seem only to bring more misery for the Africans. This is clearly illustrated in the Union of South Africa, by far the most important and, economically and industrially, the most highly developed part of Africa. During the war the Union experienced unprecedented prosperity. Gold mining, the basic industry of the country, makes an annual profit of more than fifty million pounds sterling. Its shares rose in value by several hundred millions in the last two years. Many shares rose 1,000 per cent. The discovery of new gold fields has still further increased the wealth of the industry.

But what about the position of the 400,000 native workers in the mines? This vast conscript army is composed almost entirely of indentured laborers recruited from the native reserves within the Union and in adjoining territories. They are forced to live in compounds hundreds and thousands of miles away from their families. They receive rations to keep them fit for work. Even cattle are usually supplied with straw beds, but these workers have to buy their own sacks of straw to lay on their cement beds. Their cash wage ranges from 35 cents to 45 cents a day; it is less today than it was fifty years ago, though the cost of living is up probably 100 per cent.

To keep wages depressed, the Chamber of Mines introduced years ago a pernicious system known as the "maximum average"; this fixes an average daily wage for laborers in all mines which may not be exceeded without penalty. The African Mine Workers' Union tried by peaceful means for several years to obtain a wage increase, but its representations were completely ignored. The right of collective bargaining being denied them, about 50,000 miners went out on strike some months ago. In dealing with this emergency, the Prime Minister, Field Marshal Smuts, who has an international reputation as a liberal, completely forgot the principles of the United Nations Charter which he helped to draft and acted with the ruthlessness that is customary with him in industrial disputes. All available police were mobilized and the strike was speedily settled. About twenty native workers were killed, scores of others were injured, and the leaders of the union were arrested. The workers were forced back into the mines with batons and sjamboks. The Nazis, when they killed their prisoners, often used the term "auf dem Flucht erschossen" (shot while trying to escape). The Union government spokesmen are more original and say ingeniously that the Africans were killed "in the course of a stampede."

The situation of the rest of the natives, who number 8,000,000 and constitute four-fifths of the entire population, is shamefully bad. The basic factor in the social and economic policy of that part of Africa south of the Equator is the insatiable demand of mine owners and farmers for cheap labor. In the Union alone more than one million native workers are employed in mining and agriculture. The most inhuman methods have been adopted to deprive the natives of land and to disrupt their means of subsistence, simply to force them to sell their labor to mining magnates and landlords at the lowest price. This policy is having a disastrous effect on the European population, hundreds of thousands of whom have become "poor whites," living in extreme poverty.

The Union government is seeking to incorporate Southwest Africa, over which it has a mandate, within the Union. The question has already been introduced into the discussions of the U. N. There will follow a further request on the part of the Union government for the incorporation of the High Commission Territories of Swaziland, Basutoland, and Bechuanaland, which are at present ruled by the British Colonial Office.

Southwest Africa was first annexed by Germany in 1884. German colonial policy in that territory was characterized by brutal repression and extermination. The colony was surrendered by the Germans to the Union government in 1915, and on December 17, 1920, the Union obtained a mandate from the League of Nations. The Union of South Africa governs the territory through an administrator, and subject to certain modifications the laws of the Union apply there. The 300,000 natives of Southwest Africa have no voice whatever in the government of the country, and little or nothing has been done to raise their living standards. In 1922 a revolt was put down with the utmost ruthlessness. Just before World War II the territory became a center of feverish Nazi activity.

For the U. N. to sanction annexation now by the Union of South Africa would not only violate the interests of the indigenous population but would clearly indicate the U. N.'s approval of unbridled exploitation of the native peoples of Africa. Southwest Africa cannot be properly considered apart from the whole of southern Africa, and it is high time that the position of all the people of Africa was given consideration by those who are about to try to mold the future of mankind. The tens of millions of downtrodden people of Africa are entitled to know whether they are human beings with a right to continue their material and spiritual development in conditions of "freedom and dignity, economic security and equal opportunity," or whether there is a "color bar" in the Charter of the U. N. and black-skinned people are excluded from its benefits.

Drawings by Nan Ronsheim

If the basic principles of the U. N. Charter are not to become a mockery, it is imperative that before more millions of Africans are placed under the jurisdiction of the Union government, the condition of these unfortunate people be thoroughly investigated and the policy of the Union government clarified. In the course of such an investigation it is to be hoped that more attention will be given to the actual situation than to the lofty liberal statements of Field Marshal Smuts. There is a vast difference between the two.

Black Africa is crying out for justice. Civilized humanity must intervene, for the indigenous peoples of Africa are helpless and have no voice.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

THIS is the week our readers get their chance at the typewriter, while the editor sits on the other side of the desk and answers questions.

Dear Sir: One thing that makes me mad is when a good sustaining program is not carried by a local station because it has a program of its own, of inferior quality but sponsored. And while I'm on that subject, why doesn't Station WHCU carry the Saturday afternoon concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra?
Ithaca, N. Y. ROBERT MARSH

It is true that many stations substitute local commercials for network sustainers, but please be honest about what you call good. Your query about WHCU and the Saturday afternoon Philadelphia concerts has selfish overtones. After all, Cornell University is in Ithaca, and now, during the football season, the students and citizens prefer hearing the play-by-play descriptions of the Cornell games. There are never enough seats at the games to satisfy the demand, and the next best thing is the radio.

Moreover, WHCU goes off the air at sundown. If it were to carry the Philadelphia music after the games, only thirty to forty-five minutes would be left for the program services that usually go through the afternoon; and these services include such essentials as news of the world, what is playing at the local film theaters, and late sports news. When the majority of listeners to WHCU want music instead of the Cornell games they'll get it. Right now they are apparently satisfied with the Philharmonic on Sunday afternoon.

Dear Sir: Can you explain why I must listen to the programs I don't like? B. K. SACHS
Baltimore

Too many of us refuse to listen to programs we think we shall not enjoy. Unlike plays, films, and books, which are generally reviewed by competent critics, radio has few reviewers. So most listeners keep to a few selected programs and don't experiment with others. If we agree that radio is too important to let go its own way without benefit of criticism, then it is worth the effort of lending an ear to the mass-appeal programs. If, having heard the program three times, you still think it is not worth listening to, you can document your distaste and so help radio to raise its standards.

Dear Sir: One of my pet peeves concerning radio is based on the use of accents and "racial" jokes. "Can You Top This?" and Fred Allen's "Alley" bother me most. Immigration has practically ceased. Soon everyone will be American born. Will the accent still be on the air fifty years from now? D. F.
Amherst College

The use of character comics complete with putty nose, baggy pants, and pot belly is as old as the theatrical profession. I wasn't around in the days of Aristophanes, but the butt of all jokes in those days was probably some long-bearded Persian. I do remember the Dutch comic artistry of Weber and Fields, the Scotch comedy of Harry Lauder and Will Fyffe, the Yiddish overtones of Willie Howard, and the pungent "Vass You Dere, Sharlie?" of Jack Pearl.

All of them were popular in the music halls, burlesque, vaudeville, and musical comedy before hitting radio. Today these broad comedy characters are practically passé, even though Ed Gardner has done well with a "dopy Irisher" and Fred Allen has been playing around with Irish brogue.

"Can You Top This?" is staffed by three ex and expert vaudevillians. They could no more do without their Jewish stories than without their cigars. No offense is intended.

The pleasure depends on the expertness of the performer. Fred Allen's "Senator Claghorn" is just as broad comedy as his "Mrs. Nussbaum." They are both well done, and Allen's program is among the first fifteen in the Hooperatings. "Can You Top This?" is often not so well done and ranks forty-fifth in the Hooperating popularity lists.

Dear Sir: At a meeting on Better Radio the fact was deplored that there weren't more good evaluations of radio such as there are for books and drama. . . . The attention of the group was called to what The Nation is now doing. The "Worth Hearing" postscript will appeal to many. Personally I wish the time of these programs might be given, as well as the day and network.
LaCrosse, Wis. GERTRUDE R. THUROW

So many network stations put programs on the air at a different time from the network itself—that is, they record the show and play it later—that any attempt to give the time of the network broadcast would, I am afraid, only irritate would-be listeners.

WORTH HEARING

HENRY MORGAN (ABC, Wednesdays). The problem child of radio comes of age with a full-fledged network commercial. Two notches below Fred Allen when it comes to spoofing and debunking sponsors but well worth hearing.

BOB TROUT (CBS, Monday through Friday). One of the best news shows on the air today. Accurate, impartial, and interesting.

MEET THE PRESS (MBS, Fridays). Four top newsmen gang up on a national figure in a weekly press conference that is often more revealing than was anticipated.

BURL IVES (transcribed). Philco is sponsoring the guitar strumming and earthy ballad singing of Burl Ives on most stations. Too much commercial and not enough Burl Ives.

The People's Front

THE French Synarchists founded several other secret organizations, of which the most important was the "Cagoule" (C. S. A. R.—Comité secret d'action révolutionnaire), an extreme rightist military outfit whose members held commanding positions in the army. Pétain and his adviser, Loustaneau-Lacau, joined the C. S. A. R.; General Giraud and Lemaigre-Dubreuil, who pleaded the General's cause before the Americans in North Africa, were at least in contact with the "hooded men."

The Paris uprising of February 6, 1934, represented the first attempt of French synarchism to seize power; although the putschists were forced to retreat somewhat by popular reaction, which swept a people's front government into office in June of that year, they continued to build a fifth column which infiltrated the new administration. Jean Coutrot, whose mysterious death I mentioned in my last article, succeeded in having himself named adviser in the Ministry of Economy headed by Charles Spinasse (who later, during the Vichy regime, turned collaborator and was expelled from the Socialist Party). There Coutrot acted as a veritable provocateur, suggesting to Spinasse a series of ultra-radical and unrealistic measures which could not but discredit the Blum government. At the same time he used his influence to obtain key administrative posts for important Synarchists, notably Branger and Hekking. Coutrot also took advantage of his official position to create a number of research groups which were in fact synarchist cells—the "Ecole d'organization scientifique" of which he became president, the "Centre polytechnicien d'études économiques," and the Centre d'études humaines." Among the members of the last-named organization was the famous Dr. Alexis Carrel, who spent some time in the United States lecturing to university students on subjects which included, incidentally, the evils of democracy and the merits of totalitarianism. When the Third Republic was overthrown in June, 1940, Pétain as Chief of State promptly distributed leading government jobs to the Synarchists.

Like their counterparts in pre-Hitler Germany, French heavy industry, big business, and banking groups financed the synarchist movement from its inception. The inspecteurs de finances, who exercised wide powers and enjoyed special prerogatives under the Third Republic, played an important part in this operation. Together with the old Senate and the Quai d'Orsay, they formed the three pillars of French reaction. In 1928 Louis Fourmery, who is believed to have been one of the founders of the M. S. E. and was in any case a ranking member, took a leave of absence from his post as a general finance inspector to negotiate a private deal between the Kuhlman interests in France and the I. G. Farbenindustrie. He returned to his department in 1930 and from that time on promoted collaboration between the various industrialists in Germany who were working to make Hitler Reich Chancellor and those in France who were trying to instal a government headed by Marshal Pétain; if successful, they planned to create a strong Continental bloc aimed at halting the advance of the progressive forces in Europe. The banking firm of Hippolyte Worms put through an agreement, similar to the one concluded by Fourmery, between the Klöckner-Werken A. G. and the French combine of Humboldt-Deutz. Along with the Banque Worms, the Banque d'Indo-Chine went all out to tighten the ties between the German and French cartels and facilitate their joint endeavors to steer National Socialism and synarchism along a parallel course.

Despite the highly secret character of the M. S. E., the following men have been identified as members: Paul Baudoin, director of the Banque d'Indo-Chine and a friend of Mussolini, who with the help of the attractive Hélène de Portès became right-hand adviser to Premier Paul Reynaud in the last months before France's capitulation; Jacques Guérard, a banker who held the post of Ambassador to Lisbon under the Vichy regime; Jacques Barnaud of the Banque Worms, a great favorite with Göring, who was responsible for handing over to the Germans the major French chemical industries headed by the Francolor trust; Jacques Benoît-Méchin, author of a book on the Reichswehr, who was rewarded for his services to the German army by being named a director of the Banque Worms after the 1940 armistice; Pierre Pucheu, Vichy Minister of the Interior and organizer of the Franco-German steel cartel.

Today the M. S. E. is attempting to restore those intimate ties between French and German industrialists which it had so painstakingly built up before the war. It is significant that a former collaborator and Synarchist, M. Filippi, who held the post of Chief of the Financial Department under Pétain, is now General Director for Economic Questions in the French Military Government at Baden-Baden. Perhaps it seems ridiculous to worry about German industrialists at the present time, but it is certain that international big business is already trying to stage a comeback in Germany with the help of American capital.

In his article in the Schweizer Annalen, Sordet hints that the main base of operations of the Synarchists is shifting from Europe to the United States, and he names Admiral Leahy, Robert Murphy, and du Pont de Nemours not as members but as individuals they hope to use to make contact with influential Catholic and industrial groups here. The catastrophic defeat suffered by the American progressive forces on November 5 will undoubtedly strengthen the M. S. E.'s conviction that the new center of opposition to every form of collectivism is to be found in this country. The Republican victory will also have a big effect in Latin America; although Mexican sinarquism has until now had no links with the Mouvement Synarchique d'Empire, eventual amalgamation of these para-fascist organizations in the Western Hemisphere is not inconceivable.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Competitors of Coal

IN A counterblast against the latest demands of the United Mine Workers for higher wages and other benefits the National Coal Association has issued a statement which accuses the miners' leader, John L. Lewis, of "digging the grave of his own followers." By winning "still higher wages for still less work" Mr. Lewis, the statement declares, "will destroy the jobs of tens of thousands of them [the miners] by pricing out of the market coal that must be sold if they are to have employment in digging it. The government may . . . sign on the dotted line. It may decree higher maximum prices for coal, thereby giving the mine owners permission to pass along to the consumers new increases in labor costs per ton. But the government cannot compel users of coal to stick to coal."

Mr. Lewis has given no sign that he is impressed by such arguments. He probably believes that in view of the very heavy demand for all fuels at this time, the traffic can bear another round of wage and price increases. For the present, he may consider that there will be plenty of employment for his "boys," who may as well make hay while the sun shines. And, to be sure, the competition of new industries, such as natural gas, is not necessarily a good argument for holding down wages in old ones. Nor is it a certain method of checking the rise of rival industries. Buggy-makers, for instance, might have worked for no wages at all in the early years of this century, but they could not have prevented, or even delayed, the onrush of the automobile.

But if Mr. Lewis sweeps aside the anxieties of the operators, it does not mean that he is indifferent to the threat of competitive fuels. He is well aware of that problem, and he is dealing with it by political methods. Part of the payoff he expects for assistance rendered to the Republicans in the campaign just concluded is undoubtedly a helping hand in throttling the growth of the competitors of coal. These are three in number, putting aside atomic energy as merely a potential rival—oil, natural gas, and water-power. They are all formidable.

In the past thirty years production of coal in this country, both anthracite and bituminous, has increased by roughly 20 per cent; that is to say, it has barely kept in step with the rising population and has been far outstripped by industrial capacity. In the same period oil output from domestic sources has jumped about four and a half times, that of natural gas nearly as much, and hydroelectric power production rather more. During the five years 1916-20 coal accounted for 80 per cent of our energy supplies in terms of British thermal units; in 1943, the latest year for which data are available, its share was only just over 50 per cent. Oil in the earlier period provided about 10 per cent of the total supply; natural gas and water-power each around 4 per cent. In 1943 the respective shares of these fuels were 26 per cent, 10.7 per cent, and 11.8 per cent.

This is not a situation about which Mr. Lewis is likely to be complacent, for it carries a double threat to his union. In times of stress it means increasing pressure on the price of coal; in the event of disputes in the industry it tends to lessen the effectiveness of the strike weapon by offering consumers alternative fuels. It is easy to understand, therefore, why the miners have consistently opposed TVA and similar projects that reduce the effectiveness of their monopoly. Mr. Lewis shares with his Republican friends a distaste for cheap public power.

Similarly Mr. Lewis, however loudly he may thunder at the misdeeds of capitalists on occasion, is more than ready to team up with such capitalist enterprises as the railroads against the common enemy, natural gas. The natural-gas industry, based on what used to be a waste product of the oil fields, is one of the most rapidly growing in the country. At the present time it is expecting to spend $500,000,000 on expansion and has plans filed with the Federal Power Commission for the construction of 6,000 miles of main trunk pipelines. Coal interests allege that completion of all these projects would mean the displacement of 50,000,000 tons of coal annually; railroaders complain of "uneconomic competition" which threatens to deprive them of 25 per cent of their coal freight.

From the national point of view, however, it is very uneconomic to allow natural gas to be wasted, and at the present time enough is being burned up at the source or permitted to escape into the atmosphere to heat from three to five million homes. One proposal for the useful disposition of this gas involves the utilization of the Big and Little Inch pipelines, built during the war to insure oil supplies in the Northeast. More than two months ago seven different bids from companies wishing to convert these lines to natural-gas carriers were submitted to the War Assets Administration, along with a number of offers from other interests which sought to use them as oil carriers. On the meager details that have been published it is hard to say which of the various proposals would be financially most advantageous to the Treasury. But there is little doubt that the public interest would be much better served if the "Inches" were utilized to bring cheap natural gas, which has much greater heating efficiency than manufactured gas, to the New York area.

However, some mysterious opposition has apparently held up action in the War Assets Administration, which is said to favor retention of the pipelines as oil carriers even though there are now plenty of tankers available to bring oil. If this is the final decision, it will be a great victory for Mr. Lewis, who has certainly been using all the influence he can mobilize to keep the New York fuel market for the coal mines. But it will be a defeat for the people of the United States, like every other monopolist's triumph. Mr. Lewis is entitled to get a decent living wage for his miners and to ask that those people who use coal pay a price that will cover such a wage. But he is not entitled to say that consumers must be barred from alternative sources of heat and power any more than the cotton interests are entitled to hinder women from wearing silks and rayons.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Diplomats and Ideologues

WHERE ARE WE HEADING? By Sumner Welles. Harper and Brothers. $3.

SUMNER WELLES'S "Where Are We Heading?" is the most important book published in some time on the subject of United States foreign policy. It is significant in first instance as an informed and intelligent inventory of the leading problems on Secretary Byrnes's agenda, with the relevant facts well marshaled and the comment keen and to the point. But its essential value may well lie in its sustained expression of a point of view oddly lacking in the current debate over foreign policy—the point of view of the professional diplomat.

This point of view is, of course, that foreign policy is a complex and subtle matter of practical adjustment which seeks a new form of international equilibrium through a dispassionate assessment of the political, economic, and moral tendencies which have upset the old. One might look for this attitude first of all in the State Department. It certainly would not be incompatible with the attitude of Mr. Byrnes. But his predecessors fairly well rooted out the enlightened professional view; so that the Secretary, thrown back on his own instincts as a cloakroom compromiser, has backed at one time or another most available solutions of the Russian question—except the warlike one which the followers of Mr. Wallace have dishonestly sought to pin on him—without any clear idea of our diplomatic objectives.

Yet Mr. Byrnes at least stands above his immediate predecessors in having an intermittent and apparently growing awareness of the nature of diplomatic problems. Mr. Hull was an eloquent and testy rhetorician who cared little for the details of diplomatic operations; and Mr. Stettinius was —well, Mr. Stettinius (or, in the cold exactitudes of Mr. Welles, a man "devoid of any knowledge of international relations or even of modern history and lacking the personal qualifications desirable in so high an office"). Under the Hull regime the very word diplomat came to evoke the image, not of Mr. Welles, say, and even less of Harold Nicolson, but of James Clement Dunn or some other of the Secretary's croquet playmates—the PM stereotype of a gentleman in striped trousers drinking tea and praising Franco. Not the least of Hull's disservices was this degradation of the diplomatic profession by favoritism to some of its least worthy members; and another of his dubious contributions was the elevation to diplomatic principle of what Welles calls—without reference to Hull, whom he studiously ignores—"the desire to believe that because some proposal is righteous and desirable, the formulation of it in writing is necessarily equivalent to the actual realization of the objectives sought."

With this last notion prevailing in the State Department, it is natural enough that the public debate over foreign policy should have fallen into the hands of sentimental ideologues. The United States, indeed, appears to have inherited the penchant for moralism which used to be Britain's specialty in international discussions. Henry Wallace and John Foster Dulles define the type—men who are possessed by strong, vague, pseudo-religious emotions but who lack the clarity or fortitude to distinguish consistently between the realm of power and the realm of value and are thus able to merge or divorce the two as suits the polemic need of the moment. Our sermonizing tradition dies hard, and one can hardly escape the impression that most people on both sides of the debate think foreign policy a matter of casting out devils.

The Welles position with its apparent indifference to ideological prepossessions will undoubtedly be confusing or even shocking to the more ardent followers of either Wallace or Dulles. Welles is a realist, not in the sense of a person who excludes moral considerations, but in the sense of a person who refuses to exclude power considerations. For him the imperative moral and political tendencies of the day are part of the data which the diplomat must take into account; they stand along with strategic and economic necessities as the facts of life to which the practitioners of foreign policy must make their precise adjustments in order to attain international stability. Moreover, for him diplomacy as a system for managing international relations has its own values and resources which the moralists tend to overlook.

Consequently his crucial standards are technical, not theological; and he is careful to distinguish between his private feelings and his views of public policy. He will refrain from denouncing the internal conditions of a regime—whether Argentina or the U. S. S. R.—if it faithfully observes its international commitments, though his realism requires him to add that non-democratic countries have inherent tendencies toward instability which lead them to violate international agreements. Communism is repugnant to him as a way of life, but the notion that democracy and communism cannot coexist in the same world strikes him as an "insane delusion." He regards Russia as "one of the greatest attempts to attain human betterment that the world has ever known" and believes that "society in every part of the earth will eventually be profoundly affected by it." Yet he never deludes himself into regarding the Soviet Union as a somewhat larger Brook Farm community, and his evaluation of its motives and objectives seems fair and penetrating.

He maintains the same balance in exploring a wide range of subjects. He castigates Peronism in Latin America, but he does not kid himself into thinking that impulsive interventionism is the way to stop it. He repeats his earlier indictment of Roosevelt's Spanish policy ("in 1937 the Roosevelt Administration was guilty of its greatest error in its handling of the issues raised by the Spanish civil war") and speaks of the "interminable shilly-shallying" of our policy toward De Gaulle. In all such questions his emphasis is empirical rather than ethical. The Hull Latin American policy "could only have been justified if it could have been expected to bring about practical results. The stupidity of the policy adopted lay in the fact that financial or economic coercion by the United States (alone) could never be effective." He calls Roosevelt's Spanish policy an "error," where another kind of critic would call it a sin. Our policy toward De Gaulle "had not only been unfortunate, it had been stupid."

Welles clearly belongs to the school which finds blunders worse than crimes. This form of dispassion does not reject the issues that agitate Dulles or Wallace; it simply recognizes their relation to the power issues involved, so that Welles avoids the moral complacency which is likely to strike the Russians, in the case of Dulles, or the British, in the case of Wallace, as hypocrisy. Such a point of view reflects years of professional experience with diplomacy as a technique and an art.

It is unfortunate, though perhaps inevitable, that Welles's style should also bear so unmistakably the stamp of the foreign service. The book is written in the manner of a prolonged State Department cable and tends to be opaque and incommunicative. Even his occasionally mordant wit is muffled under the prose, as in his dry observation on vice-presidents: the liberal Argentine President Ortiz "was succeeded by the Vice-President, Dr. Ramon S. Castillo, who, as is not infrequently the case in republics where the vice-presidential candidates are nominated for reasons of political expediency rather than because of their ability, was the complete antithesis of President Ortiz."

As Welles points out, the current confusion of the American people over foreign policy shows itself in two different extremist tendencies—the panicky drift toward imperialism and the panicky drift toward appeasement. To arrest these tendencies the State Department and the American people must develop a clear notion of national objectives in foreign policy. "Where Are We Heading?" should do something to get the public debate off the Dulles-Wallace level of high morality and down to practicalities. But the great task has to be done at the corner of Pennsylvania Avenue and Seventeenth Street. This book reminds us forcibly that the man best prepared for this task by experience and capacity is being tragically wasted at a time when the nation can spare him least.

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.

Capital

THE DIVINE RIGHT OF CAPITAL. By C. E. Ayres. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

C. E. AYRES has written this acute and lively book as a sequel to his more highbrow "The Theory of Economic Progress." It should have a wide appeal: it is clear, its chapters are short, and it deals with the assumptions of orthodox economists with refreshing irreverence. Furthermore, it is completely devoid of charts, diagrams, and statistics. One wishes that more philosophers like Mr. Ayres—or Adam Smith—would look at economics.

For what economics needs, and has needed for many years, is a thorough going over such as physics got from men like Eddington, Whitehead, and Bridgman in the years after Einstein announced his general theory. The difficulty in the case of economics, of course, is that its theories and concepts are affected if not determined by class and personal interests, with the result that economic inquiry tends to produce not truth but doctrines which support either the possession or the acquisition of economic advantage and power. The criticism of doctrines, assumptions, and logic requires the breadth of view and intellectual acumen of one who has been trained in philosophy. This is the kind of criticism that economics should have, and it receives it from Professor Ayres.

By the orthodox Professor Ayres will very likely be regarded as a heretic, like Silvio Gesell, Hobson, and Veblen. But if they will consider his writing seriously, even at the risk of losing their faith in the divine right of capital, they will widen their perspective and perhaps get some idea of how to save private enterprise from capitalists on the one hand and the bureaucratic state on the other.

Professor Ayres holds that the predatory power of capitalists resides primarily not, as Marx claimed, in their ownership of the means of production but in their control over funds which they need not spend and which they are not required to invest. Owing to the gross disparities in the distribution of income the demand for consumers' goods is usually inadequate, whereas savings are excessive in relation to opportunities for investment. Under these conditions a mass-production economy cannot function. The solution, says Professor Ayres, is to tax large incomes so that savings will be sufficiently reduced, and to spend the revenue for social welfare so that consumption will be sufficiently increased. In this way we can achieve full production and employment.

Professor Ayres gives no estimates of what tax rates would have to be in order to accomplish the result he desires. Here is work for tax experts and statisticians who have been persuaded to Professor Ayres's general views as to the nature of the economy and his analysis of the factors which cause its periodic breakdown.

As Professor Ayres takes a broad view of the economy, and as his book is short, there are many details that are touched on lightly or altogether left out of account. Orthodox economists will be able to think of many difficulties in carrying out the author's program which they can use as arguments for opposing it. However, the real significance of this book does not lie in its particular remedy for depressions but in its criticism of the assumptions and logic of the prevailing theory of capitalism. If a considerable number of economists adopted Professor Ayres's approach to economic problems it might still be possible to evolve a comprehensive program for achieving a long period of prosperity under private enterprise. Whether such a program would be adopted would depend, of course, upon the victory of reason and liberalism over prejudice, intrenched privilege, and political reaction.

What Gorky Remembered

REMINISCENCES OF TOLSTOY, CHEKHOV, ANDREYEV. By Maxim Gorky. Dover Publications. $2.75.

THERE is a Gorky legend (remember that legend may be, not fiction, but truth simplified and magnified): Gorky the tramp, the outcast, the man from the abyss, the voice of "creatures that once were men." In glorifying him the Soviets made him the Laureate of the Proletariat, an uncouth, rough-hewn figure. These "Reminiscences" reveal a totally different Gorky: a conscious artist, at home with artists, their equal in sensitiveness and refinement. The most fascinating are the notes on Tolstoy. Gorky felt reverence, not before genius merely, but before a spiritual quality which he himself calls "divine." Yet he was puzzled and exasperated by the Tolstoy mystery: the would-be mujik who could not forget he was a barin, the apostle who was still a subtle artist, the believer who needed God to be sure of his own soul but was angry at times with God Himself for not keeping the tryst. The friendship with Chekhov was pure and beautiful. Of Chekhov's stories Gorky says: "A melancholy day of late autumn, when the air is transparent, and the outline of naked trees, narrow houses, grayish people is sharp." This is not mere prettiness: pages of elaborate criticism would tell us no more. His feelings for Leonid Andreyev had a tinge of pity and contempt. Andreyev was a conscious, a wilful degenerate, who sought genius—or the illusion of genius—through insanity. The all too brief section on Alexander Blok is excellent also. The last passage, Blok and the Harlot, shows how a trite sentimental theme can be redeemed through transparent delicacy. The translations, by various hands, are good—at least they are good English, for I cannot check their accuracy—and not unworthy of Katherine Mansfield herself. I wish I could quote many passages which, quite incidentally, throw light on philosophical and political problems. In the age-long fight against thought ("Thought is evil," said Tertullian) Andreyev struck a deep note: "Reason is the old witch Conscience in disguise." It will not allow us to enjoy comfortable belief in peace. The notion that the Russian proletariat has been hopelessly vulgarized by a "realistic" government is preposterous. Dostoevski, Tolstoy, and Gorky himself remain more Russian and more human than Karl Marx and Djugashvili.

ALBERT GUERARD

The Caveman's Point of View

MAN: AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY. By George R. Stewart. Random House. $2.75.

MR. STEWART, who has written a novel about the weather and a successful history of place-naming in the United States, has produced in his latest book, "Man: An Autobiography," a general history. What is new about Mr. Stewart's history is, first, that it is written in the first person by "man" himself, and second, that it emphasizes "prehistory"—history before men lived in cities and learned to write. Of the present volume fully one-half is devoted to man's pre-urban career, two-thirds unrolls before the Hebrews and the Greeks enter the scene, and only thirty pages are left to handle the period since 1700 A.D.

What is the value of Mr. Stewart's innovations? Telling the story in the first person seems definitely bad. One is inevitably confused as to who "I"—that is, "man"—is. While "I" generally speaks with all the knowledge available to a modern social scientist, he often exhibits the unscientific snap judgments and even prejudices of the common man—for example, his disdain for scholarship and scholars. We soon forget that this is "man" talking and assume it is only George R. Stewart, but we are jarred when he uses phrases like "my peoples" or "my archaeologists."

The second innovation—for which Mr. Stewart cannot take credit; H. G. Wells and Harry Elmer Barnes, to mention the first names that come to mind, have treated prehistory at length—is good. The urban civilizations of Mesopotamia and Egypt that once appeared full blown on the horizon, inexplicable growths on the body of savagery, are now seen as the end-products of an incredibly long and complex process of social and technical invention and change. The idea of viewing history from the vantage point of the past rather than the present is good, and properly executed should lead to an interesting and important perspective.

Mr. Stewart's book is easy to read and hardly anyone will fail to find something suggestive in it, particularly in his discussions of physical changes in early men and of the first great inventions. But Mr. Stewart goes beyond his valid role as popularizer of history and presumes to create it: he distorts it, either unconsciously or for dramatic ends.

He ignores huge gaps in the archaeological record, the sudden disappearances and appearances of cultures, the variety among cultures, from the very beginning; instead, he creates a myth of a single continuous cultural tradition, for which we have no evidence. He glorifies the Neolithic village and devalues the city civilizations which succeeded it, choosing his facts for the purpose. Neolithic life was not so peaceful as he pictures it, and the cities' slavery and conquests, which he decries, were advances over earlier extermination policies and for the first time permitted different cultures to coexist in the same territory. To make his Neolithic Golden Age brighter, he assumes that Neolithic men had a rational, naturalistic view of the world, on the evidence of their inventions—agriculture, domestication, pottery, cloth. Yet these same inventions recur in contemporary Neolithic-type societies, and are there imbedded in magical and religious beliefs. This overestimation of Neolithic society leads him to underestimate the importance of scientific thought as developed among the Greeks and in modern times.

Some readers will find Mr. Stewart's—and his publisher's—cavalier attitude toward scholars as annoying as any theoretical defect. The men who made possible this neatly written "novel"—the blurb calls it that—are dismissed without a thank-you; rather, a sneer. There is no bibliography; readers who might be stimulated by Mr. Stewart's account to find

SUITORS AND SUPPLIANTS. By Stephen Bonsal. Prentice Hall. $3.50.

CRYING over spilt milk may be of some use if it helps us to be more careful next time. History is the best teacher, as Hegel wrote, but it has uncommonly inattentive pupils. In May, 1919, a Ukrainian delegate said to Major Bonsal: "The Allies, thanks to America, have won the war; but will they win the peace?" He might ask the same question today. There is a ghastly resemblance between Signor Orlando's argument on Fiume and Signor de Gasperi's on Trieste. The same horse-trading and name-calling went on with a different Russia. Zinoviev boasted that "with these words we slapped President Wilson in the face." Albania opposed an Italian protectorate, and as early as March, 1919, Nouri al Said, the adviser of Emir Feisal, complained about "Jewish intruders brought to our land." Many of the issues which clouded the Paris conference in 1919 have to be faced by the current conference. Major Bonsal's candid chronicle implicitly admits the blunders which resulted in the failure of the treaties. Although the jealousy between the ex-Allies was less conspicuous then, the blunders resulting from overheated nationalism are the same. One shortcoming was and is incompetence. Colonel House told the author, who was his aide: "I think I can handle Lloyd George and the 'Tiger,' but into your hands I commit all the mighty men of the rest of the world." He did indeed handle those "strange people," and his interviews with them are recorded in this book.

But even a brilliant journalist like the author cannot be expected to be equally familiar with the problems of the Poles, the Ukrainians, the Koreans, the Rhineland, and others on which he served as an expert to Colonel House. It is not surprising that he took Father Hlinka for the representative of Slovakia, "who deserved a better fate." He faithfully reports all cock-and-bull stories, including the statement that Hlinka stood for a union with Hungary. Yet a British authority has written that this "turbulent priest . . . surpassed the most chauvinist Czechs in his hatred of Hungary." Major Bonsal has won a historical prize, but his book, a fine piece of journalism, is certainly no history. No historian would call Kerensky "one of the many fugitive Pinks," or indorse Bratianu's statement that the Rumanians only took back what the Hungarian regiments stole from them. Major Bonsal admits some of the blunders of the peacemakers, but hardly shows how they could have been avoided. "Better to have had no revolution at all," was Iswolsky's opinion, which the author seems to share—admitting, however, that "the making of history is a difficult task whether undertaken by the philosophers in their closets or by the orators in the market places." The task is no easier for army officers and journalists. RUSTEM VAMBERY

The Sugar-Coated Pill

TO LEVEL CRITICISM of any kind at a book so well-intentioned, competent, and reasonable as Margaret Halsey's on race relations, "Color Blind" (Simon and Schuster, $2.50), might be considered little short of churlish were it not for the fact that a determinedly bright and humorous attitude to a subject essentially unhumorous has much the same antagonizing effect, on this reader at any rate, as an evangelist's intimacies with the Almighty. "Most writing on the race problem," says Miss Halsey, "falls into one of two classes. Either it is passionate fiction about race clashes . . . or else it is passionless non-fiction loaded to the gunwales with statistics." There is, it would seem, a certain need for either passion or statistics which is not entirely compensated for by the substitution of humor.

Miss Halsey, who worked during the war at a service men's canteen where race discrimination was not practiced, has based her book largely on her experiences at the canteen and on a really excellent memorandum that she put out for the white hostesses. This memorandum attacked, with sound common sense and good humor, the stock prejudices about Negroes and answered the questions that would arise while the girls were working. The book is in effect little more than an enlargement of this pamphlet. Though prejudices about Negroes are deep-rooted, they are not very numerous, and though Miss Halsey's answers are pointed and wise, they do not lend themselves to extension; so that the book becomes, perforce, rather repetitive. Then also Miss Halsey's humor, in which the book abounds, is based largely on the most elaborate pranks with similes.

In short, Miss Halsey has stated, not to say reiterated, with insight, humor, and sincerity, the sound opinions of an enlightened and well-balanced individual on the Negro question. Though she can hardly be said to have shed any new light on the subject, she has certainly illuminated it with a bright one, and probably she has brought the matter to the attention of a number of persons in whose minds the question would have remained a vague, unformulated annoyance. That the book can hardly be considered a very weighty contribution to the solution of the problem is probably a small price to pay for awakening a large number of consciences.

ANTHONY BOWER

The Chinese Puzzle

TO A WESTERN observer the labyrinth of Chinese society must seem as intricate as its language. It took both courage and ingenuity for Olga Lang, author of "Chinese Family and Society" (Yale, $4), to attack the Chinese character first. That accomplished, she was able to dive into the midst of Chinese life, swimming through its classical and modern literature as well as through the depths of daily life in modern China. She emerged without losing her perspective: "China needs world culture to become happy and prosperous," but "the world needs China to develop its civilization to the highest possible level," since China can teach it "how to be tolerant and human." It is a message from the fermenting chaos.

Miss Lang shows how Confucianism governed all Chinese relationships until it was checked by the influx of all kinds of Western ideas—Christianity, fascism, communism, and democracy. Imperial China, which had enforced the dominance of Confucianism in order to guarantee submission, was replaced by republican China; this upheaval destroyed the old family and established the new. Then the society itself began to disintegrate. The factory girl no longer is willing to be no more than the daughter-in-law of her husband's parents, but insists on being the wife and companion of her husband. The girl who used to welcome foot-binding now despises it. The children begin to criticize their parents. Several families may still share one room in Shanghai's factory area, but the individuals read newspapers, discuss international problems.

The author does not present this development as universal; reactions to the old and the new ideas varied with different classes. Miss Lang's laborious examination of different levels of society has brought to the reader a lively succession of stories, either quoted from novels or written from personal experience; academic rigidity is transformed, almost, into entertainment. While the tables and the analysis may interest students of sociology, the ordinary reader may find the incidents from the novels more entertaining. And the existence of such great lyricists as Chu Yuan and Lee Yi-san should convince Miss Lang that China does not have to deplore its "poverty" of lyric poetry.

YANG KANG

Descanso, U. S. A.

LIKE THE LYNDS' MIDDLETOWN or James West's Plainville, Ruth D. Tuck's Descanso (the Spanish word for Repose) is an unidentified medium-sized American city not to be found on any map. Her book, "Not with the Fist" (Harcourt, Brace, $3), deals primarily with the city's "colonia"—the section composed of immigrants or descendants of immigrants from nearby Mexico, generally thought of as being slightly above the Negro, probably slightly above the native Indian as well, but certainly far below the Anglo-Americans. The "whites" keep them in the "place" where they "belong," if not with their fists, at least with their elbows. Hitler's and Madison Grant's racial nonsense helps prevent the dark-skinned Mexican minority from holding public office or enjoying full social equality. The outspoken and well-informed author blames the Mexican Americans' miserable caste status partly on the fact that the "whites" do not know or do not care to know their Mexican fellow-townsmen. True, there exist genuine cultural differences between these groups, at least as far as the older generations are concerned, but Miss Tuck, a believer in "cultural pluralism," considers it unfair to object to the Mexican Americans' use of Spanish in public, and to demand that they abandon their foreign ways. The author prefers the Soviets' idea of letting national minority groups retain their cultural autonomy while the state provides them avenues for fuller participation in the entire nation's life.

An improvement of the position of our three million Mexican Americans can be brought about only through sincere cooperation between them and the Anglo-American majority. Miss Tuck does not say that the "colonia" consists of angels only; she finds there reaction, egotism, and chauvinism as well. But as long as policemen arrest intoxicated Mexicans and overlook white drunkards, as long as our newspapers purposely exaggerate the Mexicans' guilt in "zoot-suit" riots, as long as employers refuse to hire Mexicans except in an emergency and labor leaders stick to the color line, as long as unscrupulous politicians reply to any suggestion of improving the Mexicans' status with the unfair question, "Would you want your daughter to marry a Mexican?" and grant these fellow-Americans only third-rate housing, education, and jobs—as long as all this happens, any minor faults of these Mexican Americans are completely overshadowed by our own major sins.

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

HEADS are already shaking over the prevalence of revivals during the current season, but the two latest new plays may well give pause to the most jaundiced opponent of the classics. "Present Laughter" (Plymouth Theater) is very wilted Noel Coward, and "Happy Birthday" (Broadhurst Theater) is a music-hall skit not too successfully disguised as a comedy. Neither, moreover, is a novelty except by courtesy, for the first is shamefully plagiarized from its author's previous works, and most of the material in the second was already in the public domain.

That Mr. Coward should be weary after all these years of determined youthfulness is understandable enough, but weary he obviously is, and "Present Laughter" — whose sprightliness is about as convincing as a hoofer's smile —appears to have been written out of sheer force of habit. All the characters say even "Good Morning" or "No, thank you" with the roguish air of having just got off something too utterly utter; though half the audience seems to laugh obediently when laughter is asked for, most of the laugh lines are neither stale wit nor bad wit but simply not wit at all. The central character is that very familiar figure, the popular actor pursued by more women than he quite knows what to do with; and the plot, if one may call it that, seems to have been made up as the author went along. At one point one of the personages protests that she feels like a character in a French farce—Mr. Coward ought to be by now sufficiently wise in the ways of the theater to know that it seldom does a playwright any good to admit how bad he is. There is a solemn youth supposed to have some sort of fixation on the hero, who pops in and out to create a disturbance whenever it becomes evident that the action is about to lie down to die, and the big scene, in which, owing to some odd arrangement of the wiring, a deceived husband is able to talk to his wife in an adjoining bedroom while supposing she is in her own home, succeeds only in making the spectator wonder what Sheridan could have done if he had only had a telephone behind that famous screen. At ten minutes to eleven the three principal male characters get absorbed in the details of a new theatrical enterprise upon which they are about to embark and totally forget their recent discovery that all three have been going to bed with the wife of one of them. Mr. Coward may be disappointed to find that, though few are shocked, more will remember that he used a similarly pleasant little polyandrous arrangement to conclude a former play. Can it be that his apparent obsession with it has sociological significance and that it is indeed one more sign of the approaching Downfall of the West? In lusty ages it is generally assumed that your hero needs several women. In that section of contemporary English society which Mr. Coward knows best males apparently find one whole one too much and are relieved at an opportunity to club up.

To make the whole play more depressing, it has a thesis expounded by a raisonneur in the last act with all the solemnity of a French well-made play. Our hero, after he has taken it in, protests that he has never in his life heard anything so immoral; but he must have led a very sheltered existence, for the thesis is merely that love is best when played as a game without too much emotional involvement. Entirely too much fuss, says Mr. Coward, has been made about sex, and he then proceeds to make quite a little more. Here, in short, is much ado about not making much ado.

Most bad comedies as well as quite a few of the good ones—"Candida," for example—have a scene in which some timid person gets drunk, grows bold, and thereby settles a lot of difficulties. Since, in the bad comedies at least, this scene usually gets most of the laughs, Anita Loos, who is responsible for the text of "Happy Birthday," seems to have decided that it would be a good idea to dispense with all the others and stretch this one out for two hours and a half. The stretching involves a lot of trick scenery to represent what the tipsy heroine thinks she sees and also a comic-strip version of life in a honky-tonk; but it would all add up to less than nothing if it were not for Helen Hayes, who appears to be having the time of her life. As a librarian—and you know what comedy librarians are like—who quickly graduates from Pink Ladies to Scotch, she runs a gamut from A to Ampersand, including such unexpected stunts as a stint at the microphone and a slinky dance with a professional panther. Considered merely as a stunt, the performance is really superb. In fact, it is hard to imagine any other American performer who could be equally convincing in both her mousy and her raucous phases, or who could cavort and mug with such confident, tireless energy. That she furnishes at moments excellent fun I cannot be churlish enough to deny, but I think also that it is no more than due courtesy to assume that, if Miss Hayes chooses to appear in such a dramaturgical nonesuch or gimmick as "Happy Birthday," it is only because no suitable new play could be found.

IT HAS taken me a long time to realize that in John Martin we have a critic with an unerring sense for the first-rate and the great in art—and an invariable contempt for it. Mr. Martin is contemptuous of Balanchine's choreography; he is contemputous of Berman's scenery and costumes; and since his words influence the ideas and actions of other people, Ballet Theater shows courage for which it deserves praise in putting on Balanchine's "Apollo" and "Waltz Academy" and in using Berman's designs for its new production of "Giselle."

Not since Berman's decor and costumes for "Danses Concertantes" has there been anything so pictorially sumptuous and distinguished, and so dramatically active in its relation to everything that happens on the stage, as what he has created for the supernatural second act of "Giselle": the grandly somber fore-curtain; the powerful decor of the "tomb of Giselle amid lonely spectral cypresses," seen at first through gauze transparencies; the costumes of the Willis, with a film of black over the white, and green showing now and then underneath. In this act there are also effective revisions of the Dolin choreography: for example, the way the Willis close in on Hilarion (the black in their costumes heightens its effect). And there is the dancing: the exquisite phrases of Alonso, the quiet precision and elegance of Youskevitch, the bold brilliance of Kaye, the fine work of the corps. All these combine to make the act the excitingly beautiful and dramatically powerful piece of "ballet theater" that I called it recently (Mr. Hurok watched it one evening from a seat in the back row, and did not applaud at the end).

The realistic first act does not impress me as something completely achieved, in the way the second does. In Berman's work there are details of which I would prefer to think that I don't understand rather than that he miscalculated: I don't understand what he is driving at with the uncompleted structure that is the cottage of Giselle, or why—when the backdrop and the costumes of the Duke and his entourage are so extravagantly fantastic—the peasant costumes are so conventionally bright and clean. In this act the revisions are concerned mostly with creating realistic dramatic sense; and not only do they still leave the nonsense of Wilfred coming on at the beginning with Albrecht and coming on again later with the Duke, but they clutter up the proceedings with a lot of over-explicit pantomime — like Giselle's demonstration of having heard Albrecht's knock on the door and having found nobody when she came out, or the various demonstrations of the fact that she has a weak heart. (There is the same attempt to make sense of "Swan Lake," with similar results: on the one hand a lot of over-explicit pantomime; on the other hand the continuing nonsense of the Prince's walking off arm in arm with the Swan Queen and returning in vain search of her.)

Meanwhile, Markova is giving her performance of Giselle with the De Basil Ballet Russe. One continues to get from it—as from all her dancing nowadays—the impression of lessened intensity; nevertheless her "instinct for the melody of movement as it deploys and subsides in the silence of time" still produces "the most refined of rhythmic delights" and a performance that remains unique, and for which one endures its undistinguished surroundings and the disturbingly offensive performance of Dolin.

Additional De Basil productions that I have seen include another Lichine horror, "The Prodigal Son," with the choreography that De Basil saw fit to have Lichine create in 1941 to replace the wonderful Balanchine choreography of the original Diaghilev production that I saw in 1929. And two of the works taken over from Ballet International: "Sebastian," worth seeing for the extraordinary costumes by Milena, for some striking details in the choreography by Edward Caton, including the new pas de deux of Sebastian and the lifeless courtesan, for the performance of Moncion—superb in its intensity and precision, and for the fine performance of Hightower, Skibine, Patterson, and Marjorie Tallchief; and the amusing "Mute Wife," with Antonia Cobos, Skibine, and Moncion.

However, not all the season's horrors were presented by the two Ballets Russes. To the Monte Carlo company's "The Bells" and the De Basil company's "Cain and Abel" and "The Prodigal Son" Ballet Theater added Jerome Robbins's "Facsimile."

Announce IRRC Luncheon

Dear Sirs: Friends of labor are urged to attend a luncheon honoring Luigi Antonini, president of the Italian American Labor Council; Julius Hochman, general manager of the Dress Joint Board, I. L. G. W. U.; and Irving Brown, European representative of the A. F. of L., recently returned from Europe with the unpublished story of trade-unionism in Europe today. Off-the-record reports on labor's hour in Europe will be given at this luncheon, which is sponsored by the International Rescue and Relief Committee and will be held on November 23, at 12:30 p.m., in the Tudor Room of the Henry Hudson Hotel—subscription $5. For reservation call LE 2-7916 or write to the I. R. R. C., 103 Park Avenue.

Never So United

Dear Sirs: Reading, here in London, Aylmer Vallance's article British Labor at the Crossroads in your October 12 issue, I felt it must be about some other country, or it must be a handout from Communist Party headquarters.

Mr. Vallance reports to your readers that the "government's stock, particularly among its own supporters, has fallen," and that the electorate are "disappointed." Here are two facts which no amount of wishful thinking can remove: (1) the membership of the Labor Party has doubled in the past year; (2) the government has not yet lost a single by-election, which is a record unequaled in living memory. If people were really so dismally "disappointed," then by-elections, of which there have been many, would reveal that disappointment immediately.

No one, not even Mr. Vallance, could exaggerate the pressing need for homes, homes, and more homes. Nevertheless, the number of houses built so far is little short of miraculous. By the end of September, 89,000 new houses had been completed. One gets some idea of the immensity of that achievement by comparing it with the period at the end of the 1914-18 war, when only 2,000 houses were built in the first sixteen months. In addition to the new houses, bomb-damaged houses have been repaired and premises converted into apartments. Altogether, by the end of September homes had been provided for 242,302 families. Considering the acute shortage of materials and skilled labor, that is a magnificent achievement.

The Labor government is not infallible. . . . But by and large the government, including Ernest Bevin, has the enthusiastic support of the mass of the movement. After eighteen years as an active member of the Labor Party it is my impression that never was the party so united and never was it in less danger of "splitting into factional left and right" than it is at the moment.

"Reckless Accusations"

Dear Sirs: I am at a loss to account for the editorial entitled Their Own Petards (The Nation of October 5), in which reckless accusations of dishonesty and stupidity are made against the American Medical Association and the National Physicians' Committee. Many such articles are attributable to the same cynical and unscrupulous disregard for truth that Hitler advocated in his technique of "the colossal lie." Many can be ascribed to a lack of the background necessary to understand the situation. Let us hope that in this case we are dealing with nothing more sinister than the uncritical acceptance by "the harried liberal" of material provided by unscrupulous or stupid individuals. . . .

One cannot determine the effect of a law by quoting a single sentence; one must, at the very least, take account of the entire law, and usually of its relationship to the body of law as well.

You pretend to find inconsistency between the N. P. C.'s statement that "the Surgeon General [under the provisions of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill] would be authorized to determine what hospitals or clinics may provide service for patients and under what conditions" and the A. M. A.'s statement that "the Surgeon General shall exercise no supervision or control over a participating hospital [italics mine] unless it is owned or leased and operated by the United States." It should be apparent that there is no inconsistency between the two statements. Moreover, if you will read the definition of a "participating hospital" in the bill (S 1606, Sec. 214, k, p. 69, lines 14ff.) and the provisions for certification and control of "participating hospitals" (Sec. 206, a and b), you will see that there can be no question as to the truth of the N. P. C. statement. If then you read Section 206 (c), from which the A. M. A. statement was quoted verbatim, you will see that any charge of inconsistency must be directed against the bill itself. You will see, moreover, that the only way that lines 22-25 (page 52) can be made consistent with the rest of the bill is to adopt such a limited and arbitrary meaning of the word "operation" as will divorce it from all matters bearing on the service supplied by the hospital. . . .

I offer no brief for all the actions and statements of the A. M. A. or the N. P. C., but I have yet to find either organization stooping to the dishonesty practiced by the Frothinghams in their attempts to mislead the uninformed. . . .

FREDERICK B. EXNER, M.D.

Seattle, October 8

[Since Dr. Exner's criticism of The Nation's editorial also contained criticism of Dr. Channing Frothingham, chairman of the Committee for the Nation's Health and a proponent of national health insurance, Dr. Frothingham was asked to comment.]

Not a Distortion

Dear Sirs: Your editorial cited two statements made by the National Physicians' Committee which were contradicted by the Journal of the American Medical Association. The National Physicians' Committee statement, "The doctor would have little if any interest in the patient who was compelled to visit him . . . sick people must depend on a doctor that has been assigned by a political bureaucrat," was refuted in your editorial by correctly quoting the Journal.

Since in his letter Dr. Exner does not take issue with this part of your editorial, it would seem that he agrees that the N. P. C. has been issuing false and misleading statements dealing with the doctor-patient relationship.

He does in his letter endeavor to defend the statement of the National Physicians' Committee to the effect that "the Surgeon General would be authorized to determine what hospitals or clinics may provide service for patients and under what conditions." Your editorial showed this statement to be inaccurate by quoting from the analysis of the bill prepared by the American Medical Association. In trying to support the N. P. C., Dr. Exner refers to several sections of the bill. He criticizes the statement of the Committee for the Nation's Health because it only quoted one sentence from the analysis of the bill prepared by the Bureau of Legal Medicine and Legislation of the American Medical Association.

Since Dr. Exner is not satisfied with one sentence, permit me to quote the whole section from which the one sentence was taken as it appeared in the Journal (December 1, 1945, p. 977):

> The Surgeon General is directed to publish a list of institutions which he finds to be participating hospitals in accordance with general standards prescribed by him after consultation with the Advisory Council. Any institution which is not included in the list, or any institution having been removed from the list, may petition the Surgeon General for a hearing. The bill provides that the Surgeon General shall exercise no supervision or control over the participating hospital unless it is owned or leased and operated by the United States. No requirement for participation by a hospital may prescribe its administration, personnel, or operation."

Your editorial did not distort the truth. . . . As the material upon which it was based was provided by the National Physicians' Committee and the Bureau of Legal Medicine and Legislation of the American Medical Association, I shall have to leave it to Dr. Exner to decide whether this material was provided by unscrupulous or stupid individuals.

The Shape of Things

BARRING A NEAR MIRACLE, THE COAL MINES will be shut down before this issue of The Nation reaches most of its readers. For the second time within eight months, for the eighth time within five years, John L. Lewis will have signaled "No contract," and miners throughout the country will have automatically answered "No work." But this time the contract he has denounced is one to which the government is a party, and Secretary of Interior Krug holds, with the backing of the Attorney General, that it covers the period of government possession of the mines and can only be ended by mutual consent. So Mr. Lewis may have to attempt to prove in court that he has not instigated a strike, thus rendering himself liable to prosecution under the War Labor Disputes Act. This promises a pretty legal tangle which may occupy the courts for months. However, injunctions are even poorer implements for digging coal than bayonets, and they are not likely to do very much to halt the industrial paralysis which will be the inevitable result of a prolonged mining stoppage. Average stocks on hand are said to amount to two months' supply, but the steel industry will probably be brought to a standstill within a few weeks, and the innumerable factories dependent on steel will not be able to keep going much longer. Drastic curtailment of production just as prices have been decontrolled may well give a sharp upward twist to the inflationary spiral. But that will only increase the certainty of equally sharp deflation, as loss of wages and exhaustion of savings by laid-off workers cuts deeply into purchasing power. It is difficult to see how the miners can gain any advantage commensurate with the damage the strike will inflict on workers in general and, in the long run, on the miners themselves.

WHAT SHOULD THE GOVERNMENT DO NOW? We confess that we find it singularly hard to offer useful suggestions. Mr. Krug has taken the position that the government as "interim custodian" of the mines cannot grant the far-reaching changes in hours and wages which Mr. Lewis has demanded. He proposed a two-months' moratorium so that negotiations could be carried on between the miners and operators, promising that if no agreement had been reached by January 16 the government would withdraw from the industry and leave it "to the normal operation of economic forces." Mr. Lewis caustically dismissed this plan in a whirl of rhetoric. The real objection to it from the miners' point of view seems to be that the operators have not agreed to accept the Krug-Lewis contract, which includes the all-important welfare levy, even as a basis of negotiations; so that the union would be back where it was before the spring walkout. But Mr. Lewis, it seems to us, has thrown away this argument by denouncing the contract, relinquishing a substantial bird in hand in the hope that his strike blunderbuss will bring down two in the bush. The result is an impasse. The Administration, already in a weakened condition, cannot afford to retreat; to do so would make it an object of public derision. Mr. Lewis, his ego swollen by past triumphs, will not dream of backing down. All the portents, therefore, point toward a war of attrition with an end that cannot easily be foreseen. But one thing seems certain; the forces gathering for a full legislative onslaught on the unions will be immensely stimulated and strengthened.

MISSISSIPPI'S TWIN STATESMEN HAVE GROWN so used to playing on the wrong side of the aisle in Congress that it took more than a week for them to discover that, like Democrats everywhere else, they were on the losing end of the affair of November 5. That pertinent fact has now been driven home to them by two arresting incidents. First, the Republican steering committee has decided that it will challenge the right of Senator Bilbo to take the oath when Congress convenes in January. Charges that he intimidated Negro voters in the primary campaign and took a toll in graft from war contractors will then be referred to the Rules Committee. Whereas a two-thirds' vote would be required to oust him once the oath were taken, a simple majority is all that is required to keep him from taking his seat in the first instance—and the Republicans, perhaps with an eye on the Negro vote in 1948, apparently intend to use their newly won majority for that purpose. The second blow of the week for the Mississippi coalitionists came in the form of a slap at John Rankin by J. Parnell Thomas, which is news of the dog-bites-dog variety. Mr. Thomas, who is slated to become chairman of the Committee on Un-American Activities when the Republicans take over, condemned the "star-chamber proceedings" in which Rankin, sitting as a tyrannical one-man subcommittee, subjected that very distinguished scientist, Dr. Harlow Shapley, to his usual bullying tactics. When Dr. Shapley very properly resisted this invasion of his rights as a citizen, Rankin threatened to cite him with contempt of Congress. But this time the Mississippian overshot the mark and, finding even his usual supporters joining his critics, was forced to back down.

UNTIL THE LAST GENERAL ELECTION, THE state of Alabama had been an island of liberal refuge between the Scylla of Mississippi and the Charybdis of a Georgia which had relapsed into Talmadgism. But on November 5 Alabama voted to adopt the Boswell amendment to its constitution, an amendment which will set up the most highly restrictive voting qualifications in force in any state in the Union. The author of the amendmentment is Representative E. C. (Bud) Boswell of Geneva, in Alabama's Black Belt. Mr. Boswell wanted "to save our Alabama traditions and principles from the frontal attack of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and their radical allies . . . [to] maintain and insure white supremacy in Alabama, by law, for the salvation of both the Negro and white races." The amendment provides that each applicant for the right to vote must appear before the board of registrars in his county and be able to read, understand and explain, to the board's satisfaction, any section of the Constitution of the United States. It is a foregone conclusion that registrars will accept no Negro's explanation of any part of the Constitution. The leaders of organized labor and many newspapers opposed the amendment, but the rank and file of labor in the large industrial districts failed to go to the polls. Racial prejudice is probably stronger than loyalty to a union, and every questionable device known to racial bigots was brought forth by proponents. The amendment was the baby of the state Democratic committeemen, and passed by the small majority of less than 10,000 votes out of 200,000 cast. It will, of course, be tested in the courts at the earliest opportunity. Many of the state's lawyers believe it will be held unconstitutional. Meanwhile, Alabama has taken a step backward, much to the dismay of those who have been priding themselves on the advancing forces of progressivism within the state.

HIGH UP IN THE WALDORF-ASTORIA HOTEL the Big Four Foreign Ministers are again going over the draft peace treaties with Italy, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, and Finland, trying to reach agreement on unsettled issues. The sessions are private, and although the press is being given fairly full summaries, it is not always easy to judge the tone of the proceedings. On the basis of precedent, however, we can assume that while the language used is often undiplomatically frank it remains essentially double-talk. The ministers, for instance, will wrangle for days over the apparently minor question of who is to control the police in the Free State of Trieste —the U. N.-appointed governor or the elected council? It is agreed that in an emergency the former must take charge. But Messrs. Byrnes and Bevin urge that if he is to have the power to do so the chief of police must be appointed by him and responsible to him. Mr. Molotov demurs on the ground that this would be undemocratic and destructive of self-government. He probably expresses this opinion forcefully; he does not say that behind his objection is a fear that America and Britain want to turn Trieste into a spearhead of Western imperialism, nor do Byrnes and Bevin utter their real belief that the Russians aim at making the city an outpost of the Slavic bloc. Yet there can be little hope of allaying these suspicions unless they are dragged into the daylight and examined candidly. Even if mutual exhaustion leads to a compromise on Trieste, the agreed solution to the problem will have little validity without a common effort to make it work. Instead, we shall see a struggle inside the infant free state, with each side attempting to use it as an implement of power.

IN CONVOKING THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY IN Nanking without the presence of the Communists or the Democratic League, Chiang Kai-shek has slammed the door against further conciliation efforts. Despite the presence of a few non-party representatives and delegates from the Youth Party, the Assembly is predominantly a hand-picked Kuomintang body. Its sole function is to ratify, with minor changes, the pre-war draft constitution, which is designed to regularize the Kuomintang's one-party dictatorship by creating a façade of democratic terminology. Chiang's decision to plunge ahead on such a major undertaking as the writing of the national constitution without the opposition parties is a direct challenge to American policy as outlined eleven months ago by President Truman. It amounts to the open avowal of an intention to use force rather than the ballot or other democratic means to settle the differences between the Kuomintang and the Communists. Thus, Mr. Truman is faced by the necessity of making good on his implied threat of withholding aid from China's one-party regime. The reactionary wing of the Kuomintang is clearly banking on the assumption that the United States will continue its support to prevent increased Communist influence. But John Carter Vincent, director of Far Eastern Affairs of the Department of State, strongly hinted that this country would not retreat from the policy outlined in the Truman directive when he told American business interests that "it is unsound to invest private or public capital in countries where there is widespread corruption . . . where a government is wasting its substance on excessive armament . . . where the threat of civil war exists . . . or where undemocratic concepts of government are controlling." We trust that the implications of this statement are being carefully studied in Nanking.

THE NEW INDONESIAN-DUTCH AGREEMENT appears to provide a solution for this knotty colonial question satisfactory to the legitimate interests of all concerned. The Indonesian Republic is recognized as the government for Java, Sumatra, and Madura. This republic is then to be federated with the autonomous states of Borneo and the Great East in a United States of Indonesia, which will be linked with the Netherlands in a partnership under the Queen. Dutch and other foreign business men are assured of equal tax rights in Indonesia, and the Dutch are guaranteed equal treatment with Indonesians in civil rights. Foreign relations and national defense fall under the authority of the new Netherlands-Indonesian Union, thus assuring common action in world affairs. Although the pattern is similar in many respects to that of the British Commonwealth, the proposed U. S. I. has the advantage, from the Dutch viewpoint, of providing a stronger constitutional bond with the mother country while giving the Indonesians full rights of self-government in domestic matters. It remains to be seen, however, whether the more extreme Indonesian nationalists will accept even these loose ties with the Netherlands.

HAROLD ICKES LONG AGO CALLED HIMSELF a curmudgeon, and the country pretty well accepted his estimate. There is no need for him now to drive the point home with a sledge-hammer. We are not thinking of his break with the Independent Citizens' Committee —that was inevitable, reasonable, and gracefully executed—but of his splenetic assault on David Lilienthal. Devoting his New York Post column to the indulgence of long-accumulated resentments, Ickes writes that "it would have been better if there had been a less romantic acclaim of Mr. Lilienthal" on the occasion of his appointment as head of the Atomic Energy Commission. He suggests—in contradiction of Mr. Lilienthal's personality, his record, and the facts as we know them—that the deservedly respected chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority lobbied for the appointment with the brassy persistence of a job-hungry ward-heeler. And he takes it upon himself to write off as "bunk" the "deep humility" avowed by Lilienthal when he accepted the appointment. With the feline touch of a Clare Luce he adds that "Mr. Lilienthal is not capable of 'deep humility' except when he contemplates the reflection in a mirror of Mr. Lilienthal himself." Not a single fact appears in the Ickes indictment, but only the emotionalism of an embittered man. Certainly there is no hint of the probable source of his current choler—the feud between a Secretary of the Interior who wanted TVA brought under his own control and a chairman who fought successfully to keep it locally administered. Without going into the merits of that controversy, it is impossible to miss the irony in the Curmudgeon's gratuitous warning to the members of the new commission. They are to keep a watchful eye on a chairman who is "willing to arrogate to himself all of their powers and responsibilities." Speaking of mirrors, Mr. Ickes. . . .

Spain Again

THE Spanish question comes up this week in a rather new context. Although the resolution advocating a general break with Franco was introduced in the General Assembly by Poland, it was Trygve Lie who insisted in his opening speech that the issue should be faced and disposed of. His demand has been echoed by a number of Western nations, both in Europe and Latin America. Indeed, the feeling he expressed is so widespread that only by marshaling the full strength of their respective blocs can Britain and the United States hope to head off a two-thirds' majority in favor of Poland's resolution.

This is a situation neither of the big Western powers can exactly relish, and Mr. Bevin's job is made even more difficult by the revolt in the Labor ranks at home. He will probably stick to the old non-intervention line, but with increasing discomfort. The American attitude is accurately described by J. Alvarez del Vayo on a later page, and the picture he gives is one to dismay every democrat in the country. At last the United States moves into the lead, instead of following the British; at last we take the initiative. But to what an end! Solemnly protesting our dislike of Franco, solemnly advising the Spanish people to get rid of him, we busy ourselves lining up our unwilling satellites to defeat any effective action against him in the Assembly. And we do all this in the face of a demand for action that this time cannot possibly be dismissed as Communist-inspired.

The broad effect of our behavior is already painfully apparent. In the popular view of almost every country of the world, the United States is coming more and more to symbolize intransigent reaction cloaked in pious hypocrisy. Even our most humane and liberal attitudes—such as those embodied in the refugee plan and in our support of civil rights and free elections—have been largely offset by our consistent hostility to social and political change. Spain, as always, remains the infallible test of democratic honesty. For the United States at this time to assume leadership in a fight to prevent action on Spain in the Assembly will be taken as final proof against us.

There is still time to rally opinion in support of a decent policy on Spain. We urge Nation readers to write to the American delegation at the General Assembly of the United Nations asking it to vote for the Polish resolution recommending a rupture of relations with Franco. We urge, also, that the C. I. O., meeting in Atlantic City, repeat its own stand, so often stated, in support of action against fascism in Spain.

Why does the State Department persist in its old and dismal policy toward Franco? What do we want? Of what are we afraid? The expert who discussed with Mr. del Vayo the danger of civil war was not, we assume, concerned only with sparing the Spanish people a new period of suffering. They are suffering today and will continue to suffer as long as fascism is held in power. What our government presumably fears is a Communist regime arising in Spain as the result of a political overturn—with or without a civil struggle. If war comes, Spain must be under the control of the West, not the East. If war comes, a Communist Spain would side with Russia, while a fascist Spain—oh, final irony! —would be a willing ally of the West. There are new American landing fields in Spain built with the cooperation—at a good price—of Franco. There are valuable metals and other raw materials. There are bases which control access to the Mediterranean.

Is it far-fetched to suspect that considerations such as these are factors in our refusal to countenance real action against Franco? If the premises on which they are based were sound, they would have at least the same validity as Russia's desire to dominate the Dardanelles or Britain's fixation on the Middle East. But the premises are false. Communism has few roots in Spain, where the temper of the people is fiercely individualistic and the non-Communist left parties and labor organizations are traditionally strong. Spain's natural trade and political relations are with the West. Its culture is Western. Only one thing could turn Spain to communism: if Britain and the United States continue their diplomatic and economic support of Franco, the Spanish Republicans may be driven closer to the one great power on which they feel they can depend. Deprived of the help of the Western democracies, non-Communist leaders will lose prestige and influence and eventually be superseded by those who all along have insisted that hope lies only with Moscow.

This week a new chance has come to break the ten-year stalemate on Spain. It will almost certainly be lost if the United States remains fixed in its present attitude. The Latin American countries, with very few exceptions, would back a break with Franco if they dared; as we go to press they are discussing among themselves the possibility of making a common stand. But it will be difficult for these delegations to act together in defiance of the United States. The greatest danger, we believe, is that they may accept some compromise move backed by the United States, such as the plebiscite proposal mentioned by Mr. del Vayo.

This plan, put forward by Señor Belt of Cuba, who seems to have succeeded Padilla of Mexico as the State Department's errand boy, offers the United States, and presumably Britain, a tempting way of escape from their dilemma. Nothing sounds fairer or more generous than a plebiscite—unless one remembers Hitler. A vote taken under international observation—assuming Franco obligingly agreed—would obviate both the necessity of applying direct pressure and the danger of civil war. Invoking a picture of the Spanish people happily trooping to the polls and voting Franco out of office while foreign correspondents look on, the plebiscite plan fits perfectly the formula suggested by Mr. Acheson last week.

The only difficulty is that a vote taken under the dictatorship would be a plain fraud, a cynical travesty on democratic procedure. Even if the State Department succeeded in winning some support for the proposal in Latin America, the final result would be disastrous. We strongly advise our government against trying it; American stock is low enough already in the democratic exchanges of the world.

Revolt Against Bevinism

A LONDON dispatch in the New York World-Telegram of November 14 described sponsors of the back-bench labor protest against the government's foreign policy as an "anti-American, pro-Soviet minority." This is an inaccurate and dangerously misleading description. If the rebellious group represented merely the fellow-traveling fringe, Mr. Bevin would have little to worry about. The seriousness of the movement lies in the fact that it is led by thoroughly loyal and responsible labor men who would not lightly have risked disunity within the party's ranks had they not believed that a change in foreign policies was imperative. It is absurd to accuse R. H. S. Crossman, Michael Foot, or Jenny Lee of being pro-Soviet or anti-American. All of them have been severe critics of Moscow in the recent past, and the fact that they dislike the Bevin-Byrnes line does not mean that they hew to Stalin's.

Antagonism to Bevin's foreign policy has long been smoldering within the Labor Party. It is felt that he has made the Foreign Office far too much of an adjunct of the Department of State, that he has carried the doctrine of continuity to extreme lengths, and that he has leaned too heavily upon the advice of professional diplomats whose training and background render them entirely out of sympathy with the democratic forces emerging in the world today. That is the general indictment; it is illustrated and reinforced by Mr. Bevin's treatment of the Greek, Spanish, and Palestinian problems.

Until now, Labor Party critics of foreign policy have usually refrained from public protest. They have done so, partly because they hoped that Mr. Bevin, who has long commanded the affection and respect of British labor, would realize he had taken the wrong turning and would retrace his steps, partly because they appreciated the genuine difficulties created by Soviet intransigence. Above all, the back-benchers have kept quiet because they feared that party dissension might react unfavorably on the progress of a domestic program with which they were in thorough agreement.

Now they must speak out precisely because domestic policies are threatened by a shortage of man-power which in turn springs in part from foreign policy. Shortage of manpower is reflected in inadequate coal production, in a lag in housing, in the slow expansion of exports. It means a continuance of the war-time regimen of "austerity" which is weighing on British health and spirits. Premier Attlee and other ministers have lately been appealing for greater productivity, and indeed, unless that is achieved, hopes of recovering a pre-war standard of living cannot be realized. But at the same time, the Defense Committee of the British Cabinet is reported to be considering the maintenance of 1,500,000 men under arms, and Mr. Attlee has just brought forward a permanent conscription plan. "In thus asking the country to accept more guns and less butter," writes the New Statesmen and Nation of November 9, "the government is asking too much; and it is basing its appeal for harder work on the wrong grounds. Whatever arguments may be put forward by . . . the proponents of 'tough' foreign policy, a campaign for higher output by trade unionists based on the slogan 'Sweat your guts to keep your sons in khaki' is foredoomed to failure."

Another reason why the revolt has now come into the open is the Republican success in the American elections. The return to power of the G. O. P., claiming a mandate to restore undiluted free enterprise, has made many Britons wonder how long a Socialist Britain can run in double harness with a capitalist America. In addition, it has increased fears that American foreign policy will proceed from toughness to roughness, involving Britain in a conflict which might well lead to its obliteration. Some American critics of the Byrnes policy regard it as designed in Whitehall, but to many Britons the reverse seems true. They see Russian pressure against British interests in the Middle East and elsewhere as inspired largely by a desire to build a safety belt against American atomic aggression.

The Labor rebels, aside from a few fellow-travelers, want to relax the American embrace without recoiling into Russia's arms. They would like Britain to seek a middle way in association with like-minded countries and thus create a power bloc which would balance the conflicting forces to east and west. Their resolution requests the British government to "recast its conduct of international affairs so as to afford the utmost encouragement to and collaboration with all nations and groups striving to secure full Socialist planning," and thus "provide a democratic and constructive Socialist alternative to an otherwise inevitable conflict between American capitalism and Soviet communism." This certainly seems a more hopeful way of meeting the Russian challenge than Bevin's policy of nagging at Russia's satellites while attempting to build British outposts on the reactionary quicksands of Greece and Spain.

We write without knowing what the outcome of the revolt against Bevinism will be. Probably, the rebels will be defeated, but their foray will have been worth while nevertheless. For one thing, it points up the incompatibility between peaceful prosperity and the present competition in armaments. The urge for greater productivity for the improvement of living standards is common to Communist Russia, Socialist Britain, and capitalist America. All three countries are finding the burdens of armaments and armies hard to bear. In the first two, they are reflected particularly in shortage of man-power; in this country, as the Republicans are already discovering, they are the chief impediment to that reduction in taxes required to lubricate the machinery of free enterprise. All the Big Three powers, therefore, have a strong incentive to agreement on disarmament. Can they not find some way to ease their mutual suspicions so that this problem can be tackled with the urgency it deserves?

Confusion in the G. O. P.

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, November 14

THE Republican leaders on Capitol Hill are in the position of the gay young man who awakens after a night of celebration to discover that he is married to a very lively stranger. The bridegroom does not know what the devil to make of his new responsibility—and neither do the G. O. P. strategists.

Reporters and radio men have been swarming over the Hill for several days hunting Republicans who would talk. The politicians who earlier were so willing to oblige on anything from the shortage of hairpins to the heights reached by wages are now strangely reluctant to open their mouths in front of a notebook. Joe Martin, Republican leader in the House, innocently said he thought Senator Fulbright's idea that Harry Truman abdicate in favor of a Republican Secretary of State might be a good suggestion, but Senator Morse was sharper. He caught Fulbright in the hall of the Senate Office Building and asked him whether he wanted to ruin the Republican Party.

The awful truth is that the Republicans were much happier when all they had to do was take a lusty swipe at Harry Truman, Communists, and the OPA. They are appalled by the idea of having to run the country for the next two years. Privately some Republicans are lamenting that their party won control of both House and Senate. They only wanted the House.

Harry Truman, who is genuinely happy for the first time since he became President a year ago, is further embarrassing the Republicans. He is beating them to the punch in carrying out the G. O. P. program—reduction of taxes, elimination of economic controls, and huge cuts in the federal pay roll. This afternoon one of the Washington papers alarmed the thousands of minor bureaucrats and clerks who are wondering about their pay checks by running the headline, "U. S. Bureau Cuts to Come Sooner than Expected." Personnel and salary cuts, in fact, began almost the day after election in every government office in Washington. The OPA let out 10,000 at one stroke. The army is thinning out all its civilian employees. The State Department is acutely concerned over the problem of maintaining order in Germany and Japan after the army and navy appropriations are sliced.

Senator Taft

President Truman is cheerfully seconding every Republican suggestion. When Senator Ball announced belligerently that he had a handful of bills restricting the freedom of organized labor, the White House correspondent for the Washington Post said that was just dandy with Mr. Truman. His exact words were, "President Truman would approve reasonable amendments to the Wagner act. The Chief Executive was described as feeling that there are certain inequities in the act which the Eightieth Congress might well correct, to the end that there would be a fairer balance between management and labor."

Intimates of Mr. Truman tell me he is enjoying his new role. Certainly there was no trace of sorrow at his press conference on Monday. He read through a statement of policy like a schoolboy reciting his lesson, and then with a wide grin on his face shook hands with visitors. The President is only too glad to dump all the responsibilities on a Republican Congress. There is no evidence at this time that he intends to fight the Hill on any issue. All this is very confusing to the Republicans, whose strategy for 1947 as conceived before the election was to harass the Administration and nimbly step aside when public reaction hunted for the devil responsible for strikes, the high cost of living, the recession, and disintegrating foreign relations.

Joe Martin held a request press conference this week, but there was so little hard news in it that the reporters had to satisfy the customers with the story of how Joe rose from blacksmith's son to Speaker-apparent of the House. Martin was vague on the details of the G. O. P. tax bill and economy drive. They would be left, he said, to special Republican study committees.

Senator Styles Bridges, who will be the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, issued a statement filled with ringing generalities. Not even the skeleton of a factual, detailed program lurked in it.

"Curly" Brooks, the Chicago Tribune Senator who happened not to be a committee chairman or leading Republican strategy maker, had a novel suggestion. He would balance the budget and end "corruption, communism, and confusion" all at one sweep by eliminating "the radicals from our government rolls."

The G. O. P. on the Hill not only finds itself suffering from a lack of program for the next two years; it is also cursed with too many generals. In the Senate alone there are so many would-be leaders that, as a compromise, gentle Wallace White will be unenthusiastically shoved into the job of majority leader. Taft wanted the place, but he has annoyed so many Republicans to both left and right of him that he will probably have to be content with the chairmanship of the G. O. P. steering committee. Then any revolt against the Ohio Senator's views can be fought out behind closed doors and not on the Senate floor.

Even Senator Vandenberg's domination of foreign policy is threatened, and he may have to do some fancy trading with his opponents. Some of the Republican Senators consider the election returns a mandate to bear down on Russia in a way that would make Vandenberg's maneuvers look like a Boy Scout picnic. Senator Wherry of Nebraska, who has never been celebrated for his internationalism, has left for a "tour of inspection" of Europe. Considerable sentiment is developing among Republicans against any form of economic aid for foreign countries, and any steps to open wide the tariff doors will be vigorously opposed. Under Secretary of State Acheson at his news conference early this week indicated that the State Department was only too painfully aware of this.

An aggressive though small liberal bloc among the Republicans is going to insist that the G. O. P. must turn left to hold the voters for the 1948 elections. This group will not have much influence in the party councils, but it will continually snap at the heels of such old-timers as Joe Martin, Clarence Brown, and Charlie Halleck in the House. If the Democrats can manage any unified command they will have a good chance to split the Republican leadership on liberal measures. They are quite the opposite of the Republicans, however, in having no generals at all.

The Republicans have a job ahead that makes even the boldest swallow hard. The voters have put it up to them somehow to find houses, bring goods back on the market at lower prices, turn back the expected recession, restore security in the world, and prevent the atomic bomb from exploding over these United States. One of the Democratic Senators commented in dead seriousness, "I hope the Republicans are ten times better than they look."

Nations at Work

BY VERA MICHELES DEAN

Tug of War Over the D. P.'s

Lake Success, November 16

THE poignant problems of human suffering which all too often are the forgotten quantity in international negotiations dominated discussions at Lake Success during the past week. In the muted atmosphere of committee rooms skilfully improvised at the former quarters of the Sperry gyroscope plant, with their softly colored walls and draperies and their day-long artificial lighting—reminding one observer of grim inquisitorial scenes in Koestler's "Darkness at Noon"—it is startling to hear the urgent appeals for help of flesh-and-blood people to whom, in turn, the devious phrases of high diplomatic strategy gambling with their lives appear remote and unreal. In this atmosphere the warmth of feeling expressed by LaGuardia with his customary histrionic vigor electrified even some of the hardened government representatives.

The two main humanitarian problems before the General Assembly are refugees (Social and Humanitarian Committee) and food (Economic and Financial Committee). These two problems, long on the conscience of mankind, have assumed new urgency because UNRRA, which has performed a valiant task in alleviating the sufferings of the displaced and the ill-fed, is slated to wind up its activities in 1947. What, then, is to take the place of UNRRA and complete a job that is admittedly far from finished? Will it be some new, if more limited, international organization, or shall we fall back on such measures of assistance as individual nations may prove ready to undertake? This is the basic issue with respect to both refugees and food.

The Assembly's Social and Humanitarian Committee has before it a draft constitution for an International Refugee Organization which has been under discussion for ten months. Russia rejected this draft when it was submitted to the Economic Council and in the opinion of some of the delegates is now filibustering to prevent its acceptance by the Assembly committee. The core of the controversy is this. There are still about 1,200,000 displaced persons in Europe, most of them in camps in the British and American zones of Germany. These camps are maintained and financed by the United States and Britain, which have performed the seemingly miraculous feat of repatriating some eleven million out of the twelve million D. P.'s who were in Germany on V-E Day. Russia asserts that a considerable number of the D. P.'s, notably those of Russian, Polish, and Yugoslav origin, were "collaborators" of the Germans during the war and should be returned to their native countries for trial as war criminals. The Western powers admit that some collaborators did take refuge in the camps, but point out that they are screening all suspects. They contend that, even after this screening has been completed, there will remain some 850,000 D. P.'s who, because of their political or religious convictions or, in the case of Jews, because of their fear of renewed anti-Semitism, will refuse to return to their homelands. These persons, according to the British and Americans, cannot be forced to return against their will; but neither can they be allowed to stay in Germany, where they will become a threat to security and an economic liability to the Allies. The Western powers, therefore, want to make arrangements for the resettlement of these residuary D. P.'s outside of Europe—principally in Canada and Brazil, which have offered opportunities for settlement.

To these proposals violent objections have been raised by Russia, Poland, and Yugoslavia, which argue that such settlers would become nuclei of opposition to the regimes in their homelands. Moreover, these three countries, all suffering from a shortage of man-power, have no desire to see potential workers go abroad to strengthen the economies of overseas countries. The cost of administering the International Refugee Organization is estimated at five million dollars, and the cost of resettlement at another five million—a sum regarded by many authorities as inadequate. Russia, Poland, and Yugoslavia, being wholly out of sympathy with the plans for resettlement, have so far refused to make any financial contribution toward their realization, although they might be willing to finance I. R. O. operations for repatriation of D. P.'s to their homelands. Underlying this complex controversy is the belief of the Western powers, courageously voiced by Eleanor Roosevelt, that the individual has rights which must be respected by the state, in sharp contrast to the view presented over and over again by the Russian spokesman, Foreign Vice-Minister Vishinsky, that the state is paramount, and the individual must bow unquestionably to its dictates.

While on refugees it is the Western powers which urge international action in opposition to Russia, the positions are reversed on the question of food. On Armistice Day LaGuardia pleaded before the Economic and Financial Committee for the creation of a $400,000,000 United Nations Emergency Food Fund for 1947 to tide European countries over until the next harvest. The following day, in Washington, Dean Acheson, Acting Secretary of State, indicated that in the opinion of the American government the time had passed for an elaborate international food agency, and that this country preferred to consider the food needs of individual nations, extending relief when necessary through grants or loans to be requested of Congress. There has been a growing feeling in Washington and throughout the country that aid should be extended, in the first instance, to "grateful" countries, and not merely to all peoples in need irrespective of their attitude toward us.

The policy of the United States was promptly denounced by Mr. Gromyko, who contends that this country is using food as a political weapon. On November 16 Professor Arutiunian, speaking for the U. S. S. R., paid tribute to the work of UNRRA and called for continuance of its food-distribution activities into 1947. But should this prove impossible, Russia, he said, was ready to back the LaGuardia proposal. While it is only natural for the United States, which has been contributing some 70 per cent of UNRRA's expenditures, to expect gratitude, we must remember that many of the receiving countries, having been for years in the forefront of our common battle, feel that the shoe is on the other foot, and that it is we who should be grateful to them, helping them now out of our war-expanded resources. It is entirely proper to inquire whether the food needs of European countries can be met more efficiently by international or by national action. But in one way or another they must be met—and there will be less temptation to use food for political purposes if it is distributed under the supervision of the United Nations than by a single nation, no matter how generous its intentions.

Moscow in November

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Moscow, November 13

ON THE evenings of November 7, 8, and 9 Moscow's cold but snowless streets were crowded. Singing and dancing amateur "ensembles" from the various factories performed on illuminated platforms, and people in mufflers and padded coats danced on the pavements to the tunes of jazz bands. Occasionally a truck appeared, selling sandwiches, sausages, and cakes. Otherwise the twenty-ninth anniversary of the October Revolution passed off quietly. Stalin was not present at the Red Square parade. On the previous night, at the Bolshoi Theater, on a stage decorated with an immense portrait of Stalin and a bust of Lenin and draped with the sixteen red flags of the Soviet Republics, Zhdanov, in a long speech, gave a survey of the progress achieved during the first year of the Five-Year Plan and a brief analysis of the international situation.

People reveal a certain awareness of the formidable tasks still to be performed at home, of the many difficulties to which Zhdanov referred. Russia as a whole had a bad harvest, and this is reflected in the food situation. Bread rationing, which should have been abolished this year, is to continue until 1947. Zhdanov expressed regret at this and also at the fact that the government had found it necessary to increase the prices of rationed foods two-and-a-half and three-and-a-half times. He explained that the government's food reserves were low and would have to be replenished. In a recent article Professor Varga dwelt on America's wealth in food reserves and expressed some apprehensions about their being used as a political weapon: when spring comes, he said, some European countries will be tempted to ask America for food credits, and "the Americans will then try to lay down a variety of political conditions."

In the Kursk province and some other areas the harvest was so bad that emergency food supplies had to be sent in—and tributes are paid to Stalin for the fatherly care he took of the Kursk peasantry. Some villages, however, have food reserves, and these are not being sent to the cities in sufficient quantities; it is apparent that additional inducements must be offered to the peasants. The government is finding it necessary to direct special attention to the whole problem of internal trade. With the Five-Year Plan concentrating largely—especially at this early stage—on restoration of heavy industry, there is still a serious shortage of consumer goods. Pravda said recently, "Soviet and party organs must radically change their attitude on questions of internal trade and consumer goods."

MOBILIZING THE COOPERATIVES

The Soviet cooperative movement is being revived to help the government cope with the situation, and the decree of November 9 concerning the new functions of the cooperatives is described as of "exceptional impor-

ALEXANDER WERTH is the special correspondent in Russia of the Sunday Times (London) and Allied Newspapers. A few weeks ago he obtained a sensational interview with Stalin which was widely quoted in this country. Our readers will recall that he was The Nation's correspondent in Paris before the fall of France, and will welcome the regular fortnightly dispatches from Moscow which he will be sending us from now on.

tance." Pursued to its logical conclusion, this policy should considerably alter the Russian urban scene in the coming year. There are 18,000 consumer cooperatives in the Soviet Union and 11,000 producer cooperatives (workshops and a few small and medium-sized factories) in Russia proper. The consumer co-ops, which until the present have been found only in the villages, acting as distributing centers for government goods only, are now to open booths and stores in the cities. They will sell not at state prices but at current market prices—though not above the prices of the government's "commercial" stores. This permits a considerable gain for the members of the cooperative and means that a serious competitor will have been created for the kohkhoz market; the highly probable result will be a general drop in prices. The government decree authorizes the consumer co-ops to sell bread, milk, meat, and a long list of other foods.

Where will they get their supplies? Here the question of marketing comes in. The co-ops will be marketing and buying organizations. The government is placing at their disposal 7,000 trucks, and it is hoped railway cars also, so that they can transport existing food reserves from out-of-the-way villages in remote parts of the country. The cooperatives will enter into what is called "healthy competition with the state."

The producer co-ops will also have a new function. Hitherto they have been largely working on government contracts and have been paid for their products at state prices. They reached the consumer through government stores. Now they will sell direct to the consumer and at market prices, which should provide a great inducement to production. The government will aid them by supplying equipment and raw materials and by instructing local authorities to help them to acquire premises, technicians, and skilled labor. The establishment of these cooperative shops in the cities should greatly relieve pressure on government stores, increase the supply of consumer goods, and encourage the peasants to come to town to buy. Since the producer co-ops have been instructed to concentrate on household goods, kitchen utensils, crockery, glass, furniture, hosiery, and shoes, their production will be an important contribution to the Five-Year Plan. The growth of both producer and consumer co-ops will be stimulated by the opportunities they offer for personal gain, and it is expected that a large number of people now unemployed or not working will be attracted into the movement.

Whether the co-ops with their new functions will become a permanent feature of the Soviet economy or are simply a solution for an emergency is still hard to say. The probability is that more centralized state trading will come into its own again when the flow of goods between the towns and cities has increased.

The mobilization of the co-ops as a producing, marketing, and trading auxiliary points up certain difficulties that have arisen as a result of the war, difficulties accentuated by the bad harvest. Although there have been substantial accomplishments in reconstruction during the first year of the Five-Year Plan, notably in heavy industry and textiles, these represent only "the very first steps," as Zhdanov and others have stressed. The high war casualties have caused a shortage of skilled labor, transport remains difficult, and there is a serious lack of machinery. The Soviet Union's interest in American credits was emphasized by Stalin in his reply to Hugh Baillie of the U. P. But at the same time the Russians have repeatedly made it clear that they will not consider any credits with political conditions.

THROUGH THE MOSCOW TELESCOPE

One frequently sees articles like Zaslavsky's in Krokodil the other day, which drew a sort of psycho-meteorological map of the world showing depression and storm clouds over America, rain over Western Europe, and sunny blue skies over the Soviet Union. In numerous utterances it is reiterated that the Soviet Union has "an economic system superior to any other—without crises or unemployment."

In the Russian view the results of the German and French elections are a confirmation of various theoretical and practical ideas about the world situation that have been put forward in Russia lately. If the greater part of the Germans voted Social Democratic rather than Communist, it was because the Germans are banking on opposition between the East and the West, have ideas of revanche at the back of their minds, and still have not absorbed the conception of the "new democracy," or, in fact, of any sort of democracy. Those who voted Social Democratic were not voting for German democracy but for the preponderant influence in Europe of Byrnes's Stuttgart speech. Above all, the Germans, owing to twelve years of Nazi indoctrination, are not quite like other people yet, the Russians say. Apart from Germany, which is the land of supreme opportunism, the Russians are largely convinced that the "new democracy" is making headway in Europe. The increase of Communist votes in France is considered highly symptomatic.

Stalin's selection of Churchill as warmonger number one was not accidental. Already, in England, a paper like the New Statesman and Nation notes that Churchill is fancying himself as the leader of World War III. Russia has considerable economic difficulties and an immense reconstruction program ahead. It is the last country in the world which wants another world war. The Russians ask therefore what Churchill's purpose could possibly have been when he started the story about two hundred Russian divisions on a war footing, except to cause unnecessary nervousness and possibly to try to bludgeon Russia, by creating intense friction, into abandoning certain strategic political positions in Europe. Incidentally, even before Stalin's statement about the sixty divisions which would shortly be reduced to forty, Allied military attachés in Moscow, including some who are highly critical of the Soviet Union, were more than skeptical about Churchill's figures. The Churchill speech is believed to have had unquestionable influence on the French elections by helping the Communists in their role as the great "peace party" and also as the "independence party" —that is, independence from the excessive inroads of Anglo-American influence and, still more, of French finance capital, which was notoriously collaborationist.

Byrnes's and Bevin's shoulder-shrugging about "What is a fascist?" and "What is a collaborationist?" marks, in the Russian view, a long retreat from their war-time positions, and can only strengthen the resistance of millions in France, Italy, and Eastern Europe to whom "fascists" and "collaborationists" are perfectly real persons. Such persons still exist in Europe, and so do the memories of the German occupation. Thus Churchill's and Byrnes's olive branches to Germany at this stage had precisely the effect we have seen in the French elections. In other words, the conception of the "new democracy" in Europe, as the Russians see it, is something which makes a spontaneous appeal to millions of people for a dozen different reasons—and for different reasons at different times. There is undeniably a clash of ideologies here, but what is interesting is that it is by a kind of instinct and intuition rather than through deliberate stimulation that the right in Europe has come to look to the West and the left has come to look to the East, or rather right and left are turning their backs on East and West. This tussle in Europe, as the Russians see it, is inevitable. What might, however, be regulated to some extent is the degree of friction; hence the welcome given in Russia to many of Wallace's arguments, the conciliatory tone of Stalin's statements, and Russian eagerness for business with America. The ideological conflict in Europe will continue, but in the Russian view there is no reason why this should spell the inevitability of physical war.

On the American elections the Russians have been extremely reserved, attributing the results to Democratic blundering rather than to any solid Republican achievements and concluding hopefully, "In both parties the struggle between the real friends of peace and the others will continue." The prospect of Dewey's becoming the next President is noted without comment.

Race Justice in Aiken

BY GEORGE McMILLAN

Aiken, S. C., November 13

ISAAC WOODARD'S demand that a Southern bus driver treat him like a man started a chain of events that were made to seem inevitable in Federal Court at Columbia, South Carolina, last week—even to the final event, the acquittal of the Batesburg police chief who blinded the Negro war veteran.

By speaking as he did on a bus that was making its way through the South Carolina piedmont Woodard threatened a way of life that is still taken for granted in that state.

While the case was being tried, the alleged acts of the police chief were overshadowed by the question of Woodard's behavior: in the ten hours after he was discharged from the army was it that of a "sober South Carolina Negro," or was it outside the pattern of conduct cut by South Carolina whites "for the inferior race to which Woodard belongs"?

GEORGE McMillan is a free-lance writer living in Aiken, South Carolina. He served as a marine combat correspondent during the war, and was assistant chief of the News Bureau, Office of War Information, before he entered the service.

In the turgid climate of the courtroom Woodard had to be acquitted of conduct unbecoming a Negro before Police Chief Lynwood Shull could be convicted of depriving Woodard of his constitutional right to "be secure in his person." Few in the courtroom knew, or seemed to care, that this was the first civil-rights case ever heard in South Carolina.

Every one of the witnesses who had been on or near the bus that night of February 12, 1946, was asked by the defense whether Woodard had talked profanely and obscenely "in front of, or in the hearing of, white ladies." All the defense witnesses said he had. The prosecution spent much of its time vainly trying to prove that Woodard was no more boisterous than the others in the group of understandably elated and hilarious men who had been discharged from the army that afternoon at Camp Gordon, Georgia.

The event that undoubtedly provoked Woodard into his angry argument with the bus driver was mentioned only indirectly at the trial. The bus driver had asked a white soldier who was sitting beside Woodard at the beginning of the journey to get up and move to the front. This man, known only by his nickname "Montana," did not appear as a witness for either prosecution or defense. With some other men aboard the bus, he had not only been discharged with Woodard but had also returned from the Pacific on the same troop transport.

It is easy to see how "Montana" and the other men felt for that moment in time a comradeship which overcame what must have seemed, if indeed they were conscious of it at all, the superficial ritual of segregation called for in the South Carolina setting.

One of the white veterans, Jennings Stroud, now a student at the University of South Carolina, did testify in Woodard's behalf. "Woodard was making noise," Stroud said, "but so were all of us."

The resentment aroused in Woodard when the bus driver asked Montana to move up front was perfectly natural. Later, when Woodard asked the driver to make a rest stop, the driver refused; he said, "Hell, no," according to the Negro. It was then that Woodard replied, "Dammit, you've got to talk to me like a man."

This reply of Woodard's, his claim that, though a Negro, he should be treated as a man, caused the driver —the conclusion is inescapable from the evidence at the trial—to single Woodard out for arrest at Batesburg. By the time Shull came on the scene to arrest Woodard the racial battle lines had been drawn, and Woodard stood convicted.

The defense was perfectly willing to let the jury decide between the word of Shull and that of Woodard. Only the two participants were able to make any assertion about what happened during their altercation. The blows were struck around the corner from the bus stop, in the dark, on a deserted block of tiny Batesburg's business district. The jury could take Shull's word that Woodard was still profane and resisted arrest by grabbing Shull's pellet-loaded blackjack; or it could take Woodard's word that he was merely protesting that Shull had no reason to arrest him, and that he grabbed Shull's blackjack only after Shull had already hit him.

The all-white jury had to choose between the word of a white man and the word of a Negro. Shull was acquitted in twenty-eight minutes.

Two facts which helped to bring the case to national attention went undisputed. Woodard is permanently blind, and Shull struck the blow which blinded him.

In the Wind

AROUND TOWN: The Wind spent most of the week blowing through the five boroughs that contain and surround its home office, eyes open, ears wide, and in general making a nuisance of itself. On the overhung morning of November 6, for instance, the Wind caused quite a traffic jam at a crowded intersection, regarding with prolonged fascination the Daily Worker's banner headline: "ALP Vote Strong."

CONVERSATIONAL FRAGMENT in the financial district, overheard that same morning, from a man who never flinched as part of a scaffolding fell loudly on to another part: "And another twenty shares dropped!"

THE DISPLAY WINDOW of the Mosler Safe Company, 320 Fifth Avenue, has been featuring a huge photograph of the rubble of Hiroshima. Staunch and undamaged in the middle of the photograph is a Mosler safe (advt). This is the way the world ends, with a bang and a well-protected insurance policy.

FARTHER DOWNTOWN, the City Hall Hardware Shop at 33 Park Row is offering a bargain sale in household odds and ends. One of the odds is a large basket filled with second-hand policemen's billy clubs, at twenty-nine cents each. "No Home Should Be Without One," declares a poster.

JUST TWO BLOCKS SOUTH, Modell's (198 Broadway) is holding its bargain sale—of surplus war property. Center of attraction is furnished by G. I. gas masks at nineteen cents each. "Children Will Love Them," chortles Modell's tag line.

UP IN THE HINTERLAND—Yonkers, that is—City Comptroller Thomas V. Kennedy has declined an $800 increase to his present annual salary of $7,200 because, he announced, "the city is not in a position to pay it." Kennedy, who passes on Yonkers's tax expenditures, goes on to say that "if you're going to have stabilization of government, it has to start with someone." "And find," Mr. Kennedy might have added, "what wind serves to advance an honest mind."

A SPY who snuck up to Buffalo over the week-end reports this sign on a cage in the zoo there: "Bald Eagle (Heliaectus leucocepheles)—range: the whole of North America. Never fishes for himself as long as he can rob the more skilful and industrious fish hawk. The bald eagle is our national emblem."

SCANNING the out-of-town papers in the huge Times Square newsstand which carries them, the Wind uncovered this editorial sentiment in the Tucson (Arizona) Star: The Republicans "will probably do what Senator Taft wants as long as he continues to be the leading bull in the Republican herd."

The People's Front

THIS time there will be no doubt about where the last fascist regime in Europe is finding its chief support. I am in a position to affirm that the center of opposition to a democratic policy toward Spain has definitely shifted from London to Washington; in the last ten days, since the presentation of the various resolutions on Spain in the General Assembly of the U. N., it is the State Department which has taken command.

The change was rather sudden. Until Foreign Secretary Bevin arrived in New York, British representatives were busy—as they were last spring during the sessions of the Security Council—explaining the necessity of continuing to do business with Franco unless some deal could be worked out with the monarchists and the army. When Mr. Bevin stepped off the boat, he got the whole story of the Trade Union Congress meeting in Brighton, where his position on Spain had been repudiated by an overwhelming vote. The former Transport House official was badly jolted; for the first time he realized the full extent of the rebellion which has now crystallized in the protest amendments submitted by the sixty Labor M. P.'s. Bevin is too shrewd a politician to stake his own fate and that of his government on a single issue. Members of other delegations reported him as inclined to favor a more positive stand against Franco in the General Assembly. It was at this critical moment that the United States began to use its influence, especially in the Latin American bloc.

The effect of this initiative became apparent almost immediately. In a statement published on November 15 Dr. Alberto Arca Parro, the Peruvian delegate, said that the Latin American nations were "watching closely" the attitude of the United States, which "does not favor the rupture of relations or any other violent action against Franco Spain." Perhaps half of the Latin American delegates, who at the opening of the Assembly had agreed in talks among themselves to take a strong anti-Franco position, have been retreating inch by inch. Privately they say quite frankly, "The whole thing depends on the United States. If you can change the mind of the American delegation, the fight can still be won."

Well, I am not in a position to convert the American delegation, but I can at least give our readers an idea where it stands at this moment. I had a long personal talk the other day with a man who is very close to the delegation and who made no bones about the fact that the United States intends to do its best to stall any effective action on Spain. He began by repeating the old argument that it is not the business of the United Nations to interfere in the "internal affairs" of any country; were that its function, he said, one might well ask it to put an end to the dictatorial Tito regime. Here he was obviously echoing the recent extraordinary outburst of Sumner Welles, who in linking Yugoslavia and Spain conveniently ignored the rather obvious distinction between a government put in power by the Axis and one which came to power by defeating the Axis.

But presently my informant brought up the point being stressed by the American delegation in all its discussions of the Spanish issue: any drastic change in Spain inevitably means civil war. If the State Department really believes this theory, the American intelligence services must be singularly inefficient. Civil war is "inevitable" only if the dictatorship believes it has the solid backing of the United States. Recently Franco's prestige and power have been severely undermined. Cabling from Madrid on November 11, Paul B. Kennedy of the New York Times reported, "Generalissimo Francisco Franco has lost, if only temporarily, his iron grip on the Spanish state." He attributes the change to "an economic situation which seems approaching the chaotic." In other words, even with increasing Anglo-American aid, diplomatic and material, Franco has been unable to solve Spain's economic crisis. If all foreign resources were withdrawn, where would he find the means with which to fight a civil war? Everyone admits that fully 90 per cent of the people oppose his rule. He has lost an important section of his banker support. His generals? The day they believe the United Nations is ready to act on Spain, a large proportion of them will try, as they did after San Francisco, to get in touch with Republican leaders with a view to cooperating in the overthrow of Franco and so saving their own skins. As for the Falange, it is disintegrating in its own corruption and no longer can put up a real battle.

No, the United States government cannot use the argument of civil war as an excuse for putting the brakes on the anti-Franco forces within the United Nations. Nor can it justify the even more pharisaical proposal of Dr. Guillermo Belt, chief Cuban delegate, that a plebiscite "under the scrutiny of the press of the world" shall determine the form of government to be set up in Spain. This seems to be the compromise formula which the American delegation will probably back, using Dr. Belt as its spokesman. Perhaps the example of Greece has encouraged the royalist wing of the State Department to hope for a similar outcome in Spain. I can assure them that no pressure or back-stairs bargain will induce the people of Spain to accept a plebiscite taken with Franco in power.

The American Political Scene

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

II. The Bankruptcy of Parties

London, November 1

IT IS many years since the difference between American political parties lay so obviously in the field of doctrine that it was possible for the observer to be sure of the distinction of the principles for which each stood. No doubt it is pretty accurate to say that the main emphasis of the Republican Party is profoundly conservative, and that the chief figures who determine its policy are also the chief representatives of corporate wealth. No doubt, also, it is a fair statement that the Republicans, generally, are hostile to government regulation of American economic life, and remain convinced that the smaller the part it plays in interfering with the free economy of the market the better for the American people. I am confident also that if the Republicans could have had their way, the Wagner act and the Securities and Exchange Act would not have been on the statute book. Nor is it likely that experiments like the TVA or those—some of them of remarkable quality—undertaken by the WPA and the PWA would have been attempted on anything like the scale upon which Franklin Roosevelt insisted.

But no serious observer is entitled to infer from the conservative character of the Republican Party that the Democratic Party is a liberal alternative. The core of the Democratic Party remains the solid South; and the evidence is overwhelming that, with rare exceptions, the South is at least as conservative as most parts of the Republican Party. It may throw up an occasional liberal like Senator Hill of Alabama, or Senator Pepper of Florida, but in general no serious assessment of its character could honestly suggest an anxiety, in the effective political South, to prove its enthusiasm for the New Deal. Mr. Roosevelt was able to retain the allegiance of the great cities—New York, Chicago, Boston. But I do not think it is excessive to say that the Democratic machine in each of these gave him a support that was personal in character, and that he obtained the support he had in return for the use of his patronage and his decision to turn a blind eye to the habits of men like Mayor Hague of Jersey City, whose way of life corresponds much more to that of a Nazi Gauleiter than to anything one could legitimately expect from a supporter of the New Deal.

The fact simply is that Americans, when they were liberal, supported the Democratic Party because of the special character Mr. Roosevelt gave to it. So did organizations like the Political Action Committee. He made the choice between parties temporarily real because he made the Democrats accept, as the price of their victory, a policy in large degree alien from the inner drive of the party machine. Now that he is dead, it becomes rapidly ever more obvious not only that his successor cannot compel the continued payment of that price but, even more, that he is not very seriously anxious to do so. It is also pretty obvious that in so far as Mr. Wallace seeks to be the residuary legatee of the Roosevelt heritage, he represents at best an influential minority in the party who could not hope to nominate him as their candidate in 1948 even if Mr. Truman decided not to run again. It is difficult to see on the Democratic horizon any real quest for something different from the "available" candidate who can be regarded as not seriously distinguished either in personality or in principles from his opponent on the Republican side.

HOMELESS LIBERALS

Most American liberals are convinced, intelligibly enough, that their votes would be thrown away if they were cast for a Socialist candidate, still more for a candidate from the Communist Party. Neither of these organizations could today muster a quarter of a million votes; and if a progressive candidate is to have a chance of victory, it is useless to look to either camp of the extreme left. The liberals rule out also any serious possibility of a third party. The time, they think, is too short for its effective organization to be possible, and an attempt in the absence of that effectiveness would almost certainly simply assure a Republican victory. Since that would mean the presence of Mr. Dewey, or Governor Bricker, or Senator Taft in the White House, or of some compromise candidate with no greater appeal to the liberals than any of these, American progressive opinion is firmly convinced that the best it can do is to bring all the pressure to bear it can in support of liberal influences in the Democratic Party.

On any showing, that is an immense task. Liberal influence has proved insufficient, under President Truman, to retain any of the major liberals in the Administration in Washington. It has not been able to safeguard American labor from having to assume a defensive position against the business interests which so patently feel that, after long years of waiting, their hour is at length at hand. It has not been sufficient to impose a liberal foreign policy upon Mr. Truman and Mr. Byrnes; perhaps in no realm is the influence of Franklin Roosevelt so grimly absent. The liberals are adversely affected by the continued rift in the labor movement. Their influence with the bosses of the city machines has declined enormously since they ceased to be able to look for support to the man in the White House. Their occasional victories, as in the defeat of Senator Burton Wheeler in the Montana primary, are offset by the victories of men like Bilbo and Talmadge. They are no longer on the inside of the forces they seek to move in their direction. They lack a coherent and unified striking power. Despite the deep interest in the ideas and fortunes of Henry Wallace, they lack, I think, a person round whom they can build the kind of dynamic appeal which, in 1940, swept Wendell Willkie into the Republican nomination. Given the actual play of forces in America today, I think the most the liberals can hope for is to act as a brake on the drift to conservatism that is now the major trend in every aspect of American policy.

It is worth noting that on the three occasions since 1919 when liberals in America have had a chance to vote for a man of their own outlook they have been able to elect him only once; and on that occasion the conservative candidate defeated himself. As a third-party nominee in 1924 the elder La Follette fought a brave campaign in which there was never a chance of his success. In 1928 liberals had an admirable candidate in Alfred E. Smith, but neither his record at Albany nor his liberal views were sufficient to conquer the combined hostility of snobbery and deep-rooted religious fears. They won a great victory in 1932, but it is only fair to admit that any reasonable Democratic nominee would have won in 1932. The later victories of Franklin Roosevelt were in a profound sense liberal victories; they brought out the progressivism of the plain people in America even more remarkably than the revolt of 1912 which sent that very moderate liberal, Woodrow Wilson, to the White House. But it is difficult for the outsider not to feel that one of those periods has been reached in American history in which the unattached voter, fatigued by a long experience of crisis-leadership, is now once more anxious for a quiet time. Because both major party machines in America are concerned only with organizing victory and not with the promotion of ideas through victory, they respond with eagerness to the demand for a quiet time. That means that they will choose candidates who are the best safeguards they can find against the danger of an exciting Presidency. Only evidence, in the next two years, of an electorate made angry as it was made angry by the great depression would persuade either of the parties to risk a liberal candidate.

In my view, therefore, it is important for American liberals to realize that political parties in the United States are not organizations to promote ideas but loose federations of machines for getting enough votes to enable the parties to lay their hands on the spoils. Ideas are of value to them only in the proportion that they are likely to increase the votes that can be obtained. A liberal group, on this showing, interests the machines to the degree that they believe it has the power to attract to their side voters who, otherwise, might be indifferent or hostile. They give it attention as they give attention to any other pressure group—the utilities, the N. A. M., the Roman Catholic church, or the P. A. C. And this means that in neither party has the American liberal any permanent spiritual home. He is welcome there just in the degree that he is judged to have importance for the specific occasion on which he demands influence.

THE MACHINES FEAR IDEAS

It follows from what I have said that there is little direct relation between the social forces at play in the United States and the political institutions through which they must express themselves. The absence of this direct relation weakens at every turn the power of ideas in American political life. The major parties are afraid of ideas. They prevent the smooth functioning of the machines. They make the hold of the machines upon the voters both difficult and uncertain. They disturb the relation between the machines and the interests. They bring into the political field—they even bring into high office—citizens who under the rule of "normalcy" would not dream of activity in Washington. They make politics interesting, and the more interesting politics are the less strong is the power of the machine over the electoral mind. Wendell Willkie could never have seized the Republican nomination at a time when great issues were not at stake. Thus it is the purpose of the machines to prevent, if they can, the emergence of great issues and to obscure them if they emerge. The American liberal, therefore, has all the power of the major parties arrayed against him. His objective is to obtain exactly what they seek to deny. He is urging that political action be made proportionate to social need. But when he does this he is inviting a politics of policy as a substitute for the historic politics of maneuver, which keeps the markets contented, the politicians regular, and the voters confined within the channels that the party bosses have found by experience to be manageable. American liberals are thus permanent rebels against the routines of action that it is the function of parties to impose.

I am arguing that the American liberal is anxious for what Bagehot called "thinking government," and that the whole ethos of the American party system is to safeguard the existing interests in the United States against the dangerous possibilities of thought. Republicans and Democrats alike want a President with whom they feel safe. To them, a liberal President, a liberal Congress also, are of the nature of intruders. They are welcome only in a crisis, when the parties have somehow to compromise with ideas and to accept unwonted innovation. They are always unwelcome if the parties feel any confidence that they can control the electorate within the framework of a traditional routine in which the results cause a minimum of social disturbance. The vital fact is that American parties are the brokers of votes and not the brokers of ideas. It is only in a storm that they turn to the pilot who is prepared to take the ship of state to port by an uncharted route.

Both major parties at the present time are lulled into a mistaken expectation of a quiet epoch in the next years partly by the self-confidence which comes from the general realization of American power, and partly because they believe America is fatigued with the immense effort of the last fourteen years and would welcome relief from the burden of thought. The one thing that alarms them is the prospect of a President who might compel them again to large-scale innovation. It is only necessary to remember their unease with Mr. Roosevelt after 1934, their deep unhappiness with him after 1936, to realize that he was forced upon them by the electorate as a leader whom they accepted with regret. They never ceased to feel the discomfort of the voyage and the risks to which their pilot exposed them.

"NO SHORT CUT TO POWER"

I do not believe that it will be a quiet epoch in the next years in the United States. Forces have been unleashed in the world which will everywhere compel fundamental reorientations of policy. It is quite unthinkable that the United States should be unaffected by their influence for the simple and central reason that the New Deal was the incomplete expression of their American operation. And since the two major parties will resist the effort to resume the New Deal at the point where President Roosevelt was compelled to slow down its development, I do not think the liberals will be able to influence their policy until crisis once more makes it evident that this is disproportionate to the situation. No doubt liberals will try hard, until 1948, to use the Democratic Party, in the belief that it can be forced to accept the obligation to resume the Roosevelt tradition. I am confident that they will fail. More, I am confident that they will learn from this failure what the British Labor Party learned between 1900 and 1918—that when the basic objectives of the two parties between which an electorate must choose are the same, the electorate has no real choice. Thus deprived of the power to choose, it cannot secure either the men or the measures which its situation requires. It is then driven to a realignment of parties so that the institutions of representative democracy may work with genuine effectiveness. To postpone unduly the making of that realignment is to risk disaster of a very serious kind.

Anyone who looks at America today must see, I think, that the present party system cannot adequately cope with the three major problems of the United States. It cannot effectively integrate the United States into the new world organization. It cannot solve the problem of the disparate hold on well-being of the South compared to the North and East. It cannot obtain for labor its proper status in the national economy. Even if it be said that each of these is, in a full way, a long-term problem, each of them also is one in which it is urgent that a real beginning should be made. How remote the existing parties are from any grasp of the first issues was well illustrated by the American government's decision to oppose Sir John Orr's great scheme for an international food board, and its sudden abandonment of its important part in the vital system created in the war for the state purchase of food supplies; these, with the abandonment of price control, are a major blow to international economic recovery. The general anxiety of both Republicans and Democrats to get back to an uncontrolled market economy makes it more difficult than ever seriously to plan for large-scale improvement of conditions in the South and the West. It needs no prophet to foresee that, despite the era of strikes through which America is now passing, the labor movement, realistically regarded, is likely to be on the defensive until the next depression breaks down that simple-minded faith in the economic American way which even Philip Murray has been persuaded to profess.

I do not believe, therefore, that American liberals can use the present party system to implement their principles in any profound or continuous way. It is geared to other purposes. It is lacking in that relation to ideas which is of primary importance for any organization which does not want to live from hand to mouth. The collapse of liberal effectiveness in the Democratic Party in the brief interval since President Roosevelt died ought to convince the left that there is no short cut to power. To believe that the Democratic machine can be recaptured for a continued New Deal is to believe in miracles, and belief in miracles is political escapism of the worst kind. Those, therefore, who want a political party which can give to the United States the opportunity of showing its readiness, both domestically and internationally, for great experiments have got to build one on a new foundation. They have got to make organized labor the core of a progressive alliance round which can gather all who have realized the danger of a retreat from the plane to which Mr. Roosevelt had raised the issues he had to meet. If they rely upon makeshifts which are now showing their deep unreliability, the next crisis may find them unprepared for what may be the most momentous internal struggle since the Civil War.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Still Around the Corner

THE Stock Exchange celebrated the Republican victory by falling flat on its back; not for two months had prices been marked down so drastically in a single session. It seemed an unkind way of greeting old friends, and Wall Streeters with red faces hastened to explain that the election results had been discounted in advance and that, as so often happens, confirmation of "good news" encouraged profit-taking. Moreover, according to the Wall Street Journal, "brokers believed that a Republican Congress was apt to have deflationary economic ideas. While this was regarded as constructive eventually, it might have temporary market reverberations." In other words, the advent of the Republicans to power will not ameliorate the recession or depression of 1947 which Wall Streeters regard as definitely foreshadowed by the bearish behavior of stock prices in the past few months. It may even make it worse, and this possibility leaves the financial community torn between its traditional loyalty to the G. O. P. and its natural dislike of having to go through the wringer.

Warning investors against impatience, a bulletin issued by the brokerage house of Buckley Brothers points out that "we are in for a period of change, and that takes time." It goes on to give a summary of the probable effects of the incoming Republican tide: "An end of the President's war-time powers; a return to conservative fiscal policies, ultimately a balanced budget, reduced income taxes, and the elimination of excise levies; little change in tariffs, farm legislation, and foreign policy; a return to state and local governments of housing, health, and social problems; a minimum of business regulatory legislation; and a revision of labor laws on an equitable basis for management and labor." This is a program for a period of "normalcy"; it seems to have little relevance to the problems facing us today.

The subject about which the triumphant Republicans are talking most freely is the fiscal question. They are promising us both lower taxes and a balanced budget, though there seems to be some difference among them as to which of these desirable objectives should have priority. Representatives Martin and Knutson, both powerful voices in the new House, think that Congress should proceed to cut taxes immediately it convenes and then go on to trim the budget as much as possible. Senator Taft more cautiously advocates balancing the budget first, suggesting that expenditures can be cut from $41½ billion to $25 or $30 billion.

Republican propaganda has spread the idea that huge amounts of the taxpayers' money can be saved by sacking unnecessary "hordes of bureaucrats" and ending lavish spending in Washington. Actually, a large proportion of government expenditure is of contractual nature and cannot easily be reduced. Debt interest, for instance, absorbs $5 billion annually, and it will not fall much below this figure for many years, even though a program of debt reduction is undertaken. The Republicans cannot reduce it and may even increase it, for their financial backers are clamoring for a change in the Treasury's cheap-money policy. Another inflexible item is veterans' benefits, which, with 1948 in the offing, the Republicans will not squeeze below the present total of $6 billion. Nor can they economize on social-security benefits—$1.2 billion for 1946-47—which are likely to rise rather than fall next year, particularly if the anticipated recession comes along.

In an outline of a $25-billion budget which he gave at a press conference on November 7, Senator Taft conceded the figures given above for interest and veterans and apparently forgot social security. He allowed $2 billion for "general government expenses"—the judiciary, the departments, Congress, and so on—which is approximately the amount provided in the current budget as revised last August. His big economies would be at the expense of the army and navy, for which he proposed $8 billion compared with $18.5 billion in the current year. That left a balance of $4 billion for tax refunds, foreign loans, and "such aid as we may give to agriculture." This last item accounts for $1.2 billion in the current budget. It could be reduced if commodity prices are maintained, but should they slump—and there are signs they are already slipping—the government's statutory undertaking to support farm prices at 90 per cent of parity for two years after the end of hostilities must involve a heavy liability for the Treasury. Will the Republican Party, with its big contingents from the farm belt, repudiate this undertaking?

The fact is that Senator Taft's budgetary program depends on the extent to which he and his colleagues succeed in imposing their slimming diet on the armed forces. Of course, the present bill for the army and navy is swollen by non-recurrent items such as terminal-leave pay, and under any circumstances will be smaller next year. But the service chiefs appear to be thinking in terms of a permanent outlay of $14 to $15 billion, and while they might take somewhat less, a slash to $8 billion could only be made over a pile of brass-bound corpses. It cannot be denied that they would have a lot of logic on their side. Certainly the Republicans are contradictory when they talk of maintaining present foreign policies unchanged and make drastic cuts in service expenditures. For American foreign policy today rests on the assumption that the only language Russia understands is that of "the big stick," and unless some way of improving relations with the Soviets can be found, Republican hopes of combining a balanced budget with drastic tax reductions are likely to go a-glimmering.

This is not to say that the budget cannot be balanced at all. It should, in fact, be possible to bring federal expenses sufficiently below revenue receipts to permit abolition of most of the excise taxes and moderate relief to income-tax payers. But despite the Republican majority, the tax burden is destined to remain much heavier than in pre-war years, and, in particular, it is unlikely that corporation levies will be appreciably reduced. A dim realization of this fact, perhaps, kept Wall Street from singing "Happy Days Are Here Again" on November 6. The kind of prosperity of which its denizens dream is still around the corner.

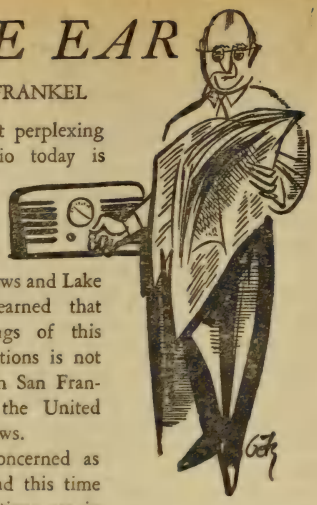
BY LOU FRANKEL



PERHAPS the most perplexing question for radio today is what to do about the U. N. For since the U. N. came, first, to Hunter College and then to Flushing Meadows and Lake Success, radio has learned that broadcasting the doings of this modern League of Nations is not the cinch it was out in San Francisco when anything the United Nations did was big news.

The U. N. is as concerned as radio, for if radio—and this time networks and local stations are in the hopper together—could only learn how to handle the peace as well as it did the war, the future of the U. N. would look up. The industry and the international body agree that there is not enough broadcast time, not enough penetrating comment, not enough listening, but they differ about how the blame should be apportioned.

To radio the U. N. is an audience killer. It offers nothing but talk, and windy talk, with boring translations to boot—especially now that the General Assembly has been broken down into its committees and is deliberating at Lake Success. Radio is therefore limiting its coverage to short takes interpolated in regular news broadcasts. Once the Assembly reconvenes as a unit at Flushing Meadows, radio will return its microphones to the rostrum and carry as many of the important speeches as its ability to forecast their content permits.

Radio is not satisfied with the situation and intends to do something about it—just how soon depends on listener reaction. Right now the amount of complaint from the radio audience is not enough to spur the broadcasters into haste but enough to keep them unhappy.

To the U. N. the problem is one of getting its story to the American public. They provided broadcast facilities—and saw them utilized—at San Francisco, Hunter College, and Flushing Meadows, but Lake Success is something else again. Here the radio booths overlooking the committee rooms and the chambers of the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council have not been utilized to the full.

When I went out there last week, WNYC, the city-owned New York outlet, was carrying a play-by-play account; WMCA, the New York independent, was recording and re-creating its evening half-hour program whenever it felt developments warranted; and Mutual had equipment on hand for airing innocuous words at the end of its daily musical tribute to the U. N. Aside from that, NBC had John McVane, an experienced news hand, covering the committee meetings and feeding takes to regular newscasts; Mutual had a man on the spot; CBS had two men assigned whom I did not see; and ABC had no one around.

In the view of the U. N. the broadcasters are sidestepping responsibility by applying news standards to U. N. doings and ignoring the wealth of background, informative, and human-interest material that is available. "If only radio would face up to its obligation," wailed spokesmen of the international organization, "put its imagination to work, and do a broadcasting job comparable to what it did in the war."

To this radio answers: "We would like to cover the U. N. as we did the war, but the broad basic appeal is not there; it has to be cultivated, and we haven't the staff, the funds, or the time to do that." Some radio men apologize for the situation as follows: "Every newspaper in the country gives a considerable amount of space to the U. N. If we insist on using news-coverage standards, then we should match the staffs and time devoted to U. N. by the press. This we are not doing, and we must face it. So long as network radio does not want—and you can't blame them—to sign a blank check for the staff required to provide the coverage needed, and so long as network radio refuses—as do NBC and CBS—to use the recorded re-creation technique pioneered by WMCA, then radio's field clearly consists in explaining and interpreting the U. N.'s daily accomplishments."

On Tuesday, November 26, NBC will start a weekly series about the U. N. along these lines. Each program will dramatize one activity of the organization, with the final five minutes given to Andrew Cordier, executive assistant to Trygve Lie, for an interpretation of the week's events.

This week, also, Norman Corwin and high program executives of CBS are lunching with U. N. officials to discuss a way out of the impasse. Corwin will only suggest and advise, not produce or write. Nevertheless, his influence will be felt.

Meanwhile the U. N.'s plans for domestic short-wave broadcasts, similar to the service it now offers the rest of the world, have been blocked by the Federal Communications Commission. For economic reasons the FCC cannot permit the U. N. to operate a domestic short-wave transmitter without permitting Press Wireless to do likewise; that in turn would raise hob with American Telephone and Telegraph, which now provides point-to-point communications by wire. But the FCC is actuated by political considerations as well. The Soviet Union is now using short-wave frequencies for point-to-point communication within the U. S. S. R. Unfortunately radio waves do not stop at political borders, and these Soviet domestic broadcasts are the subject of an international conference now meeting in Moscow. To approve U. N. short-wave broadcasts in the United States would cut the props from our protests in Moscow. However, the United Nations has an office in Geneva, Switzerland, and it is not inconceivable that a short-wave transmitter will be erected in Geneva to receive the U. N.'s current short-wave programs and re-beam them to the United States for use by domestic radio stations. This will take a bit of doing, for a wave length will first have to be obtained.

Guns and Butter

ARSENAL OF DEMOCRACY. By Donald M. Nelson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

WITH twelve million of their huskiest workers in the armed forces, the people of America came close to doubling the national production in four years. By what means did they do it? What knowledge did they gain of the processes of industry? What was the full story of this incredible achievement? If any human being can tell us, it should be Donald Nelson.

In 1940 the value of goods and services produced in the United States was about $100 billion; in 1944, $200 billion. In the teeth of all the experts, who said we must choose, we produced both guns and "butter" ("butter" in a highly symbolic sense). Output of civilian goods changed its character somewhat, but the total did not fall, while output of war goods was almost as much again.

This miracle was due to many causes. Citizens worked longer hours; some millions of women, youngsters, and oldsters came out of the home, the school, and the Florida sunshine to go into war plants. Patriotism made many of us work harder and better; our work was directed to a goal, instead of being just work. In 1940 there had been nearly ten million unemployed, generally regarded by our best people as bums and loafers. They formed a great pool of man-power for shipyards, aircraft factories, and atom-bomb plants, as well as the armed services. How these men fought and worked! At last their country needed them!

But perhaps the most important reason of all was the lucid brain work which organized the men, the materials, the plants, the power grids, the transport system, into one great industrial team. We won both wars, East and West, as Hanson Baldwin is never weary of pointing out, not by our superlative generalship, courage, or cunning, but by literally overwhelming our enemies with shot and shell, a rain of steel and lead more dreadful than anything hitherto known. Where they sprinkled it on us, we let loose a continuous cloudburst on them. American mass-production destroyed them in the end. Without a miracle of planning, however, the result could not have been achieved. Furthermore, it was planning without, in most cases, ownership or operation of the plant—something logically impossible to the ideologists on the right and on the left.

The War Production Board was the central planning agency, and Donald Nelson was its head during the critical years. His book is a clearly written and invaluable record for all time. When a tycoon or a banker says to you, "We can't do this," or "We can't afford that," hand him a copy of "Arsenal of Democracy" to help him raise his sights. This country can do anything it wants to do, materially and financially. The only question is, do we really want to do it?

Can we seek any peaceful end with an equal determination and unity? The war exploded all the old limitations of economists, bankers, and business men which had so crippled us in the 1930's. Now the boys are trying to force industry back into their artificial strait-jackets, but I doubt that they will succeed.

Like a modern Cincinnatus, Donald Nelson dropped his hand from the telephone set at Sears Roebuck to rush to Washington and lead his country's industrial armies. It was a job to kill most men in a month, not only because of the size of the undertaking, but because of the so-called "Battle of Washington." You would not believe the fights they got into, egged on by the press, which believes that nothing is news unless there is a fight in it. (This journalistic first principle may some day cost us our democracy.)

Donald Nelson tells us how he smoked his pipe and calmed the battlers down. The secret of his success is fairly plain. First, he likes people and trusts them. Second, he seems to have the kind of mind which looks all around a given problem and gets the major characteristics in before coming to a decision.

He liked nearly everybody—his staff, Congress, the President, the dollar-a-year men, the bureaucrats, labor leaders, farmers, the navy, scientists, the British, the Russians, Mr. Stalin, even Charlie Wilson of General Electric. But one important exception runs through the book. He did not like the heavy brass in the War Department. He felt that these gentlemen did not understand mass-production, did not know what could be done and what could not, and took considerable satisfaction in depriving civilians unnecessarily of goods. Mr. Nelson describes his running engagement, and gives them this parting shot—a bull's-eye, if you ask me:

> It seems to me that this experience provides the final, clinching reason why control over the nation's economy must be kept in the hands of civilians at all times . . . our whole economic and social system will be in peril if it is controlled by the military men.

The Children of Light

THE STORY OF THE FAITH. By William Alva Gifford. The Macmillan Company. $5.

IT IS manifest that scientific realism will not save the world. The viper is as real as the dove, and it is a truth that the wolf devours the lamb. These are noxious truths, which must not be allowed to prevail; they have to be conquered by higher truths. Such a hierarchy of values is the core of religion, and such a religion, not business, politics, or science, has alone the power to heal and guide us. A book like William Alva Gifford's "The Story of the Faith" is more than mere information; it is a challenge, to the dogmatic and the undogmatic alike. For unless our faith is revived, darkness threatens us all. And it cannot be revived unless it be purified.

The first 174 pages, in this volume of 622, seem to me wholly admirable. They sum up the story of the faith from earliest Judaic times to the Council of Nicaea. The faith was fully formed by 325; indeed, it was arrested. All further developments were explanations or regressions. In 325, as Gifford puts it, "Christians, who had so recently won the right to live, lost the right to think." By that time also the church had "come to terms with the world." The next 400 pages are the history of the churches, and since the churches are of this world, the history of medieval and modern Europe. This was perhaps inevitable; it certainly is to be regretted. We have little use for another elementary textbook of war and diplomacy. Why give a compressed and distorted account of Napoleon's career? Twisted facts abound, and, even worse, stale interpretations. In the fight against Austria "Piedmont found support in the little kingdom of Sardinia," and Cavour is apparently a "Sardinian," not a "Piedmontese." "To the Arabs, Allah's gift of Palestine has been confirmed by 1,200 years of unbroken occupancy." Well, the first Crusade was at least a strange interlude. "Spain is romantic, devoted to the past, submissive to authority." (Amen! says romantic Franco.) But Germany, France, England were romantic also. There is a revolutionary as well as a reactionary aspect to romanticism. Shelley and the third Lamennais were no less romantic than De Maistre or the first Lamennais. "The seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, in the Western world, are the Protestant era." This ignores the tremendous prestige of Catholic France at that very period. "[In Babylon] the exiles were as insignificant numerically and socially as the Jews of modern New York." The insignificance of the New York Jews is perhaps the most startling discovery in the book.

A young lady read Renan's "Life of Jesus," breathlessly, "to see how it would end." I had the same feeling with this volume. It started with a magnificent promise: in the last chapter, The Valley of Decision, would the author bring us a definite message? Alas! The answer is equivocal. Gifford destroys the faith of the fundamentalists—who, by the way, are not all millennialists. But he has no substitute, except Rousseau's Confession of Faith of a Savoyard Vicar, made a little more respectable with a touch of Kantism. He spurns theology and ecclesiasticism; yet he concludes that the churches are indispensable. Then let us seek our guidance in the churches, not in undogmatic religion.

The true lesson of the book is contained in a quotation from Marcus Aurelius: "Never value anything as profitable to thyself which compels thee to break thy promise, to lose thy self-respect, to hate any man, to suspect, to curse, to act the hypocrite, to desire anything that needs walls and curtains." It is the highest merit of this well-meaning and hesitant book that in many of its pages it is not unworthy of such an ideal.

THE CARTHAGINIAN PEACE, OR THE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF MR. KEYNES. By Etienne Mantoux. Oxford University Press. $4.50.

THIS book was completed in the summer of 1944, the year one Before the Atomic Bomb. Its author was killed on active duty in Austria in April, 1945, at the age of thirty-two. Lord Keynes, whose treatise on "The Economic Consequences of the Peace" is the subject of Mantoux's critique, died in the spring of 1946. Because of these facts Mantoux's book assumed more of a historical than a contemporary interest even before its date of publication. Nevertheless, it is important. It is an intelligent, factual, and illuminating appraisal of the Treaty of Versailles, and of Keynes's attack upon it, in the light of subsequent events.

As between Clemenceau and Keynes, Mantoux preferred Clemenceau, and he wrote this book in the hope that in the peace treaty after Hitler's war the ideas of Keynes, so influential after the Kaiser's war, would not prevail. They haven't. Were Mantoux still living, and were he now to inspect the severed carcass of the German Reich, he would find little to justify his earlier fears, though he might well find grounds for new ones.

Mantoux believed that it would have been impossible for the Allies to make a peace so generous and just as to win the acceptance of the Germans. For them defeat was bitter; they were enraged by the frustration of their ambitions. It was the task of the peacemakers, first, to make the Germans pay for the damage they had done, and, second, to curb their power so that they could not try again to conquer Europe. These two objectives might have been accomplished by the Treaty of Versailles—had it not been for Keynes and the widespread acceptance of his views.

Mantoux examines these views in detail. He shows that many of Keynes's prophecies were mistaken; that the treaty did not, as Keynes maintained, "reduce Germany to servitude"; and that the Allied bill for reparations, enormous as it was, could have been paid. It must be said that Mantoux's arguments and statistics are persuasive, supported as they are by the gigantic fact that Germany recovered sufficiently within a generation to start another war.

But was Keynes wrong in his main thesis, and Clemenceau right in his? The answer, perhaps, is that if we assume a world of sovereign states, each looking to its own strength and pursuing its own interests, then men like Clemenceau, or Cato, are the safest men to follow—if they are on your side. (A Carthaginian peace—not the first but the second one—would be easy to carry out with the aid of the atomic bomb.) But if we assume that the future of mankind is not a hopeless one, and that it may still be possible to organize the world for peace, then we need more men with the intelligence, good-will, and wit of John Maynard Keynes.

The human race may survive the errors of its idealists but not the realism of its cynics. G. R. WALKER

Retrospect and Reality

SELECTED POEMS. By Raymond Holden. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

NOTHING IS A WONDERFUL THING. By Helen Wolfert. Simon and Schuster. $2.

IT IS not an altogether satisfying experience to look through the wrong end of the telescope at Mr. Holden's thirty years of versifying. Anything in retrospect is ultimately saddening or ironical or both. In the case of Raymond Holden the ironic note has seldom been absent—except, perhaps, when he was writing his "Early Poems 1917-1927." Here he showed a lyricism that was charming because it was fresh and he was awake to the landscape around him. He committed a grave folly when he forsook these green pastures for the philosophical waste lands he wandered into later. The sonnets and poems which followed were more often fastidious than inspired. Resigned instead of challenging, solemn rather than profound, his verse has practically dried up. The progress Mr. Holden has made in technical skill by pruning, snipping, and balancing each word and line has finally resulted in his paring his art down to a flexible handicraft.

Mrs. Wolfert could benefit by a few elementary lessons in technique from Mr. Holden, but her narrative poem about New York's East Side has a driving power that makes his book look pale and sickly. Only someone very close to this unending struggle with squalor and a hostile environment could write with such uncompromising realism about these people. She knows almost instinctively the peculiarly rich idiom of the Jewish neighborhood speech. Yet it might have been a greater artistic achievement for Mrs. Wolfert had she not strayed so far from the conventional verse pattern. Probably she expects the sheer force of her ideas to move readers who do not usually read poetry; but those who do read poetry are certain to deplore Mrs. Wolfert's flashy tricks, her double-barreled words and similes, and her clumsy efforts at alliteration and assonance: "Beneath her flanks the planks creak." AMERICANS LIKE MATTHEWS?

"I've been down the Jordan Valley and up in Galilee and in the Jezreel Valley and in the Hulah swamps. Those are some guys. They're a new type. They've quit being Jews and become Hebrews. . . I haven't seen the Arabs producing anything worth showing off, except cabarets and filthy postcards, from Tangier to Teheran—not for the last thousand years."

ENGLISHMEN LIKE SMITH?

"We are extremely sorry for the Jews, and it may not be irrelevant to point out that in aiding Jewish refugees Great Britain has played a larger part than any other country in Europe — or outside Europe, if it comes to that. . . However, we cannot afford to antagonize the Arab world for the sake of the Jews . . ."

Arthur Koestler, by the magic of a great novelist's art, breathes life into the people involved in the Palestine conflict — Jews, Arabs, British, and Americans alike — and makes them understandable in this, his greatest novel!

MACMILLAN

FICTION IN REVIEW

FOR some years now John P. Marquand has occupied a very special place among our novelists. Practically single-handed he has held the line immediately behind a possible first rank of current fiction. Without himself ever transcending the high-grade-commodity level, he has done a great deal to raise our standards of what a literary commodity can be. Without ever urging us to think that his novels are themselves "important," he has done more than any writer of our time to close the dangerous gap between important fiction and popular fiction. But now, with his new novel, "B. F.'s Daughter" (Little, Brown, $2.75), for the first time one has an awareness of Mr. Marquand's own sharp sense of the divisions among the social-intellectual classes, and of himself as a spokesman for the embattled majority. There is a new note of defensiveness, not only in Mr. Marquand's satire of the long-hairs, but also in the main argument of his story. "B. F.'s Daughter" is a study of what constitutes adjustment for a typical modern woman: one may be perfectly willing to accept the traditional sexual values for which the book pleads and still be disconcerted by the shoddy terms in which these established values are cast and the identification Mr. Marquand makes between domestic traditionalism and traditionalism in all departments of thought. One can scarcely believe that Mr. Marquand means to imply what his book so plainly does imply—that thinking in any direction to the left of dead center is aberrant, unreliable, or immature; of such a thoroughgoing conservatism one feels that its advocate has really let himself be pushed too far by the minority forces. As a matter of fact, even the technical telling of Mr. Marquand's story betrays an uncertainty about his own position. The novel skips around in time in a fashion that is both confusing and useless. And there are pages and pages of empty "bright" talk which are disturbingly reminiscent of that other uneasy champion of unhappy millionaires, Philip Barry.

Although Polly Fulton, the heroine of "B. F.'s Daughter," is the daughter of a very rich industrialist, she has many of the traits of the contemporary ideal of young womanhood. And very pleasant traits they are too. She is intelligent, spirited, humorous, warm-hearted, independent, generous, competent, and loyal. But Polly is also, like so many nice modern girls, utterly confused as to what to do with her life. In natural revolt against her upbringing, she marries, not the steady sensible Bob Tasmin of her father's choice, but Tom Brett, an erratic intellectual and New Dealer who she supposes will introduce her to a whole new field for her energies and make her feel useful. It turns out, however, that she has little outlet for her energies except in dominating her husband. When, with the outbreak of the war, Tom comes into his own on the Washington front, Polly is left high and dry; as to the busy, successful Tom, he finds his docile secretary much more comforting than a spirited wife. And even Bob, whom Polly meets again, refuses to give up his well-ordered if unexciting marriage for the sake of love for a former sweetheart. At the end of Mr. Marquand's novel Polly is a very sad girl, but she is at least wiser to the extent of having learned that a woman's only happiness lies in the traditional sphere—in a home and children and acceptance of the way of life set down for her by a strong-willed man.

Because Mr. Marquand has such a flair for social observation, the story of Polly Fulton is of course never as dull as this summary might suggest. For instance, the sections of "B. F.'s Daughter" that describe life among the high military are expectably pointed and amusing, and in general the book has a good quota of its author's usual happy reporting of how things and places look and how the social animal behaves. But dull indeed, and dismal too, is Mr. Marquand's projection of the brand of domesticity that will cure Polly's restlessness—all a matter of playing a good game of bridge and golf, of joining one's husband for nice walks in the country with the dogs, of (no doubt) voting Republican if that is what your husband's boss is voting. For there is no question that the twin virtue to traditional domesticity is political conservatism. Working out his sexual theme against the background of a larger social pattern, Mr. Marquand makes it clear that just as submissiveness to a strong man is the desirable female attitude, so the acceptance of a paternalistic rugged individualism and a regard for gentlemanliness are the desirable social attitudes. How could the daughter of a great industrialist be expected to submit to a poseur and a windbag like Tom Brett? But how could a college professor, a writer, a New Dealer be anything but a poseur and windbag? Evidently Mr. Marquand knows which political side the young women of America should be on if they wish to get over their growing pains and come to a healthy, wealthy, and wise maturity.

It is interesting that another recent novel, Elinor Rice's "Mirror, Mirror" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $2.75), which also is about the problem of a modern woman, should also weave its sexual theme together with a political theme. In Miss Rice's novel, however, the heroine's background is not one of wealth and free enterprise but one of poverty and socialist idealism: Mona Biro is the daughter of immigrant worker parents; her revolt is to break with the family idealism and herself discover the golden American opportunity. Mona is the very prototype of modern career women and the very essence of female narcissism; she makes a great success of dress-designing. Like Polly Fulton, who carries with her into maturity a father-figure in the person of Bob Tasmin, Miss Rice's heroine carries with her the father-figure of Toby Lang. Toby is a left-wing playwright; even after he marries Mona, he still likes to talk with Mona's old socialist father about things as remote from the fashion world as the Spanish civil war. But neither his radical impulse nor his writing impulse is strong enough to resist the pressure of his wife's large earnings and her willingness to indulge his every luxurious wish even at the cost of his manhood. There is no principled resolution in "Mirror, Mirror," as there is in "B. F.'s Daughter"; there is no definition of the positive values a woman should seek in her life. But there is at least this much accord in the two books —that Miss Rice, like Mr. Marquand, assures us that a woman cannot buy her happiness as so many men can, and that the female domination of a marriage has within it the seeds of its own destruction.

The relation of Mona and Toby in "Mirror, Mirror" is a much more dynamic thing than the relation of Polly and Tom in "B. F.'s Daughter": as fictional characters should, these two central figures in Miss Rice's novel take their story into their own hands instead of merely standing for the various attitudes their author would explore. In fact, the fault so endemic to all the major portions of Mr. Marquand's book, of treating the people as personifications of ideas—I had almost said, as personifications of political parties—is present only in the early sections of Miss Rice's book, where Mona's reality as a little girl is sacrificed to a kind of schematic representation of the budding of a female narcissist. More important, however, than this point of dissimilarity is the difference between Miss Rice's approach to the writers, would-be writers, and other assorted "intellectuals" whom Mona and Toby know and that of Mr. Marquand to Polly Fulton's Village friends. Miss Rice gives us satire, too, but satire born of sympathetic knowledge, not of self-protectiveness.

Victoria Lincoln's three stories, "The Wind at My Back" (Rinehart, $2.50), will disappoint the readers who enjoyed her successful novel, "February Hill." It may also disappoint admirers of Miss Lincoln's sketches in the New Yorker, because the new stories have a preciousness and self-consciousness that one has not usually noticed in her short fiction. Although each of the new stories has a young girl or young woman as its featured character, the volume is less representative of contemporary writing about women than of contemporary writing by women. Too carefully styled, too delicate in its perceptions, too thin in its narrative materials, "The Wind at My Back" is another instance of the exaggerated sensibility that is such a large part of women's current effort in literature.

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IN THE past repertory theaters have been a good deal like third parties—everybody talked about them, occasionally they even got started, but in America at least they usually haven't amounted to much. The improbable, however, sometimes happens, and The American Repertory Theater, Inc., looks quite a bit more promising than most such enterprises. Cheryl Crawford, Eva Le Gallienne, Margaret Webster, and Walter Hampden are not theatrical innocents. They seem, moreover, to have sound financial backing, and what may be even more important, there are certain signs that the time is ripe.

For reasons which I do not pretend to understand, a large playing public has suddenly decided that all old plays are not necessarily beneath its notice. After at least a quarter of a century during which any man or woman unwilling to be regarded as provincial held firmly to the opinion that everything except the latest hit was merely educational and therefore exclusively for children who get sent rather than for adults who buy their own tickets, Shakespeare, Shaw, and various dramatists in between have been enjoying real runs. No doubt the wonderfully publicized visit of the Old Vic Company helped somewhat by calling attention to the fact that in London self-respecting people admit to an interest in Sophocles or Shakespeare; it seems not impossible that "John Gabriel Borkman" will be witnessed by spectators who, five years ago, would as soon have thought of spending an evening playing a few rubbers of Lotto.

The new company has established itself in the roomy old playhouse on Columbus Circle where the ballet was recently housed. When these words were written it had already offered two productions, and a third will have been put on view by the time I get into print. The two seem sufficient warrant for certain conclusions: the plays will be competently directed, as well as competently acted and decently mounted; but no attempt will be made to confine the choice to those on the short list of first-rank masterpieces. Certainly, at least, neither "Henry VIII" nor "What Every Woman Knows" belongs on such a list, though both are just as certainly worth seeing by anyone with reasonably catholic tastes.

The former, as everyone who ever took a course in the history of the drama has been told before now, was written after Shakespeare had officially renounced the practice of his rough magic and deeper than ere did plummet sound had sunk his book. Much of it—including Cardinal Woolsey's big speech, "Farewell, a long farewell to all my greatness," was almost certainly not written by Shakespeare but by that theater-wise hack John Fletcher, and the intention of the whole was to appeal to the already old-fashioned but still eager appetite for historical pageantry. Considered intellectually, the play is a segment from that serialized Child's History of England which had been running for a generation, and there are even certain touches which suggest "1066 and All That." But Miss Webster, the director of the present production, is an old hand at reanimating the effects achieved by dramatists practicing stage tricks no longer in fashion; with the aid of costumes and settings rather more elaborate than is usually expected of repertory companies, she makes the whole a spirited and picturesque peepshow. The form or formlessness of the chronicle history is always a bit trying to the modern spectator, who finds it difficult to relax and to take things as they come instead of unconsciously resenting the failure of the play to satisfy his expectations in the matter of unity and climax, but with a little readjustment he can get a good deal of what early seventeenth-century audiences got. Romantic history is still more picturesque and satisfying than scientific history, and the figure of Henry himself—a comically wilful bad boy who never learned to distinguish between his patriotism and conscience on the one hand and, on the other, his determination to satisfy his simple sensual desires—is still an engaging as well as sinister figure that gives Victor Jory an opportunity to run away with the acting honors in this performance. Miss Le Gallienne and Walter Hampden as Catherine of Aragon and Cardinal Woolsey have harder tasks. Noble, long-suffering queens and ambitious churchmen cast down from high place simply do not fascinate us so much as they did the Elizabethans.

"What Every Woman Knows" seems to me to include some of the best and some of the worst of Barrie. The whole of the first scene, in which the loving brothers of poor ardent Maggie tie up a man for her, is as full of comic invention and sly humor as any modern bit I can think of, but the play as a whole does not quite live up to the extravagant promise of that opening. Every subsequent development is not only expected but presented with unnecessary explicitness, until one begins to wonder why what every woman knows should be told either to her or to anybody else quite so many times over. The character of the Comtesse de la Brière, played with a good deal of animation and charm by Miss Le Gallienne, has no other excuse for existence than that of crossing the t's and dotting the i's which have been crossed and dotted at least twice before. One begins to wonder, indeed, if the arguments which used to go on between the modernists and the traditionalists over the relative merits of Barrie and Shaw were not really occasioned less by the opposing convictions of the two men than they were by the fact that the one seemed to have more faith than the other in the quickness of his audience. Sentiment and humor are as acceptable to most of the sophisticated as satire and wit. But Sir James, in this play at least, seems to be making the ancient Victorian assumption that in the theater it is necessary not only to say a thing three times but to underscore it at least twice.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

THIS year's Pepsi-Cola show at the National Academy, its name changed to "Paintings of the Year," was a great improvement over last year's. But it was of necessity—as any attempt to present contemporary art wholesale must be—a relative failure. There is simply not enough good painting being done in this country to stock a respectable large-scale show out of current production.

The mistake of largeness arises from a more fundamental error, which is that of attempting to be representative, of refusing to be "prejudiced" or to select and back specific tendencies. True, the outright academic work that made such a fiasco of last year's show was excluded, but the catholicity of taste within "modern" painting that governed this year's effort served only to place its failure on a somewhat higher level, not to diminish it. It was overlooked that there are tendencies toward decay and retrogression inside "modern" art itself which are little less inimical to high art than the confessedly academic thing.

The show of "Fourteen Americans" (actually fifteen) at the Museum of Modern Art suffers, if to a considerably lesser degree, from the same error. This, I think, causes the unfortunate total impression it leaves—an impression disproportionate, however, to the number of deserving artists included. At least half of them—Gorky, Hare, Roszak, Tobey, MacIver, Price, and even Motherwell—have to be taken seriously, whether for good or bad. I myself hold greater or lesser reservations with respect to each of them and get full satisfaction from rather little of their work, but it remains that they are among the relatively few people upon whom the fate of American art depends at the moment. And the fact that they make up half this show would seem to stamp it unambiguously with a definite and chosen direction—toward the abstract in the line of Matisse-Picasso, or the abstract as the freedom to invent "poetically" in the way of Klee or Giacometti. And yet somehow this is not at all the impression one carries away. The presence of such artists as Sharrer, the ineffable Pickens, Tooker, Culwell, Aronson, even of the abstract painter Rice-Pereira, the sculptor Noguchi, and the gifted draftsman and cartoonist Saul Steinberg—whose drawings are surprisingly strong on their own terms—blunts the point, either because, as in the case of the first four or five, their tendency is ultimately academic or because, as in the case of Rice-Pereira and Noguchi, they adulterate the good tendency by faking it. And the inclusion of Steinberg, good as he is in his limited way, seems almost a last-minute gesture of despair: for even if he were much better he would still be relatively unimportant in terms of modern art.

The net impression left by the "Fourteen Americans" show is of a kind of shabbiness, half-bakedness, a lack of seriousness and independence and energy, the fault of which lies more with the person who selected and arranged the show than with the artists shown. Whoever he was, he seems altogether devoid of personal taste—more reliant on tips than on his own judgment.

It is precisely personal taste that furnished the auspices of the Metropolitan's show of a group of contemporary American paintings bought by the State Department for exhibition in South America and elsewhere. In my opinion it was the best group show of this nature to be held in New York for years. Disagreement with many of his inclusions and omissions does not abate my admiration for the way in which J. Leroy Davidson of the State Department handled his job. Obviously, he realized that the cultural situation in Latin America is such that its connoisseurs of modern art are more likely to be impressed by daring and plastic originality than by the American "scene" or our home-grown surrealism; and that it was up to the State Department to show people whose taste is oriented toward Paris that we too keep abreast of the advances in art. Whether he wanted to or not, Mr. Davidson had to take a definite and bold line, and therefore a good half of his show goes determinedly in the direction of the abstract.

But Mr. Davidson's exhibition does not make the point of being advanced merely for the sake of being so; in proportion, there is almost as much bad advanced or abstract painting as there is any other kind. Mr. Davidson also has a taste, a personal and definite one, that accords with the line he took. Though he shows many bad pictures by poor artists, he shows enough good pictures, even by mediocre artists, to more than make up for them. And at least there is some relation to be discerned between the bad and the good; they are not thrown together helter-skelter by a jury the only connection between whose members is one of time and place; they have an organic relation to each other that is enlightening in itself. Mr. Davidson's exhibition is in a way a remarkable accomplishment, and its moral should be taken to heart by others who control the public destiny of art in our country.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

VICTOR takes the opening of the Metropolitan Opera season as the occasion for the release of a large number of operatic recordings. One is Eri tu from Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera," sung by Leonard Warren (11-9292; $1). This is one of the times when Warren is content not to bawl but really to sing and to phrase with discretion and taste; and the splendor of his voice ravishes the ear. On the reverse side is the Credo from Verdi's "Otello," which Warren sings with more, but not excessive, power. Another excerpt from "Un Ballo in Maschera," the third-act Ma se m'è forza perderti, and O Paradiso! from Meyerbeer's "Africaine" are excellently sung by Jan Peerce (11-9295; $1). Zinka Milanov's phrasing and style in Casta diva from Bellini's "Norma" are superb, but the performance happens to be one of the occasions when her voice is not under control and is therefore clouded by tremolo and not securely on pitch. On the reverse side of the record (11-9293; $1) she sings Suicidio! from "La Gioconda." Blanche Thebom's voice is opulent in Waltraute's Narrative from Wagner's "Götterdämmerung," which I find myself disliking as much this time as the last for its Wagnerian portentous mumbo-jumbo (11-9296; $1). For this excerpt Frieder Weissman produces the Wagnerian orchestral ebb and flow satisfactorily, but he imparts no force to the accompaniments for the Italian excerpts. The performances are beautifully reproduced, except for the almost inaudible woodwind (?) figuration in the transition from the introductory recitative to the beginning of Casta diva; and my copies of Waltraute's Narrative and O Paradiso! suffer from wavering pitch. On another single (11-9294; $1) are the Anvil Chorus from Verdi's "Trovatore" and the Bridal Chorus from Wagner's "Lohengrin" excellently sung and performed by the Victor Chorale and Orchestra under Robert Shaw, and excellently reproduced.

A volume called "A Treasury of Grand Opera" (Set 1074; $4.85) contains additional recordings—some previously issued, some new—of an excerpt from each of seven operas. There are the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," superbly performed by Toscanini with the N. B. C. Symphony; Il mio tesoro from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," sung without musical style by James Melton with an orchestra under Breisach; Ritorna vincitor from Verdi's "Aida," cut and somewhat hurried to fit on one side, beautifully sung by Milanov with an orchestra under Weissmann; Un di felice from Verdi's "Traviata," well sung by Peerce and Albanese with an orchestra under Weissmann; the Habanera from Bizet's "Carmen," acceptably sung by Gladys Swarthout with chorus and orchestra under Leinsdorf; the Soldiers' Chorus from Gounod's "Faust," well-sung and performed by the Victor Chorale and Orchestra under Shaw; the Prologue to Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci," sung by Warren with an orchestra under Weissmann. When the "Lohengrin" performance was issued I mentioned that it was recorded with liveness and brilliance on top but with insufficient body down below and with automatic limitation of volume, so that the climax did not have the depth and massiveness, nor the entire performance the organic proportions, that they have on the older record of Toscanini's performance with the New York Philharmonic. The other performances are well-recorded.

Another set (1073; $3.85) offers several excerpts from Russian operas sung by Kipnis with an orchestra under Berezovsky. They are Prince Gremin's aria from Tchaikovsky's "Eugen Onegin," the Song of the Viking Guest from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," the aria of Prince Galitzky from Borodin's "Prince Igor," the Miller's aria from Dargomijsky's "Russalka," and a bit of the Inn Scene from Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" (with Anna Leskaya and Ilya Tamarin)—to which is added Mussorgsky's "Song of the Flea." The music is enjoyable; but in the arias there is much mouthing and chewing of the big bass sonorities, and in "The Flea" there is dramatic over-emphasis and distortion to the point of horrible caricature. The orchestral parts are well-done, and the performances are excellently reproduced.

On one side of a Victor plastic record (18-0053; $2) Koussevitzky shows how he plays Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever." The pace is a little faster than Toscanini's; and after the brilliant opening the quiet passages are done with the orchestra's characteristic refinement of sonority and execution that is right for Ravel but a little odd and amusing in Sousa; but the Koussevitzky thumb-print on the performance is the huge retardation introducing the concluding statement. On the reverse side is "Semper Fidelis." The recorded sound of the performances is magnificent, but clouded by reverberation.

Why Glazunov's ballet suite "The Seasons" should be recorded I don't know; but it has been by Dorati with the Dallas Symphony Orchestra (Set 1072; $4.85). Performance and recording are good.

Columbia has issued a set (648; $3.85) of Beethoven's Sonata Opus 13 ("Pathétique") played by Serkin. The feeble, dull sound of the piano as it began to come from the first record was almost unbelievable; and so was Serkin's performance—his lack of power even in the introduction, his fleet-fingered rattling off of the fast movements, his inability to create any phraseological continuity from one sound to the next in the melody of the slow movement.

Begging the Question?

Dear Sirs: That Mr. Krutch (The Nation, October 26) should call O'Neill's less laudatory critics "detractors," and should think of their remarks as "grumbling," is—in the strictest sense—impertinent. It is as if I should retort that many of O'Neill's most laudatory critics are his old colleagues and personal friends.

The real issue is not joined in Mr. Krutch's article. Mr. Krutch assumes that the gifts O'Neill possesses are central and that those he lacks are peripheral. This is to beg the whole question. Those of us who find O'Neill something much less than great would say that he has all too many of the peripheral gifts and perhaps none of the central ones. The question, clearly, is: what is central and what peripheral? Can a playwright with the faults which Mr. Krutch, Mr. Nathan, Mr. Young, and Mr. Atkinson find in O'Neill really be a very good playwright?

I should be happy to try to answer these questions myself had I any chance of getting my answers printed by The Nation. ERIC BENTLEY

"Who's Who" Explains

Dear Sirs: My attention has been brought to the statement in the column entitled In the Wind, in the October 19 issue of The Nation, that Joe Louis Barrow is not included in "Who's Who," but that James Joseph Tunney has been listed since 1938.

Just to keep the record straight, I should like to point out, first, that the policy of "Who's Who" has always been not to include those whose prominence is due solely to their physical prowess. That is why Joe Louis Barrow has never appeared in "Who's Who." You will note that Jack Dempsey was never sketched, nor was Babe Ruth. . . .

As for Mr. Tunney, he appeared in 1938 only when he had become chairman of the board of a large corporation of national reference interest. Incidentally, I understand that Mr. Barrow is scheduled for a current issue of "The Monthly Supplement to Who's Who."

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • NOVEMBER 30, 1946 NUMBER 22

Men and Coal

THIS is being written on the eve of The Showdown. For that is the way the issue is being described by the American press. If one man can successfully challenge the authority of the state, then the very basis of law is destroyed and with it the solid foundations on which our society rests. So, at least, argue those who feel that, whatever the wider issues, the immediate one is the United States of America versus John Llewellyn Lewis.

Such is the talk in the streets this week-end as the lights go down in the great cities, as the fires in the steel mills are banked and the railways cut their schedules, as the shadow of industrial paralysis creeps over the land. But even those who hold most grimly to this opinion have doubts. The "wider issues" insinuate themselves into the picture and destroy its clear outlines. The miners, recalling years of misery and terror in the coal fields, give unquestioning loyalty to the man who has led their battles and won their victories. Fifteen million trade unionists, with little love for Lewis, unite in condemning the government for making use of the injunction which, years ago, the Norris-LaGuardia Act outlawed as a weapon to force settlement in a labor dispute. The heads of the great industries whose production depends directly on coal count the costs of shutdown in the coming weeks. And men and women with wider imagination estimate in terms of human life the effects of stopping coal exports to the desperate people of Europe. The truism that clapping Lewis into jail, or fining the U. M. W. $200,000 for each day the strike continues, or occupying the coal fields with the army will not mine one ton of coal confronts Mr. Truman and his Cabinet with a responsibility which will not be discharged even after the courts have had their say. In the end, the issue is not merely the United States versus John L. Lewis; it is also the issue of men and coal.

"It is time for the American people to ask themselves some searching questions about the coal mines. In any rational view of the matter the mines exist not to give wages to miners or profits to owners and operators but primarily and chiefly to provide an adequate and regular supply of coal for public and private needs at a minimum cost of production and distribution." These words from The Nation of December 13, 1919, were written in the middle of the devastating post-war strike in the year John L. Lewis first took command of the United Mine Workers. Now, as then, the responsibility of the government cannot be reduced to the simple enforcement of law. It must include that of getting back into operation the coal mines on which so much of our national life and the life of other nations depend. We admit that the character and actions of John L. Lewis have not made it easy for the government to assume that responsibility. But we believe, just the same, that the government must not permit his menacing bulk to block the vision of its wider duties. We believe that the injunction technique was a mistake. And we also think that the authorities should be devoting their best effort to discovering means by which negotiations can be resumed. This may involve immediate loss of prestige to an Administration already humbled by its licking at the polls. But until miners and operators talk across a table the paralyzing impasse will remain.

There is one way in which the Administration can more than retrieve the immediate loss of face. The editorial in The Nation of twenty-seven years ago made the tentative suggestion that nationalization of the mines was the only logical solution of the perennial coal crisis. Now, with the record of those twenty-seven years behind us, and with the experience of the past six months of nominal government ownership of the mines, we urge this solution with more confidence. If the government took over the mines permanently and brought the whole industry under a Coal Authority, it would be forced to accept responsibility for continuous operation. This would entail the establishment of machinery for labor negotiations and arbitration to meet reasonable demands for improved conditions in the mining communities. True, as long as John L. Lewis was head of the union, negotiations between the Authority and the miners would not be easy. Lewis is as pugnacious, as arrogant, as unreasonable a labor leader as has ever taken the center of the national stage. But most of his qualities are a reflection of the lust for profits and the callous disregard for human life that has characterized the majority of the coal operators whom he has battled for nearly half a century. In dealing with a National Coal Authority which itself should include representatives of the workers, the character of the negotiations would inevitably change and Lewis's dictatorial hold would be loosened. For the major concern of the Authority would be to bring health into a sick industry, to see that the conditions of life in the coal towns at least meet those of other industrial centers, and to guarantee the constant availability of a fuel which, for some years to come, will remain the nation's chief source of power. If the present crisis hastens this ultimately inevitable conclusion to the grim story of coal, then the price the country will pay in the next few weeks will not be in vain.

The Shape of Things

THE SPANISH ISSUE WILL COME BEFORE THE General Assembly of the United Nations sometime next week. But diplomatic trial balloons are already being floated in the corridors, and it is apparent, as we declared last week, that the United States has now supplanted Great Britain as leader of the do-nothing bloc. This does not mean that Mr. Bevin has undergone a fundamental change of heart, but in view of the strong opposition at home, he is not averse to letting Tom Connally take command of the forces resisting positive action by the United Nations. We believe that the American delegation's attitude on the Spanish question does not reflect the sentiment of the overwhelming mass of the American people. For that reason, the Nation Associates and the Friends of the Spanish Republic have presented a memorandum to the president of the General Assembly and to the various delegations, requesting severance of diplomatic relations with Franco and recognition of the Spanish Republican government in exile. The document points out that last March the governments of Great Britain, the United States, and France felt there was sufficient reason to issue a joint declaration calling upon the Spanish people to remove Franco from power by peaceful means; that last summer a subcommittee appointed by the Security Council unanimously proposed adoption of a resolution recommending that diplomatic relations with the Franco government be terminated by each member of the United Nations, should the regime still be in existence at the time of the next session of the General Assembly. The Assembly is in session and the Franco regime is still in existence.

NO COUNTRY HAS MORE TO LOSE BY THE division of the world into hostile ideological blocs than Czechoslovakia. Politically, it must maintain the close alliance with the Soviet Union on which its security depends, but in order to prosper it needs world markets for its technically advanced and specialized industrial economy. The dearest wish of the Czechs, therefore, is to build a bridge between East and West, and the commercial agreement they have just signed with the United States may be regarded as a tentative approach to such a structure. This agreement is, primarily, a statement of principles in which both countries pledge themselves against discriminatory treatment of each other's trade. It includes a statement by Czechoslovakia approving the general tenor of American proposals for expansion of world commerce on multilateral lines, and a promise to compensate American citizens for property nationalized under Czech laws. It is to be followed by negotiations for a comprehensive treaty of friendship and commerce. The Prague government would hardly have signed a document of this kind against the wishes of the Soviet Union. Yet it seems in violent contradiction with the principles hotly sustained by Soviet representatives at the Paris conference when they attacked American proposals for non-discrimination clauses in the peace treaties. However, it would probably be a mistake to assume that the Soviet Union is irrevocably opposed to multilateral trading. The kind of bilateral agreements which it has signed with its neighbors have immediate political advantages, but they tend to isolate Russia economically and restrict its commercial exchanges to countries which can produce few of the things it needs. In the long run, the Soviets have more to gain from worldwide trading relations than from monopoly within their own sphere. Perhaps the Czech-American treaty points to a growing appreciation of this fact.

WHEN THE MOSLEM LEAGUE AGREED A FEW weeks ago to nominate representatives to serve in the Indian interim government, it was possible to hope that a communal truce would prevail while India took the next step toward its goal of independence. Unhappily, this hope has already been completely dissipated. As our New Delhi correspondent, Shiva Rao, explains on another page, the Moslem ministers have entered the Cabinet only to prevent it from functioning successfully. They refuse to recognize Nehru as Prime Minister or to accept the principle of joint responsibility; Jinnah, the head of the Moslem League from whom they take orders, has announced a boycott of the Constituent Assembly due to meet next month. The breakdown in the administrative structure has been appallingly illustrated by the bloody Hindu-Moslem riots which have been taking place in Bengal and Behar provinces. The governments of these provinces appeared unable to take effective action; the central government remained paralyzed by its divisions. Both sides, when not accusing each other, tend to blame the British in general and the Viceroy in particular for the situation. Mr. Rao, a Congress sympathizer, supports Nehru's charge that the British have formed a "mental alliance" with the Moslems. Jinnah accuses the Viceroy of "appeasing Congress." Short-sighted British imperialists, like Churchill, are gloating over the mess in the belief that a breakdown of law and order will make possible a British comeback. They are wrong. Britain has not the resources to reimpose its rule in India. If the current effort to transfer power peacefully and constitutionally fails, the British will have no alternative but to pull out of India, lock, stock, and barrel.

LANDLORDS IN SEVERAL WESTERN STATES have launched a somewhat inverse "strike" against current rent ceilings by locking up their empty houses until rents are boosted. As a publicity stunt, the "strike" (or is it a lockout?) may have its merits. But as an economic weapon it is hardly to be taken seriously. Existing laws protect tenants against eviction, and the number of empty houses—as anyone knows who has looked for one—is not large enough to provide very effective bargaining power. The strike is, however, a subsidiary feature of a well-organized and apparently well-financed drive by realty interests to force through a 15 per cent increase in rent ceilings. Although a recent government survey shows that as a result of full occupancy and reduced services landlords are enjoying profits from 25 to 43 per cent greater than before the war, some of the property owners apparently regard this as small change compared with the profits that they might be making if all controls were lifted. As long as the present acute housing shortage exists, a "free market" in housing might conceivably push rents to two or three times their present level. It is perhaps natural that the recent Republican victory, and the sharp trend toward decontrol over the bulk of the economy should have caused landlords to cast a lustful eye on the fleshpots that decontrol would give them. But if rents, which constitute approximately one-sixth of the average family's living costs, are pushed up, the pressure for higher wages will be so much the greater—a prospect that not even a Republican Congress will relish.

CHANCES ARE, THE POWERS THAT BE WILL make short shrift of Private Gorth Merrill, and nobody but Private Merrill's parents and Private Merrill himself will ever think about it again. Private Merrill seems to be a non-conformist; in a tiny A. P. dispatch from Manila carried in several papers last week, news of his non-conformity was brought to the attention of an American reader here and there. The soldier, "whose home address was not given . . . was severely wounded while fighting beside Hukbalahap guerrillas" who were resisting a Philippine Army military police raid on a guerrilla hideout at Sapangbalen. The sketchy dispatch leaves details to the imagination. In lieu of further information—and it is to be expected that the military will clam up—imagination can place Private Merrill in any of many roles ranging from ardent freedom-lover to just plain shack-lover (roped into somebody else's fight by mistake). At any rate, the important words in the A. P. dispatch are that the American was fighting beside guerrillas; the G. I. Ubermensch attitude—in islands where that attitude is devastatingly manifest—appears to be strangely absent in the case of Private Merrill, and it is with a small tingle of admiration that we read of this American whose ruggedness seems not neurotically splashed away.

Nations at Work

BY VERA MICHELES DEAN

Lake Success, November 23

THE relatively cordial atmosphere of committee discussions was clouded this week by mutual recriminations among the Big Three about the policies they have pursued since the end of hostilities. Mr. Molotov, addressing the Political and Security Committee on November 20, made a genuine attempt to meet the views expressed by Mr. Austin in his speech of October 30: in a revised draft of his resolution requesting information about United Nations troops abroad he agreed that this information should cover not only troops in friendly countries—notably Greece, Egypt, and China—but also those in former enemy countries, which include Rumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Finland, where Russian forces are stationed. It should be recalled in this connection that the presence of Russian troops in former Axis territories —in addition to Germany and Austria, where troops of Britain, France, and the United States are also stationed —was approved by the Allies at the time of the armistices. The peace treaties with Italy, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Finland, now being drafted by the Council of Foreign Ministers, provide for withdrawal of occupying troops ninety days after signature. Mr. Molotov, in his resolution, also asked for information concerning air and naval bases maintained abroad by the United Nations in both friendly and former enemy countries. Information about armed forces maintained by the United Nations at home, in which Mr. Austin had expressed interest, should, according to Mr. Molotov, be considered only when the General Assembly takes up his proposal for disarmament.

Unfortunately, Senator Connally, who replied for the United States, had not acquainted himself with Mr. Molotov's revised draft, and he delivered an old-fashioned, oratorical address denouncing Russia's actions since the war all over the globe. This gave Molotov the opportunity to question, in a long-winded statement on November 22, the motives of the United States, and Britain as well, in not furnishing the information he had called for about troops in friendly nations. He proposed that the nations in whose territories such troops are stationed should furnish information. On the previous day Mr. Bevin had declared that Britain would accept the Soviet proposal for a public report on all armed forces maintained abroad by the United Nations, but only on condition that it be included in a plan for disarmament and for the establishment of an international police force —and introduced a resolution to that effect. Mr. Molotov, who was supported by M. Parodi of France, answered that since discussion of disarmament would necessarily be protracted, this represented an attempt by Britain to shelve his request for immediate information about United Nations troops aboard. Efforts were being made over the week-end to reconcile the Russian and British resolutions.

The whole discussion is shadow-boxing. Both Russia and the Western powers know pretty accurately the size of their respective forces abroad. Some of the remarks made by Molotov on November 22 created the impression that he welcomed the chance to put the United States and Britain on the spot, as tit-for-tat for their previous criticism of the presence of Russian troops in Iran. Moreover, Russia, which is strong in land armies and weak in air and naval forces and in industrial capacity to produce the atom bomb, would like to see a public confrontation of the striking strengths commanded by the Big Three. While Mr. Molotov contends that the feeling of unease now existing throughout the world would be alleviated by information about United Nations troops abroad, it is difficult to see how anything short of general troop withdrawal would help, and this in turn would require genuine agreement among the great powers.

The debate about future machinery for the distribution of food supplies to countries in need, precipitated by LaGuardia's proposal for the creation of an International Emergency Food Board and by indications from Washington that the United States would prefer bilateral negotiations to a new international agency, has had the unexpected effect of producing a conciliatory atmosphere. Poland, Yugoslavia, Byelo-Russia, and the Ukraine have vied with one another in demonstrating their fervent appreciation of the aid they have received from UNRRA, and have expressed their gratitude to the United States in terms so glowing that some observers thought they verged on the abject. Typical of the tone of these speeches was a statement by Mr. Rajchman of Poland before the Economic and Financial Committee on November 18, in which he said that UNRRA had "indeed set the example of international solidarity among free peoples" and had been "a curtain-raiser of unusual efficiency." In an attempt to reconcile national with international action Philip Noel-Baker of the United Kingdom suggested on the same day that member nations receiving or contributing relief use the U. N. secretariat as a clearing-house for information and coordination.

C. I. O. Tightrope Act

BY ROBERT BENDINER

Atlantic City, November 22

COMMUNIST penetration is not the most important problem confronting the hard-pressed American labor movement, but only a wilfully blind observer or a particularly barnacled trade-union bureaucrat will deny that it has been the chief issue at the C. I. O.'s eighth annual convention. A new drive for wage increases was formally launched here, with Philip Murray making it clear that demands will be moderate and that the C. I. O. has no thought of "jeopardizing the economy." And there was a noteworthy sense of responsibility in his conciliatory plea to management to "be gentlemen, [to] sit around the bargaining table and in the spirit of good faith and in the interest of our national economy arrive at mutually satisfactory wage agreements without resorting to strike." But in the off-the-floor sessions, where all too much of the real business of these conventions is done, the caucusing has not revolved about wage demands or strategy to offset the anticipated wave of anti-labor legislation. It has been concerned first and foremost with the left-right struggle that has plagued the C. I. O. from birth.

Philip Murray's approach to this problem appears to be based on three objectives, each more or less incompatible with the other two. As strongly opposed to communism as a pious Catholic well might be, but at the same time fearful of an open split in his organization, he has attempted simultaneously to reduce the influence of the fellow-travelers, to soften the blow by hamstringing their only serious opposition, and to convince the public that the whole issue exists only in the dreams of a congenitally vicious press.

To achieve the first of these cross-purposes Mr. Murray lost no time here in setting up a committee that was to frame a resolution disavowing Communist influence in the C. I. O. To prevent a fight on the floor, and perhaps to convey to the public a picture of internal harmony and unanimity, he took the strange course of appointing to this committee three of the most determined anti-Communists in the organization and three diehards from the opposite side of the aisle, including, fantastically, one self-avowed member of the Communist Party. There is no question that the three left-wingers—Abram Flaxer, Michael Quill, and Ben Gold—would have spurned the "compromise" that finally emerged from this committee if they had not been fearful of even more drastic treatment on the floor. Clearly on the defensive, they agreed with surpassing irony to "resent and reject efforts of the Communist Party or any other parties and their adherents to interfere in the affairs of the C. I. O."

Similarly, the left, to use an arbitrary designation, has had to swallow changes in the rules governing C. I. O. industrial councils, which will find it all but impossible in the future to indorse, or to vote contributions to, such "front" institutions as the Win-the-Peace Congress. The activities of the councils will henceforth be subjected to close and persistent scrutiny by the top layer of C. I. O. officialdom. And finally, I have reason to believe that the C. I. O.'s Political Action Committee will soon undergo a drastic pruning of the budget, with a number of its leading left-wingers deliberately selected for forced retirement. If the National Citizens' Political Action Committee, which is slated to merge with the Independent Citizens' Committee for the Arts and Sciences, does not change its name, C. I. O.-P. A. C. will in all likelihood move its headquarters away from New York.

These are sizable gains for the anti-Communist forces in the C. I. O., and their leading figures are solidly in agreement that the resolution can be made a powerful weapon in combating party influence on the local level. It is not as strong a statement as they would like to have brought forth, but it will clearly make anti-communism, though not witch-hunting, respectable in trade-union circles.

While a number of right-wing delegates felt let down by the mildness of the resolution and neutral observers gasped at the spectacle of known Communists voting to resent their own interference, Mr. Murray clearly felt that he had bestowed more than enough blessings with his right hand and proceeded from that point on to employ only his left. His chief opportunity came with the election of the nine C. I. O. vice-presidents. Normally this is a mechanical matter, with nine predetermined nominations, unanimous voting, and a general rush for the station. But this time there were complications.

It was a foregone conclusion that Walter Reuther, who was elected president of the United Automobile Workers after the last C. I. O. convention, would be given the vice-presidency held by his predecessor and embittered rival, R. J. Thomas. At the same time Reid Robinson, president of the Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers and, like Thomas, a favored son of the left, was doomed to go —not for political reasons but because he had tried to borrow $5,000 from an employer in the industry with which he was engaged in bargaining. If Murray really wanted to make the convention a leftist rout, he need not have lifted a finger. Reuther would have replaced Thomas, and Robinson's place have gone to O. A. Knight, the middle-of-the-road president of the Oil Workers' Union.

Whatever his reasoning, Murray chose not to let the convention take this course. At the zero hour the hitherto disconsolate left-wingers came up with a formula that was bound to appeal both to his passion for compromise and his sense of personal loyalty. They agreed to withdraw Robinson and to vote for Reuther—neither of which they could really avoid doing—if the other vice-presidency went, not to Knight, but to R. J. Thomas. The effect would be twofold: the left would lose only one vice-president instead of two, and Reuther's elevation would be offset in an unprecedented way by the equal honor accorded to a subordinate officer of his own union.

Murray not only found this arrangement satisfactory but crushed all resistance to it by threatening to support Thomas against Reuther if a choice were forced on the floor of the convention. With U. A. W. left-winger George Addes also a member, Reuther now finds himself outvoted by his own union colleagues on the C. I. O. executive board, while back home his effort to consolidate his position as president will hardly be helped by Murray's open indorsement of his rival.

Murray's handling of this episode painfully illustrates what appears to be a premature hardening of the C. I. O.'s institutional arteries. Except for George Baldanzi's courageous but brief flare-up in the last hour of the convention, debate has been kept off the floor with an angry determination that recalls only the tradition of the United Mine Workers. On one occasion Murray practically forbade debate, "because that has already been taken care of in the course of three days' discussion" in the executive board, and asked instead for "a rising vote of thanks" to the board. He got it—but not willingly. One thing that distinguishes this convention from A. F. of L. conventions is that many C. I. O delegates still have the spirit to resent this curious approach to trade-union democracy.

In any estimate of the left-right struggle in the C. I. O. the Reuther-Thomas election must be weighed against the anti-Communist resolution and the change in rules governing industrial councils. My own belief is that a net gain has been registered by the anti-Communist forces, which for the first time have brought concerted pressure on the semi-receptive Mr. Murray. But the real story of this convention will be apparent only after the delegates have returned home and demonstrated the extent to which they mean to implement the anti-Communist resolution in their respective locals.

Showdown on Lewis

BY JAMES A. WECHSLER

Washington, November 24

IF JOHN L. LEWIS is beaten he will drag labor's house down with him. That is the only certainty in the coal drama on the eve of the courtroom scenes. But it may also be the major clue to the outcome. For there is still grave doubt whether this Administration is prepared for the kind of atomic war against unionism required to crush the United Mine Workers. Nor is it clear that the Republican majority has achieved real unity of purpose in the business of anti-labor legislation. Lewis may be forced into momentary retreat, he may suffer indignities and even drastic legal reprisals pending appeal to the Supreme Court, he may provoke a Congressional rampage against labor; as the struggle wears on, the miners may endure payless weeks, the nation may grow cold, dark, and irrational. But the miners' president, whose gaze has been fixed on the history books for a good many years, has new assurance of immortality. He has triumphed over his bitterest labor enemies, compelling them to rally to the miners' cause. He has stolen the national and labor shows. He has reasserted his power to paralyze, frighten, and confuse the country for the eighth time in five years. At sixty-six these are the compensations that feed the Lewis ego.

The only defeat that would hurt John L. Lewis would be the destruction of the union dynasty which is his life's work. Crippling financial penalties—in the Danbury Hatters tradition—legislation outlawing the closed shop and the union welfare fund, and other measures repealing hard-won labor gains may conceivably emerge from this tragic war. But the Administration is inhibited by a guilty conscience and a respect for some liberal virtues. It is spiritually divided, looking for a way out. Neither the President nor most of the men directing day-to-day activity in the case are union-busters. You can find no long-range battle plan here.

Proposals to try to starve out the miners by suspending credit at the company stores have so far been vetoed; there is considerable opposition to the idea of imprisoning Lewis. Much of the Administration's strategy is being improvised from day to day. I suspect that Lewis is similarly playing this one by ear. In such a setting, of course, anything can happen; as bitterness deepens, moves that are now looked upon with horror may seem like routine acts of war. But coal is involved as well as men. No homes have ever been warmed by heat emanating from Capitol Hill, and no living editorial writer has yet produced a chunk of coal.

Labor is certain to reach new depths in middle-class popularity polls. But Lewis has always been impervious to that danger. Does big business prefer a long, costly war against unionism to production for profit in the here and now? There is probably far less unanimity on this point in business ranks than is generally imagined. As the days pass, that question may become the key to the settlement. Already one hears rumors of union peace feelers to the steel magnates who own the captive mines, and to individual operators.

On this bright Washington Sunday, with the President back at the White House, nearly all prophecies are futile. The impact of the strike is just beginning to be felt. Only as its consequences become clearer will the real decisions be made.

WHERE IT ALL BEGAN

The paradoxes in the conflict are grotesque and familiar. Once again the nation's most distinguished Republican labor leader becomes the cause célèbre in what the editorial writers describe as a test between law and anarchy. The Administration's stand against Lewis is deprived of a large measure of its economic justification by the total collapse of price controls; yet the Mine Workers' Journal crusaded against the OPA as cynically as any tory paper. On the other side of the fence, "Cap" Krug, generally credited with chief responsibility for the government's "tough" policy toward Lewis, is also remembered as the man who started the cycle of decontrol months ago when he scuttled "L-41," the order channeling building materials into low-cost housing. It was Krug, then directing the War Production Board, who also rejected a long succession of pleas from the War Labor Board for imposition of sanctions against employers defying WLB orders.

Amid all the contradictions on both sides of this dispute—to say nothing of the private operators, whose zeal for free enterprise is matched only by their recurrent belief in salvation by government—the crucial one is the record of Administration policy on price control. It both explains the sense of guilt in many government agencies and provides a moral basis for Lewis's revolt. Krug opened the gates when he terminated L-41; the President made disaster inevitable when he capitulated to the steel industry last winter in its fight for price increases. Chester Bowles and others told Truman what that action foreshadowed. Their prophecies were borne out. Industry got the signal for a concerted assault on a tottering price structure, and the Administration never recaptured the initiative.

Some government apologists now explain that the ultimate decontrol decision reflects a popular mandate. But the fact is that the government lost popular support for price regulation only because the fight was half-heartedly and belatedly carried to the people and was sabotaged behind the lines by Civilian Production Administrator Small and other Truman associates who appreciate a friendly smile from big business.

Then came Lewis.

In May, after the government's seizure of the mines ended the spring strike, Krug signed an agreement with the U. M. W. which the union organ characterized as the most important achievement in the miners' annals. It established the long-debated welfare fund as well as other major advances. Interior Department officials now contend there was no idea at that time that the government would stay in the coal-mining business for any long period. The agreement would remain in force until the operators and Lewis sat down and worked out the terms of a peace settlement. If this was what they expected, it was a wishful thought. The operators were still divided, backward, and astigmatic. Ex-Senator Burke, who represents the Southern coal bloc, was in no mood to accept the changes registered in the Krug-Lewis pact. The government stayed in the coal business.

While it is easy to exercise retroactive wisdom, there is reason to believe that failure to return the mines was a blunder. Krug, however, is said to feel that sudden abandonment of the mines would merely have precipitated a strike, forcing another government seizure; and that the merry-go-round would have creaked to the same end.

In any case, the Administration errors that occurred between October 22 and Election Day cannot be explained away. On October 21 Lewis suddenly and ominously served notice that he proposed to "renegotiate" the Krug contract on November 1. He cited impending changes in the government wage policy, charged violation of the existing accord, and invoked the ten-day reopening clause, which, the U. M. W. contended, still carried over from the previous company-U. M. W. agreement. Krug's attorneys held that a clause in the government-signed accord stating explicitly that the agreement was to remain in force for the period of government possession superseded the earlier point; they held that Lewis could not unilaterally abrogate the pact.

While lawyers wrangled, politicians assumed command. Election Day was approaching; the White House decided that a coal strike had to be avoided at virtually any cost. The precise nature of the assurances given Lewis—whether by Dr. John Steelman or some other White House medicine-man—is not known. But the President himself announced flatly that there would be no coal strike. A flurry of inspired stories indicated that the truculent Krug was out of the picture and that Steelman, who had done business with Lewis in the past, was in charge. It has even been suggested that the dismissal of O. John Rogge, who had started roaming around the country delivering speeches on Lewis's curious pre-war connections with the oil magnate, William Rhodes Davis, was partly designed to keep the miners' leader from stirring up trouble on the eve of the election. Lewis remained silent, letting some of his henchmen go through the motions of conferences with Krug's subordinates. The meetings were futile. In West Virginia the district leaders of the union continued to snipe at Senator Harley Kilgore, a White House favorite. But there was no strike. The Adminstration took its Election Day beating in a setting of industrial tranquillity.

Then the Administration's personality changed. The amiable Dr. Jekylls who had persuaded Lewis that patience would bring its rewards became violent Mr. Hydes roaring for his scalp—or at least trying to pretend that was their mood. Krug, whose stand at least had the merit of consistency, was restored to eminence. By that time, however, Lewis had good reason to believe that if the Krug method failed, the Administration would once more become a house divided. Krug's proposal for a sixty-day truce to permit negotiations between the miners and the operators was vulnerable. Anyway, by the time the truce expired, Congress would be in session; Lewis could hardly fail to read significance into the time-table. At the Interior Department officials assert they had received solemn assurances from Burke that he would bargain "in good faith." Lewis's skepticism on this point does not seem exaggerated. The Krug formula offered Lewis no assurance that even the gains of last May would be preserved.

Admittedly it is questionable whether any steps short of total surrender could have averted a strike. Men who have known Lewis long feel that the timing of the strike —to coincide with the C. I. O. convention at Atlantic City—was no accident. Virtually the same drama was enacted in 1941 when Philip Murray was presiding over a C. I. O. convention for the first time and Lewis blanketed the proceedings with the captive-mine strike. Lewis is still playing for big labor stakes.

THE PRESIDENT SAYS NO

Few men here pretend that the contract-termination issue involved in Lewis's clash with Krug is the heart of this dispute. Lawyers differ on the merits; in any event the potential cost of a prolonged strike would have overshadowed the most momentous legal quibble. The President's final decision was dictated by simple, instinctive, and unprofound emotions. Like most decent Americans who believe in trade unionism, he was weary of "showdowns" with Lewis, weary of being pushed around, by others as well as Lewis, convinced that capitulation now would mean a new crisis within six months. Indeed, the reasons for standing up to "Big John" were strong and plausible once the elections were over.

The decision was finally reached at a White House conference on November 13 at which Krug and Clark Clifford, the President's legal aide, argued for resistance. Steelman dissented. As far as anybody can determine, Secretary of Labor Schwellenbach was not asked for an opinion. There is, however, no indication that Schwellenbach fought for the privilege of taking on Lewis in mortal combat. Two days later the White House released Truman's letter to Lewis. The answer came swiftly; the contract would be terminated on November 20.

The President's subsequent deep-sea diving in Florida waters is easily subject to caricature, as is his handling of many aspects of the conflict. Yet it is infinitely simpler to write about Lewis than to negotiate with him; and to project long-range solutions for the coal industry than to find ways of dealing with its day-to-day problems. Nationalization is still the only cure for the sickness of coal that makes any sense. But it is obviously not the way out of the present deadlock, with Republican Lewis opposing the project as firmly as Democrat Burke. I have some doubt, too, whether the most flagrant example of labor totalitarianism—the U. M. W.—affords a solid bulwark for an experiment in democratic socialization.

TRIUMPH OF SHOWMANSHIP

There is a sad magnificence about Lewis's performance, despite the backwardness of his economic thinking, the arrogance of his demeanor, the monolithic rigidity of his union. His arrivals and departures have again become theatrical events, and he rarely falls on his face. The stage is his own once more; from it he imparts the sense that his enemies are Lilliputians and that he is the personification of justice. There are moments when the play becomes so completely the thing that the dimensions of the struggle he has provoked seem almost unreal.

The government obtained its restraining order at 2 p. m. on Monday the eighteenth, after Attorney General Clark had filed a petition resurrecting the notorious doctrine of the Debs case. The deadline for compliance was midnight of the following Wednesday. For the next forty-eight hours there was almost pathetic hope in many places that Lewis would back down. Men recalled the precedent of 1919 when Lewis bowed to an injunction, proclaiming that he would not fight his government, "the greatest government on earth." From Key West came word that Truman was resolutely fishing. There would be no appeasement, no peace gestures, no deals.

But in Atlantic City the C. I. O. was unhappily rallying in opposition to the injunction move. In Washington William Green protested against the government's course. Lewis must have found solace for long years of abuse and exile in the headlines Wednesday afternoon: "A. F. L., C. I. O. Back Lewis." Throughout the day the mine leader again cloaked his movements in mystery. Then, although the phalanx of reporters and photographers keeping an all-day vigil had never seen him enter the Mine Workers building, he emerged in late afternoon. He greeted the throng with a single word: "Gentlemen." Amid exploding flashlight bulbs and the familiar whirring of newsreel cameras, he strode to his limousine and drove off in the twilight.

He retired to his home in Alexandria for the evening, giving no final answer to the question that shadowed the Capital. As time wore on, his answer became painfully apparent. It was officially announced by the miners when they walked out at midnight.

He had nothing to gain by surrender, nothing to lose —at that stage—by defiance. Now it was the government's move again. Late on Thursday the show-cause order was issued after a long day of feverish activity. Lewis was still at home in Alexandria, his house surrounded by curious bystanders and exhausted journalists. He stayed inside, delaying his reappearance until Friday. By then the build-up was complete. John L. Lewis leaving his home in Alexandria was a front-page picture. So were the photographic records of Lewis entering his headquarters, Lewis strolling through the streets to the Carleton Hotel, with a parade of onlookers, reporters, and photographers behind him. In the Carleton lobby an elderly lady rushed up to him. Lewis swept off his black hat, bowed, and thanked her for her good wishes. The crowd was still pursuing him when he returned to his office after lunch, striding along like an aged matinee idol out for a constitutional.

As this is written, the stage is set for his courtroom appearance. Although unforeseen changes in the script may conceivably cancel the performance, people are already preparing to descend on the District Court in large numbers. Among government lawyers there is sharp dispute as to the validity of the injunction case. The surviving liberals here have diminishing enthusiasm for the project. "Injunction granted" sounds like a throwback to an earlier, uglier time.

Psychologically Lewis remains on the offensive, despite tough talk from "high Administration officials." Everybody knows that there must be a revision of wage scales in the next few months; they merely regret that Lewis is leading the procession. The more enlightened Administration members know that the behavior of Congress is unpredictable. At least one official remarked, "We may not like what Congress does any more than labor will." Meanwhile, all the familiar and remembered accompaniments of a coal crisis are repeated, like a faded newsreel —the conservation measures, the brown-outs, the freight reductions, the rumors.

As the play unfolds, one inevitably reverts to the earlier questions: Is this the showdown that some sections of industry and finance talked about over highballs during the long Roosevelt nightmare? Are the barons of big business more class conscious than the most orthodox Marxists, convinced of the inevitability of the great class struggle and eager to rush to the barricades? Are the coal operators the front-line troops in a labor-capital civil war? Is Lewis prepared for martyrdom as the climax of his career, leading the armies of labor into all-out savage conflict? At this moment no one here knows the answers, but the uncertainty indicates that a deal may still be made. There have been surprise endings to the Lewis plays before.

Wanted, a Bandwagon

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, November 22

CAPITOL HILL is comparatively quiet these windy days as the victorious Republicans beat the bushes in search of a bandwagon. It must be a special kind of bandwagon, one which will still look shiny and attractive two years from now.

In their conferences the G. O. P. Senators and Representatives have agreed at least on one point: their party was not swept into power by any program or policy or clever strategy. The election was simply the answer to the poster "Had Enough? Vote Republican." This same slogan could conceivably be borrowed by the Democrats in 1948, and the Republicans are only too unhappily aware of it. They must find some way of holding all the dissatisfied groups, which include Jewish, Catholic, and Negro voters, labor, farmers, veterans, small business men. Meanwhile, the G. O. P. has borrowed and adapted to its own uses two rather fashionable devices—the iron curtain and the John L. Lewis "wait-and-see" approach.

The man who first saw and understood the G. O. P. dilemma is Senator Taft. He listened to the clamor of confused voices from the Hill and then lectured his colleagues behind closed doors about two things. First, they should restrain their impulses to issue statements and hold press conferences; and, second, they were warned, for God's sake, not to commit the party to a definite program this early in the game. Conditions might arise which would make it impossible to save nine billion dollars or cut taxes 20 per cent across the board. That would make the Republicans look silly.

The leaders have tried to hush up the intra-party conflicts. The big fight over Taft's candidacy for floor leader was carefully squelched on the advice of Taft himself. Taft will divide the G. O. P. direction with Wherry, the majority whip. Taft will concoct the strategy, and Wherry will drive his forces into action. The guarded truce between the two will continue.

One fire the Republican command has not put out is that started by the conservatives to keep Senator Aiken of Vermont out of a key committee chairmanship, and the refusal of the spunky, white-haired liberal to take this lying down. Aiken is in line for either the Agriculture or the Labor Committee leadership, but the dominant conservative group would prefer to let him languish as chairman of the Committee on Pensions. Taft may take the Labor Committee for himself largely because he realizes that labor legislation is one of the trickiest issues his party will have to face.

This morning there was an outbreak of statements from Republicans—and from Democrats—urging President Truman to call a special session of Congress to enact labor legislation. But none of the real G. O. P. strategists entered the lists. Representative Clare Hoffman and Senator Joe Ball have become the two most outraged anti-labor figures on the Republican side of the aisle. Another voice was that of Representative Clarence Brown, who is actively campaigning for House majority leader. His opponent, Charles Halleck, answered coldly that he might recall that Congress last session wanted to pass the Case bill, which Halleck wrote, and was blocked by the President.

Halleck, who roughly corresponds to Senator Taft in the House, does not want a special session of Congress. The Republicans just don't want to be put on the spot so soon. They would much prefer to have Harry Truman be a public target for sixty days more. If he can manage to sour labor on the Democrats once and for all, so much the better.

The Democrats have not even begun to lift a bloody head from the election returns. The President is one of the few members of his party who take a cheerful view of the country. Mr. Truman is relieved by the election and a decision he has made—not to run in 1948. He feels that he is freed of much responsibility and all political pressures and can do as he wants to. This was indicated last week-end when the Administration decided to get tough with John L. Lewis, completely reversing its previous stand. Dr. Steelman, who was inclined to play ball with Lewis, was shoved aside. (Perhaps he is being saved for a rainy day.) The man who guided Mr. Truman's decision on coal was Clark Clifford, the aggressive and clever St. Louis lawyer who wrote the so-called Truman labor bill last spring and the President's speech denouncing A. F. Whitney. Truman and Clifford went even farther than Secretary of the Interior Krug, who only wanted to show John Lewis that he couldn't loud-talk the government into reopening the contract.

The President, in common with many small-town politicians and business men, feels personally irritated by "big business" and "big labor." While for a time this spring he was fascinated by the dramatics of John Lewis, he is now angry at him and has given the signal to go after him hammer and tongs and throw him in jail if necessary. The President, however, has a history of retreating under pressure, and if the country suddenly decides three weeks from now that it wants coal more than it wants Lewis's head, Harry Truman may become convinced that is what he wants, too.

Right Face in Japan

BY HAROLD STRAUSS

AN INNATE desire for collectivist solutions never lies very far below the surface in Japan. People of all classes now believe that in a country so devoid of natural resources considerable socialization is the sole alternative to a resumption of the old imperialist drive for export markets. Even the owners of industry, fearing unlimited competition for severely limited raw materials, for a time supported the nationalization of basic industries. Socialism, it is thought, will be able to strive for a maximum importation of raw materials rather than money profit, and for a higher standard of living for the people.

HAROLD STRAUSS is chief editor of Alfred A. Knopf, Inc. This is the last of three articles on Japan based on information he gathered as a member of the Civil Information and Education Section of SCAP.

At first the Supreme Commander's staff (SCAP) tolerated this view. But suddenly, about May 20, 1946, the complexion of occupation policy was changed. MacArthur denounced the relatively mild hunger demonstrations before the Imperial Palace, even though he had been directed to permit the people to overthrow their old rulers by force if they so chose; a security blackout was clamped down on GHQ; war-time hush-hush was revived. Routine reports were classified as secret, and if they so much as mentioned socialism, communism, or leftist political tendencies among the Japanese, they were suppressed by "a command decision based on the delicate nature of the existing situation." Even more formidable was the barrier erected against our Allies: Dutch, British, and Russian routine requests for information were turned down on the pretext of lack of personnel. In the last week of October all SCAP "conferences," including those with Japanese, were classified as secret, and American newsmen were limited to the use of official hand-outs.

Simultaneously, American personnel was drastically purged. Individuals were haled before the G-2 chief, General Willoughby, and asked whether they were Communists. Reserve officers who had months to serve under the War Department's discharge plan were suddenly ordered home, to their own joy. Civilian employees had to be eased out by more devious methods. Before this happened, SCAP personnel had been broadly representative of all shades of American political opinion. But the replacements were to a large extent either experts "borrowed" from the National City Bank, the big silk companies, and other business concerns with a heavy stake in Japan or young pirates of whom the Wall Street Journal wrote, "Military government is rapidly becoming a training ground for Americans who plan to go into business in Japan." By July the number of paunchy, sack-suited, panama-hatted executive types in their middle fifties whom one met in downtown Tokyo gave one the illusion that the local branch of the United States Chamber of Commerce was in session. British, Dutch, and Chinese—not to mention Russian—trade representatives were noticeably absent. Such is "equality of economic opportunity" in action.

RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA

About this time SCAP ceased to issue directives of any importance, for the reason that all directives must be debated before the Allied Council for Japan, where they are subject to criticism by General Derevyanko and the brilliant British representative, J. MacMahon Ball, both of whom wield an educative influence on Japanese public opinion even though they are powerless to alter SCAP policy. This influence is so strong that the reactionary Burton Crane, in his dispatches to the New York Times, has begun an underhanded campaign to have Mr. Ball replaced. Instead of issuing formal directives, staff officers now merely intimate the Supreme Commander's desires to conservative Japanese officials.

In July, in the course of an attack on a Soviet twenty-two-point proposal for a new labor policy, bumbling George Atcheson, Jr., made his now-famous anti-Communist statement. When Mr. Ball insisted that the Soviet proposal was "designed for the good of the people" and denied that it contained "any signs of Communist propaganda," Mr. Atcheson was forced to admit that he had expressed only his personal opinion; but the damage was already done. Like clockwork a Diet member denounced Communists in the trade unions, and Welfare Minister Kawai replied that although the government cannot exclude Communists because it is not allowed to control the unions, "the views of Mr. Atcheson will be respected." He added that he was optimistic about the economic future because "the imminent growth of unemployment would increase the industrial reserve army and automatically check the outbreak of labor disputes."

In scores of lesser matters the tide of reaction was evident. The sudden conservatism of SCAP-controlled Japanese newscasts after May 22 was widely remarked. The Japanese press, which had been well to the left of the public, took note of SCAP-inspired tokens and portents and veered obediently to the right. The case of Yomiuri was notable. The liberal editorial committee which had taken over the management of the newspaper from Matsutaro Shoriki, now awaiting trial as a war criminal, was in turn forced out by SCAP on the pretext that Allied press control hinged on "responsible ownership." The tightly organized employees struck for the reinstatement of the committee. To our shame and to the irreparable damage of the people's opinion of the occupation, Tomin Suzuki, the chief of the committee and one of the most brilliant writers in Japan, was brought before a mediation meeting arranged by SCAP in handcuffs and chains, with the bruises and cuts of obvious police brutality evident on his head and face. Responsibility did not lie with SCAP's Labor Division, whose able chief, Theodore Cohen, scathingly reprimanded the police officials; it lay with those SCAP agencies whose actions suggested to the police that their old anti-union methods were once again in order.

LABOR AND PRICE CONTROL

SCAP's entire labor policy, which had previously transmuted 300,000 house-broken company unionists into more than 3,000,000 militant and well-organized workers, was on the verge of collapse. On four occasions between June and September MacArthur cracked down on strikes and demonstrations. As a protest signed by a number of unions put it, "We cannot but feel that GHQ is supporting the suppression of the right to hold public meetings and the right to strike." Without changing the letter of any directive, labor policy was so effectively reversed that on October 9 Old Japan Hand Burton Crane, representative of a group of Americans in Tokyo who would like to see restored the feudal conditions which worked to their personal advantage before the war, was able to cable the New York Times, "Government circles are beginning to feel that General MacArthur is not really opposed to their taking steps to check improper union action." Charges by Socialist members of the Diet that the government is supporting the capitalists in labor disputes are now a frequent occurrence. The morale of labor is shaken.

Nor is the SCAP-inspired reactionary tone of government policy confined to labor questions. The appointed Shidehara interim government had inaugurated in February a strong deflation and price-control policy which would have worked if it had been backed by a vigorous drive to restore production. But the conservative Yoshida government which was installed in May, after the election, appointed an avowed inflationist, Tanzan Ishibashi, as its Finance Minister. On May 4 Mr. Ishibashi, in a shrewd political bid for the appointment, had proposed to relax the key controls over corporate finances. After his appointment he said he would follow a policy of "reflation," a word which certainly has no meaning when the starting point is inflation. He showed his true colors on October 22, when without relaxing the stringent controls on consumer incomes he permitted the official retail price for rice to rise to 90 yen a bushel. On August 9 he had said that "the way to stabilize prices is to stabilize business first"; that is, business is to have everything it wants in order to obtain increased production, and let the consumer look out for himself.

This is not just the Japanese equivalent of the destruction of the OPA by reactionaries; it actually paves the way for the recovery of the industrial tycoons, the Zaibatsu, whom we are pledged to destroy. For although their top holding companies have been strait-jacketed by SCAP, as individuals and through dummies they are free to speculate in stocks of raw materials, which sometimes change hands three times a day, and in industrial properties. This is exactly the method whereby the Krupps recouped their fortunes in Germany after the last war. A true deflationary policy would have pushed the Zaibatsu, who are greatly hampered by the huge indebtedness they were forced to assume in order to finance war production, into bankruptcy in law as well as in fact; and this in turn would have facilitated the redistribution of their industrial empires along desirable lines. Ishibashi's inflationary policy, however, is rapidly increasing the value of their assets in proportion to their debts and enabling them to escape bankruptcy. Thus even though technical liquidation of the eleven largest Zaibatsu trusts is being forced—slowly—by SCAP, the old Zaibatsu families will accumulate an enormous kitty in cash or cash equivalents which can be put to work after ten years. Furthermore, the war profiteers, who were much more closely connected with Japan's militarists than the well-publicized Mitsuis and Mitsubishis, are untouched by SCAP directives. It would be interesting to learn why the investigation of a contractor named Ando, a "new Zaibatsu," who was alleged to have bought his way into SCAP favor, was labeled top secret and suppressed.

Another key Japanese who has a hand in making economic policy is a ridiculous little man by the name of Keinosuke Zen. His job, exceedingly difficult under the circumstances, is to do nothing. On paper, as chairman of the Economic Stabilization Board, he has complete and dictatorial powers over Japan's economy. He was appointed in May by the Yoshida Cabinet in order to suggest to the people that the previous Cabinet's policy of inaction would be reversed. But Zen has proved to be a master at stalling. First he proclaimed himself merely a go-between; then he blocked the appointment of the other members of the board; and finally he announced that he could not act until certain bills—introduced into the Diet only on October 11—had been passed. Meanwhile he passed his time writing enlightening articles for popular magazines which explained that under socialism a farmer would have to share his cow and his wife, and that common laborers and trained technicians would receive the same daily wage. Mr. Zen appears to be in the good graces of SCAP.

MACARTHUR AND THE ELECTIONS

Some American progressives feel that this trend is due principally to MacArthur's engineering of a general election at an early date, before the parties suppressed by the militarists had a chance to reorganize their machinery. MacArthur's action, in turn, they attribute to his innate reactionary disposition. Their analysis overlooks the dramatic purging of Hatoyama, the man slated to head the conservative government, at a time calculated to give maximum assistance to the Socialists, and shows a misunderstanding of the political situation in Japan. The people, always amenable to authority and already beginning to worship MacArthur, were reluctant to organize any opposition to the appointed Shidehara government, which appeared to have SCAP backing. In order to help the people acquire a rudimentary sense of political responsibility, it was imperative to instal an elected government, no matter how reactionary, at the earliest moment. The people had to learn that they had only themselves to blame for the inadequacies of their government.

It was clear that a conservative government would be returned, for the spirit of feudalism is deeply ingrained in the numerically dominant rural prefectures. But it was also clear that any party coming to power would soon fall into disrepute with the electorate. The problems of food, shelter, clothing, and inflation cannot be solved within the time limits imposed by popular patience, and any party empowered in 1946 will be thrown out in 1947.

The conservative parties knew this all too well. Criticism of MacArthur runs afoul the fact that these parties during six long weeks in April and May tried to evade the responsibility of forming a conservative government and even tried to entice the Social Democrats into a coalition. They thereby intended to play upon the feudal instincts of the Japanese, who like the seeming unanimity of the "family-council" method of decision and habitually strive to avoid open parliamentary debates. The Socialists hung for weeks on the verge of consent. Had they accepted, there would have been no parliamentary opposition, decisions would have appeared to be as unopposed, "unanimous," and authoritarian as formerly, and the people would have learned nothing of democratic methods. The present upsurge of political consciousness, attested by the wave of political strikes, would have been circumvented. When the Socialists decided to go into opposition, MacArthur issued a statement specifically praising this move as a major step toward democracy. It was the last progressive action taken by SCAP.

The Yoshida government has failed miserably, in spite of the alleviation of the people's lot by the good luck of a bumper rice crop and a benevolent attitude on the part of SCAP toward imports. Since its political weakness is already manifest, the real test of SCAP intentions will come early in 1947. There is much talk that, following anticipated gains by the Socialists in local elections, a new national election will be held then. If SCAP maneuvers to prop up the Yoshida government and to put off the elections in the name of "order," the degradation of occupation policy will be finally demonstrated.

PARTIAL SOCIALIZATION ESSENTIAL

SCAP's thin defense, of course, will be the international situation. But though it may try to justify its anti-red moves on the ground of short-term strategy, any opposition to moderate socialism in Japan can lead only to disaster. Japanese industrialists themselves have testified that in default of the tightest sort of planning, government controls, and bilateral trade agreements, the scarcity of raw materials and other pressures will soon strangle free competition. Free trade is an impossibility in Japan. And using the antics of the Russians as a pretext to avoid rationalizing the Japanese economy is stupidity of the first order.

We have three possible choices: the present expensive policy of maintaining the Japanese as our wards and supplying them with whatever raw materials they need—a policy which has led to alarmed Chinese forecasts that Japan will become the greatest manufacturing and trading nation in Asia, as well as a military bulwark against the Soviet Union; the Byrnes policy of free economic opportunity, which will lead straight back to the struggle for export markets out of which the war arose; and a policy of fostering a planned, partially socialized economy which will seek to raise the standard of living of the Japanese people and eliminate imperialistic pressures.

The American Political Scene

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

III. The Return to Reaction

London, November 10

IT HARDLY required the great Republican victory in the recent election to convey to an observer of American politics that the Roosevelt epoch had closed, and closed, in T. S. Eliot's classic phrase, "not with a bang, but a whimper." The liberals left Washington after Mr. Truman was in office, first by twos and threes, then in droves. The "raucous voices" in both parties made themselves heard with a vigor and self-confidence they had not dared to display since the great depression. There was a new wave of anti-Negro feeling in the South. There was obviously a new incentive for the crude purveyors of anti-Semitism; Gerald L. K. Smith and his like had begun, very clearly, to feel that a fresh opportunity had come their way. The men who had founded the old Liberty League began to renew their contacts with one another. The National Association of Manufacturers issued propaganda obviously built upon the assumption that the initiative was returning to their hands.

There are, I think, three outstanding ideas which dominate the American social consciousness at the moment. The first is the conviction that America is in a position virtually to dictate the policy of the world. That is born partly of the natural exuberance brought by victory and the knowledge that American productive capacity was so large a factor in the common triumph, and partly of the knowledge of America's unequaled technological skill in an age when such skill is the key to economic advance. Partly, again, it is the result of the pretty plain fact that the swift recovery of other nations from the war depends upon American aid; without this aid the very existence of European civilization is insecure. The profound conviction that the center of world destiny is now in the United States finds symbolic recognition in the decision to place the headquarters of the U. N. there.

At long last America is really free from dependence on Europe. This has sharpened the nationalism of a people which has always suffered from a feeling of inferiority to Europe. Freedom from that inferiority gives a widespread sense of an indispensable authority it is no longer possible to challenge. And that sense is deepened, if a little uneasily, by the fact that the American government is the sole possessor of the atomic bomb. Hiroshima and Nagasaki hardly made a greater impression on Tokyo than they have made in Washington.

BUSINESS TAKES CHARGE

A self-confident nationalism is, then, the first great feature in the contemporary pattern of American thought. The second is a willingness to go back on a good deal of the Roosevelt experiment and try once more what the business men can do with a largely uncontrolled economy. Whether this reaction would have occurred if President Truman and his supporters had decided to defend the Roosevelt heritage it is difficult to say. But they abandoned it at the outset by liquidating the rationing system almost immediately after the defeat of Japan. Once they made the choice, the Democratic Party ceased to have either an attitude or a policy by which it could be distinguished from the Republican; it was easy therefore for the voter to throw his weight on the side of the party to which Mr. Roosevelt and all his works had been anathema.

In abandoning the Roosevelt heritage Mr. Truman made the shaping of the post-war economic policy of America the concern of business and not of Congress. The business view was the simple one that the more unimpeded was the mechanism of the market the greater would be the national prosperity, and, as usual, that labor's share of well-being would be properly decided by the play of supply and demand in the market. Hence the hostility to the Kilgore bill; hence also the enthusiasm, to which Senator Taft has given such frequent expression, for amendment of the Wagner act. But dependence upon a market economy in a period when demand was immense and supply necessarily small brought about a wave of strikes which had the twofold result of breeding hostility to the labor unions among large sections of the public and arresting the process of reconversion, thereby continuing the irritation of short supplies. Far too few Americans have realized the speed and the depth of Mr. Truman's abandonment of a controlled economy. They attribute to control the ills and inconveniences which are actually the outcome of the policy so long preached by the Republican Party, the authentic guardian of the business interests. With the Republicans dominating both houses of Congress, and with a President who now, on economic matters, has no effective difference with the Republicans, the business man is, in fact, reinvested with the authority that he lost in 1932. And he has also a renewed faith that it ought broadly to be used for what is so curiously called "free enterprise." Economically, business will seek ways and means of returning as rapidly as it can to as much as can be found of the climate of 1929. Mr. Hoover, so to say, is back in power.

VANDENBERG OVER BYRNES

The third outstanding feature of the political landscape is the character of American foreign policy. Though this is a joint affair of the two parties, in its continuing definition Senator Vandenberg will now count for more than Mr. Byrnes, for through his chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations he will dominate the process of ratifying the results of negotiation. Mr. Byrnes, to put it bluntly, must agree with Senator Vandenberg or find himself reduced to futility. American foreign policy will therefore continue to be anti-Russian in its major inspiration. It will refrain from assisting all governments which it believes to be within the orbit of Russian influence, as in its recent rebuff to Czechoslovakia over a loan. It will be hostile to any move, such as Mr. Bevin recently proposed, to socialize the key German industries. Even though the fact is inescapable that no viable German democracy is possible without that socialization, America will resist it with all its influence, political and economic alike. The dualistic policy in China will continue until the failure of General Marshall's mission can no longer be denied; at that stage all America's support will be thrown to General Chiang Kai-shek, which will mean keeping China divided and maintaining in power, partly on doctrinal and partly on commercial grounds, the corrupt and reactionary elements of the Kuomintang. I fear that a policy of deliberate abstention from action against General Franco will prevail; 1948 is too near for either party to risk the loss of the Roman Catholic vote.

Moreover, it will be increasingly difficult, I suggest, to persuade the American government to active economic cooperation on an international basis. For all practical purposes, it has already torpedoed the promising and imaginative scheme by which Sir John Boyd Orr proposed to safeguard the future against famine. It has restored free competition, with its grave potentialities for disaster, in the realm of food purchases by foreign nations in America. In the International Trade Conference all its emphasis has been on free access to markets, whereas other members have stressed need for full employment. And its own attitude to bases for strategic purposes stands in significant contrast to its suspicion of the Russian search for security and its urging that other nations put their colonies under the direction of the Trusteeship Council of the U. N.

It is difficult to survey the prospect for the next two years in America without concluding that there will be either the virtual paralysis of government or a de facto coalition government in which the Republican Party will be the senior partner. The consequence of the turn Mr. Truman gave to events is therefore to enthrone conservatism in office. What he has done, in practice, is to expel the liberal elements in the Democratic Party from any share in authority. They can only hope to stage a return to influence if a serious catastrophe occurs. That is not outside the range of possibility, since the danger of inflation is very real. And if there is inflation, neither Mr. Truman nor the Republicans have any sort of coherent policy to deal with its consequences at home, much less abroad. No doubt there would be frenzied improvisations to meet any domestic crisis, but it is difficult to believe that the politicians now in office would feel that the foreign repercussions of such a crisis were America's concern. Here, at least, they may well invoke the unhappy precedent established by Mr. Roosevelt when he wrecked the World Economic Conference in 1933.

CONSERVATISM IN THE SADDLE

Conservatism is firmly in power in the United States at a time when the rest of the world is overwhelmingly moving leftward. It is all too clear that those in authority in Washington view with dislike, even with alarm, this leftward trend. That was made evident when so representative a figure in American big business as Bernard Baruch warned his fellow-citizens against any financial support for socialist experiments in Great Britain. It is clear, again, in the absence of any deep feeling in America at the outcome of British policy in Greece. It is manifested in the MacArthur policy in Japan, which has not only made the occupation of Japan virtually an American monopoly, but has been careful to develop constitutionalism there as a political form with, as yet, few if any signs of economic substance behind it.

Whoever is being encouraged to look forward to effective authority in a future Japan, it is certainly not the common people. Not the least reason for the retention of the Emperor is that his very existence as a constitutional monarch screens off, as it were, the Japanese workers from any real hope of power in the foreseeable future. It is to the Japanese right and center, barring of course the ardent militarists, that General MacArthur has lent the weight of his support. The real battles for democracy in Japan will only begin when the American occupation has come to a close; and when that occurs, business Japan, stripped no doubt of most of its military potential, will be intrenched pretty firmly in power. To put it succinctly, Republican America is being matched by Republican Japan. The one has a beaten President; the other has a beaten Emperor. As much as possible, the occupation seeks to mold Japan in the pattern that a good Republican in Kansas or Michigan would approve.

Nor is it unimportant to watch the growing alliance between big business and the General Staff in Washington. That appears supremely, of course, in the economic relations built around the development of atomic energy. But it is inherent in the power of the Joint Chiefs of Staffs, headed by the very reactionary Admiral Leahy, to by-pass, with the consent of the President, the civilian Secretaries to whom each of them was previously subordinate. In matters of vital secrecy I suspect this will mean that, with the consent of the Republican leadership, President Truman will give the Joint Chiefs of Staff their head, and there will be less of public discussion of their most urgent activities than has ever happened before in peace time. And since all these activities require pretty close liaison with steel and chemicals and oil and the like, but not, very notably, with labor, a relationship for the future will be built which is bound to have repercussions far outside the area of international affairs and of security from military aggression. That is an important portent. The alliance of the armed forces and big business makes it difficult to strengthen the liberal element now in any country.

Caricature by Seligson
Senator Vandenberg

It is, moreover, notable that all the key industrial states are now in Republican hands. That means an immense access of strength to business in the administrative implementation of its come-back. It means that the general pattern of state policy in economic matters will be set by influences which go directly back to the outlook of the N. A. M. On any showing, this is a grim position for the liberals; perhaps it is still more grim for the labor movement. For in the next two years both John L. Lewis and Philip Murray are going to find little willingness to meet their demands. All the would-be nominees for the Presidency in 1948 are going to vie with each other in insisting that militant labor be taught its place; and I doubt whether Mr. Truman has either the initiative or the imagination—even if he could get the support—to emerge as the champion of labor claims against a solid business phalanx that is in a position to wreck any effort he might make to recover the liberal heritage he so wantonly threw away after the Japanese defeat.

WAITING FOR 1952

I am not arguing that there is not plenty of real liberalism in America. I am arguing only that in the eighteen months since Franklin Roosevelt died it has lost the power of strategic initiative. It has to fight a costly rearguard action against an enemy which not only has won the first round of the battle but is supremely confident that the second is already in its hands. It has, further, to fight in the knowledge that the very men have deserted it for whom, in the next two years, it might have hoped to organize a fighting chance of victory. Historical analogies are dangerous things. But I see no reason to believe that Henry Wallace has any greater chance of mobilizing the liberal forces for a great battle than Woodrow Wilson had almost thirty years ago. The crucial date for a liberal revival is, on all the obvious chances, 1952; but the speed at which the shadows darken around us make waiting for 1952 a graver matter than waiting for 1932 was in 1920.

We are back at the Old Deal when circumstances have made its central principles almost painfully obsolete. I wish I could see more clearly how much chance there remains for American liberalism after men like Senator Vandenberg and Senator Taft have given their energies for the next years to applying those principles as a policy despite their obsolescence. American liberals would do well to gird up their loins. For it is something more than a fair guess that, if they have the courage, they may have to battle for a Lord who will stand for more than a mythology that has long ceased to edify. At least they must be acutely aware that a dead past sits triumphantly where, less than two years ago, the emerging future excited the hopes of the whole world.

India in Travail

BY SHIVA RAO

New Delhi, November 19

INDIA has lived through some months of unparalleled Hindu-Moslem conflict. First came the extensive riots in Calcutta in the middle of August, in which it is estimated 5,000 people were killed and about three times that number injured. The riots synchronized significantly with "Direct Action Day," observed by the Moslem League throughout India. The Hindu and Sikh retaliation during the late stages of the riots caused an unexpectedly large number of Moslem casualties.

The campaign of hatred and violence then spread to the remote districts of East Bengal, where the Hindus form a small minority of the population. For a week or more in the first half of October Moslem gangsters had the Hindus at their mercy. One cannot say how many were murdered, for it is easy to throw bodies into the rivers and canals of that waterlogged region. Estimates vary from the 200 or fewer reported by the British governor of Bengal to 5,000. Large numbers of Hindu women were "converted" and abducted after the murder of their husbands and sons.

These occurrences in Bengal drove the Hindus in other parts of India into a dangerous mood of despair, and nowhere was indignation stronger than in the neighboring province of Behar. Every year a considerable number of Behari workers go to Calcutta and Bengal for employment, and hundreds must have died during the August riots. Hardly a town or village in the province was unaffected. As Nehru explained last week in the course of a deeply impressive statement, the Beharis waited patiently for weeks in the hope that the higher Bengal government or the Central government—especially the latter since it contains the Congress Party leaders like Nehru—would do something. But nothing happened beyond the appointment of a commission of inquiry at Calcutta, which proceeded with an astonishing lack of vigor.

Other things are troubling India. Nearly a million men have been demobilized in the last twelvemonth, and only a small fraction of them have found work. These men—peasants in peace time—had better food and clothing during the war than they had ever known before. Some of them were found among the gangsters looting and raping in East Bengal. Having been recruited from all over India, these men are now scattered through the country.

The ministries functioning under the control of the Congress Party have held out the promise of almost immediate abolition of the "Zamindari" landlord system prevailing in various parts of India—a system which permits absentee landlords to extort vast incomes from a backward peasantry through the agency of unscrupulous middlemen. There is much talk of collective farming of peasant-owned land and of education, housing and medical relief, and other amenities. The peasant grasps little of this except that the landlords and petty village tyrants, whom he detests but has patiently endured, are doomed to disappear within an extremely short time.

The outstanding fact of the Indian situation is that the prestige of the governing classes has diminished almost to the vanishing point. Officials who have run the British administration of India for decades must terminate their contracts with the British in a few months. Probably the majority will prefer to retire rather than continue in the service under greatly altered conditions. These men's hearts are no longer in their work; they are packing up to leave India—literally or figuratively. Many of them have sent Nehru and thousands of his followers to prison more than once, and it is inconceivable that they could now conscientiously serve his government.

The problems of Nehru and his Cabinet are stupendous. They have undertaken the administration of India after six years of an exhausting war during which the country was run with an iron hand by the British Viceroy with the aid of the British civil and military services and such Indians as were willing to cooperate. Nowhere else in the world have the rebels of yesterday been called upon to assume charge of the government of their country and to run it with the instruments which have resisted them all these many years.

And this is not the whole picture. It was the Cabinet's and Nehru's declared belief that the substance of political power had passed into their hands and that the Viceroy's authority had correspondingly diminished to something like that of the Governor General of Australia or Canada. Before Nehru had time to consolidate his position, Lord Wavell hastened negotiations with Jinnah in order to bring the Moslem League into the Cabinet. The Viceroy assured Nehru that Jinnah would cooperate with the Congress leaders in both the Cabinet and the Constituent Assembly. Jinnah himself has kept out of Nehru's Cabinet, but he nominated five members on behalf of the Moslem League—one of them strangely not a Moslem but an untouchable from Bengal. From inside the Cabinet they have repudiated Jinnah's assurances conveyed through the Viceroy. They refuse to recognize Nehru as de facto Premier, maintaining that under the existing constitution the Viceroy is the real head of the government. They do not feel bound by the conventions which Nehru has been striving to establish. In fact, they don't consider it a coalition government at all, as Jinnah frankly revealed last week. The League's nominees joined the government, he said, as sentinels to watch over Moslem interests from the inside, since they could not afford to intrust the administration of the country to the Congress Party.

Jinnah wants absolute and immediate Pakistan, with an exchange of populations if necessary. Someone asked him what would happen in the country during the next six months if he did not succeed in achieving Pakistan. "You've seen what is happening and that will continue," he replied, unmoved by the ghastly events in Behar and Bengal.

Social, economic, and political unrest is rapidly increasing as a result of the stresses developed by the war and its aftermath, an administrative structure which is plainly unequal to dealing with this unrest, a government divided into two halves—Congress and the Moslem League—incapable of acting together because of their fundamentally different ideologies. Many are asking whether this strange experiment will last. The Viceroy has shown greater solicitude for the prestige of the provincial governors and of himself as Viceroy than for the welfare of the Indian masses. British labor may have decided to transfer power to the Indian people, but such a transfer must take place through the Viceroy, the governors, and the British civil and military servants—men who, with few exceptions, subscribe to Churchill's conception of the British Empire. Lord Wavell was Churchill's choice for the vice-royalty of India, made under dramatic circumstances at Washington on May 19, 1943.

The word sabotage has been used by the nationalist press here to describe the British imperialist attitude toward the Labor Cabinet's plans. Churchill is openly encouraging India's minority leaders to adopt a defiant policy. A formidable combination of vested interests is fighting with skill and without scruples to prevent the swift and peaceful transfer of political power — the landlords, the British privileged classes both official and commercial, some of the Indian princes, Moslems like Jinnah. Designing men are exploiting the social and economic unrest for their own unworthy ends. It is possible that India may be plunged into civil war despite the efforts of Gandhi and Nehru.

To prevent such a catastrophe the Labor Cabinet must send a new Viceroy, one more capable of translating its policy into concrete action than Lord Wavell, one more understanding of social democracy than a professional soldier can be. It is impossible to turn back at this stage. If British Labor wants to retain India's friendship, it must go forward rapidly and remove all those, however high placed they may be, who cannot accept its principles.

UNESCO Gets to Work

BY A. G. MEZERIK

NEARLY every day the papers I read and the radio I listen to feature the United Nations. I would have guessed, with all the coverage the U. N. has been getting, that only characters like Lil Abner and Lester Jeeter were unaware that the United States is a member of the United Nations. But Mr. Gallup's survey tell me I am wrong. Thirty per cent of Americans, it seems, almost one out of every three, do not know this country is part of that well-publicized world body.

Of course none of the 30 per cent are Nation readers. Nation readers, if polled, would know the answer to that one, but would they be just as well informed about UNESCO? I have conducted a private "man in the street, bar, office, and living-room survey," only to find that my best friends can't tell me what it is. Some announce that the synthetic word stands for United Nations Economic and Social Council—which it could but does not. My lowbrow drinking companions recognize it immediately as a competitor of Nabisco. Almost no one knows that this is UNESCO month, or that UNESCO is the international organization which is to undertake the staggering burden of teaching—not just telling—the world the aims of the U. N. and its specialized agencies. Indeed, it is much more than that—for UNESCO is designed to be the ideological arm with which the world builds peace, as the United Nations is its extremely shaky security arm. The United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization is a big mouthful, but if it is ever permitted to do its job, and turns out to be capable of doing it, there may really be peace on earth.

When the international exchange of scientific information is under discussion, as now with UNESCO, everybody is cordial and cooperative, but a glance at the record is discouraging. Julian Huxley, executive secretary of UNESCO, has been on an almost fruitless quest for international organizations with which his own could work. Among the engineers he found no worldwide group; the engineers have never been able to form and hold together an organization transcending national boundaries. Jealousy is often given as the reason, but look a little deeper and more sinister reasons appear. Engineering has long been the handmaiden of monopolies and large corporations, and engineers will tell you that in the desire of corporations to control trade secrets and processes lies the real reason for their lack of international organization.

Engineering has had military and strategic connections, too, and those may provide a corollary reason. The physicists working on the atomic bomb have felt the heavy hand of the military. Talk of worldwide exchange of information by scientists and engineers is indeed optimistic in the face of military demands for strict isolationist curbs. As science becomes of strategic significance, scientists are restrained by law, by economic pressure, and by appeals to patriotism from exchanging the results of their studies with scientists in other countries.

When the Nazis decided to use science as the keystone of their aggressive effort, they blacked out the right of German scientists to share their achievements with foreign specialists. This action was generally condemned, but the Allied victory has not changed the world picture for the better, and today all scientists who look beyond the confines of their own laboratories are greatly concerned about the future. They realize that science will not move forward without the benefit of communication across national borders and that if held tightly within national walls it will never help build the peace.

The idea of UNESCO dates back to the London meettings of the Allied Council of Ministers of Education during the war. These ministers saw that the rehabilitation of devastated educational institutions would be an international job and made plans for a permanent organization. But the idea could be implemented only by the new United Nations Organization. The U. N. thus came into the picture before its own charter had been signed. The preparatory group of UNESCO was invited to meet in San Francisco just before the United Nations meeting, and here UNESCO took form. Groups concerned with the arts and information were included with the educators, but the scientists, who felt the greatest urgency, had still no place in the proposed organization.

Joseph Needham, the eminent British scientist, had been for some time urging the establishment of an international body of scientists, with the goal of exchanging scientific data. Needham was stationed in China, doing work of great importance for that country's war effort and its future scientific development, but he came to San Francisco and made an eloquent case for scientific participation. He was ably supported by Harlow Shapley, the Harvard physicist. These two, with Julian Huxley, Henri Laugier, and others, carried the ball across the goal line. Archibald MacLeish, who was the leader of the United States delegation at the UNESCO meeting in San Francisco, took on the job of getting the name and the idea approved by Congress.

A. G. MEZERIK is the author of "The Revolt of the South and West."

UNESCO next moved to London. Last June it entered into a draft agreement with the United Nations which outlined its scope. Its first assembly is now being held in Paris.

UNESCO can include countries which are not members of the United Nations. The United States became formally a member on July 30, when President Truman signed a Congressional resolution authorizing its permanent participation. This step must be taken by at least twenty of the forty-one countries which signed originally, if UNESCO is to become permanent. Signatures have been dribbling in, slowed by diplomatic snafu, political exigencies, and translation difficulties.

The big job which UNESCO proposes to do falls into three divisions. In the field of the creative arts, the aim is to enable people in every part of the world to jump national barricades with their cultural contributions, for these are the tools for the understanding of national character. In science and learning, UNESCO will seek standardization of scientific symbols and techniques and precise translations from one language to another. The third part of UNESCO's task is to inaugurate practical measures to spread science and learning. One such job might be the preparation of scientific textbooks, usable everywhere and not only by persons who intend to become scientists but by those who want to know their way about in a world where science is supreme. Similarly world history books, free from nationalism, have been suggested by educators. But such demonstrations would be few, for UNESCO is designed to be mainly a coordinating, facilitating, and planning body.

UNESCO already plans to call conferences on scientific problems in which one nation can get the benefit of scientific help from the others. Mexico has recently asked for a conference on the conservation of non-renewable natural resources. Consider also what UNESCO could do in promoting an international approach to zonal problems, as proposed by Dr. Huxley. The Arctic zone goes around the world, and how to fight extreme cold is the common problem of all the people who live in it, no matter what their nationality. Dr. Huxley maintains that there should be a common attack on the problem throughout the entire zone. The diseases of the tropical zone pose another such challenge. In some arid zones the need for water crosses national borders.

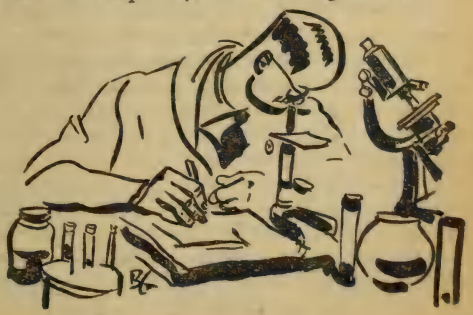
With UNESCO pointing the way, the international TVA's about which so much has been written could really come into being. Huxley, Needham, and their colleagues are also equipped to study eugenics, psychology in relation to politics, the use of natural resources, and the cure of cancer or tuberculosis. An international organization, allocating a sizable sum properly and planning a worldwide attack on disease, could save the world much pain, money, and wasted effort.

Henri Laugier, Assistant Secretary General of the U. N., in describing UNESCO's many possibilities, has spoken of astronomy. Astrophysics and astronomy are essential to the whole world, but most of the observatories are in the Northern Hemisphere because the wealthy countries are there. Laugier pointed out that rich countries have big telescopes, medium-sized countries have medium-sized telescopes, and small countries use spyglasses. He went on to ask, "If Tahiti proves to be a location where a very large observatory is necessary, shall the world community be denied the use of this facility because Tahiti's budget is small?"

If all this is as logical as it sounds, who would try to stop UNESCO? I have mentioned the monopolies in this country, which for all their kindly words may gun for the organization. And I have spoken of the militarists and the power politicians everywhere. With disease germs and atomic bombs of tremendous military importance, there is very real danger that the big nations will block any international scientific cooperation. With the Republican Party in power in the United States, these worries are doubled, for the Republicans have traditionally embraced both monopolies and isolationism.

Any increase of isolationism here will have an effect on Russia and the countries in its sphere. None of them have as yet joined UNESCO, and it is obvious that Russia's entry is dependent on the general policy of the United States and Britain. UNESCO is one international organization which Russia should cherish, for it is spending a higher percentage of its national income on science than any other nation. Russia also publicly recognizes that the application of science to industry is cardinal to the success of its Five-Year Plan. UNESCO can be the mother of this kind of knowledge, and I am hoping—but not betting—that the Soviets will come in.

It is UNESCO month here—our State Department has so designated November officially—and it is UNESCO month in England, France, and other countries. May there be a UNESCO month ten years from now, with a world population dancing in the streets in celebration of victories over poverty, disease, and ignorance!



The People's Front

THE results of the recent elections in France and Italy are further confirmation of the point I have been making in The Nation since the liberation, that whatever zigzags it may make on the way, Europe is going left.

Other European elections in the past six months have led conservative American observers to report, a little precipitately, a reversal in the trend, a return to "normalcy." An elaborate article in the July Fortune—which must itself have cost a fortune in time and money—put the final touches on this diagnosis; it marshaled figures and arguments to show that Europe is fed up with its one year of socialist experimenting and is turning its eyes toward the admirable economic order which prevails in America under the benevolent guidance of "free enterprise."

Now Fortune's expensive little popgun has backfired. The French people voted left. The Italian people voted left. In France the Communist Party was the only party of the government coalition that increased its popular vote—5,475,955 votes this time as against 5,203,046 last June, raising the number of its seats in the Assembly from 148 to 166. The latest Italian elections on November 17, coming on the heels of the Socialist-Communist gains of the previous Sunday, resulted in a sweeping victory for the Communists; at Leghorn they received 59 per cent of the total vote, thus securing control of a key municipality.

Both in France and in Italy reaction mustered all its forces in an attempt to rout the working-class parties. The French right had an electoral fund worth more than any number of undevaluated francs in the form of support from General de Gaulle, whose prestige is topped in French history only by that of Henry of Navarre and General Bonaparte. The Catholic church worked hard to return Georges Bidault's Popular Republicans as first party of France. The M. R. P. succeeded in keeping its 160 seats in the Assembly, but its popular vote dropped from 5,589,130, in the June 2 elections, to 5,033,430. Without the help of the hierarchy it would surely have come off worse. A conservative French paper, l'Ordre, commented, "The church saved the M. R. P." This time there was not even a pretense of neutrality on the part of the clergy. La Croix, organ of the Vatican in France, whose masthead carries a crucifix and the motto "Adveniat regnum tuum," abandoned its ecclesiastical tone to warn Frenchmen that if they voted left they would, on the one hand, forfeit their chance of heaven and, on the other, American credits. In Italy Pope Pius all but stepped from the altar to the rostrum to direct personally the campaign for the right-wing parties. Yet in neither country were these warnings enough to sway the people.

It is true that the French Socialist Party emerged a heavy loser. This was no surprise to those who had followed closely the debates at the last two Socialist congresses. In the long run it was impossible to maintain an equilibrium between the left and the right wings of the party without losing on both sides. Those Frenchmen who have formerly voted Socialist but are now apprehensive of the steady growth of the Communist Party seem to feel more protected under Herriot's Rassemblement des Gauches, which is openly anti-Communist but at the same time a staunch defender of secular education. On the other hand, many militant rank-and-file Socialists who accept the necessity of a single working-class front find the Communist Party, which has called unceasingly for unity of action, more to their taste. But even the decline of the Socialists, which is fundamentally the result of their elderly, anemic approach to public questions, does not alter the fact that, viewed as a whole, the French vote of November 10 was a decisive blow to reaction.

In Italy the interesting thing this time was to see the effect of the unity pact between the Socialists and Communists. One of the principal arguments of Saragat and Treves, leaders of the right-wing Socialists, was that close collaboration with the Communists would ruin their party's electoral chances. Actually where the parties ran combined slates on November 10, they improved their position and led in five of the main cities—Rome, Turin, Genoa, Florence, and Naples. The Christian Democrats, whose victory last June was taken as a sign of a right turn in Europe, dropped from first place to third in Rome, from second to fifth in Naples. Apparently in Italy the clerical reactionaries are not satisfied, as they are in France, to support a center party like the M. R. P. Impatient with De Gasperi, from whom they expected a firmer stand against the left, they have now gone all out for the neo-fascists of the Common Man Front. But in spite of the considerable gains of that party, Italy came out of the test with the left parties strongly intrenched.

Now France faces the difficult problem of readjusting its coalition government to conform with the election results. The Communists would have a right to claim the premiership, but they are not likely to insist on it at the risk of seeing a government formed without them. They will probably demand important portfolios and may insist that if the Ministry of Foreign Affairs is not given to them, it go to a man—say, Pierre Cot—whose views on foreign policy meet with their approval. The Communists and Socialists together do not hold a majority in the Assembly, and therefore a joint Cabinet, as proposed by the Communist Party on the day after the elections, will hardly materialize. The only possible alternative to the present tripartite coalition would be, I think, a return to a kind of limited popular-front government including the three major parties and the Radicals. Such a solution might bring Herriot out of the opposition as President of the Fourth Republic.

The problem is not so immediate in Italy, since the recent balloting there was for municipal posts only. But it is clear that the victory of the Socialists and Communists will have repercussions on the composition of the Italian government before many months.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Prices and Tariffs

TARIFFS are devices to make imported goods more expensive and so temper the winds of competition to domestic producers. Although each particular import duty assists a comparatively small number of producers and is paid by a large number of consumers, generations of propaganda have put over the idea that tariffs benefit the whole nation. The onus of tariffs, it is widely held, is borne by those foreigners who find their cunning schemes to make cheap goods available to Americans thwarted. It follows that any reduction in tariff rates is a favor to such foreigners and should therefore never be made except as a quid pro quo. On this basis, in fact, the State Department will shortly negotiate for a mutual reduction of trade barriers with eighteen other countries, negotiations in which concessions by one party will be weighed against concessions by others.

I am not criticizing this procedure. It is, perhaps, the most hopeful method of beginning the gargantuan task of lowering trade barriers throughout the world. But in these days of shortages and soaring prices it does seem rather strange to me that there is not more agitation for whittling down import duties, not for the sake of foreign nations but for the sake of the hard-pressed American consumer.

Let us look, for example, at the case of the three major non-ferrous metals—copper, lead, and zinc—which are raw materials for a host of industries. All these metals are in short supply in relation to current demand, and, not surprisingly, domestic prices jumped to the world level when ceilings were abolished on November 7. However, for the moment this imposed a new ceiling, since the Metals Reserve Company, a government corporation which was exempt from paying duty, continued to buy foreign metal for resale at local prices. Now the company has announced the cessation of its operations, which means that future imports will have to bear the prescribed duties. Theoretically, this could mean a two-price system with consumers paying more for foreign than for domestic metals, but in that event bidding for the cheaper material would soon force quotations up until they equaled foreign prices plus duty.

A two-price system in a free market is not, in fact, practical, and it seems certain that within a very short time American producers of metals will be obtaining the benefit of the added duty. Two large mining companies have already moved halfway to this goal by raising their quotations for copper from 17½ cents a pound to 19½ cents, and a further jump to 21½ cents appears imminent since the excise duty on foreign copper is 4 cents. In the case of lead the American Smelting and Refining Corporation, which has mineral interests both here and abroad, has already lifted its quotation for New York delivery to 11.8 cents a pound, which compares with the OPA ceiling of 8¼ cents. The new figure represents a price of 10.25 cents for foreign metal at Gulf ports, plus duty of $1^{1}/_{16}$ cents and transportation costs.

Since most of the big metal producers are already making satisfactory profits, the higher prices they can now obtain, thanks to protective duties, are so much velvet. But what advantage will be gained by the community at large to compensate it for added costs on automobiles, electrical and household appliances, housing materials, and other goods which require appreciable quantities of non-ferrous metals? Domestic production of copper, lead, and zinc will of course be stimulated. High-cost mines, which can operate only when prices are above normal, will be reopened. But no matter how high prices may go, domestic supplies will not be sufficient to satisfy domestic needs, and large imports will still be necessary. In the first ten months of 1946 American consumption of copper amounted to 990,000 tons, of which over half was of foreign origin. Lead consumption for the whole year is estimated at 870,000 tons, even though under allocation many users are not receiving nearly all they need, while domestic production is not expected to exceed 350,000 tons.

The United States was exceptionally well endowed by nature with metallic ores, but in the course of 150 years of economic development these resources have been drawn upon very heavily. They are no longer extensive enough to provide for the needs of industry when it is operating at anything like capacity, and to an increasing extent we must depend on imports. Why, then, should we penalize ourselves and hasten the depletion of our metallic reserves by making foreign metals artificially expensive. This is a matter of great concern to the consuming industries and is disturbing even some of the large producers. The big copper interests, for instance, are not happy about a rise in price to 21½ cents; they fear that consumers may turn to substitutes—aluminum, magnesium, plastics, stainless steels; that they may be "priced out of the market."

A temporary remedy for the situation is available. Under the Tariff Act of 1930 the President has the power in an emergency to suspend the collection of import duties on a particular commodity. He might well use this power in the case of lead and zinc. Whether he has the legal authority to abrogate temporarily the excise duty on copper is uncertain, but that move would be equally desirable. Indeed, there are a number of raw materials supplies of which could be improved or cheapened or both by the suspension of import duties which hamper their entry. In spite of a desperate shortage of vegetable oils, reflected in the high price and scarcity of soap, imports of such commodities as cottonseed oil, cocoanut oil, linseed oil, and peanut oil are impeded by the tariff. Another example is soda ash, for lack of which glass factories are closing down; the duty on this material is equivalent to 25 per cent of the current price.

Of course, it may be argued that the suspension of any duties at this moment would weaken the hands of American negotiators in the forthcoming tariff talks. But that argument is based on the premise that we are always the gainers by our tariffs and the other fellow the loser. In our present situation at least, when we are concerned not with glut but with scarcity, to penalize foreign sellers of wanted goods is surely an example of economic masochism.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

THE big surprise in radio—to both the broadcaster and the listener—is in television. Television sets are being sold, for immediate delivery, in New York City priced at $300, plus $50 for installation and a year's guaranty. And they are being sold so fast that the supply is about exhausted and stores are now taking orders. Sets are also obtainable in Philadelphia, Washington, Chicago, and Los Angeles, although it is probable that West Coast retailers have no more than token stocks since the big present and expected market is in New York City.

The television production center is still New York, where the television listener has three stations to choose from—NBC, CBS, and Du Mont. Two of the three stations offer programs, on an average, six or even seven days a week. Depending on the schedules, the listener can enjoy from twenty to forty hours of programming each week over NBC in New York; somewhat less over CBS and Du Mont.

What makes television a surprise is the speed with which it has caught the public fancy. Many a broadcaster, realizing the cost of television operation, had hoped Frequency Modulation would be the next development. A television station costs four times as much to construct and operate as an FM or AM station. In round figures an FM station can be built for about $50,000 as against the $200,000 needed for an investment in television. Since either FM or television will tend to kill the broadcasters' existing audience, they know they may have to switch to one or the other, and those with limited resources would naturally prefer it to be FM.

Most broadcasters foresaw a gradual shift to FM, a profitable decade with it, and then another gradual shift to television. Instead, FM is still struggling, and television, at least in New York, the largest single market, is here to stay.

Behind this mushrooming of television are a number of interesting factors, all of which have the broadcasters worried. The strongest shot-in-the-arm for television has been sports broadcasts. The baseball, football, and prize-fight telecasts have steadily built up listener demand. It wasn't so good when telecasts had to stick to their home towns, but this season NBC has been picking up games hundreds of miles from New York. The secret is in the micro-wave facilities developed by A. T. and T. Before these were perfected, television could carry programs beyond the horizon only by using another A. T. and T. device, the coaxial cable, which was and is fantastically expensive.

Coaxial cables run from New York to Philadelphia and Washington. A coast-to-coast coaxial cable was announced to be in the works some time ago, but no one anticipated prompt action, especially since such a cable reputedly costs $10,000 a mile to instal. Today we are told that a coaxial cable extends as far west as El Paso, Texas, and is due in Hollywood by spring. This is another cause of television's phenomenal spurt.

Radio men realize that only concerns with heavy financial reserves will go into TV. These are the networks, the radio-equipment manufacturers, and the movie makers. The few non-network stations that can afford to enter the field are those that are affiliated, by financial interest or philosophy, with those already in it.

Radio Corporation of America is in the field with NBC, its subsidiary. General Electric is in with its station in Schenectady, CBS with its station in New York, Paramount with its financial interest in the Du Mont firm in New York, Philco with its own station in Philadelphia. Paramount is on the scene in Chicago through its relationship with the Balaban and Katz movie chain, which owns and operates the most active single television outlet in that city.

ABC, the radio network, is also in the picture via working agreements with Du Mont, General Electric, and Balaban and Katz. Only Mutual, of the networks, has no TV station, but it is affiliated with the Chicago Tribune's WGN station, which for years has had a studio built especially for television. Others in the field are WLW, in Cincinnati, now owned by the AVCO Corporation, part of the Victor Emanuel empire, and WBAL, the Hearst station in Baltimore.

These are the people that can afford to build the stations, put money into the programs, use the coaxial cable—as radio stations now use telephone lines—and with the micro-wave facilities of the A. T. and T. pick up such stellar attractions as an army football game at West Point.

One need not assume from its operators that television will be bad, meaning a minor force for the best in cultural, social, and educational programs. But already its broadcasts are swamped with commercials—run at a loss, it is true, since the advertisers are experimenting, trying to find the most effective and palatable commercial plugs while the audience is still attracted by the novelty and limited in size. Even this does not mean that television must be bad. But look at the past as a guide to the future. The big guns in television are the same big guns that in radio have been most guilty of advertising excesses. TV is a new art, as well as a new technical problem. And the FCC has no handbook for television public service.

Now is the time to watch television and make your likes and dislikes known to the telecasters. And to the FCC, too.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Real China

THUNDER OUT OF CHINA. By Theodore H. White and Annalee Jacoby. William Sloan Associates. $3.

AS THE group of suave Chinese pretending to represent "China" took their seats in the General Assembly of the United Nations, a book of epochal importance about the medieval-Fascist dictatorship which they represent was placed before the American public.

This book, "Thunder out of China," by Theodore White and Annalee Jacoby, for years the China correspondents of Life and Time magazines, is the most incisive and enlightening study of present-day China to appear in many years. While other excellent books have been more restricted in theme, this one is distinguished by its much broader canvas, which embraces not only China but all Asia.

The book is superb reporting; some of its chapters have real literary excellence. Its vigorous pages are full of dramatic details of heroism, tragedy, compassion, humor, and scalding satire. All the elements of Chinese life are in turn unified and analyzed in the light of those social forces without a knowledge of which China appears as it did to most American officers and G. I.'s—a land of squalor, filth, and ignorance.

Understanding these social forces, the authors are preoccupied with the feudal oppression of the Chinese peasants who constitute more than 80 per cent of the Chinese population. In this book the reader, hitherto confused by American press dispatches from China, can watch the savage exploitation of the peasant by the Kuomintang dictatorship and the medieval forces on which it is based: landlords, usurers, gendarmes, tax collectors, merchants, and generals. During the Honan famine of 1943, which killed three million people, the reader sees Kuomintang generals strip the peasants of all their grain, horde it until the prices soar, then feed it into the black market. An American relief official had to buy this grain from generals at prices ten times as high as those in the United States, then give it back to starving peasants from whom it had been looted. But the Chinese government suppressed a newspaper in Chungking for four days for publishing the statement that there was a famine in Honan.

The two chapters on the Chinese Communists, who are today fighting for their lives against these Kuomintang generals and their dictatorship, tell an entirely different story. The entire Communist political thesis, say these authors, can be reduced to a single paragraph:

> If you take a peasant who has been swindled, beaten, and kicked about for all his waking days and whose father has transmitted to him an emotion of bitterness, treat him like a man, ask his opinion, let him vote for a local government, let him organize his own police and gendarmes, decide on his own taxes, and vote himself a reduction in rent and interest—if you do all that, the peasant becomes a man who has something to fight for, and he will fight to preserve it against any enemy, Japanese or Chinese. If, in addition, you present the peasant with an army and government that helps him harvest, teaches him to read and write, and fights off the Japanese who raped his wife and tortured his mother, he develops a loyalty to the army and the government and to the party that controls them.

The criticism of some of the Communist practices pales beside the pen pictures of the key men in the Kuomintang dictatorship. Here you see Chiang Kai-shek not as American reactionaries picture him but as he is, a medieval war lord who is convinced that he alone is China, and who hates and wages a war of extermination on anyone, from Communist to mild liberal, who believes that the Chinese people are China. The Chinese government, the Kuomintang armies, and the Kuomintang Party are Chiang's instruments; the national treasury is his private pocket-book.

There are terrifying sketches of such arch-reactionaries as General Ho Ying-chin and such anti-foreign, Hitlerian reactionaries as Chen Li-fu, who "sleeps untroubled by the screams of victims in Kuomintang concentration camps" where practices like those of Dachau, Belsen, and Buchenwald still prevail. The reader will revel in the savage and satirical picture of Dr. H. H. Kung, who, with his entire racketeering family, is hated by the Chinese people as a grotesque caricature of all the war was about. The Chinese, "with the most biting sense of humor in the world," delighted in the spectacle of the henpecked Dr. Kung, "gutlessly presiding over a Cabinet that reeked of corruption and indecision, surrounded by a kitchen council of cringing sycophants, [who] symbolized all the ridiculous decay they saw in their nation." Just as grotesque is the picture of the boasting buffoon, the American ambassador, Patrick Hurley, who went through devastated China giving a Choctaw war-whoop.

After V-J Day, write these authors, the American army, navy, and air force moved with swift precision to the defense of Chiang Kai-shek's regime. American marines stood side by side with Chinese traitors, Japanese troops, and Kuomintang armies against the Chinese Communist-commanded armies which had fought the Japanese throughout the war, and which the Kuomintang dictator and the American armed forces are now trying to exterminate. All Asia, they say, is now convinced that "America is the last great bastion of reaction, a nation that speaks of freedom while aligning itself with the old order which over a billion people of Asia are determined to destroy."

It is imperative for every American to read this book; its authors deserve the eternal gratitude of the American people, who believed that we fought the last war for the destruction of fascism, not for its preservation. AGNES SMEDLEY

Roosevelt

THE ROOSEVELT I KNEW. By Frances Perkins. The Viking Press. $3.75.

WHILE very much that might have been contained in it is absent, Madame Perkins's memoir of her thirty-five-year association with Roosevelt is quite worth studying. But it must be studied; it is a bad book simply to read. The memoir is full of details of a portrait of Roosevelt and the New Deal, and therefore very interesting. But the tone is official, in a homey sort of way; the ideas in their moral-abstract quality are even more suited to the beginning than to the end of the thirty-five-year period; the total view of the late President is righteous and theoretically shallow. As for the style of the author—Miss Perkins seems to be a practical, energetic administrator whose larger view of life could be summarized in the admonition: be patient with misguided persons and try to do the right thing. (One gets from this book—and not only this one—the strong impression that the New Deal was, realistically, a very successful political adventure and, spiritually, a kind of Unitarian upsurge. Apart from the factor of practical politics, the religious element can hardly be overemphasized.)

Frances Perkins met Roosevelt in 1910, when she was a social worker just out of school and he a righteous young upper-class gentleman beginning a political career in a small way. Roosevelt's first political struggle was against "corruption." The direction of his political development was from moral arrogance toward social charm and tolerance. This movement was greatly facilitated by his attack of paralysis in 1921. ("Franklin Roosevelt underwent a spiritual transformation during the years of his illness.") Roosevelt gained a tremendous amount of psychic vitality because of his paralysis, and this expressed itself chiefly in the deep emotional effect he had on people, his charm, and his almost biological need for conversation—for mental exchange with others. He turned his "dependency component" into a hugely successful political principle. Although he was never very powerful intellectually, his need to partake of others' minds became primary and organic. His psychology was a paradox: he was a genius at stimulating others by allowing and inducing them to stimulate him. His need and love of being stimulated vividly and variously from the outside led him to foster great freedom of activity in his associates. In this process he not only drew the best from them but also afforded them a sense of their own creative importance, thus consolidating their loyalty to him. And he remained the reference point of their creativity: he was the queen bee. Talking about handling politically minded people, he once said to Miss Perkins: "Always ask their advice, whether you take it or not."

Roosevelt's excessive penchant for being enlivened by things outside himself is certainly an indication that he was repressing interior stimuli. The truly intellectual person is one whose inner life is by far the more active. To him, the theoretical framework of action and belief is obviously of extreme importance—almost, at times, a matter of life and death. But to a man of Roosevelt's type, the inner life is dedicated almost entirely to unifying outside forces, usually represented by individuals. He has no real theory; he has only facts, and then information concerning what others believe. Miss Perkins has this to say about the preliminary work of the New Deal: "At the President's request we steered clear of people who were too theoretical. . . ." And when John Maynard Keynes visited Roosevelt in 1934 he remarked to the author that he had "supposed the President was more literate, economically speaking." In the absence of a comprehensive theoretical context, the frame of Roosevelt's decisions was a very simple religious humanitarianism balanced by opportunistic political considerations.

When Roosevelt took office in the depths of the depression, he uttered his greatest words—"The only thing we have to fear is fear itself." This is perhaps the greatest half-truth ever spoken. Nothing could have been farther from the essence of the period, nothing closer to the essence of the man.

Good Out of Nazareth

THE SHORE DIMLY SEEN. By Ellis Gibbs Arnall. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

NO HONEST man should think it an easy assignment to review the writing of another man he likes and admires as much as I like and admire Ellis Arnall of Georgia: inevitably what critical faculty he possesses finds itself at painful strife with his affections. So let me say right off that the Governor's book is not perfectly organized and at spots is consciously "literary," and that with a microscope you can turn up an occasional—but inconsequential—misquotation. And then I can proceed to clap hands heartily.

I know what Ellis Arnall has done for Georgia; how far forward he led his state in his one four-year term, and how eagerly it came with him. His account of his progress is not boastful, but given with gratitude and with pride. Georgia may slip back a foot or two under another Talmadge regime snaked into power against the will—and the votes—of the majority by the undemocratic county-unit system, but most of the social and political yardage gained under the Arnall administration will not be lost, but will be the platform from which the state will resume, before long, its march into the twentieth century.

Arnall's book is discursive, wandering far afield from the author's own home town of Newnan into a world that exists, as the author clearly understands it must, in the Newnan-centered perspective of a Georgia boy who grew up to be a scholar and philosopher, as well as governor of his state and a national figure of continuing promise; but the discourse is entirely delightful, the thought-content solid and evocative, and the keenness of the author's perception accompanies his interests in their wide range.

Governor Arnall is a sincere conservationist, a sincere believer in democracy: "The collective wisdom of the people, if they are informed, is greater than that of any one man." He is, of course, a born Democrat, but also by conviction, since Jefferson, Mason, Jackson, Wilson, and Franklin Roosevelt were of that party: he believes Lincoln and Teddy Roosevelt belonged in it, too. He is at some pains to present himself as a middle-of-the-roader, decrying the impracticalities of the extreme left and the extreme right. Boston, for

The Planned Economy

FREEDOM UNDER PLANNING. By Barbara Wootton. The University of North Carolina Press. $2.

THIS is an excellent little book—honest, courageous, logical, thorough, and admirably written. Mrs. Wootton neither underestimates her opponents' case nor tries to make glibness and rhetoric do duty for argument. She faces squarely the very important problem: can we plan and keep the essential freedoms? Her answer is yes, if we go the right way about it.

She starts from the proposition that the state exists "to make it possible for men and women to live their own lives in their own way." Power to plan production certainly gives the planner power over our private lives. "But power can be exercised in different ways and in different degrees. All extensions of power involve certain risks: some offer advantages also. If the advantages did not sometimes outweigh the risks, complete anarchy would be preferable to any government. . . . The critical issue is . . . knowing where to stop." That is the answer to Hayek, and the rest of the book is simply a carefully reasoned development of this theme.

In the course of that development Mrs. Wootton makes three very important points: (1) Planning does not necessarily involve socialism: the state can plan what is to be produced without necessarily doing the producing itself. (2) Neither war experience nor Russian experience is decisive on whether planning is compatible with freedom. "The first characteristic of war is hurry"; the second is "violent changes in the pattern of production"; the third is that "what people want to do ceases to count." None of this need apply in peace time. Russian experience also has but limited validity, not only because the Soviet system arose out of "the violence of revolution and civil war" and the history of the czarist empire, but because the Soviet government never even tried to establish a state dedicated to letting men and women lead their own lives in their own way. Russian experience proves "that it is possible to plan at least up to the Soviet level of efficiency in time of peace without recourse to universal industrial conscription"; but "the fact that there are no legal opposition parties in the U. S. S. R. proves nothing except that there are no legal opposition parties in the U. S. S. R." (3) It is not true that "public buying is a safe guide to public wanting. . . . What people buy and what they want are two different things."

Perhaps the most important chapters are those on freedom of collective bargaining and political freedom. For these are parts of the subject on which advocates of planning have said lamentably little. Both are crucial.

Mrs. Wootton is convinced that we cannot have planned production unless we have a "plan for wages"; without it we can't be sure that the right amount and kinds of labor will be available at the right time and place. But can we plan wages and keep free collective bargaining? Mrs. Wootton's answer is that unless the unions are prepared to work out an adequate, unified wage policy, or to practice traditional, sectional collective bargaining "with exceptional discretion" and "common sense," it will be necessary to substitute either statutory wage-fixing or arbitration, with the unions acting as "advocates" for the workers. Whatever method is adopted, wages will have to be settled on an entirely new basis, that of matching labor supply with the requirements of public plans. It would be interesting to have her comments on the discussion of wage policy under full employment in Mr. Worswick's chapter in "Economics of Full Employment" (Oxford Institute of Statistics), which provides a useful supplement to her own treatment.

The central problem of political freedom under planning is that "economic planning demands continuity, and political freedom appears to imply instability. . . . Nothing can alter the fact that we cannot both make effective long-term plans and continually exercise the right to change our minds about anything at any time." There is no space here even to summarize Mrs. Wootton's attempt to solve the problem. Opinions will differ about whether it is completely successful. But at least it faces the difficulties and constitutes one of the very few substantial contributions toward a solution. Any serious discussion of the subject in future will have to take account of it. BRIEFER COMMENT

Old, Unhappy, Far-off Things . . .

THERE NEVER WAS a more delusive phrase than "strong silent men." The strong men of history have been not merely articulate: they have been voluble. It is the Coolidges that are dumb. "Winston Churchill's Secret Session Speeches" (compiled with introductory notes by Charles Eade, Simon and Schuster, $2) were deeds as well as words. The most impressive is the one of which we have no full record, but only Churchill's typewritten notes. It was England's darkest and finest hour. In the jottings there are no strokes of lightning, such as we expect in the public utterances. There is, however, one flash of impish Churchillian humor: "Steady continuous bombing must be regular condition of our life. . . . Learn to get used to it. . . . Eels get used to skinning."

The speech on Parliament and Air Raids, and the one on The Battle of the Atlantic are, in comparison, sheer routine reports. The Fall of Singapore makes us realize anew what we are now forgetting: that the Japanese blitz was even more spectacular than the German, and that the British collapse in the Far East was no less sudden and no less profound than that of France in the West. In seven weeks a third of Britain's battleships and battle cruisers had been lost or crippled. At Singapore a hundred thousand troops had surrendered to thirty thousand Japanese. Britain had lost one more gigantic battle; but it was not alone, and the war was finally won.

The speech on Darlan is wilfully ambiguous. The operations in Northwest Africa were under American direction, and "since 1776 we have not been in the position of being able to decide the policy of the United States." "They [the Americans] do not think much of him [Darlan], but they do not hate and despise him as we do over here." Churchill makes it quite plain that Darlan and Giraud claimed to be acting in the name and by the authority of the Marshal. "In fact, if Admiral Darlan had to shoot Marshal Pétain, he would no doubt do it in Marshal Pétain's name." Churchill promised also that we fully intended to doublecross Darlan. Perhaps Darlan would not have been so easy to doublecross. Had he lived we might have had to do in France what the British have done in Greece. Providence intervened, and Darlan was removed.

The utter confusion of this speech shows how vain are all the alleged "verdicts of history." We won. I still believe

The Economics of Exploration

IT MAY SEEM like pedantic sadism to insist that the history of exploration should be regarded as part of economic history. Exploration is a romantic, exciting subject; economics has a long-standing reputation as the "dismal science." Nevertheless, from the time that the Minoans pushed their galleys into distant corners of the Mediterranean until the latest journeys of Admiral Byrd, the forces that have operated to induce men to sail unknown seas and break new trails through unmapped lands have usually been economic. This does not mean that most explorers have been spurred on by hopes of personal gain; the psychology of a Columbus, a Stanley, a Nansen is more complicated than that. But such men have been the instruments, conscious or unconscious, of drives which are essentially economic.

This idea is the thread which connects the stories of three classic journeys told by Jeannette Mirsky in "The Westward Crossings—Balboa, Mackenzie, Lewis and Clark" (Alfred A. Knopf, $4). Vasco Nunez de Balboa sought "gold for the crown"—gold with which Charles V was to buy his election as emperor and to finance an effort to establish Spanish hegemony in Europe. Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the first man to cross North America from Atlantic to Pacific, sought "furs for the company"—the Northwest Company of Montreal, upstart rival of the mighty Hudson Bay Company. Lewis and Clark, commissioned by Congress to explore the Missouri Basin and break a trail to the Pacific Northwest, sought "commerce for the nation." In this last instance, it seems to me, the desire for symmetry has led to over-simplification. Indeed, Miss Mirsky herself makes it clear that Jefferson, who fostered the Lewis and Clark expedition, was inspired not only by thoughts of trade but still more by his desire to prevent his struggling democracy from being hemmed in by new European colonies, and to secure space as a safeguard against the development of feudalism and capitalism.

In her account of Balboa Miss Mirsky leans heavily, as all historians must, on the writings of Peter Martyr, and his eloquence gives a glow to the tragic story which is lacking in the other narratives. And perhaps distance lends enchantment too; so that Miss Mirsky tends to glide over the sins of Balboa and to exaggerate his virtues. By comparison the stories of the North American explorers may seem a little pedestrian. Here the historian cannot use an instructed imagination to supplement the original documents. Mackenzie, Lewis, and Clark all wrote full accounts of their travels, and no conscientious writer can embroider the plain material provided. What Miss Mirsky has done admirably is to give us summaries of Mackenzie's "Voyages from Montreal" and the Lewis and Clark "Journals," works which in the original make somewhat gritty reading. I found the account of Mackenzie's voyage up the Peace River and penetration of the Rockies the most fascinating part of the whole book. Mackenzie himself emerges as a remarkable man whose quiet will kept his expedition intact, despite incredible hardships, until its goal was reached, and whose firm diplomacy time and again secured essential cooperation from scared and sometimes hostile Indians. Miss Mirsky has done well to dust off his neglected saga and give it equal prominence with those of better advertised but no more daring travelers.

ALL THIS NEW ENGLAND PRIDE of ancestry seems, sometimes, a little parvenu—as if three hundred years were such a long time, as if no families in Europe went back a thousand, as if there were no such thing as the human race, with a somewhat longer genealogy. (1856—1943). Mr. Greenslet, in "The Lowells and their Seven Worlds" (Houghton Mifflin, $4), writes of them with affection tempered by judgment, or vice versa. But all his fondness cannot make them seem more than admirable; not warm, not lovable, not particularly interesting. They had successful careers, in law, in business, in science, education, literature, arms, diplomacy; they made a lot of money, founded endowments, were given to good works, including the Lowell Institute, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and Harvard College. They traveled widely, they established towns; never philistines, they may have, some of them, been a little pharisaical. They produced many men, and one woman, of letters; they never produced an artist. Exemplary citizens, pillars of the community, respectable, affable enough—one or two may even have been charming—worthy, devoted, good; and yet, by and large, dull, dull, dull.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Model B and the New World

THE SIXTH AND FINAL REPORT made by Stuart Chase for the Twentieth Century Fund in a series dealing with post-war questions which face the United States is "For This We Fought" ($1). In some hundred pages Mr. Chase attempts to explore the larger national and international issues and to reach some valid conclusions, particularly from the point of view of the veteran. It is an enormous task, and of course Mr. Chase fails.

What he has given us is a hotchpotch of subjective interviews, selected quotations from attitude surveys, and brief summaries of vital statistics. He then jumps, with little connection with the preceding pages, into a trite chapter on the atomic age which is a brief survey of the disheartening features of present-day international relations. Next Mr. Chase distinguishes four possible economic systems and personally plumps for Model B—the Middle Way. He says that there is nothing inherently wrong with the capitalist system but that the era of free enterprise—the "trickle-down system"—must give way to planned capitalism. The function of government is to compensate for the inadequacies of the economic system. In the final chapter—mystically entitled "$E=MC^2$"—we are first regaled with a two-page summary of archaeological and anthropological data from 7,000,000 B. C. until the destruction of Hiroshima on August 6, 1945. On that date the third great era of man commenced. (The other two commenced with the discovery of fire and the development of agriculture.)

There are three ways, apparently, in which we can face our destiny. One is to send our Congressmen daily postcards inscribed: "$E=MC^2$—What are YOU doing about it?" The second is to send all the outstanding leaders of the world to watch the navy's experiments at Bikini. But the most important thing is to accept the Lilienthal report on Control of Atomic Energy. This third point Mr. Chase establishes in one and a quarter pages, of which one page is devoted to outlining the actual contents of the report, leaving exactly fourteen lines for his arguments in support of it.

The moral of all this is: the smaller the book, the less you can put into it; and this remark is no more trite than many made by Mr. Chase.

FICTION IN REVIEW

ISABEL BOLTON'S "Do I Wake or Sleep" (Scribner's, $2.50) is quite the best novel that has come my way in the four years I have been reviewing new fiction for this magazine. Small, entirely anonymous in the welter of current books, it might very well have escaped my notice had Edmund Wilson not called special attention to it in the New Yorker: the possibility of such an oversight will now become my reviewer's nightmare. Mr. Wilson's high praise prepared me, however, only for a work of exceptional talent. It did not prepare me—nothing but reading the book could—for the extraordinary process of revelation that Miss Bolton's novel turned out to be. Opening as a minor work of poetic sensibility, the kind of writing which Miss Bolton herself goes on to describe as achieved with the nerves rather than with the deeper centers, "Do I Wake or Sleep" gradually deepens to become a work of compelling insight; then the story progresses a bit farther, and the intelligence that one has hitherto noted simply as a restraining force upon poetic excess slowly proclaims its dominion over the novel's whole conception; finally one confronts the real novelistic shape and intellectual strength of the book, and recognizes the source of and response to a major fictional experience. I have no idea who Miss Bolton is: the jacket of the novel is provocatively uninformative. Whoever she is, she is the most important new novelist in the English language to appear in years. Whatever her literary apprenticeship, her book—it is a long novelette, really, rather than a novel—is the achievement of a fully matured artist.

And I say this despite the fact that "Do I Wake or Sleep" is not my favorite sort of fictional writing. It is a very closed book; to borrow a figure from music, its tone is covered—and I usually prefer a more open method. The method of Miss Bolton reminds me of that of Elizabeth Bowen at her best: there is the same privacy of approach to its materials in "Do I Wake or Sleep" as in Miss Bowen's "The Death of the Heart," just as there is the same scalpel-like precision of observation and expression, the same ability to make the most delicate differentiations between appearances and reality, the same fierce insight into human error held in check by a warm human sympathy. But one recalls that even at her best Miss Bowen has always suffered from a certain parochialism of the emotions; her intelligence, marked as it is, plays in her fiction only about the individual character and, so far, has never been able to relate the forces that move the individual with the forces that animate a whole society, whereas Miss Bolton is preeminently concerned—and most successfully—with this larger intellectual enterprise. Actually, Miss Bolton's closest affinity is with—I am afraid it must be said—Henry James. Not only in point of mutedness of tone, but also in point of subtlety and richness of perception and in the boldness with which it stands up to its final moral responsibility, "Do I Wake or Sleep" asserts its place full in the Jamesian tradition. Even its theme is a present-day statement of that theme dear to the heart of James—the relation of European and American culture.

There is a strong suggestion of James's Isabel Archer in Miss Bolton's Millicent, through whose eyes "Do I Wake or Sleep" is told. Millicent misses the charm and beauty of the James jeune fille américaine, but she shares with the heroine of "Portrait of a Lady" both the American energy of innocence and the American need to find importance in life by an act of dedication. When Miss Bolton's novel opens, Millicent, who earlier in life had rejected an English suitor on some impulse she has never understood, is about to make the saving gift of her love to Percy, an American novelist. She is not at all sure, however, that the gift is either advisable or welcome, for Percy too is looking for salvation through self-immolation, and he has just found a new object of his sacrifice in the person of Bridget, a beautiful European refugee. Even more guiltily than Millicent, Percy, being an American too, wants to spend himself for an ideal; his literary sensibility, indeed, is the other side of the coin of this nervous exacerbation. In the first chapters of "Do I Wake or Sleep" Millicent, Bridget, and Percy are dining together in the French Pavilion at the World's Fair. Over the table, against a background of the General Motors Building, the Futurama, and all the rest of the panoply of American success (the setting is a touch of genius), Bridget tells her friends the story of her life. She has only to reveal the fact that she has left a small daughter behind her in Europe for Percy to seize upon the rescue of this child as the culminating mission of his existence. Driven by her own sympathies and her desire to do anything she can to make Percy happy, Millicent tries to further this pursuit; in the next twenty-four hours, which are the whole period of Miss Bolton's story, she lunches with Bridget and Percy, she goes to the dressmaker with Bridget, she enables Percy to attend a cocktail party to which she and Bridget have been invited.

But accidentally she also introduces Bridget to a young millionaire who at once becomes infatuated with her and in whose favor Bridget makes her choice of champion. Level-headed, shrewd, experienced as only the European can be experienced in playing her feelings instead of letting them play havoc with her, Bridget knows just the sort of help she needs and just how to secure it. The story closes with Percy prostrated in failure and with Millicent facing the tragic necessity of having to turn her life inward instead of—romantically—outward.

But no more than a synopsis of "Portrait of a Lady" can suggest the complex meanings of the James novel, can a synopsis of "Do I Wake or Sleep" suggest its complexity and skill. There have perhaps been other modern American novels—though at the moment I cannot name any—that have given one as vibrant a pictorial impression of New York as Miss Bolton's novel does. But surely Miss Bolton's book is unique, not only for the cultural meanings it evokes with every stroke of its description of the city, but also for the way it demonstrates the human outcome of our culture, and the relation, in both human and social terms, of American and European culture. In a symbolic story like Miss Bolton's the temptation to either overstatement or oversimplification is enormous: Miss Bolton's ability to avoid either of these extremes is the mark of a beautifully disciplined mind and heart. If one waits, for instance, for the character of Bridget to dissolve in satire or to merge into the accustomed character of the glamorous European adventuress, one waits in vain: rather than diminishing, one's sympathies for Bridget only increase as she begins more and more to reveal the cool springs of her conduct. Or if one looks for the young millionaire of the novel to become a caricature of stupid American openhandedness, one has the agreeable surprise of watching his author endow him with all the frank sweetness possible to his kind. Just as there is no hint of chauvinism or of any other easy value in Miss Bolton's comparison of the Old World and the New, so there is no touch of malice or of any other form of self-hatred in her approach to the American personality.

Then there are the myriad wonderful details with which Miss Bolton fills in the main outlines of her drama of American self-discovery. As striking as her descriptions of New York and her use of the World's Fair are Miss Bolton's descriptions of meals, of the protocol of restaurants, of a newsreel, her portrait of a cocktail party (the scene with the little doctor asserting his professional importance in the midst of so much alcoholic indulgence is a minor miracle), her asides on literary subjects—on Whitman, on Hart Crane, on why a modern cocktail party would be an unsuitable subject for a Restoration comedy. From time to time I have been accused of anti-intellectualism in my reviews because I have spoken so sharply against the modern "intellectual" novel. What I have been speaking against, of course, has been the use of the novel as a crude vehicle for argument or as an exhibition-piece of the author's education. Obviously the proper play of intellect in a novel is something quite different from this, something highly desirable and one of the rarest things in the contemporary fictional world—and I recommend "Do I Wake or Sleep" as a beautiful instance of its virtues and charms.

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

OF THE three plays now being offered by the American Repertory Theater "John Gabriel Borkman" will not, I suppose, prove the most popular. It is a tragedy gaunt as well as grim and almost totally devoid of the elements which contribute to "entertainment" in the ordinary sense of the word.

There is, for example, little that appeals to the eye and, except for the pathetic absurdity of the poet manqué, nothing remotely suggesting humor. The only two characters who have even the hope of anything to live for appear but briefly and soon flee from a stage given over to frustration and hate. The central character is unsympathetic; of the two women who come next in importance one is hateful, the other defeated and, spiritually, all but dead. Most of the action has taken place before the curtain rises, and it is only the disastrous aftermath which the audience is shown.

Yet for all that, "John Gabriel Borkman" is a better play than "Henry VIII" or "What Every Woman Knows" and for those willing to take it on its terms a more rewarding experience. Ibsen, even after he had passed the summit of his career, could still write plays more impressive than third-rate Shakespeare diluted with Fletcher, and his grim solidity promises long to outlast the famous whimsicality of Sir James. This particular play was written half a century ago by a man who was already old and who had never bothered to be in the slightest degree ingratiating; yet there are only a few moments when it seems old-fashioned rather than sternly timeless.

Indeed, Borkman himself is a curiously modern figure, and Ibsen is, in one way, so much ahead of his time that if the play were new it would undoubtedly be interpreted as an analysis of fascism. The hero-villain who lusts for power and justifies all the dishonesty of his means by the claim that his ultimate intention is to rule everything for the people's own good sounds very much as though he might have read some of the philosophical exponents of National Socialism; his whole attitude is less that of the nineteenth-century robber baron than that of the present-day tycoon. We meet him long after his downfall, but defeat has not changed him, and before he dies the whole of his character has been dissected before our eyes.

Ibsen is, to be sure, old-fashioned to the extent that he is a moralist rather than an exponent of economic determinism. John Gabriel is not the inevitable product of a dialectical process. He is, on the contrary, the classical hero of tragedy—a strong man doomed to destruction by a fatal defect which is, in this case, an inability to love. That defect is most dramatically revealed by his sacrifice to expediency of the woman he had chosen to be his wife; but this single act is no more than typical, and his damnation is the result, not so much of what he did, as of the character which made the action possible. Even today, however, not all playwrights are Marxists, and it is curious to note that S. N. Behrman's "The Talley Method" unknowingly rewrites "John Gabriel Borkman"—to the extent at least that both plays are about able men who are "proto-fascists" and who can justify their own ruthlessness because they are incapable of love.

"Borkman" is neither so rich nor so intricate in its working out as either "The Wild Duck" or "Hedda Gabler," but the famous retrospective method of its author was never more expertly handled, and the little scene in which the sentimental father comes limping in after the sleigh which was carrying his son out into the great world has run over his foot is typical of those curiously prosaic and yet curiously effective symbols which he loved to introduce. Moreover, the whole of the last scene, though old-fashioned in the staging which it demands, is dramatically right. John Gabriel, who has acknowledged defeat at last, is led by the woman who had always loved him to the rustic bench on a height to which as lovers they had been accustomed to come. But even in his last moments he cannot redeem himself, even with his sweetheart beside him, for he cannot really be aware of her presence; as he looks down he regrets only that the factories and ships spread out in panorama before him belong not to him but to others.

To my mind the best performances in the present production are those by Margaret Webster as the passionate, unforgiving Mrs. Borkman and by Ernest Truex as the pathetic little failure, Wilhelm Foldal. As John Gabriel, Victor Jory does not seem to get inside the role so effectively as he did when he played Henry, and Miss Le Gallienne's Ella Rentheim is, perhaps necessarily, somewhat monotonous for the simple reason that long-suffering heroines tend to become just that.

"Park Avenue," the Nunnally Johnson–George Kaufman–Ira Gershwin–Arthur Schwartz musical at the Shubert Theater, got rather tepid reviews, but I found it as entertaining as anything of the kind I have seen in a good while. It is true that the plot is only a very sketchy farce and, what is more serious, that the score is not especially good, but there are a number of very ingratiating performers, including Leonora Corbett, and an expert direction which manages somehow to avoid those sudden plunges into the vacuum of an air pocket which make most musical comedies a torture to me. I infinitely prefer Mr. Johnson's and Mr. Kaufman's gags (of which there are several very good ones) to the usual sentimental songs sung before a backdrop while the scene is being changed (of which there are, mercifully, none).

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

DEBUSSY's "Pelléas et Melisande," whenever I have heard it in the past, has been too tenuous for my mind to get hold of—the fact being that much of the physical sound of the orchestral part has been lost on the way to my ear in the vast space of the Metropolitan, and the rest in the conversation which the Metropolitan's audience feels it may carry on when the curtain is not up. Not until the New York Philharmonic played excerpts in the superb acoustic conditions of Carnegie Hall recently could I hear what the orchestral detail sounded like and appreciate how marvelously beautiful and effective for its dramatic purpose it is. Or rather, I was able to do this at first, but after that the growing restlessness of the audience made it difficult for me to keep my mind on the music. I am inclined to ascribe that restlessness to the uncomfortable temperature of the hall; for it would be surprising if a sophisticated symphony audience, which is accustomed to hearing Debussy's orchestral music, found "Pelléas" uninteresting; and the performance was very beautiful, with the lovely sonorities produced by the orchestra under Rodzinski's direction, and the fine singing of Maggie Teyte and Raoul Jobin.

In Aaron Copland's recent works—like "Rodeo" and "Appalachian Spring"—one hears Copland's matured "modern" style, and an occasional integration of this style with American folk music or with the idiom of this music. They are the end of a development, of which the beginning is the Piano Concerto, composed in 1926 but performed in New York for the first time only recently. In this work one hears the big raucous noises of a first attempt at a "modern" style; and one hears phrases of hot jazz pianists, clarinettists, and trumpeters—phrases torn out of their original contexts and not integrated with the "modern" noises. The jazz phrases remain mere quotations, which astonish and after a while amuse one with their extraordinary accuracy; they succeed each other but do not develop; and that, in fact, is true of all the substance of the work, which is interesting only as part of the documentation of Copland's development as a composer. The performance by Leo Smit with the New York City Symphony under Leonard Bernstein was excellent; and so was the one of Haydn's D major Concerto, in which Smit's precisely executed sensitiveness occasionally produced fussy nuances in scale passages and phrases.

Not having heard Benjamin Britten's most recent opera I don't know whether it justifies the recent contention of a writer in the London New Statesman and Nation that one now had to speak not of Britten's talent but of his genius. If I were to judge by the violin concerto, composed in 1939, that Bernstein performed at another of his concerts I would not speak even of talent. There is not an idea in it that is worth anyone's attention—to say nothing of the superb skill wasted on its difficulties by Werner Lywen, the soloist in the performance.

The driving intensity which robbed Toscanini's performances last year of their normal plasticity has been less evident this year. It was not evident at all in the performance of Mozart's Divertimento K. 287 for two horns and strings, which was completely relaxed and plastic, and enchanting in its modeling of phraseological contours, at once so sharp and so fluid. On the other hand it seemed to me that his tempos for the opening and the coda of Brahms's Variations on a theme of Haydn were unusually fast; and this impression was confirmed when I played the Victor recording of his performance with the New York Philharmonic, in which the slower tempos gave the opening a repose, and the coda a gravity and spaciousness, that I preferred to their restless urgency in the broadcast performance.

The manifestations of fatigue or boredom in the playing of the Budapest Quartet the past two or three years are gone this year: the group has been in top form. In broadcast performances the perfection has included tone; but at the Y. M. H. A. the violins have sounded harsh and wiry. For some time I had been wondering whether the auditorium wasn't excessively resonant; but one evening recently I tried the experiment of cupping my hands around my ears, and discovered to my surprise that the sound of the violins became fuller and—as it did so—clearer and smoother. It began to look as though the harshness came not from too much but from too little resonance. And as it happened an engineer I know who has an ear for musical sound (which is not standard equipment for radio engineers) mentioned that he had heard the Budapest Quartet at the Y. M. H. A. and had not liked its sound in the unresonant auditorium.

Asks Child-Labor Ban

Dear Sirs: The Child Labor Amendment to the Constitution has now been ratified by twenty-eight states. Eight more must ratify before the amendment becomes valid. It is a national disgrace that it is not already in force.

The amendment itself does not attempt to regulate child labor. It very properly leaves that to Congress. The exact wording is as follows:

SECTION I. The Congress shall have the power to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under eighteen years of age.

SECTION II. The power of the several states is unimpaired by this article except that the operation of state laws shall be suspended to the extent necessary to give effect to the legislation enacted by the Congress.

I give below the states which have ratified. If your state has not done so, apply pressure to your state officials for an immediate referendum. Arkansas, Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Utah, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, Wyoming. Recommends Workshop

Dear Sirs: As a subscriber to The Nation, I read with interest this past spring of a Workshop in Intercultural Education to be held in Los Angeles under the supervision and direction of Dr. Stewart Cole. After attending this workshop for a period of seven weeks in the summer, I realized the importance of its services. I met with some thirty-five men and women of various majority and minority groups from all parts of the United States—all of different religions and ethnic ancestry. All of us were deeply concerned with the problem of intercultural living. As a result of my experience I am convinced that in this type of workshop lies the solution of the problem of how people can learn to live together and respect one another. We learned to recognize and face minority problems; we lent ourselves to a scientific study of prejudices that stand in the way of a free intercultural association, and we sought for concrete means whereby the mutual respect of neighbors could be attained.

Surely this Workshop in Intercultural Education, if it is not the sole way in which one can be prepared to act responsibly as a world citizen, is the best that I know.

Says Negro Vote Shifted

Dear Sirs: My paper says the C. I. O.-P. A. C. elected only 78 of 344 candidates it supported. Behind the Republican victory, however, are less than 3,000,000 votes. The figures, in round numbers, are 18,000,000 to 15,000,000.

My estimate is that at least 1,500,000 of the votes won by the Republicans were cast by Negroes, and that these votes previously went to Democrats. . . .

How silly, then, to talk about the failure of the C. I. O.-P. A. C. when the victory of the Republicans really belongs to the do-nothing, race-hating element among the Democrats—Truman included. In their necessarily elemental approach to the question of how to vote, Negroes could see nothing of worth to their race in the present set-up of the Democratic Party.

My sincere belief is that a shift of Negro votes to the tune of nearly 2,000,000 really brought the Republican victory and that no widespread anti-liberal sentiment had anything to do with it. W. J. J.

Philadelphia, November 11

A Doubtful Precedent

Dear Sirs: During the Nürnberg trial and after the judgment a controversy arose over whether there is a rule in international law which makes aggressive war a crime. Justice Jackson and Professor Sheldon Glueck produced ample affirmative evidence. Now Mr. Biddle's report and President Truman's reply seem to justify their opponents. We are told by Mr. Biddle that "it is not enough to set one great precedent. . . . Clearer definition is needed." He suggests "drafting a code of international criminal law" which would give much thought to "what extent aggressive war should be defined, methods of waging war outlawed, penalties fixed," and so forth.

From all this, it appears that the Nürnberg judgment was pronounced without a clear definition of what constituted the crime and what was its punishment. President Truman, less confident than the enthusiasts for the judgment, expresses the "hope" that it will create a precedent, and he therefore favors having an international criminal law dealing with aggressive war drawn up "by the best legal minds the world over."

This is most gratifying, but without insinuating that the participants of the Nürnberg trial did not belong to "the best legal minds," we cannot help observing that a criminal law which needs to be drafted in the future, plainly did not exist when the Military Tribunal set its doubtful precedent.

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • DECEMBER 7, 1946 NUMBER 23

The Shape of Things

THE CASE OF THE UNITED STATES VERSUS John L. Lewis proceeds, as we go to press, in a curiously irrelevant fashion. As far as the layman can make out, an inexcusably ambiguous contract may or may not have been breached; an injunction of dubious legality may or may not, in a strictly technical sense, have been disobeyed; and if it is found to have been violated, the punishment will not, in the words of the court, "very seriously interfere with anybody's comfort" should the injunction prove to have been invalid in the first place. While this performance drags along, with every prospect of appeal after appeal, the country moves rapidly toward an industrial crisis worldwide in its effects. Steel production has already slumped alarmingly, and train schedules are being seriously curtailed. A prolonged coal strike threatens inflation, crippled transportation, and widespread unemployment here at home and the direst kind of suffering abroad, where little enough is needed to push whole populations into the camp of the Communists. The most justified gains for deserving coal-miners would have to be weighed in the balance against such consequences, but Mr. Lewis's act of defiance is as disproportionate to his immediate aims as his power is incompatible with the functioning of a democratic society. That point cannot be driven home to him by the action of government alone. As long as organized labor lends him its support, however nominal, he will be a martyr or a hero, whatever the courts decide. A number of members of the Washington Newspaper Guild have taken the lead in condemning the resolution adopted by the C. I. O. convention in defense of Lewis. It remains for the top leadership to follow suit, however strongly it may object to use of the injunction. To fail is to give the wild men in Congress a golden opportunity to set American labor back many years.

✶

BY AN IRONIC TWIST, CHINA'S NATIONAL Assembly has utilized the technique of democracy to destroy the last hopes of achieving a democratic constitution. Chiang Kai-shek had belatedly persuaded the Social Democratic Party to participate in the assembly by promising that the constitution would be basically that which had been agreed on last spring at the All-Party Political Consultative Conference. But when members of the extreme right-wing C.C. clique protested that a democratic assembly must be permitted a free hand to make such changes as it wished, the Generalissimo gracefully backed down and agreed to permit unlimited amendments. Since the membership of the assembly is not only overwhelmingly Kuomintang but was hand-picked by the C.C. clique which controls the party machinery, it may be assumed that most of the reforms that were adopted last spring under pressure from the Democratic League and the Communists will be eliminated. One of the chief points of controversy concerns the power of the President under the new setup. Chiang Kai-shek's assertion that he has "no more political ambition" now that the assembly has met may be regarded with utmost skepticism. He has announced his retirement many times in the past, always with a definite political objective. It will be interesting to see what kind of constitutional changes will be necessary to persuade him to reenter political life.

LAST WEEK'S ELECTIONS IN URUGUAY HAVE left South America's most firmly rooted democracy intact but slightly shaken. On the surface, Tomas Barreta, of the pro-United States Colorado Party, soundly defeated Dr. Luis Alberto de Herrera, the seventy-three-year-old admirer of Hitler, Mussolini, and Perón. But the gains of the Herreristas were too marked for comfort. Actually, their leader received more votes than Barreta, who shared the Colorado ticket with two other presidential candidates; fortunately, under the Uruguayan electoral system the ballots for all candidates of a given party are assigned to its leading contender in computing the final results. The Herreristas also made gains in the Congressional campaign; they will have more Senators, and possibly more Deputies, than any single faction of the Colorados, who lost seats to the Communists as well as to their fascist opponents. Aside from the rising cost of living, the chief factors in the Herrerist gains were fear of Perón and fear that Uruguay would be left isolated by United States appeasement of Perón. The Montevideo newspaper, El Pais, reports that during the campaign automobiles bearing Argentine license plates toured the Uruguayan capital flying Herrera banners, and a New York Times correspondent was told by partisans of both camps that Herrerist strength has been growing not only because of Perón's election victory but because he "also apparently came to terms or is coming to terms with the United States representatives there." Here is a fact for Ambassador Messersmith to ponder.

BACK IN THE TERRIBLE DAYS OF BLOOD, sweat, and tears, when the Nazis were at the Channel, three Americans were putting out a magazine whose avowed purpose was to keep us from lifting a finger in Britain's defense. Their slogan was "Steps Short of War—Mean War," and their headquarters were at Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, where they had gone in order to escape from "refugee-dominated New York." The journal was Scribner's Commentator, which sometimes published reprints from the German-American Bund's Weckruf, and the three journalists were Ralph Townsend, Douglas Stewart, and George E. Eggleston. Were they just good Americans expressing a legitimate minority point of view? Or were they as sinister a crew as some of us vocally suspected? The full story has not yet been told, but the subsequent careers of the three champions of America First are worth passing notice. Mr. Townsend was hauled into court soon after Pearl Harbor for having served as a paid agent of Japan without bothering to register as such. He was duly convicted and has served his time. In 1943 Stewart told a special grand jury that his magazine was financed by two contributions from an "unknown donor" which were "left on a little table by the door." At Nürnberg last June, the former first secretary of the German embassy at Washington claimed credit for the donation, but there was no little table in his testimony. He said that he had personally handed some $15,000 to Stewart at the Hotel Pennsylvania in New York; in consequence Stewart has just been indicted for perjury. And what about Eggleston? The transcript of the Nürnberg testimony links him to the same transaction, but he has not been called to account. He remains, in fact, the respectable associate editor of the respectable Reader's Digest, with a respectable circulation of more than ten million (Advt.).

FOR PARIS, FRANCE, TO ATTEMPT TO BAN as obscene the works of Henry Miller is a joke that will please anybody; but for New York City to suppress "Memoirs of Hecate County" is a little too far-fetched to be a successful joke. Almost unlimited quantities of books, magazines, movies—pin-up girls, even—have more of a "tendency to deprave and corrupt the young and immature" than the cold, detailed, embarrassing few pages for which Edmund Wilson's publishers have been prosecuted; many respected works of art contain a more "pornographic," and many textbooks of physiology a more anatomical, treatment of sexual relations. It is a pity to have a distinguished critic used as a whipping-boy for the many carefully and successfully salacious books that go scot-free. "Memoirs of Hecate County" is far less likely to corrupt young girls than to induce them to enter a convent; its suppression reminds one of the medieval ban on the dissection of corpses.

The Disarmament Debate

THE somewhat chilly reception accorded the gift horse trotted out by Mr. Molotov at the U. N.'s Thanksgiving Day parade reflected the frustration felt by most delegates after weeks of Russian stalling. Had the proposal been made in the early days of the atomic-energy discussions, or before the Paris meeting of the Foreign Ministers, or even in the first hopeful flush of the present sessions, the Western world would have been more generous in accepting the disarmament proposals at their face value. For Mr. Molotov apparently was advocating what the American and other delegates on the Atomic Energy Commission have been pressing for in vain from the very beginning: namely, the international control of atomic and—inferentially—all weapons of super-destructive power, with suitable machinery for inspection.

As Vera Dean points out on page 638, the course of the U. N. debate made it more and more clear that the Russian conception of inspection was not that being discussed in the Atomic Energy Commission. In fact, it was suggested with strong supporting evidence that the commission would be sidetracked if the Russian plans carried. The control agencies the Russians proposed would come immediately under the authority of the Security Council and be bound by its veto. Plus ça change, alas, seems to apply to the endless permutations and combinations of the Soviet argument. The debate has had value in that it has forced the world's attention on the crux of the disarmament issue: that nations may solemnly sign a convention renouncing all manner of weapons, but unless a system of international control and inspection is established which, once accepted by the powers, shall operate without danger of interference, then disarmament is a farce. This issue has already been faced in the Atomic Energy Commission. It had better be faced as the nations talk of extending disarmament to less—or more—lethal weapons.

Mr. Molotov's proposal for international inspection should not, however, be wholly discounted. Russia's desire for world disarmament is obvious. When Molotov was speaking of the armament burden "borne by populations who will be unable to carry the load long without complaint," he was expressing more than an altruistic interest in the weary peoples beyond the boundaries of the Soviet Union. Russia's domestic tasks of reconstruction are enormous and have been increased by mismanagement and bad harvests. The stepped-up rate of demobilization and perhaps the recently reported troop withdrawals from Germany reflect a desperate manpower shortage on the home front. Moreover, Russia's shift on Trieste and its more conciliatory attitude on the Danube-navigation problem show an active concern in lessening tension in foreign affairs. Indeed, as far as the Foreign Ministers' Conference goes, for the first time there appears to be some hope of East and West conferring on problems of peace and not merely maneuvering to hold the line against the other side's belligerent claims.

A crucial test will come shortly. The Atomic Energy Commission has announced that it will present an interim report on progress before the end of the year. Up to now, the technical discussions have yielded valuable data on a feasible system of control. It is even conceivable that the informal testimony of scientists and engineers has done something to educate the politicians, who, after all, must have the last word. But up to the moment of Molotov's speech the Russians had not budged an inch from the position originally stated by Gromyko in favor of national as opposed to international control. Mr. Molotov appears to have reinterpreted the Gromyko plan. Will there now be a modification of the Russian attitude in the Atomic Energy Commission? Russia has in the Lilienthal-Baruch proposals the best offer of international security against atomic war it is going to get in many a long year. The Soviet Foreign Minister has a magnificent opportunity to make good on some of the bold statements he has been voicing during the past few weeks at Lake Success. The United Nations Assembly is an excellent forum, but the Atomic Energy Commission is where work is being done to build the kind of security that Russia and all of us need.

The Indian Crisis

WE ARE glad that Pandit Nehru decided after all to attend the conference of Indian leaders which the British government has assembled in the hope of allaying the new political crisis in India. It would have been a great pity if the All-India Congress Party had left a clear field in London to Mohammed Ali Jinnah, the suave lawyer who heads the minority Moslem League. It is Jinnah's maneuvers that are largely responsible for the dangerous situation which has arisen in India.

Last summer, both the Congress and the League finally accepted the plan evolved by the British Cabinet Mission for the establishment of an independent India. The plan provided for a central government controlled by an elected legislature with authority over foreign affairs, defense, and communications. Since all powers not specifically reserved were to adhere to the provincial governments, this meant that the provinces with a Moslem majority would have a large degree of autonomy. When Jinnah accepted this scheme it was assumed that he had abandoned his own plan for partitioning India and was prepared to cooperate in working out the details of the new constitution. However, the League has been consistently obstructive, and even after accepting an invitation to join the interim Cabinet, it proceeded to block all action by refusing to attend meetings when Nehru took the chair. On top of this, Jinnah announced a boycott of the Constituent Assembly, scheduled to convene December 9, thus in effect repudiating his indorsement of the Cabinet Mission plan as well as subsequent undertakings given to the Viceroy, Lord Wavell. At the same time, he again raised the cry for Pakistan—an independent Moslem India.

In view of this record of intransigence, it will not do for the British government to adopt the role of umpire and limit its efforts to pleas for conciliation. Premier Attlee should at least make it quite clear that Britain stands firmly on the basic principle of Indian unity which he enunciated before the Cabinet Mission was dispatched to New Delhi. He should likewise refuse to consent to a revision of the Mission's proposals and should back Nehru's demand that the Constituent Assembly be held without further delay. Furthermore, Jinnah should be told that the League must take part in the Assembly and cease its obstruction or quit the Cabinet.

Admittedly, this line involves risks. If Jinnah proves recalcitrant and forces the British government to intrust sole authority to a Congress administration, his followers might attempt to make good his threat of revolt——and widespread violence, if not actual civil war, might follow. But the only visible alternative would involve a bigger risk, for it would mean indefinite postponement of independence and an effort to revivify a visibly dying imperialism.

A firm stand by Mr. Attlee is all the more necessary because the London Times, in a truly mischievous editorial on November 28, proposed that Britain reverse its stand on Indian unity and agree to Pakistan. This is an idea that appeals to sundry Tories who hope to maintain Britain's hold on India, but it is inconceivable that the Labor government will consider it. The mere fact that such a proposal has been put forward in a paper with the standing of the Times is likely, however, to increase Congress suspicions that Britain is encouraging Jinnah in order to find an excuse for breaking its pledge of freedom for India.

We ourselves do not accept the view that Jinnah is just a Whitehall puppet. No doubt Britain has exploited Hindu-Moslem differences in the past, but the communal problem is, unfortunately, one that has real cultural and historical roots, and it will continue to plague India long after the British have withdrawn. It is a problem that cannot be solved by coercion. It can be solved only by the Indians themselves and only when the sole responsibility for their government rests on their shoulders.

Third-Party Obstacles

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

"THE major parties," said Harold J. Laski in his second article on American politics, "are afraid of ideas. They prevent the smooth functioning of the machines. They make the hold of the machines upon the voters both difficult and uncertain. They disturb the relation between the machines and the interests." These facts, Mr. Laski believes, have forced liberals to become "permanent rebels against the routines of action that it is the function of parties to impose," and his conclusion is that American liberals will have to build a new party with organized labor as its core.

I think the checkered history of progressive attempts to influence the politics of this country bears out this analysis: only for brief periods have the advocates of social change been able to establish effective control within the parties or within the government. Reform administrations have been swept into office on strong progressive tides—normally in the wake of economic disaster—and then have been driven to retreat before the more ruthless and well-organized pressures exercised by financial interests working through the political machines.

But if the big parties are so controlled as to make impossible their conquest from within by the progressives—by those who want "thinking government"—the story of third-party movements in America is hardly more encouraging. Except for the Republican Party which rose to power on the impetus of the Civil War, absorbing the Free Soilers and a majority of the northern Whigs to become a second party rather than a third, no successful challenge to the two-party system has ever been made. State and regional parties have sprung up, but they have either merged with or continued to function as a sort of independent left wing—ally or gadfly—of one of the major parties. It is fair to say, I think, that the value of third parties in America has been chiefly to provide a popular platform for the expression of accumulated discontents and so to modify the behavior of the two old parties. From the Greenback and Populist parties, down through the Bull Moose Progressives in 1912 and the LaFollette Progressives in 1924, the story is the same. It does not prove that a new party cannot be created in this country; it simply reveals the inherent difficulties that must be faced if the attempt is to be made.

Other obstacles arise out of the present political situation. The Democratic defeat has caught the left in a state of disorganization bordering on collapse; or perhaps the facts should be put the other way round—the collapse of the left forces was one big reason for Democratic defeat. Their rout was partly the result of the war, which shifted the balance of power to the industrial-financial interests. But the process was underway before the war struck. It should be understood once and for all by American liberals that their total dependence upon the leadership of Roosevelt not only left them, in the end, at the mercy of the party machine, but robbed them of inner vitality and coherence. It is futile to point out that a more hopeful situation might now exist if progressives had laid the foundations of a new party in the black days of depression; futile, because Roosevelt and his bold leadership in the emergency were a gift that could not have been rejected. People who recognized the relationship between economic breakdown and political direction crystallized around Franklin D. Roosevelt as if by spontaneous chemical action. But a reverse process, equally inevitable, has fragmented and dispersed them—and at a moment when cohesion is an absolute prerequisite to any new political movement.

The recent C. I. O. convention revealed one important aspect of left disunity despite Philip Murray's desperate effort to prevent an open clash. Communist control of many key union posts has created an internal conflict bound to weaken the labor movement itself and block any political action. It is bad enough that organized labor as a whole should be split into two hostile organizations; it will prove fatal if within the C. I. O. factional divisions are repeated and multiplied down the line. For whether we work toward a new party in this country or try to force a realignment within the old parties, a progressive alliance capable of effective action must be founded on a labor movement that is at least not engaged in civil war.

The Communist issue has also increased friction among non-labor progressives, creating political groups pledged to exclude Communists and producing disaffection in organizations in which Communists play an important part. To bring progressives together in a single political body pledged to a common program of action will be immensely difficult until the factional struggle is resolved. America offers no counterpart to the Labor Party in Britain or the Socialist parties on the Continent, which can handle their relations with the Communists in terms of fairly well-defined ideological distinctions. American progressives, operating traditionally on a hand-to-mouth, pragmatic basis, with no body of doctrine or even a systematic program of action, constantly find themselves faced with an alternative of red-baiting or fellow-traveling, neither of which coincides with their true political desires. As long as progressives acted, willy-nilly, as a subsidiary wing of the Democratic Party, the problem could be minimized, although not dodged altogether. It looms large as soon as they try to start business on their own.

For these reasons, among many more, progressives in and out of organized labor tend to be skeptic about the chances of a third party. Men like Wallace and Ickes, whatever their mutual differences, and in spite of their break with the Administration, agree in wanting to work through the Democratic Party. In fact, most New Dealers who tasted authority under Roosevelt and most labor leaders who achieved power under the New Deal recoil from the problems involved in building a new party. They know that a new party is bound to draw upon New Dealers for its initial support, insuring victory to the Republicans. They know what devotion and ardor must be generated to take the place of the patronage that cannot be dispensed until the problematical moment when victory is achieved. They know that the political habits of the people, the lack of political consciousness among workers, and above all the terrific legal and financial obstacles in the way of a new national party tend to relegate third-party movements to minor operations on the periphery of the political system.

Whether events will overcome these multiple obstacles remains to be seen. No one can doubt the ferment now stirring in the liberal ranks in this country. No one can doubt that aggressive reaction in Washington, coupled with mounting international tensions, will speed up political processes that might otherwise take many years to mature.

In the meantime, the best chance of effective action by the left lies in a nation-wide effort, among small groups and large, to formulate coherent, concrete programs of social and political change. Let us forget parties for a while. The Democrats have lost control of the government; the progressives have lost control of the Democrats. No third party will be made between now and the next depression. But what can be made are plans. Progressive groups should meet and organize, write and talk. They should not abandon their favorite tasks of political criticism or forfeit the chance to win individual engagements. But attacks should be fortified with demands; and demands should be backed by a political program that makes sense.

[This is the second in a series of editorial discussions of the political situation following the Republican victory on November 5. The next will take up some of the major issues facing American progressives.]

CORRECTION

A typographical error distorted the meaning of a sentence in Robert Bendiner's article, C. I. O. Tightrope Act, which appeared in last week's issue. The passage should have read: "If the National Citizens' Political Action Committee, which is slated to merge with the Independent Citizens' Committee for the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, does not change its name, C. I. O.-P. A. C. will. And in all likelihood it will move its headquarters away from New York."

Arms and Mr. Molotov

BY VERA MICHELES DEAN

Lake Success, November 30

THE lack of mutual confidence that has hitherto stymied all post-war attempts at international collaboration was never so nakedly apparent as during the debates of the Political and Security Committee this past week on disarmament. On November 27 the committee disposed of the controversial troop-census question when it voted, point by point, on British amendments to the original Russian resolution. As approved by the committee, the member nations must submit to the Secretary General of the U. N., Trygve Lie, by January 1, information as of December 15 on their total armed forces at home and abroad, including "military-type formations," a phrase referring to uniformed organizations like the Soviet secret police. A British amendment that would have made the troop census subject to verification "on the spot" by representatives of the Security Council was defeated—with the United States, which has stressed the need for a system of international inspection in the case of atomic energy, unexpectedly opposing inspection in this instance. Russian proposals that the reports to the U. N. should contain information on armaments as well as men, including atomic bombs and rocket weapons, were also defeated.

Mr. Molotov, however, who not only has endless resources of debating strategy but also is tireless in pursuing his objectives, returned to the attack on Thanksgiving Day, when he surprised his colleagues by submitting a resolution to the Political and Security Committee accepting the principle of international inspection and control as a means of verifying compliance both with proposed measures of general disarmament and with measures to outlaw atomic weapons. It had been rumored that two schools of thought existed in Moscow, one addicted to a strongly nationalistic policy, which was said to be favored by Molotov, and the other, reputed to include Stalin, more receptive to cooperation with foreign nations. Consequently, Molotov's public espousal of Stalin's dictum on a subject which the United States considered of paramount importance for an agreement on the control of atomic energy was welcomed at Lake Success as a big step forward.

But careful analysis of Mr. Molotov's Thanksgiving Day proposals and of Mr. Vishinsky's demand on November 29 that the committee accept the Russian resolution without amendments—then, he said playfully, "there will be no disagreement"—seriously dampened initial enthusiasm among other delegations. The core of Molotov's resolution concerning inspection is the establishment "within the framework of the Security Council" of two special organs—a commission for controlling the execution of decisions on the reduction of armaments, and a commission for controlling the execution of decisions on the prohibition of the use of atomic energy for military purposes. As Norman J. O. Makin, Australian ambassador to Washington, pointed out in a closely reasoned speech on November 29, the creation of these commissions might result in sidetracking the work accomplished thus far by the Atomic Energy Commission, whose establishment as an independent organ had been approved by the Soviet government at the first session of the General Assembly in London. The Baruch plan, it will be remembered, provides that the Atomic Energy Commission shall not be hampered in its task of controlling and punishing violations by any member's exercise of the veto power. Russia has strenuously opposed this point in the Baruch plan, regarding it as a sort of back-door attempt to circumvent the veto altogether—although, as has been pointed out in this series before, the United States has no intention at the present time of urging abandonment of the veto in the Security Council. Should the second commission—on atomic energy—proposed by Mr. Molotov be established "within the framework" of the Security Council, will it, Mr. Makin inquired, supersede the Atomic Energy Commission, and will its operations be subject to veto by any one of the five permanent members of the Council? In essence, does Molotov's proposal for inspection and control both of general disarmament and of the use of atomic energy for war purposes mean inspection and control by the great powers, always with the possibility that Russia will invoke the veto to block any measure it opposes?

Doubts, too, were expressed as to Russia's main object in pressing urgently for general disarmament. While Vishinsky, in an eloquent speech blending sarcasm with emotion, declared that he agreed with Senator Connally about the need for progressive international and multilateral disarmament, he made it crystal clear that by "progressive" disarmament Russia means abolition, first of all, of the most dangerous weapon, the atomic bomb, which, he said, hangs over the world like "a sword of Damocles." In other words, Russia has not changed its main objective, which is to terminate the production and stockpiling of atomic bombs. Having failed to achieve this objective in the Atomic Energy Commission, having failed also to obtain inclusion of information about atomic bombs in the armed-forces reports to be submitted by member nations to Trygve Lie, it is now bringing up new arguments in the hope of breaching the resistance of the United States and other nations committed to the kind of control contemplated in the Atomic Energy Commission. In adopting this new line of approach Russia hopes to enlist the sympathy of those nations which might be fearful of atomic warfare in general or of the Western powers in particular.

But while the Russians remain hard-boiled negotiators, they are beginning to find that other nations have become hard-boiled, too. The prevailing skepticism was well expressed by Senator Connally when Mr. Vishinsky asked him to speak more slowly because he found it hard to follow the translation. Discovering that something had gone wrong temporarily with the Russian delegate's earphones, the Senator said good-naturedly: "My Soviet friend appears to have his wires crossed. I hope he doesn't have his fingers crossed."

This skepticism about Russia's intentions is not surprising, considering the series of reverses experienced by the Western powers in trying to come to terms with Russia both in the United Nations organization and in the Council of Foreign Ministers. In both places the Soviet representatives have recently appeared to display a more conciliatory attitude. But other countries have become inured to the expectation that what the Russians have accepted today they may try to undo tomorrow, and therefore place little trust in any move made by Moscow, no matter how constructive it may be. This lack of confidence, without which, as one delegate after another keeps pointing out, no real progress can be made in any direction, least of all in the direction of disarmament, is reacting against Russia; and if Moscow should now be genuinely ready to arrive at an accord with other nations, it would find the going much harder than a year ago.

John L.'s Last Stand

Washington, November 29

THE angry, bewildered look on the massive face of John L. Lewis is the most eloquent story in Washington today. It may mean the end of the coal strike in a few days. His expression now is in startling contrast to the pose of majestic defiance that he displayed so theatrically all through the coal crisis last spring and again this fall up to his appearance in court on Monday. During the previous week John Lewis strode through his scenes like John Barrymore, with fascinated reporters, photographers, and spectators staring at him. On Monday he entered the small federal courtroom in Washington surrounded by seven attorneys. When they parted, the crowd saw a tired and pallid old man. His skin was an unhealthy gray. The muscles of his face sagged. The bold look in his eyes had been replaced by an uneasy stare. The only sign of belligerence was his thick under lip, pressed out. For a moment he turned to look at the benches behind him. The John L. Lewis we have been watching for weeks would have struck a dramatic pose. But on Monday he gave a quick, furtive look around. During the long hours of legal argument Lewis was by turns nervous, vaguely inattentive, and absorbed. On Wednesday he betrayed his sense of angry frustration when he tried to smash a camera with his walking stick. The old John Lewis was a favorite with camera men because he posed so well for them.

The old adventurer's luck is beginning to play out, and he has lost some of the sureness that carried him through his earlier gambles. He is under the greatest pressure he has ever experienced—from members of his own union, from friends, from the American Federation of Labor. And over his head hangs the threat of violent action by the Administration and Congress, egged on by a furious public opinion. Among his adherents there is disagreement over strategy. Before Big John told the government he was going to break the Krug-U. M. W. agreement, he was advised against it by two of the men closest to him—his brother, A. D. (Dennie) Lewis, and his loyal personal attorney, Wellie Hopkins. They felt he was taking too big a risk. But Lewis went ahead, counting on the Administration crumbling meekly before his demands and on the industry wanting coal more than his scalp.

According to those who have been in the coal fields this week, the miners are beginning to wonder whether their chieftain perhaps was not thinking more of himself than of his union. Local U. M. W. leaders have cautiously told reporters that the miners were happy with the generous Krug-Lewis agreement and afraid they might lose its benefits by Lewis's belligerence. The forgotten men in the crisis, the men who dig the coal, are bitter against the operators and the Administration, but they have more than a suspicion that John Lewis put them in their present unhappy position.

Lewis was counting, as he always has in the past, on the desperate need for coal eventually outweighing all the fury directed against him. But this time he apparently made a miscalculation. Public resentment shifted after November 5 from the Democrats to John L. Lewis. He had become the villain responsible for shortages and high prices, and the failure of the brave post-war world to develop. The remarks of people passing the headquarters of the United Mine Workers and the District of Columbia courthouse are grim; they want to see John L. Lewis in chains. The same feeling sweeps through the Capitol. The Administration is just as determined to break Lewis's power as the grizzled Maryland farmer who stood outside the courtroom and vowed he would stay there until Lewis was led out to jail.

President Truman's wrath at the mine leader is kept at a high pitch by the same conservative Democratic Senators who insisted that he fire Henry Wallace. They are even angrier than the Republican leadership, which is playing a careful wait-and-see game in the hope that Mr. Truman can turn the labor vote over to the G. O. P. The President's personal advisers are delighted that his firmness on the coal strike has regained for him much of the prestige he lost in the preceding months. The Republicans, whom Lewis might expect to reward him for political services, are staying clear of him. He is strictly on his own.

Men on Capitol Hill who are friendly with Lewis or the U. M. W.—there is a difference—are pleading with the miners to settle the strike before the wrath of the public consumes them and the rest of organized labor. Senator Wheeler of Montana, long a personal friend of the miners, is one of several individuals in Washington who are sending out peace feelers through the White House, the operators, and the union. Wheeler's solution, and it may not be original with him, is a face-saving compromise. The Administration must turn back the mines to the operators. It would hardly object to this, for Secretary Krug has been trying to get rid of the mines all the autumn. The operators must agree to sit down and bargain with the U. M. W. in good faith—there seems to be some difficulty about this point. But according to word sent by Wheeler to the White House, the operators are willing to meet Lewis halfway on a major question —the number of work hours in a standard week before overtime is paid. The compromise is said to be for the owners to pay a fifty-four-hour wage for a forty-five-hour week. Lewis must call the miners back to the pits and see that they stay there during the negotiations.

The first real break in the strike came last week after Cyrus Eaton, the Cleveland industrialist, met Lewis in Washington and warned him that industry was fed up and that if the strike continued many more days industry would shut its doors and starve the miners out no matter how long it took, The union would be destroyed and so would John L. Lewis. Industry has another weapon. It could say to hell with coal; let natural gas, oil, and water-power take its place—a good example of what the economic displacement of coal means is to be seen in the anthracite fields. Those who know all about the Eaton-Lewis conferences say the Cleveland banker made a proposal. If the U. M. W. would send the miners back to the pits, he would attempt to persuade the coal operators to negotiate a satisfactory contract.

Lewis was undoubtedly impressed. Word that the U. M. W. was willing to call off the strike came first on November 24 in a broadcast by Albert N. Dennis, a labor commentator very close to the A. F. of L. and the U. M. W. He said, "A settlement of the issues can be reached and the work stoppage ended with reasonable promptness by the very simple and just process of collective bargaining. . . . It is the consensus of opinion that the work stoppage will not be long drawn out, that there will be a break almost immediately." Dr. Steelman was quietly drawn back into the coal-strategy huddles at the White House. But the Administration was still going to hold the court case over Lewis's head in case he tried to renege.

Two days ago the chief stumbling-block was Ed Burke, head of the Southern Coal Producers' Association. He is the former Senator from Nebraska who fought the Wagner Labor Act and the National Labor Relations Act. Since his political defeat he has lobbied vigorously for anti-labor legislation. Two of his clients, the Island Creek Coal Company and the Pocahontas Fuel Company of West Virginia, are among the most important producers in the country. On September 17, when the Federal Coal Administrator formally proposed to the U. M. W. and the operators that the mines be turned back to the owners, Burke balked. He said flatly that he would not consider the Krug-Lewis agreement, which he thought far too generous. Specifically, he objected to the miners' welfare fund, which is raised by a tax on every ton of coal mined and is administered by a joint board of the union, the operators, and the government.

Yesterday Burke made a statement which on the face of it seemed generous and a turn-about. He said the operators would be "very happy" to negotiate with the U. M. W., adding, "We think the miners are entitled to the best of treatment, and we are even willing to talk with them about a shorter work week." But there was a big catch in his offer. He proposed that the negotiations should start from scratch and forget all about the Krug-Lewis agreement. This meant that the United Mine Workers would stand a chance of losing the welfare fund and many safety provisions established by the agreement. The operators also could, if they had a mind to, stall the negotiations until January, when Congress returns and can threaten to throw the book at the miners if they walk out again.

At this point Lewis does not seem to have any alternative. He will have to take his chances. The next few days will tell how willing he is to eat humble pie.

Trusteeship Takes Shape

BY RUPERT EMERSON

PERHAPS no section of the Charter of the United nations was left more open to variant interpretations, after San Francisco and even after the first meeting of the General Assembly in London, than Chapter XII, which laid the groundwork for the new international-trusteeship system. The old mandates system had for all practical purposes died with the outbreak of the war; its successor was given a name at San Francisco and a sketchy blueprint of what was expected of it, but the new baby showed few signs of life. At Flushing and Lake Success efforts to invigorate it and to translate into reality the high-sounding phrases and admirable aspirations of the blueprint have resulted in frequently high-sounding but not always admirable debates. As usual, the United States and the Soviet Union are the two major disputants, although the brazen attempt of South Africa to gain the blessing of the United Nations for the incorporation of Southwest Africa into its system of racial discrimination distracted attention for a time from the Big Two.

The position of our government is gradually being revealed. Regrettably the United States seems to be seasoning its traditional anti-imperialist policy with a hankering for Pacific islands, antagonism to the Soviet Union, and a general liking for order and respectability.

At the present session of the Assembly the chief issues to be settled are which territories shall be placed in trusteeship, by what method this shall be decided, and whether the terms of trusteeship in particular cases shall be approved. In the background—because it is a matter for the Security Council and not the General Assembly—is the question of the disposition of the mandated and other islands of Japan now under the military government of the United States.

RUPERT EMERSON, of the Department of Government of Harvard University, was formerly director of the Liberated Areas Branch of the Foreign Economic Administration.

A brief review of the origin of the trusteeship system will help to explain the current dispute in the Assembly. The preliminary labors of Dumbarton Oaks produced no decision about colonies in general or the fate of the mandates system in particular, but it was understood that this would have to be one of the main pieces of new business at the prospective United Nations conference. At Yalta it was agreed that the five permanent members of the Security Council would put their heads together to shape definite proposals for submission to the San Francisco conference. These proposals were to be based on the understanding that the application of the system to particular territories would be a matter for subsequent agreement; the territories to be considered available for trusteeship were the former mandates, areas detached from the enemy as a result of the war, and any other territory that might voluntarily be offered up.

The chapters on trusteeship and the Trusteeship Council formulated at San Francisco, although in many respects an improvement on the old League system, were not immediately applicable to any specific territory, and were not even an effective guide as to the procedure by which such territories were to be designated. The types of territories to which the system might apply were listed precisely as in the Yalta formula, and lest the moral be lost on any casual reader, a second paragraph stated: "It will be a matter for subsequent agreement which territories in the foregoing categories will be brought under the trusteeship system and upon what terms." To increase the uncertainties, a further article stated that the terms of trusteeship, including any alteration or amendment, should be agreed upon by "the states directly concerned," including the mandatory power if it was a United Nations member. No hint was given as to the criteria by which the states directly concerned were to be identified. Apparently this phrase was merely an evasion of the real problem, and like most evasions it was bound to cause trouble.

The United States did not play a very generous or engaging role in the trusteeship discussions at San Francisco. The internationalism of the American position was tempered by the knowledge that a large number of islands, commanding a vast sweep of the Pacific and reaching to the China coast, had fallen to American arms. The navy, backed by powerful elements in Congress and elsewhere, had no intention of seeing them slip from its grasp. Enough pressure was brought on the American delegation to obtain the inclusion in Chapter XII of two articles, tailor-made for the United States, which allowed any trusteeship agreement to name part or all of the trust territory as a strategic area. For such strategic areas the Security Council, not the Assembly, exercises all the functions of the United Nations, assisted, if it desires, by the Trusteeship Council. The basic social, political, and economic objectives of the trusteeship system are secured to the people of a strategic area, but the silence on all other matters indicates that the provisions as to reporting, examination, and inspection become applicable to strategic areas only to the extent that the relevant agreements specifically so provide.

The Assembly sessions in London threw no new light on the question, although it became even more apparent than before that the only territories likely to be placed under trusteeship were the former mandates, with the probable addition of Southwest Africa and of some of the Italian and Japanese colonies. Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Belgium, and later France all announced that they would convert their mandates into trusteeships, but the United States did not reveal its intentions, except for hints that we were against sin when committed by other people. An ill-advised comment by President Truman at a press conference early in the year indicated that his indorsement of the trusteeship system was equaled by his lack of comprehension of its intricacies. Vanished from the scene were earlier notions that some trusteeships might be administered by the United Nations and that some of the world's strategic areas—the Japanese-mandated islands, for example—would be utilized as United Nations bases and manned by international forces for the maintenance of global rather than national security.

In the behind-the-scenes conversations which took place before the present sessions of the Assembly, little real progress was made. Draft agreements for all the former non-independent mandates except Palestine, Southwest Africa, Nauru, and the Japanese islands have now been submitted to the Assembly, for consideration in the first instance by its Trusteeship Committee, but certain basic issues of interpretation remain unsettled.

One of these is, of course, the troublesome phrase "states directly concerned," on the interpretation of which the United States and the U. S. S. R. have joined issue. The United States, through John Foster Dulles, has come forward with an original suggestion which, if it were not so clearly a misreading of the Charter, would appear to make good sense. This is that the "s" should be dropped from the word "states" and that only the state having direct control over a territory through sovereignty or mandate should frame the original trusteeship document—clearly no longer an agreement—for ultimate approval by a two-thirds' Assembly vote. The advantages of this proposal, as Mr. Dulles pointed out, are considerable in that it avoids the delays involved in preliminary negotiations, evades the issue of direct concern on the part of other states, and eliminates the possibility that some state directly concerned might exercise a veto power before the proposed agreement ever reached the Assembly. Mr. Dulles asserted the readiness of the United States to waive its right as a state directly concerned with the trusteeships of other countries on the basis of geography or of rights deriving from World Wars I and II if other states would do the same.

Objections to his proposal are based on its inconsistency with the Charter and also on its presumably clear intent to shake the Soviet Union out of any more direct concern with the initiation of trusteeships than comes from membership in the General Assembly. A further purpose may be to limit to one the states having primary jurisdiction over a later trusteeship agreement for Palestine. If the price of its adoption is to be a bitter sense on the part of the Soviet Union that it is being deliberately pushed out of the picture, then the proposal had probably better not be pressed.

Unfortunately the main statement of Nikolai Novikov on behalf of the Soviet Union did little to advance a solution, although some of his criticism of specific trusteeship provisions as retrograde rather than progressive in character was certainly well founded. However great one's sympathy with Soviet condemnation of the South African annexation plan, it is difficult not to agree with Marshal Smuts's comment that the Soviet statement was "a piece of crude propaganda intended to influence only the uninformed and unthinking." Attacking the British assumption that the only states directly concerned with Britain's African mandates were France, Belgium, and South Africa, Mr. Novikov said that since these countries were, by "a unilateral and an altogether arbitrary" decision of Prime Minister Attlee, the only ones consulted, the Soviet Union must regard the proposed trusteeship agreements as only preliminary drafts which had still not been cleared through the proper channels. In a significant aside Mr. Novikov challenged the suggestion of Mr. Dulles that the United States would have a right to be considered a state directly concerned with all mandates because of its share in the treaties winding up World War I. In the Soviet view these treaties could not affect events occurring after the creation of the United Nations, which established new principles in international relations. On the basis of these statements it is a plausible assumption that the Soviet Union regards itself as a state directly concerned in the initiation of all trusteeships, but Mr. Novikov at no point said so, nor did he propose any general criteria.

On another score Mr. Novikov went at least as far off the United Nations Charter reservation as had Mr. Dulles. The Soviet spokesman not only attacked Britain and Australia for failing to come up with trusteeship agreements for Palestine and Nauru but accused them of violating the Charter. This was argued on the wholly untenable ground that there are only two legal ways of determining the fate of mandated territories—by granting them true independence (he also questioned the true independence of Trans-Jordan) or by transforming them into trust territories. While this contention represents the spirit of the Charter, the principle had been accepted, from Yalta through San Francisco, that no territory would become a trust save by voluntary agreement. Mr. Dulles was on sound ground when he said later that if the Soviet view were adopted for the mandates it should also be applied to the Kuriles, which were handed over to the Soviet Union from Japan.

While these debates were getting under way in the General Assembly's Trusteeship Committee, the United States was at long last producing its solution for the Japanese islands. An announcement by President Truman stated that the United States was prepared to place under trusteeship the Japanese-mandated islands and any other Japanese islands for which it assumed responsibilities, and that it was distributing to the other members of the Security Council and to New Zealand and the Philippines a draft of a strategic-area trusteeship agreement for the mandates. This draft is to be submitted formally to the Security Council for its approval at an early date. The State Department had won its battle for the principle of trusteeship, but the navy carried off a good many of the prizes. The United States has full power over the territory as an integral part of the United States; it has full military, naval, and air rights; it can limit aircraft flying into and out of the territory; and, perhaps most significant of all, it can determine to what extent the United Nations' right to examine and inspect is applicable "to any areas which may from time to time be specified by it as closed for security reasons." In sum, the whole sweep of the mandated islands, not merely the actual base areas, is declared a strategic area, and whenever the United States finds the United Nations or its organs over-inquisitive it can seal off any part or the whole of the area.

Until this plan is formally offered in the Security Council, the attitude of the Soviet Union and of other states directly, or indirectly, concerned will presumably not be known. As far as the record discloses, no effort has been made to win the agreement of the Soviet Union in advance, which seems a foolhardy tempting of fate in view of the veto. Mr. Dulles did not help the situation when he emphasized the unilateral nature of the American proposal by remarking that if the United States did not obtain approval of the proposed agreement it would hold on to the islands anyhow.

Paul-Henri Spaak
President of the General Assembly

An opportunity to elaborate the American position was presented when India introduced a resolution calling for the adoption of the general principle that trust territories should be administered by the United Nations itself rather than by any single country. Attractive as this seems in theory, authorities on colonial problems generally agree that one-country rule, despite its dangers, is preferable to the confusions almost inevitably resulting from international administration. In rejecting the Indian resolution, Mr. Dulles stressed that the United Nations was not at present organized to deal with the concrete and large-scale administrative problems posed by the trust territories, although he assumed that the international body, as it matured, would play an increasingly large role in trusteeship matters.

Mr. Dulles pointed out that under the wording of the Charter the establishment of the Trusteeship Council, which should be one of the major fruits of the present Assembly session, would become impossible if the United Nations were to be the usual administering authority. Until at least some states are identified administrators of trust territories through the approval of trusteeship agreements, the council cannot be brought into existence. This process has got off to a slow start with examination of the agreement proposed by New Zealand for Western Samoa. The heated debates over such matters as amendment of the agreement in the Assembly and the establishment of bases show that there are still many hurdles to be got over before the Trusteeship Council can swing into action as the major international instrumentality of the system.

Radio's Operation Crossroads

BY CHARLES A. SIEPMANN

JUSTIN MILLER, president of the National Association of Broadcasters, has stumped the country for some weeks, inveighing against the authors and supporters of the Federal Communications Commission's "Blue Book." He has described members of the FCC as "stooges for the Communists," "obfuscators," "professional appeasers," "guileful men," and "astigmatic perverts."

The Blue Book—officially titled "Public Service Responsibility of Broadcast Licensees"—is already a collectors' item and has been neither seen nor read by the majority of radio listeners. Its contents were summarized as follows by Charles Denny, chairman of the FCC, speaking at a meeting of the National Association of Broadcasters in Chicago on October 21:

> The Blue Book says that when an applicant [for a station license] represents that he is going to do certain things, he should, in fact, do something reasonably close to what he said he would do. The Blue Book says that a reasonable amount of time, including some time in the desirable parts of the broadcast day, should be devoted to sustaining programs. . . .
>
> The Blue Book says that a broadcaster should devote a reasonable amount of time to local live programs. . . . A true broadcaster will not content himself simply with plugging his transmitter into a network or a turntable and going off to Florida for the winter. Unless there is to be some organization of local live programs, we do not need radio stations in the various communities. All we require are unattended boosters.
>
> The Blue Book says that radio should not content itself with being simply an entertainment medium. . . . Radio should make an adequate amount of time available for the discussion of public issues. . . .
>
> The Blue Book says that advertising plays an indispensable part in our system of broadcasting, but that should not mean that broadcasting should be run solely in the interest of advertisers rather than that of listeners.

That, said Mr. Denny, is the Blue Book. "We do not intend to bleach it."

His assertion lends peculiar interest to a decision which the FCC must make on a fateful date in the near future. On January 13 hearings will be held on the application of Station WBAL in Baltimore for renewal of its license. The FCC's decision will be the test of the sincerity of Mr. Denny's claim that the commission stands by the Blue Book and does not intend to bleach it.

Station WBAL, Baltimore, is a "clear-channel" station with tremendous range and one of the most powerful transmitters in the country. When it sought a clear channel from the FCC in 1927, the station submitted a description which said that "although WBAL is owned by a private corporation [Consolidated Gas and Electric Company of Baltimore], its operation closely approximates that of a public enterprise." The station at that time retained as regular features, "to insure a uniformly high standard of program," a concert orchestra, an opera company, a salon orchestra, a dinner orchestra, a string quartet, and four other musical combinations.

But in November, 1934, control of the station passed into the hands of the Hearst interests. So marked was the change of tune that the station's record in 1944 was cited in the Blue Book as a prize example of gross default.

> During the week beginning Sunday, April 23, 1944 [says the Blue Book], only 12.5 per cent of the program time between 8 a.m. and 11 p.m. was "sustaining." On Monday through Friday of that week less than 6 per cent of the program time between 8 a.m. and 11 p.m. was sustaining, and no sustaining programs whatever were broadcast on those days between 2 p.m. and 11 p.m., a total of forty-five hours. . . . Between 8 a.m. and 11 p.m. of the week beginning April 23, 1944, Station WBAL broadcast 507 spot announcements, of which 6 were sustaining public-service announcements. An example, not unique, of the piling up of spot announcements is found in the forty-five-minute period from 8:15 a.m. to 9 a.m. on Monday, April 24, 1944, during which sixteen spot announcements were broadcast, or one every 2.8 minutes. . . . Less than 2.5 per cent of the station's time between 8 a.m. and 11 p.m. during the week was devoted to sustaining programs of local live origin. . . . During the entire week in question, the only local live-music broadcast by Station WBAL between 8 a.m. and 11 p.m. was as follows: a ten-minute music-award commercial program, Musical Maneuvers (thirty minutes), and Songs of Romance, commercial, at various times, totaling fifty minutes for the week. . . . During the week beginning April 23, 1944, NBC designated nineteen programs as public-service programs. Of these, Station WBAL carried five and failed to carry fourteen.

CHARLES A. SIEPMANN is chairman of the Department of Communications in the School of Education of New York University and author of "Radio's Second Chance." Because the FCC's decision with regard to Station WBAL is so important for the future of radio, Lou Frankel's regular page was omitted to make room for this discussion of the case. In One Ear will appear as usual next week.

The decision which the commission must make on the renewal of this station's license is not an easy one, for it renewed the license in 1942, when by the standards of the Blue Book WBAL was already in default.

Two alternative decisions appear open to the commission. One is to make the principles of the Blue Book retroactive and deny the renewal of the license; the other is to renew the license, either temporarily or for the statutory three-year period, on the strict understanding that the station will now and in the future conform in practice to the principles of public service enunciated in the Blue Book. (Since 1944 the station appears to have mended its ways to some extent.)

The FCC's decision is complicated somewhat by the presentation of a claim upon this station's frequency by two nationally known columnists—Messrs. Pearson and Allen. Without doubt these rival applicants will cite the Blue Book as evidence of Station WBAL's incompetence to serve the public interest and will submit program proposals intended to outbid those of the present licensee. How, in the scales of justice, shall the commission weigh the claims of a station which, while it defaulted in the past, gives pledges of reform, against the promise of a rival applicant to render even better public service? It is a nice question.

What is exciting and important about this case is that it offers opportunity for a community to make its wishes the decisive factor in determining the commission's verdict. The commission and the radio industry agree that the public ought to be the final arbiter of what goes on the air. The people of Baltimore and Maryland, and listeners farther afield within the service area of this powerful station, now have the chance to register their will. The decision should be theirs. It will be so only if interested groups in these communities present their testimony at the hearings and claim this right in time. Women's organizations, representatives of labor, farmers, and many other groups should organize—and quickly—to examine this case and submit testimony. It is a rare opportunity to test whether democracy works.

The greatest weakness in our system of broadcasting is the indifference of the public to the possibilities of radio service. Listeners to Station WBAL can now contribute to a momentous decision on which depends not only the quality of this one station but the service to be expected of all the thousands of stations in the country. If the principles of the Blue Book are not sustained in this decision, the FCC will be giving a green light to the radio industry to drop the book in the waste basket and continue blithely "down the primrose path of dalliance" which for too many years it has been treading. Civic groups in Maryland should realize that the eyes of all who still have high hopes for radio are on them.

In the Wind

SANITY JOTTINGS: The Wind has been rustling through old waste baskets recently, searching for evidences that there are a good many level heads in America. Point of departure and basic criteria were provided for the Wind by Leonard Lyons, in his syndicated column of November 21. Mr. Lyons tells of one Robert Irwin, a triple-murderer, "deemed incurably insane by psychiatrists," who "is not progressively deteriorating as they predicted." This was proved recently when Irwin was asked his preferences in magazines and books. Irwin requested Time, Life, Reader's Digest, and "How to Win Friends and Influence People." A well man, obviously.

TAKING IT FROM THERE, the Wind looked in on Assistant Judge W. C. Purcell of the Recorder's Court in Durham, North Carolina, who last October 23 suspended sentence on two University of North Carolina students who had celebrated a birthday "by indulging in beer, gin, whiskey, and wine and then swiping $200 worth of clothing" from a Durham haberdasher. Judge Purcell called this adventure a "college prank" and on that same October 23 sent to the roads for thirty days two Negroes convicted of stealing eight pounds of lard.

ON THE OTHER HAND, Illinois Circuit Judge Harry Fisher, in awarding unemployment compensation on October 7 to 1,500 workers who struck against Montgomery Ward in 1944, stated that "the men had a perfect right to . . . refuse to work on purely patriotic grounds." Now listen here, Judge. . . .

"SENATOR FULBRIGHT," sagely observes the Stevens Point (Wisconsin) Daily Journal, "is a sincere, able man. . . . unfortunately he is afflicted with a mental handicap as serious as a lost leg would be physically. He is a Rhodes scholar." So that's what a mental handicap is! Mr. Lyons, can you apply that somewhere?

BUT ADDING STABILITY to the American scene are the prices of Reno divorces, which have gone up from $100 to $150 each, and Senator John W. Bricker. The Senator's contribution was made in a speech, on November 20, before the Ohio Home Builders' Association, in which he declared that it is "a constant battle to keep the masses from overthrowing everything we stand for."

The People's Front

TO THOSE familiar with the inner workings of the League of Nations James B. Reston's recent story in the New York Times about the trading in votes among United Nations delegates is no trivial matter. A country's silence or its acquiescence in the compromises that undermined the prestige of the Geneva institution and rendered it useless to the cause of peace was often sold to the highest bidder in the corridors; principles were discarded as blocs bargained ruthlessly for the votes that would assure their candidate's election to the League Council or some key commission.

Mr. Reston's disclosures confirm my feeling that one of the chief traffickers in ballots at the United Nations may turn out to be the Arab League. Latin American delegates with whom I have spoken categorically deny rumors of a deal with the Arab states, but their denial has not put a stop to the persistent efforts of the Middle East delegations to effect an alignment that would place the two blocs in a position to make their voice and vote strongly felt in the Assembly.

It is somehow fitting that the role of corruptor of the League, once held by Fascist Italy and the puppets of the aggressors, should today, in the U. N., fall to the Arabs, who have been thrust into the international scene by cynical power intrigue. Together with Argentina the Arab League holds undisputed title to the fascist legacy, for until Germany began to lose the war it was whole-heartedly on Hitler's side. Syria and Lebanon, during the Vichy regime, became the chief Middle Eastern base of the German command; in Iraq the Mufti, working closely with Prime Minister Al-Galaini, initiated a revolt against England with a pogrom in the classic manner; the Allied intelligence services in Cairo seized a high Egyptian official who was delivering planes to Rommel's army then at the gates of Alexandria.

An ultra-nationalist campaign financed by the Nazis produced a series of sensational plots and violent outbreaks in the Middle East. If Hollywood could lay hands on the Mufti's correspondence which is now in the archives of the State Department, it would have the stuff for the most exciting "thriller" of the year. But despite promises by Under Secretary of State Acheson that the documents would be published, they remain a carefully guarded secret. Of course their publication might cause embarrassment in London; they would undoubtedly reveal that the Nazi solution of the Jewish problem—the gas chamber—originated with the spiritual leader of the Moslem world.

The elevation of the Arab states to their present position in world affairs is further proof of British ingenuity in extricating the empire from one of its crises. Almost overnight Britain succeeded in transforming allies of Hitler into respected members of the United Nations. The nations of the Levant declared war against Germany a few weeks before the Nazi collapse, thus, without firing a single shot or losing a single man, staking out a claim to seats in the new international organization. But appeasing the Arabs was not without its penalties. The British risked the friendship of France when they sponsored the openly anti-French activities of General Spears in Syria. Their Palestine policy cost the life of Lord Moyne, who with Spears had been one of the promoters of the Arab League. Nor could it have been pleasant for them to wink at the Mufti's escape from France, knowing well his record as an artist in pogroms and political murders. But there is no ceiling price on empire security; the British defenders of Western democracy resolutely closed their eyes and took the Arab fascists to their bosom.

The fascists of the Middle East, however, do not have the following that Hitler and Mussolini enjoyed when the Axis was in the ascendancy. The much-vaunted power of the Arab League is mostly bluff; its delegates, who move like potentates through the corridors of the United Nations, are backed by only a handful of feudal, corrupt elements in their respective countries. An outstanding exception among them is Edward Atiayah, a genuine liberal who is the league's representative in London. But in general the strength of the league is based on the suppression of all progressive movements and civil rights at home. Only last week an eminent Moslem liberal, Fawzi al Husseini, cousin and opponent of the Mufti, was assassinated because he advocated friendly relations with the Jews.

The so-called irreconcilable conflict between Arabs and Jews is another bluff invented out of whole cloth by the big powers to serve their special interests. I remember the day at Geneva, in the early twenties, when at a private dinner Feisal openly expressed himself in support of the Zionist cause. At that time the other Arab countries were much less concerned about Palestine. The "war" between Jews and Arabs started later, as a result of the work done by Bishop Macinnes, a notorious anti-Semite who was sent by the British to Jerusalem, and by Cardinal Barlassina, the Vatican representative. With the aid of General Storrs, who was then governor of Jerusalem, they brought the Mufti's family to power, supplying funds and other forms of help in an effort to delay the logical solution of the Palestine problem.

To suggest that the Arab League is a British invention designed solely to combat Zionism would be to narrow the issue and ignore the great dangers involved. After all, the Palestine problem will sooner or later be solved. But there will remain the Arab states, which today, because of Anglo-Soviet rivalry in the Middle East, are playing an international role out of all proportion to their importance. Ultimately they may prove a nuisance to both the major powers. The present pro-British orientation of the Arabs is, to say the least, ephemeral; replying to the charge that the Arab League "speaks Arabic with a British accent," Secretary General Accam Pasha said: "This suit is made of British cloth, but I am wearing it." As for Russia, if it plays ball with the Arab states, it will come off no better than it did in Perón's Argentina. Fascists remain fascists, and nothing can change them.

DEL VAYO

Reaching the Limit in Austria

BY G. E. R. GEDYE

Vienna, November 6

GENERAL MARK CLARK returned to Vienna for his farewell visit two days ago to find Austria moving rapidly toward the worst crisis it has faced since the reestablishment of the republic. In some respects conditions are slightly better than those prevailing at the onset of the winter of 1945-46, the first after the Red Army had bombed and shelled its way into Vienna and the retreating S. S. divisions had burned and dynamited all they could of the hated city. But psychologically, conditions are infinitely worse, for the Austrians have lost the one asset which buoyed them up in November, 1945—hope. Hope was all the Allied Commission could hold out to the Austrians that first winter. "Till the winter is over," it said officially, "survival, not recovery, is all we can aim at."

Austrians believed then that the ultimate goal of the Allies was the realization of their own solemn declaration in Moscow in 1943—that a "free and independent Austria" should be re-created. Now, nobody believes that the Allies are united in seeking any goal; a really "free and independent Austria" seems to be the last thing some of them desire. Last year Austrians hoped that UNRRA would bring an improvement in the emergency rations issued by the armies. Instead, UNRRA put off its responsibilities month after month, and when it did start distributing supplies, the ration scale was lower than the previous military one. Now it is still lower, only 1,200 calories as against the military ration of 1,550. Germans are starving on 300 more than that. Chancellor Figl's announcement that thanks to UNRRA and the United States the ration will be raised to the promised 1,500 calories by November 10 will mean only a badly needed two pounds more of bread a week.

In the last week of October all train services were suddenly suspended; save for trains carrying vital food supplies they remain so. All through last winter the authorities struggled to restore gas for cooking; it is still only available for a few hours daily—fewer than in the summer, and new cuts are threatened. Power shortage is causing more factories to work part time: today the state had to arrange for partial compensation for their workers; this has also had to be arranged for those unable to get to work when all means of transport are stopped by lack of power. The use of lifts, restored during the summer, is again forbidden. For three days in nine every house, office, and shop is to be deprived of current from 7 a. m. till 4 p. m.; one never knows when current will be cut off even after dark, leaving one in total darkness for from one to four hours—candles of course are unprocurable, but there is a little very low-grade petroleum for the few fortunate enough to own oil lamps.

Worse hardships than these could be faced with courage if people could see light ahead, could perceive any evidence of steady progress, however slow. The real crisis in Austria is one of confidence. The Austrians see no reason to believe that the Allies either intend to help them to their feet or will allow them to rebuild the country out of their own resources.

On October 29 the government, stung by endless attacks from newspapers of all three parties, especially in the provinces, called a secret session of Parliament—the last secret session, held after the Piave disaster in 1917, heralded the final break-up of the monarchy—and told the deputies the truth, for discreet and partial release in their constituencies. The alternative to continuing as at present was to turn over Austria, lock, stock, and barrel, to the Allies and invite them to rule the country through a Cabinet of officials. A showdown in secret session was preferred because of the fear that the four Allies would wrangle in council for months over the ministries each would seek to control and that Austria in the meantime would be partitioned perhaps forever into four zones under foreign rule. Why did not the government tell the truth in public session? Because it feared that one or the other of the Allies would accuse it of disloyalty and attempt to take it over.

The writer has learned some of the facts put before the secret session; the reader must divide the blame among the Allies as his general information about them may suggest. It would be wrong to imagine, as some may be tempted to do, that Russia is the sole culprit.

Austria is so short of all kinds of textiles that the ordinary citizen can purchase no clothing whatsoever. Yet for eighteen months one of the Allies has been forcing the government to hand over from one province alone an average of 100,000 yards of textiles monthly, obtaining it by military requisition, by paying for it in schillings requisitioned from the National Bank for "occupation needs," or by even shadier methods. Payment has never been made in foreign currencies or goods.

G. E. R. GEDYE is the Vienna correspondent of the London Daily Herald and of the Overseas Press of New York.

The raw material for these textiles was left in Austria by the Swiss as payment for the making up of larger quantities of the same material.

On October 22 General Körner, the Socialist burgomaster of Vienna, announced, "The Viennese can have only one pair of boots repaired in twelve months; only one pair of new boots will be available every five years." A survey of Vienna school children showed that 13.7 per cent are entirely without shoes; 7.3 per cent are kept from school by the lack of shoes. At the same time one of the Allies takes from one factory alone from 14,000 to 15,000 pairs a month of its output of 20,000. Austrian women have been unable to buy stockings since the occupation. From one rayon factory one Allied power has exported 500 tons of rayon, enough to keep Austrian women in stockings for years.

The Viennese have had no fuel issued for the winter. But one power holds large stocks of Austrian coal which it will sell back to Austria only at the world price—just double the domestic price, above which the Allied Commission forbids Austria to buy. Poland has failed to supply promised coal, and Austrian coal trains sent to the frontier had to return empty. Czechoslovakia has supplied only a fraction of the quantity promised. The direct cause of the stoppage of the train service was the exhaustion of coal reserves by the demand of one power for hundreds of special troop trains for maneuvers. For months one power has insisted on the export of Austrian power to Germany to feed factories there in which it is interested. One power, because it considers that another is preventing it from obtaining for its zone its due quantities of Austrian oil, holds back Austrian coal and Austrian livestock which the Austrian government wants to transfer elsewhere.

UNRRA ceases operations in December, and no definite arrangements have yet been made to replace UNRRA supplies. Yet one power has seized Austrian goods which could have been exported by Austria to pay for food, giving bonds in return to the value of 2,000,000 schillings. Payment would in any case have been made only in requisitioned schillings, but not even this has been done.

In addition there is local interference. The Austrian textile industry in one zone is forbidden to receive from another zone potato starch which would cost 1.50 schillings per kilo and has to import Czechoslovak starch from Switzerland at 4 schillings a kilo. Hundreds of truckloads of potatoes stand today in one depot rotted by frost and rain because a local commander refused to let them leave his zone for hungry Vienna; at the same time he forbade the movement of milk, cutting Vienna children's scanty rations by six to eight thousand liters a day.

One could continue indefinitely to quote from what was revealed at the secret session. In effect, the Austrian government, a coalition of the three parties—Catholic Volkspartei, Communists, and Socialists—said, "These are the facts—we are quite powerless." Parliament exculpated the government in a resolution which demanded of the Allies, among other things, that Austria alone should control the movement and sale of Austrian products at home and abroad. Next day, in public session, Eduard Heinl, Minister of Commerce, announced that the Russians had seized 169 concerns, including 47 iron and metal works. A week later the Russians said that they had restored several of these as not being "German property," citing a vinegar factory, a small trading company, a thread factory, and two big estates—all "of no special economic value," according to the Socialist Arbeiterzeitung.

America and Britain are mainly blamed for insisting that some 400,000 D. P.'s, unwilling for one reason or other to return to their own countries, many of them foreign fascists, remain in Austria, where their presence diminishes the scanty rations. The disproportionate demands of military officers, especially Americans, for accommodation, when the war destruction makes whole Viennese families share one room, creates much ill-will. The British in Carinthia are criticized for seizing in summer almost all accommodations in the health resorts on the great Wörthersee and in winter moving back into the warmth of Klagenfurt, at the expense of the population of this overcrowded town. The Austrians do not object to the Americans and British staying as long as any occupying power does, but we should have no illusions that these armies are any longer popular. Austria is weary of all foreign armies; it considers that they devour its substance, make self-government a mockery, and arrest even its parliamentary deputies and high police officials for anything that looks like criticism of their policies.

The Allies, for their part, have no illusions that their armies are here to guard against a revival of Nazism or to help the Austrians; they know that they are here solely to watch and oppose one another. "Beat my Jew if you wish, and I'll beat yours in return," medieval landowners are supposed to have said when differences arose between them. Today the Austrian inhabitants of the four zones say they have become the Jews of the respective occupying powers. The Viennese feel as baffled and angry when the Americans are unwilling to let UNRRA stores or Austrian livestock enter the Russian zone as they do when the British hold back Austrian steel in Styria, the Russians hold back Austrian oil in Zisterdorf, or the French mulct them of the milk, cheese, and butter of Tyrol and send it to France. Hunger strikes and demonstrations may break out at any moment among the enfeebled and despairing workers. One group alone is happy—the camouflaged Nazis, who lose no chance of whispering, "And wasn't Hitler right, as always?"

The grass is very green, my friend, and tousled, like the head of—your grandson, yes? And the mountain, the mountain we climbed twenty years since for the last time (I write this thinking of you) is saw-horned as then upon the sky's edge—an old barn is peaked there also, fatefully, against the sky. And there it is and we can't shift it or change it or parse it or alter it in any way. Listen! Do you not hear them? the singing? There it is and we'd better acknowledge it and write it down that way, not otherwise.
Not twist the words to mean what we should have said but to mean —what cannot be escaped: the mountain riding the afternoon as it does, the grass matted green, green underfoot and the air—rotten wood. Hear! Hear them!
the Undying. The hill slopes away, then rises in the middleground, you remember, with a grove of gnarled maples centering the bare pasture, sacred, surely—for what reason?
I cannot say. Idyllic!
a shrine cinctured there by the trees . a certainty of music!
a unison and a dance, joined at this death's festival: Something of a shed snake's skin, the beginning goldenrod. Or, best, a white stone, you have seen it: Mathilda Maria
Fox—and near the ground's lip, all but undecipherable, Aet Suae,
Anno 9—still there, the grass dripping of last night's rain—and welcome! The thin air, the near, clear brook water!—and could not,
and died, unable; to escape
what the air and the wet grass—through which, tomorrow, the great sun will rise bejeweled—the unchanging mountains, forced on them—and they received, willingly!
Stones, stones of a difference joining the others at pace. Hear!
Hear the unison of their voices. . . .

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS

DAVID TO BATHSHEBA IN THE PUBLIC GARDEN

Worn out of virtue, as the time of year,
The burning City and its bells surround
The Public Garden. What is sound
Past agony is Fall:
The children crowding home from school at five,
Punting a football in the bricky air—
You mourn Uriah? If he were alive,
O Love, my age were nothing but the ball
Of leaves inside this lion-fountain, left
For witch and winter. . . . Yet the leaves' complaint
Is the King's fall . . . whatever suffers theft.
The Latin labels on the foreign trees are quaint.

The trees, for decades, shook their discontent
On strangers: rustling, rustling the Levant.
Uriah might have found the want
Of what was never his
A moment, found the falling colors welcome. . . .
But he was dead before Jehovah sent
Our shadows to the lion's cave. What's come
Is dancing like a leaf for nothing. Kiss:
The leaves are dark and harping. You observe
The shedding, park-bound mallards as they keep Circling and craning for Uriah's sleep?
Driven, derided, Father, and my will a curve:

I knew these circles after Joab killed
Uriah in the shock of battle. Sharp
Arrows transfix me! You will harp
Of women? They are called
To succour Israel if his foot shall slide. . . . .
I knew you from my roof-top: bubbles filled
Uriah's fountain, and we splashed. You died
In Adam, while the grass-snake slid appalled
To summer, while Jehovah's grass-green lyre
Was rustling all about us in the leaves
That gurgled by us, upside-down. Earth grieves:
Unspeakable the groanings when it catches fire.

The fountain's failing waters ring around
The garden. Love, if you had stayed my hand
Uriah would not understand
The lion's rush, or why
This stone-mouthed fountain laps us like a cat. . . .
And he is nothing after death but ground,
Anger and anguish, Love? And when we sat
The nights of summer out . . . perhaps, it took
Of Fall, the Fall? Perhaps. I live. I lie
Drinking our likeness from the water. Look:
The Lion's mane and age! Surely, I will not die.

ROBERT LOWELL

THE PLACE OF DEATH

"The wreath is plaited wicker: the green varnish
Still traps, in its tarred pits, a race of gnats;
The flowers in the fruit-jar fail—and vanish,
Drying a stem for judgment. The outlandish
Angel fixing a grey granite Bible
With his red granite eyeballs; the red squirrel that squats
In the black walnut with a wormy nut,
Gnawing mechanically: these, the red
And white and blue woodpecker hammering
This light-pole, are enough to wake the dead—"
The living student walking with Spinoza
In his thin freckled hand, has sometimes felt,
Sinking upon a mound; the grassy airs,
The wood and meadow of their comprehension,
Have murmured to him, from the yellowing page,
That all determination is negation—
He has felt the boundaries of being fade,
These long-outmoded, mounded, dewy modes
Lapse to the seeding and inhuman Substance
Whose infinite, unchanging, and eternal thought
Is here extended in a thousand graves.
These shining bodies—vagrant as a flaw
Of the breath that, in the made, dead flower, mourns—
Involved in their essences the little existence
That survives their thought of it; in part denied
But real, and hence perfect, they hunch here,
A realm within a realm, the last contrary
Being of all used, persisting things—
Till the avenging angel sheathe his sword,
Forget that he is guardian, and dream
(His pocked head pillowed on the book of Life)
The flower and the fruit-jar Victory,
And these graves serving an eternal God
That happiness itself, and final liberty
Which (from the delta of the Alp-born Rhine)
The dead Spinoza named necessity. . . .
But the squirrel flames within the flaming wood
That soars above the poor mounds and their sigh:
"The pity that made us was not womanish";
But the gay bird hammers at the dying tree
Whose wires bring to the peoples light and death;
But the mourners gather for the dying gnat—
The dancers sparkling in their mating cloud—
And the sounds of the lens-grinder cease:
The mourners and the mourned are one. Once more
The great wind dances from the ends of Time
To breathe upon these leaves the student drops,
Napping an hour on this grassy grave.
But the angel whispers from the leafy tomb,
He is not here—see, see, he is not here;
But the leaves blow home to that inhuman kind
Who play their lives out in the place of death
And—dying, dying—from the unmourned grave
Cry to him: "Only man is miserable."

RANDALL JARRELL

American Aesthete

THE AMERICAN SCENE. By Henry James. Edited, with an Introduction, by W. H. Auden. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

NOW that "The American Scene" is reprinted, we may expect the astonishing book to be known and not only famed. It is worth many kinds of critical notice. Unprecedented in the annals of the Republic, for one thing, is such mastery of language as shows in the effortless long lift of its style. Revisiting Concord, the "restless analyst" ponders the felicities of the place, and moves piously through the historical associations, but is brought up sharply by another and, to our notion, a meaner thought:

> Beyond even such broodings as these, and to another purpose, moreover, the communicated spell falls, in its degree, into that pathetic oddity of the small aspect, and the rude and the lowly, the reduced and humiliated above all, that sits on so many nooks and corners, objects and appurtenances, old contemporary things—contemporary with the doings of our race; simplifying our antecedents, our annals, to within an inch of their life, making us ask, in presence of the rude relics even of greatness, mean retreats and receptacles, constructionally so poor, from what barbarians or from what pigmies we have sprung.

We will feel that American writing can never be finer than this. The danger is that in too many quarters it may be too fine. In any noble writing which has entered securely into the national consciousness, the linguistic staple probably consists in a folk element of common sententious rhetoric. But here this element is dangerously reduced; it is at once overlaid and refined till it nearly loses visibility. For here in procession come the quick phrases, amplifying and correcting each other so briskly that we say this must be an example of the "qualified" style. To which we have to add immediately that, abounding in lively metaphors, this is also a case of the animated or "poetic" style. But the refinement, whether by the qualifications or the metaphors, is such as to escape us if we let attention relax ever so slightly; and as for the middling or untechnical sort of readers, this like others of James's later writings may be supposed, quite simply, not even to solicit their effort. It is very brilliant writing. But it is not writing with an epical quality; it is not of and for the people.

And consider the "thought" of the passage. It is of a piece with the style, and equally characteristic of the author; it will testify to his uncompromising claim for finery, and with it some elemental defect of temperament. The humble things of Concord, such as the Old Manse and the "rude bridge" and the natural objects that belong in the cluster, should be able to be embraced with all affection, and without any boggling, by a proper piety. The patriot, whom we may regard as a spontaneous and warm-hearted variety of the aesthetic man, cannot afford to be repelled by their rudeness and lowliness. Where else is their invincible "existential" quality, to which piety and art make it peculiarly their business to consent? We take the impression of James as of a man undone by his own fastidiousness, which holds him back from obtaining the blessing of reconciliation. But for completeness we should say, Of the two reconciliations. First, the one with nature, for civilized man by his mode of living becomes more and more estranged from nature, till he recognizes and cannot endure his cosmic isolation; and then reconciliation with the common family of mankind, from which in his individual and specialized progress he has traveled apart till he has achieved a solitude, and become sick for his human society. Of the two needs, one is as compulsive as the other.

Motives of this sort are so powerful that they would seem able to do their own work; so that we need not be too concerned for the continuance of our national arts, and of our public works and manners and occasions. And when it comes to assessing the degree of their beauty, or tastefulness, we might survey them from a long-range anthropological sort of viewpoint, and find some comfort in being relativists. We shall then expect them to be just as "good" as the citizens deserve; but if they are better they will hardly be suitable for the purpose.

James could not assure himself that his native society would enjoy a presentable grade of these communal arts and rites unless some social class were made specially responsible for them. It had to be a superior class, and then they took some expense; the initiative devolved, in a word, upon the rich. James made no mistake about the advantages of wealth once possessed, and despised the processes of acquisition. In how many ways is a man of wealth a man of "means," if he could only know it! And in the last great days of Europe, which were James's days, a man might still know it. Not yet wholly inoperative was the design of a feudal and landed aristocracy, appointed in the name of noblesse oblige to be the fountain of public taste. The newly rich as they appeared could be assimilated into this class, and instructed. But in America, by 1906, the year of James's speculations, new rich men were appearing, the "dead-pan" riders upon the furious ocean of business that had cast them up, in a frequency fatal to the chances of any such assimilation. Nor was there, to tell the truth, an aristocracy to assimilate them; its provision had strangely been omitted in the American foundations; and even the agrarian tradition was not hierarchical but equalitarian. Therefore the public taste was low; there was nobody to manage it. It is not strange that James found the outstanding triumph of American civilization in the sumptuary splendors of hotel life, at the old Waldorf-Astoria, or the still more pretentious "caravansaries" newly come to Palm Beach; occasionally in some perfectly appointed function at the country club, on summer verandahs embowered by the very noblest trees. Of so small a fraction of the burden of taste in expenditure had the community of wealth managed to relieve the green American nouveaux. And James could discover no hope that, under these auspices, taste would go much farther. There is no hope.

The American scene is a large one, and the aspect of disorder is still upon it. It does not seem a favorable setting for James's passion for a taste which shall be an elevated one, as a matter of course, and then one to be shared in unanimity by all the citizens. But we might do well, as realists, if we should rule out of our aesthetics what we seem already to have ruled out of our politics—the idea that we are principally aiming at some tight, some wonderfully tidy organization of our persons. The loose society, which is the one according to our history, makes a poor showing for the elegant aesthete; but at any rate it lets its arts flourish at will, which is according to need; even among little congenial groups, and at all levels of taste. We shall not lack the usual facilities of the shared life; participations which are only symbolic, or festal, such as the arts and the fictions of society. These latter will still be the tireless agents of peace and concord among us.

JOHN CROWE RANSOM

A Family Monster

METAMORPHOSIS. By Frank Kafka. The Vanguard Press. $2.75.

THIS brief masterpiece is so direct, so like a punch on the jaw, that there should be little to say about it. But the introduction and the illustrations of the first American edition are so wrongheaded that they provide employment for a critic. The story is that a youngish man, who is supporting his parents and sister as a much-bullied commercial traveler, wakes up to find himself turned into a monstrous "vermin" (the charlady says "cockroach") of human size. The other three have to get jobs, and take in lodgers; the sufferer hides in his bedroom, and her sister in spite of her loathing makes efforts to keep him comfortable. His father is afraid of him and once injures him when driving him back to his room. The lodgers give notice when they discover him. But by then he has almost completed the process of starving himself to death, which he undertakes because he is so hopeless and such a drag on his family. At the end the sister is beginning to say that this is not her brother but only a monster which it is essential to kill, but we do not know whether they would act on it. All the family are trying to behave well. Once he is dead they find they are better off than when he was normal, because they have all got jobs, and having something to do the father has recovered his vigor. It is time the girl got married.

The introduction says that Kafka describes animals in all possible ways at once; as in a fable, where they are like men; as having qualities also interesting in men; as themselves, realistically; and as men acting as beasts. "He makes an identification of man and beast. Kafka's animals are totems." In accordance with this view, the pictures at the two ends of the book show dogs and pussycats in human poses, and the picture of the monster in the middle, swaggering in white tights, plumes, and a military carapace, might be a society portrait of Lord Byron fighting for the Greeks. Of course it is in a sort of Picasso style, but everyone knows that isn't meant to be horrid; it can be used to advertise ladies' underwear. Now I think that all this gives an entirely false idea of the story. The point which the story rams home is that the monster is unbearably nauseating, not in the least like a pussycat. The question of what the actual feelings of a man-sized woodlouse would be (he has more legs than a cockroach) is obviously not considered by the author, except perhaps in the one remark that his legs enjoy running. So far from being like any animal, for that matter, the sufferer is always human and nearly always high-minded. What he chiefly reminds me of is an elephantiasis case described by a doctor ten or more years ago in a horrible book called "The Elephant Man," who had an even more unbreakable sweetness of temperament in spite of the loathing which his body inspired. The whole story, indeed, might have been told about a real disease, and would only have lost (what is no doubt its chief value) the wild poetry and the sense of the appalling strangeness of the world.

If this is true, you may say, it is very unlike "The Castle" and "The Trial." I don't deny that the book satisfied the neurotic side of Kafka as well as the mystical one. No doubt the preface is right in quoting the reproach which Kafka supposed his father to give him, that he fought his father like vermin which both sting and suck blood. But though the first idea was a justification of the vermin, that is, the young writer who refused to get a job, the story as it worked out rose entirely away from those foggy troubles and became clear-cut in the sunlight. I think there is a lurking bit of neurosis right at the end, when we are told that the sister looked healthy "despite the make-up which made her cheeks look pale." She was dressed before she knew her brother was dead, but she had no need to pretend to be pale. It is a typical piece of the puzzle-technique which is used so magnificently in other Kafka books; not really out of place, because she might easily have been dramatizing the situation a bit, but quite trivial here; whereas in "The Trial" it would have carried some monstrous and enervating suspicion. It is also part of the Kafka atmosphere that the monster never tries to speak after the first day, though his mother certainly understood one thing he said through the door before she saw him ("he must be ill, even though he denied it this morning"), so that if he had had the courage to go on talking he would have been less completely cut off. Here, you may say, is the wilful defeatism of the usual Kafka; but you can also believe that the man would have acted so within the framework of the story. Indeed, the real Elephant Man, during the years he was with the traveling show, was never spoken to because everyone assumed he was imbecile. It is because the story is so real that the spangles tucked onto it by this edition look so tasteless.

However, there are several minor inconsistencies. For instance, his back is described as a hard carapace onto which this large animal can fall without getting hurt, but his father can throw a "red" (therefore presumably soft) apple which cracks it and makes it fester; no doubt it is the apple of Adam, but one wants the details more convincing. And the statement of page 59 that he had not heard his mother's voice "for so long" is quite incompatible with the previous story, though here there seems to be no symbolical excuse. Considering how much he is supposed to stink, it is unlikely that they would take to leaving his door open in the evening so that he can watch them; but perhaps this shows how remorseful his father was for throwing the apple. After the apple incident there could surely be no question of "cleaning himself several times a day by lying on his back and rubbing against the carpet" (page 83). In the other major Kafka books one feels sure the contradictions are intentional, indeed the more baffling they are the more carefully they seem placed; but this is a different kind of story and does not need them. Maybe he could never bear to read over the manuscript.

The Past and the Future

HIROSHIMA. By John Hersey. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.75.

JOHN HERSEY'S story of what happened to six ordinary persons at Hiroshima has been read all over America and heard by great radio audiences. Its stark simplicity has brought home to hundreds of thousands of persons what it meant to drop an atomic bomb on a great city. Some Americans have reacted with painful guilt at the thought that they belonged to the nation which catapulted this horror into the houses and streets of a city of whose very existence they had previously never heard. Many more have read it as the handwriting on the wall, prophesying the agony of the day when they will be citizens of a city marked for atomic destruction. Neither those who have read the book as a record of things past nor those who have read it as a portent of things to come have been able afterward to dismiss the negotiations of atomic commissions as if these statesmen were playing a mere impersonal game of diplomatic chess. The matter at issue has become for them scenes of the burned and wounded staggering endlessly along the roads, of living burial under fallen timbers and rubble, of vomit and suppuration and lingering death.

The hour-by-hour, day-by-day account of the experiences of a seamstress, a clerk, a Jesuit priest, a Japanese Methodist preacher, and two doctors is written with complete simplicity, and the calmness of the narrative throws into relief the nightmare magnitude of the destructive power the brains of man have brought into being. There is no preaching in this book. Not a single sentence "views with alarm." Even the page which calls attention to the fact that the bomb which destroyed Hiroshima was a mere feeler, one-tenth or one-twentieth as powerful as possible atomic bombs which could be developed in the future, is a matter-of-fact account of what well-equipped Japanese nuclear physicists learned about the nature of the bomb by investigating the ruins of the city. They mimeographed their findings in little books for private circulation in Japan during the months when the American authorities were maintaining security on the subject of atomic fission.

Now that John Hersey's book has been issued between covers it will be read by another vast audience. The fascination of the subject of atomic destruction and the pure human interest of the theory will put it high on the best-seller lists. It will stir a new set of readers to an understanding that all other issues in the world today pale beside the necessity of outlawing war among the nations.

Even at this moment, when the topical interest of John Hersey's story overshadows all else, "Hiroshima" is important on other counts. It is a capsule of Japanese life, and it tells more about our ex-enemy Japan than many learned books. Because so many people will identify themselves with the sufferers in Hiroshima, seeing their own dread foreshadowed in what has already happened there, they will miss the importance of this little volume as a sourcebook on Japanese behavior. But it is that too. The story is not a preview of what people would do if New York or Chicago were devastated by an atomic bomb. It is a story of how people in a Japanese city behaved. The record would be important because of this fact, even if it did not also tell the tale of how the curtain was raised upon the new Atomic Age.

For the Japanese did not behave as many Westerners had imagined they would. Even the German priests in the Novitiate three miles from the center of the city, one of them has said elsewhere, feared, until a messenger was dispatched to them, to go to the rescue of their brothers who were stationed in Hiroshima itself. They thought the populace might attack any Westerner. It was a reasonable fear; Westerners had dropped the bomb. But when they went into the city, no hand or voice was raised against them. A band of soldiers challenged them, on the theory that they might be American parachutists, and, when the priests identified themselves, the soldiers apologized. That was all. As the seamstress, a poor widow, said of the bombing, "It was war and we had to expect it." Hostility against Westerners was not shown in Hiroshima then or since. The first military commission after V-J Day was met at the airport by the Japanese officials drawn up in due order and invited to drink tea with their hosts. A year after the bombing the Hiroshima Planning Conference discussed plans for "erecting a group of buildings as a monument to the disaster and naming them the Institute of International Amity."

Nor was there mass hysteria among the sufferers at Hiroshima. Some Westerners had believed that toward the close of the war the time was ripe for such behavior among the Japanese in the homeland. It did not happen. With their leaders and doctors decimated and offices and hospitals destroyed, the populace acted, indeed, as sheep without shepherds. The able-bodied, during that first day, did not organize themselves into rescue teams. "Under many homes people screamed for help, but no one helped; in general survivors that day assisted only relatives or immediate friends, for they could not comprehend or tolerate a wider circle of misery." Nor did sufferers expect such help. In the parks and along the rivers where people streamed for refuge "it was not easy to distinguish the living from the dead, for most of the people lay still, with their eyes open. To Father Kleinsorge, an Occidental, the silence in the grove by the river, where hundreds of gruesomely wounded suffered together, was one of the most dreadful and awesome phenomena of his whole existence. The hurt ones were quiet; no one wept, much less screamed in pain; no one complained; none of the many who died did so noisily; not even children cried; very few people even spoke. And when Father Kleinsorge gave water to some whose faces had been almost blotted out by flash burns, they took their share and then raised themselves a little and bowed to him, in thanks."

Even the Reverend Mr. Tanimoto, the Methodist preacher who had studied theology in the United States, and who organized himself as a committee of one to carry water to the wounded and to ferry them across the river out of the way of the flames, was "as a Christian filled with compassion for those who were trapped," but "as a Japanese he was overwhelmed by the shame of being unhurt." "In his guilt he turned from right to left as he hurried and said to some of them, 'Excuse me for having no burden like yours.'"

Nine days after the bomb was dropped the Emperor spoke over the radio. In accepting defeat, he said, his people were to resolve "to bear the unbearable and to tolerate the intolerable and thus leave an imperishable foundation for generations to come." Over the radio in America his words seemed a kind of whistling in the dark. They did not seem to promise any specific kind of behavior. In Japanese eyes, however, they did. They promised a continuance of a behavior inculcated for centuries in Japan and expressed at Hiroshima when man by man and woman by woman they had "borne the unbearable" with patient fortitude. For the Japanese do not fight against circumstance; the bombing was a risk they had taken when they entered into war and "they had to expect it." Their duty is to fight weakness in themselves and to control their pain and personal sufferings. They do not have to reason why or to rail at a universe which requires such discipline. Westerners had doubted whether Japan could surrender; the Japanese knew that they could take capitulation with the same self-control the wounded and dying had showed at Hiroshima. If they could maintain such proprieties, they would not lose their self-respect in their own eyes.

Russia, Russia!

THE GREAT CHALLENGE. By Louis Fischer. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $4.

ONE might plunge right into the substance of this powerful and impassioned book by asking the question: What is the great challenge? "Hitler, Mussolini, and Hirohito challenged the democratic world," Louis Fischer says on page 329. "We smashed the challengers. Now Russia challenges the democratic world. This is the greatest challenge the democracies have ever confronted. It is a challenge to improve or succumb." I have chosen this quotation rather than a score of others because its last sentence indicates the philosophical base on which the author sincerely intends to rest his scathing criticism, his violent rejection of Russia and all that country's works, methods, and thoughts. In its implications of tragedy it discloses, too, in what I believe to be a defective manner, the nature of the choice before us.

I will say at once that I have no intention of trying to rebut the author's analysis of Russian developments. Stalin has undoubtedly incorporated nationalism into his Marxist philosophy, and the result has been both a sharpening of the international crisis and a source of confusion for the European left. But the author constantly overplays the importance of this nationalism. For had the revolution developed in accordance with its early promise, the opposition in the West, supposing the present or another equally grave crisis to exist, might very well be sharper than it is. Moreover, the Soviets would still be in a position to "exploit," to use the author's word, the real needs of men. As Louis Fischer is fully aware, those needs antedate the Russian Revolution and the form it has taken. The fact is that, in considerable measure, it is the economic message of the Soviet Union, in conjunction with its emergence to power, that awakens hostility. Its forms and its means often confuse and divide, but there was always a specter haunting Europe.

Basically Louis Fischer's values remain the same; yet in all that he has written since his revulsion from Russia I have been astonished at the increasing parsimony with which he uses the social philosophy which he sincerely believes himself to believe. Take, for example, his formulation of what he regards as the correct policy for the Western powers. On page 335 he rejects the proposal to fight Russia now. He scorns appeasement of the U. S. S. R. because he says it will compel us to fight that country later on. His own policy is described in these words, "Block Russia's territorial expansion by an effective international organization and block Russia's ideological expansion by increasing the contentment and cohesion of the countries in her path."

At first sight this appears to be a socialist version of "Stop Russia." The old Louis Fischer would have been very quick to say that a policy of stopping Russia "by an effective international organization" runs a great danger of becoming one of building an international organization in such a way that it will stop Russia and everything else on the left. That is what is likely to happen; what is happening. The intention of the Stop Russia powers is all too clear. It is to use the United Nations in exactly the way the League of Nations was used, as an instrument not only for checking Russian expansion but for stabilizing and even extending those empires which Louis Fischer believes constitute a major cause of war.

As things are now, there is no such thing as an ideal Stop Russia policy; there is just one policy conditioned and characterized by the nature of the social forces it most naturally rallies to itself. That the liberal forces which have committed themselves to the present conservative leadership of the United States will be able to modify the major aspect of the present policy, I cannot believe. Nothing in the mathematics of probability and nothing in the history of the interwar period encourages that hope. The contents of the book itself seem to support me. One can register a dissent from imperialism very impressively by writing about India as Louis Fischer does. But the indignant expression of dissent is no substitute for a close and extensive survey of the general problem. For all its vehemence "The Great Challenge" provides no clear picture of the real world of politics within which the struggle for Louis Fischer's values goes on. Indeed, because this book presents no systematic analysis of Western policy but concentrates by far the greater part of its fire on the Soviet Union, it is rather worse than a passionate abstraction. A foreign policy truly expressing socialist intentions will not consist of measures universally acceptable to the right plus a protestant rider. Louis Fischer's jockey, who wears the colors of civil liberty, is an excitable and voluble idealist, but his mount is out of control.

"The Great Challenge" contains little about issues that once agitated its author deeply. There is almost nothing about Spain, for example. To be exact, there is one sustained half-page on Spain, in which Louis Fischer rejects the idea of an armed invasion to liberate that country. Why this shying away from the question? Is it that the author fears communism in Spain also? And why the unsatisfactory reference to Greece? And why, in a section that discusses the Far East almost wholly in terms of Stop Russia, does he dismiss consideration of Chiang Kai-shek's regime by what I can only call a frivolous anecdote?

In his section on India the author has pointed out the strategic reasons for Britain's maintenance of the puppet princedoms. They are there to prevent revolts within India, to break up the areas of disaffection. What, then, is the significance of our tolerance of Spanish fascism? What does Mr. Fischer suppose is the meaning of our mustering of reactionary powers? He may say that London and Washington have not organized an anti-Soviet bloc. Alas, the case is then far worse, for one must ask why of themselves these powers gravitate toward us. In "Men and Politics" Louis Fischer defended himself against the unmade charge that, despite serious misgivings, he had withheld criticism of Russia because it might have damaged the struggle in Spain. Can it be that he is now unconsciously withholding criticism of Western policies because it might damage the struggle against Russia?

So, too, when we turn to the internal social scene, "The Great Challenge" is deficient. There is still no thoroughgoing analysis of the problem of European reconstruction. The author does not seriously examine the political situation in terms of parties and classes. That a Stop Russia policy in the hands of conservative states must bring reactionary interests toward power the author is aware. But it is not a problem which he is willing to examine in concrete terms; perhaps because it leads to the very brink of a horrifying abyss. There is just one brief phrase in which he admits that in such countries as France and Italy the Socialists and Communists must work together to defeat these reactionaries. It is a negative approach, and there is consequently no realization that these parties must do this by evolving a contractual program designed to further socialist transformation.

Here, I believe, is the source of Louis Fischer's trouble. There is an either-or division within the heart of man, and it is common to all effort in every sphere. To surmount it is extremely difficult. Within socialism it takes the form of a conflict between civil liberty and effective social change. Democratic processes do not necessarily guarantee that man will react reasonably to the real world. An election may return to power a Stop Russia party with very little interest in the common welfare. Fearing this, impatient at it, feeling that they must exteriorize their aggressions, many Socialists are attracted to dictatorial methods because they offer a new dynamism. The result is that the socialism they achieve or support remains lifeless: the blood of freedom has gone from it. There is probably no real solution to the dichotomy. For my part I think socialism needs the parliamentary system to be worth while and effective; yet I am aware that in many countries, such as Spain, a minimal approach to the vast problem of social reform itself endangers parliamentarianism.

It is a dilemma which lies at the root of all socialist efforts. The tendency, sensed or unsensed, is to swing between the two poles of longing for concrete change and longing for the safeguards of democracy. Formerly Louis Fischer, though a democrat, looked without excessive harshness on revolution and Communist dictatorship, because of his desire for concrete social change. Now, fearing dictatorship, he swings toward civil liberty and appears less eager for the concrete changes that would give civil liberty real substance. That is why, haunted as he is by the threatened doom of Western civilization, he urges, not radical transformation, but "improvements" and "an increase of contentment and cohesion."

An Intolerable Confusion

A HISTORY OF AMERICAN POETRY, 1900-1940. By Horace Gregory and Marya Zaturenska. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

IT IS difficult to say how much is wrong with this book because there is so much that is wrong and the wrongness is of so many different kinds. Although it is a history, the errors of fact are not as important as the triviality of detail: one learns that William Carlos Williams was born on September 17, 1883, William Butler Yeats made a speech in Chicago on March 1, 1914, and a poem by Allen Tate appeared in the winter, 1944, issue of the Kenyon Review. And to speak of the wrongness of judgment is difficult too, since this may be said to be merely a matter of opinion. Nevertheless, it is the opinion of one reader that the Gregorys indulge in a systematic wrongness of praise and dispraise. Most of the important and famous poets of the period consistently receive the damnation of faint praise; and at the same time minor, mediocre, and bad poets are equally damned by being overpraised. Most difficult of all to make clear is the margin of inexactness involved in the Gregorys' use of comparison. Comparison is an invaluable tool of criticism; but in the Gregorys it is a desperate infatuation. They are moved by some kind of free association which makes them bring forth any comparison; and the more far-fetched the comparison, the more they appear to be delighted with it.

For example, the narrative poems of Edwin Arlington Robinson are entitled a "Comédie Humaine," although few authors resemble each other as little as Balzac and Robinson, and few narrative poets lack to such an extent the comprehensiveness and the variety which such a term as the human comedy signifies. In the same way Robert Frost is named "the Horace of our day" and endowed with a "Horatian serenity." The inexactness here is a complicated one which becomes clear only when one remembers that Frost might have been just as fruitfully compared to Vergil, to Wordsworth, to Emerson, and to Robinson. Equally fantastic is the comparison of W. H. Auden to Lovelace on the basis of a resemblance of stanza forms and the single occurrence of such "Freudian" words as "wombs" and "tombs." With like justice Karl Shapiro is said to resemble William Saroyan, a comparison which shows itself in a true light if one declares that William Saroyan resembles Karl Shapiro. And T. S. Eliot, who is entitled "the Twentieth-Century Man of Feeling," whatever that may mean, is compared to Delacroix: "how well, how appropriately," say the Gregorys, "Eliot's tigers and leopards would appear in company with Delacroix's lions and Arabs!" Any other painter of lions might have done as well; and as for tigers, presumably the Gregorys refer to Eliot's phrase "Christ the tiger," which, given their habits of association, makes one curious as to how when they thought of Delacroix's lions they forgot "Mary had a little lamb."

Inaccurate and bewildering as this use of comparison is, it might not matter so much if the Gregorys did not use comparisons as a means of insinuating judgments of value. There is nothing here that can quite equal Mr. Gregory's comparison, in a review in the New Masses, of Yvor Winters to Adolf Hitler on the basis of a resemblance Mr. Gregory had discovered between Hitler's paintings and Winters's lyrics; but there is much that comes fairly close. John Gould Fletcher's poetry is inflated in value by being termed "post-impressionism," which presumably suggests Cézanne; but then, as soon as the reader attempts to see what this can mean, he finds that, for the Gregorys, Fletcher's "Color Symphonies" were attempts to capture "the feeling, the spirit, the mood of post-impressionism in music and in painting." Now if the "Color Symphonies" are influenced by anything, they are influenced by impressionism, but if we are going to compare Eliot to Delacroix, we might as well confound Manet with Cézanne and make believe that both are indistinguishable from Debussy.

It is when they move at great speed from a comparison to a judgment that the Gregorys are most fascinating of all. The wit of one poet is so fine, we are told, that we must go back to the eighteenth century to find his equal. We are not told how to get by Lord Byron's wit, although on the other hand the Gregorys appear to know of Byron, at least in name, since they call Auden "a latter-day Byron" not long before they forget this characterization for the sake of the comparison to Lovelace—unless, that is, they think Byron resembles Lovelace. It turns out that Louis Untermeyer is not only "a romantic traditionist," in which respect we learn that he resembles Mark Van Doren and Robert Hillyer, but Untermeyer's translations of Heine will "probably remain the most impressive tribute to Heine's memory that the present century will yield." The prudence of "probably" is admirable, for otherwise the Gregorys would have no guard against what may happen in the remaining fifty-four years of the century. Unfortunately, here there is a solid ground of fact; Untermeyer's translations are bad in the plain sense that they are inaccurate, and this has been demonstrated with ease a number of times. To harp on it would be unjustifiable, were it not that it is characteristic of the disproportionate attention the Gregorys often give to works, such as Untermeyer's translations, which deserve nothing but silence; just as they waste space on many varieties of irrelevance, especially pointless quotation, going so far at one point as to quote the entire newspaper notice of the death of John Wheelwright, and elsewhere remarking on who received a Guggenheim and in what year.

If one had to choose a sample of what is most typical of this book, the pages which deal with Archibald MacLeish might serve as well as a dozen other shocking excursions. Here we learn that critics were wrong to compare MacLeish's "Conquistador" to poems by Eliot and Pound: the true comparison is to Longfellow's "Evangeline," which is "the actual precedent for the flaws and merits of the poem." The Gregorys may or may not mean precedent, but since they cite the facts that both poems are in unusual meters and deal with the exotic, one might reflect endlessly on why they chose "Evangeline" rather than "Hiawatha." Nothing but direct quotation, however, can display the fatuity of some paragraphs and the Gregorys' difficulty in using words correctly: "The coming of the Second World War created a new series of emergencies for Archibald MacLeish; in 1939 he received an honorary degree at Yale and was appointed Librarian of Congress." Here for the first time an honorary degree at Yale and the position of librarian have become emergencies. "Soon his activities placed him in the Office of Facts and Figures as well as in the Office of War Information, and though the first office was dissolved and the second had undergone changes which temporarily cast a shadow across MacLeish's career of political advancement, MacLeish's genius for diplomacy was rewarded." Here perhaps the sympathetic reader will concede a reason for the reference to emergencies in the first quotation; and here for the first time he will learn that MacLeish's political career in Washington was marked by genius, which was rewarded rather than shunted from post to post. "In accepting these responsibilities and honors MacLeish followed the footsteps of James Russell Lowell as minister to Spain . . . and ambassador to Great Britain."

Again comparison is irresistible to the Gregorys. But the citation of Lowell is not enough. Another precedent is necessary: ". . . still another precedent for MacLeish's activities may be found in the career of John Hay (1838-1905), the author of 'Pike County Ballads' (1871)." Hay and MacLeish are both poets, and that is precedent enough: no two poets are more unlike, but both are diplomats; although MacLeish never became Secretary of State, he "probably" was willing to follow in the footsteps of his precedent. In the next sentence the Gregorys make use of their most precious source of comparison, the incomparable phrase "not unlike," which can be used to bring any two things together: "Not unlike MacLeish's, John Hay's early training was in law; he was an assistant private secretary to President Lincoln, and he closed a distinguished career in diplomatic services as Secretary of State in Theodore Roosevelt's Administration. A future historian may discover that John Hay's anonymously published novel, 'The Bread-Winners,' which appeared serially in the Century magazine from August, 1883, to January, 1884. . . ." The dates are given, no doubt, so that, if one wants, one can try to get copies in second-hand periodical stores. And one must also remark upon the circumspection of the phrase "a future historian may discover." " 'The Breadwinners' was the true ancestor of MacLeish's political verses; Vernon Louis Parrington treated the novel harshly, yet MacLeish, in his satires, seems to stand for 'educated leadership'. . . . Upon the death of Stephen Vincent Benét, MacLeish also assumed the responsibility of editing the 'Yale Series of Younger Poets.' " It is untrue that MacLeish's political verses have any connection with Hay's novel; and it is impossible to make out what the grammatical connection can be between Parrington's judgment and MacLeish's stand for educated leadership. And if anyone wants to know what conceivable relevance the foregoing quotation has to American poetry, the answer is that it has practically as much relevance as practically anything else one may say about a poet, provided that it has little to do with the nature of his poetry.

The ineptitude of the detailed discussions is obviously such that the reader tends to forget what is merely absent: a coherent point of view, a sense of cultural and social history, and an analysis of poetic techniques. As to point of view, the Gregorys say that their "intention is to present a history of American poetry which is humane in its interest rather than humanitarian"; after some reflection, it is possible to guess that whatever the Gregorys may mean by scorning a humanitarian interest (one possibility is that they intend to flee from social analysis), it is extremely likely that the vagueness of what they mean by "humane" can be reduced by supposing that they have confused it with "humanist," and adding the connotation of "gossip." American poetry between 1900 and 1940 is a rich subject and a complex one: it might well be studied purely as a development of techniques; or one might record the influence of social crisis and cultural change upon the sensibility of individual poets; or one might study the most important schools or the most representative poets. The Gregorys have done none of these things with thoroughness, exactness, or justice. They merely have mixed up the several possible methods of dealing with the subject, and they have produced what must be called an intolerable confusion. DELMORE SCHWARTZ

Slaves and a Sophist

THE SERVILE STATE. By Hilaire Belloc. With an Introduction by Christian Gauss. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

ONE often gets, or at least I do, more enlightenment about present society from the non-progressive thinkers of the past century than from the liberals and Marxists. The skeptical and pessimistic spirit of the former, from De Tocqueville to Weber, freed them from doctrinaire illusions and opened more profound insights than the progressive tradition permitted; even the genius of Marx was hobbled by that tradition.

At first glance this reissue of a book written in 1912 by a leading Catholic historian seems to be a case in point. Belloc excoriates capitalism with Marxian vigor and in surprisingly Marxian terms. In addition, his nostalgia for the Middle Ages made him see what few Marxists of that time saw: that industrial progress and collectivism were, in fact, not leading toward socialism but toward something very different; and that decentralization was a major requirement of advance toward a better society. A remark like the following seems acute in the light of the present nationalization program in England: "Who can imagine that if, say, two of our great industries, coal and railways, were handed over to the state tomorrow, the armies of men organized therein would find any change of character of their lives, save in some increase of security and possibly in a very slight increase of earnings?"

The more one reads in the book, however, the more one realizes that Belloc's central thesis is spectacularly unsound; and since the book is no more than a scholastic elaboration of this thesis, there is nothing much left once it collapses. Belloc states his thesis in one sentence on page 101: "The capitalist state breeds a collectivist theory which in action produces something utterly different from collectivism: to wit, the servile state." This might appear unexceptionable enough, in the light of the Russian experience, except that Belloc's definition of the "servile state" is not what one might expect. Taking the instability and non-viability of capitalism for granted, Belloc outlines three possible future solutions:

(a) Collectivism, or the placing of the means of production in the hands of the political officers of the community.

(b) Property, or the reestablishment of a distributive state, in which the mass of citizens should severally own the means of production.

(c) Slavery, or a servile state, in which those who do not own the means of production shall be legally compelled to work for those who do, and shall receive in exchange a security of livelihood.

Although he affects a "hard-boiled" scientific neutrality, Belloc's personal choice is clearly for the second alternative: a society of small farmers, merchants, and artisans owning their own means of production and exchanging their products on a free market—something like Jefferson's ideas, or Proudhon's. But he rightly points out that although this solution is logically conceivable, it seems historically unlikely, since the trend of capitalism is toward centralization. The main argument of his book is that this trend will result not in collectivism, as the Socialists expect, but in the "servile state." By this striking phrase Belloc does not mean—as the jacket blurb states and as Mr. Gauss's rather woolly introduction seems to imply—what critics of socialism from Herbert Spencer on have meant: regimentation by a state bureaucracy, which replaces the private capitalist as owner and exploiter. Rather does he mean, as he is at pains to repeat several dozen times in the course of a short book—his style, like Stalin's, has the repetitious, catechism quality of the theological seminary—a society in which a small number of private capitalists force the non-owning masses to work for them by direct legal compulsion. Now it must be clear to a child—to write like the author—that just the opposite has happened. We have the state everywhere taking from private capitalism. Even in this country the state is more powerful economically and private business less so than they were twenty years ago. Throughout Europe basic industries are being nationalized, the bourgeoisie is vanishing as a significant social force, and while there are plenty of indications of the growth of servile relations, they are not arising on Belloc's basis. ("That state is not servile in which all citizens . . . must labor at the discretion of state officials.") The nationalization of industry which he proves in detail cannot ever take place in England is now coming about. As for Russia: in the preface to the 1927 edition Belloc writes, "I have not modified the sentence in which I say that state collectivism can show no working example, for the Russian Revolution . . . has not produced a collectivist state; on the contrary, it has produced a state the vast bulk of which—some nine-tenths—have, by it, been confirmed as peasant-holders." It was a brave bit of casuistry, with just enough truth to be effective. The Old Guard dies but never surrenders. And death came a few years later when Stalin put through the forced-collectivization program.

How did Belloc come to adopt such a fantastically wrong-headed thesis, and to stick to it as late as 1927? That he is a superficial thinker is clear from the false-lucid rhetoric of his style: baby-talk for the intelligentsia. That he is a doctrinaire of the most irresponsible kind, handling ideas and data with the fine free sweep of an undergraduate debater, appears in the forty-page "historical digression" in which he traces the social and economic history of Europe from the Roman Empire to the Industrial Revolution, showing how everything good flowed from the Catholic church and everything bad from the pagan centuries before its rise and the Protestant centuries after its decline. As a doctrinaire, he saw private property as an eternal principle, for good or ill; and the superficiality of his intelligence enables him to stick to this in the face of all evidence. His book might still be of value had he not adopted an "objective" pose throughout, insisting that he is not using the term "servile" pejoratively, and that he is not concerned with inquiring as to "which form of society might reasonably be preferred." This pseudo-neutrality—for such it is, whether in Belloc or in Burnham—is a cheap rhetorical trick designed to persuade a scientific-minded audience. But once the thesis to be advanced thereby has been outmoded, very little is left. Had Belloc frankly tried to show the virtues of his "distributive" society and why it should "reasonably be preferred" to other societies, his book might still be to the point today. As it is, it would seem he outsmarted himself. DWIGHT MACDONALD

Homo Faber, Homo Magus

THE MYTH OF THE STATE. By Ernst Cassirer. Yale University Press. $3.75.

IN HIS "Myth of the State" the late Ernst Cassirer has provided an illuminating survey of some major texts in the history of political theory, such as Plato's "Republic," Machiavelli's "Prince," the doctrine of the "social contract," Carlyle on hero-worship, Hegel's metaphysics of the state, and so on. The exposition is keen and clear, well reflecting the author's thorough grounding in philosophy. A reader shown over the field by such a guide can consider himself well guided indeed.

The political "myth"—there is no talk of "ideology"—is here placed in terms of a dualistic distinction between the "magical" and the "semantic." The "magical" use of language, we are told, "tries to produce effects and to change the course of nature," while the "semantic" serves to "describe things or relations of things."

> The historians of human civilization have told us that mankind in its development had to pass through two different phases. Man began as homo magus; but from the age of magic he passed to the age of technics. The homo magus of former times and of primitive civilization became a homo faber, a craftsman and artisan. If we admit such an historical distinction our modern political myths appear indeed as a very strange and paradoxical thing. For what we find in them is the blending of two activities that seem to exclude each other. The modern politician has had to combine in himself two entirely different and even incompatible functions. He has to act, at the same time, as both homo magus and homo faber.

Much valuable insight is got through this approach. Yet it may cause contemporary doctrines of political motivation to seem somewhat more "strange and paradoxical" than need be. For although there are aspects of language that cannot be comfortably reduced to either the "magical" or the "semantic," when we have but these two bins whatever cannot be classed as "semantic" must be classed as "magical." As a result, with so much disturbing evidence of reversion to savagery in the modern world, we are invited to conclude that there is even more.

What seems to be missing in this study of political "myth" is a systematic concern with the functions of speech that fall under the traditional heading of "rhetoric." When one human agent sets other human agents in motion, for instance, by calling for help, such a persuasive use of words is not sheer magic spell, as with the attempt to coerce physical nature by incantatory means. Nor is it quite the semantic use of language to "describe things or relations to things." It is the motive that goes into rhetoric.

True, it may be greatly misused, as with race doctrines designed to promote social cooperation for sinister ends. But in itself it is a normal and proper function of words. Being hortatory rather than descriptive, it would fall outside the "semantic" bin; yet its essentially realistic nature, when properly used, would make it a bad fit for the "magical" bin. If we give it a bin of its own—the category of the "rhetorical," with a systematically generated set of terms to round out the analysis—we can study its ways shrewdly enough, but without so many extremely discouraging incentives to believe that presumably civilized populations are running around with rings in their noses.

Technically, the dualistic approach here seems to get an important aspect of language turned backward. For if there is any sort of real experience motivating primitive magic, it must be rooted in the fact that one person's expressions, commands, and requests, when interpreted by other persons,

Island In the Atlantic

by WALDO FRANK

This is the story of Jonathan Hartt and Evan Cleeve, two boys who meet in the panic and nightmare of the bloody Draft Riots of 1863. It is a story of New York in its most colorful, most exciting era—the changing scene of New York through fifty years of its flowering. really can produce desired effects. Error arose when men transferred the use of the verbal instrument to areas where it does not belong, as when trying by incantation to influence natural things that do not understand language. But if, as with the Cassirer dualism, you begin with natural magic, the hortatory use of language to influence human conduct seems derivative from this derived magical use, rather than existing in its own right. Hence verbal inducement, even in the sphere of human communication, is treated roundabout, as a "social magic" that descends from natural magic. The point is worth stressing because it is characteristic of much modern theory, with its tendency to define human motives by matching science against some antithetical term.

But whether or not the modern political "myth" might be approached more directly, and with less distressing implications, than in "The Myth of the State," there is much of great moment to be observed about it when viewed in the Cassirer perspective, which considers it primarily as a mixture of bad poetry and bad science. For large areas of it are just exactly that. And much of the book is an apt summary of works in their own terms. KENNETH BURKE

A Philosopher Fallen Among Anthropologists

THE THEORY OF HUMAN CULTURE. By James Feibleman. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $5.

IT IS not in the nature, tradition, outlook, or techniques of philosophy to make any significant contribution to the social sciences by way of subject matter or method. We can, however, legitimately expect philosophy to supply generalizations of a higher order that can lead to more precise insights. We have the right to expect, moreover, that higher orders of generalization prove their usefulness, and not remain exercises of translation into philosophical lingo of well-established facts or relations more simply described in the social sciences. It is in the light of this anticipation that we approach Mr. Feibleman's effort, and in the light of its specific failure that we must register disappointment. No new knowledge comes out.

The author tells us that he will employ ontology, the study of being, as an instrument of analysis and discovery. What he actually does is begin with the basic drives of feeding, breeding, and inquiry—otherwise known as hunger, love, and curiosity. One could debate at length the merits of his selection of primary drives, but to no purpose. Ontology, the author says, exists in social groups in the beliefs which its members hold in common; and since these beliefs are maintained implicitly, the formula for any culture is the implicit dominant ontology, "i. d. o." for short. The i. d. o. has, in addition to an ideational content, an affective one which Mr. Feibleman calls the "ethos."

One has no right to quarrel with the particular constructs an author wishes to use to manipulate his data. In this anarchic age each investigator considers it his sacred obligation to invent constructs never used before. This fashion prevails in all the social sciences, where recurrent phenomena cannot be defined in terms of a precise and delimiting universal language like mathematics. This confusion is a nuisance to be endured, but it is not of the essence.

The test of any such formulation lies in whether its use is accompanied by any novel or precise techniques. These are conspicuously absent from the book. The author's formulas are accompanied only by some undisciplined psychologizing. What emerges is a formulation of the Nietzsche-Spengler variety, another version of the culture pattern which we have long since known, but whose usefulness has become altogether inadequate to the needs of our time. Where does the culture pattern come from? The author gives us the customary answer: from the problems of adaptation.

No one today takes these general answers seriously. What is urgently needed is not a higher abstraction of conclusions long known in the social sciences but an instrument for the more precise analysis of the minutiae and dynamics of adaptation—individual and social.

As illustrations for this thesis the author uses the Baiga—from the published account of Verrier Elwin—and the English nation. The two analyses are equally unsatisfying. One subject in the book, the analysis of common sense, receives excellent treatment throughout, except for the fact that the author fails to recognize that common sense involves a great deal of "natural" psychologizing.

The reviewer believes the author has mistaken the temper of our time. The study of culture is no longer an academic subject; it is every man's highly personal business. There is a great hunger for new information on human culture which this book offers little to satisfy. What is needed is not new theories about what was known a generation ago but new data, new techniques, and new types of demonstration that are empirical, not authoritarian. ABRAM KARDINER

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LILLIAN HELLMAN'S "Another Part of the Forest" (Fulton Theater) is the story of four scoundrels, two half-wits, one insane woman, and a whore. "Tobacco Road" had better look to its laurels, for though the characters in the present play dress better and wash more often it is still quite the fruitiest picture of depravity seen in years. Miss Hellman's ability to imagine dirty tricks and nasty speeches is unrivaled in the contemporary theater, and there can be no question of the theatrical virtuosity which enables her to extract from each all the ugliness it can possibly yield. By comparison "The Little Foxes" will have to be ranked as an idyl and "The Children's Hour" be dismissed as mere prentice work written before its author had learned how to get along without the disturbing intrusion of good-will on the part of any of her characters. If, as I am inclined to suspect, other spectators beside myself began to feel toward the end of the evening a certain disposition to titter, that was less because of any technical defect in the writing than simply because total depravity has a way of beginning to seem funny when exhibited for too long and completely without foil. Neither Commodus, Heliogabalus, Lucretia Borgia, nor Jeeter Lester is a comic character, but all have a way of turning into just that.

For our benefit the play details the earlier history of the family first introduced in "The Little Foxes." The founder of the clan is a conscious scoundrel who reads Aristotle or listens to chamber music during the rare moments when he is not foreclosing mortgages, bullying his insane wife, or taunting his two blackhearted sons with the helplessness which he imposed upon them. There is something rather Dickensian in the completeness as well as the complacency of his villainy, and if he were disposed of in the end by someone on the side of the angels the total effect would probably be not unlike that of a Victorian melodrama. Actually, however, he gets his come-uppance at the hands of the eldest son, and so, though one villain is foiled, there is no virtue to triumph.

I am not unaware of the fact that all this is supposed to have, for the initiated, a meaning. It is, that is to say, a Marxian study of the decline of the Southern feudal aristocracy and the rise of the capitalist exploiter. There are no admirable characters because, by antecedent premise, there cannot be any. Dying aristocrats must be dim-witted and rising capitalists must be villainous because otherwise the dialectic process could not have taken place as it did. Even the fact that the scoundrels seem somewhat more likable than their victims is precisely according to formula, since capitalism, though evil in itself, advances the dialectic process one stage beyond feudalism and is to that extent more admirable. But none of this is pointed out explicitly in the play itself, and I suspect that most of even the initiated will disregard it in order to join with the innocent in getting what fun they can out of a play in which dog bites dog, and bitch snarls at bitch for two hours and a half during which no spectator need ever remember that any of the virtues exist except in the futile imaginations of the insane or the half-witted.

The last scene, in which the father signs over all his power to the son who has found, conveniently written down in a family Bible, evidence which would send the old villain to the gallows, seems to me curiously feeble and much in the manner of what was called in my youth the ten-twenty-thirty. Up to that time, however, the play had not only been more expertly written than any of its author's previous works but also well acted and superbly directed. If, nevertheless, it fails to move me to great enthusiasm, it is because I no more believe its picture of unrelieved villainy than I believe novels of the Pollyanna school. And I wonder that the author is not herself a little disconcerted by the fluency of her imagination when she sets it to working along certain lines. Max Beerbohm was, I remember, when he discovered how easily he composed the "Insults" section of a Complete Letter Writer he once thought of putting forth.

Maxwell Anderson's "Joan of Lorraine" (Alvin Theater) is, though for very different reasons, likely to achieve almost as much success as Miss Hellman's piece. Its elaborate scheme, by means of which various characters are permitted to comment on the significance of Joan of Arc during the course of the rehearsal of a play about her, is ingeniously managed and well sustained. Perhaps because Mr. Anderson has been taken to task so often of recent years by critics who complained of turgidity and pretentiousness, the prose of the present work is straightforward enough and sensible enough. But the whole seemed to me something which could, with uncomfortable accuracy, be described as Shaw and water. A good many things in "St. Joan" have been left out, including, for example, the hard-boiled conclusion that heretics cannot be distinguished from saints until after they have been burned. Nevertheless, most of what "Joan of Lorraine" says about faith, Shaw seems to me to have said first. Ingrid Bergman plays the leading role with a certain wholesome, well-scrubbed charm and is, indeed, almost too far removed from the usual Hollywood glamour girl not to suggest sensible shoes and pigtails, but I can hardly follow most of my colleagues in hailing her as a great actress. The presence of hordes of movie fans who Oh'd and Ah'd like fond parents at a school play whenever they thought their favorite was being cute made both the play and the performance somewhat hard to judge.

What Hollywood Can Do

"THE BEST YEARS OF OUR LIVES," a misfired title, seems to have started as a gleam in Samuel Goldwyn's eye when he saw in a mid-war issue of Time a picture and article about returning veterans. At a later stage it was a verse novel by MacKinlay Kantor called "Glory for Me"—not a very good title either. Robert E. Sherwood turned this into a screen play; the director William Wyler and the camera man Gregg Toland and a few hundred others turned the screen play into a movie. The movie has plenty of faults, and the worst of them are painfully exasperating; yet this is one of the very few American studio-made movies in years that seem to me profoundly pleasing, moving, and encouraging.

The story is of a sort that could have been, and often remains, just slick-paper fiction at its most sincere, and that could also have become, and occasionally suggests, a great and simple, limpid kind of fiction which few writers of serious talent seem able to attempt or even to respect, at present. An ex-bombardier (Dana Andrews), an ex-infantry sergeant (Fredric March), and an ex-sailor (Harold Russell) meet for the first time as they return to their home city, part to undertake the various pleasures and problems of their return, and meet again at various subsequent times as their lives and relationships shake down into new shape.

The bombardier, a highly intelligent proletarian, can find nothing better in the way of a job than his old place in a drugstore. He finds, too, that he and the girl he married just before he went overseas no longer get along. The sergeant, who was once the kind of nervously well-married, vocationless, rather sensitive business man, too good for his job, who tries to sweep along his uneasiness in a momentum of alcohol, clowning, fairly sophisticated wit, and his real but seldom focused affections, finds that none of that has changed for the better. He is made vice-president of his bank, in charge of G. I. loans, and spends a good deal of his time drunk. The sailor, who has lost both hands and has learned to use a pair of hooks quite well, returns to the gentlest and most touching depths of the lower middle class. His chief problem is the girl he had always expected to marry; another is his extreme uneasiness about everybody's attempt to be good about his hooks; a hideous complication is that he is at once intuitively very perceptive and sensitive, and hopelessly inarticulate, and that most of the people he returns to are equally well-meaning and unsophisticated.

At its worst this story is very annoying in its patness, its timidity, its slithering attempts to pretend to face and by that pretense to dodge in the most shameful way possible its own fullest meanings and possibilities. Perhaps one shouldn't kick too hard at a "mere" device, but I feel very dubious about the invention of a nice bar in which the veterans keep meeting each other, perhaps because I suspect that one of the dodged truths is that, once they become civilians again, most men of such disparate classes or worlds would meet seldom, with greater embarrassment than friendliness, and that the picture is here presenting, instead of the unhappy likelihood, a hopeful and barely plausible lie. I feel a good deal of interest in the love affair that develops between Andrews and the banker's daughter, played by Teresa Wright, but again they have made it easy for themselves by showing Andrews's wife to be a bag, and they atone for this convenience only in part by making her as well-meaning and sympathetic and essentially innocent as, in the terms invented for her, she could be. Thanks to much of the writing and all of the playing, this illicit affair is by implication remarkably real and mature; but in action, in the good old inevitable Sunday School way, the extra-marital activities are limited to a single Andrews-Wright kiss and a boy-friend, for Andrews's wife, lolling in his shirtsleeves; and it is the wife who asks for a divorce.

Or again, they pretend to hit the banker's predicament between the eyes, and allow him to tell off his careful world which doesn't want to make loans to veterans without collateral in a speech which, on the movie scale of things, is reasonably bold. They even have the firmness to let March have the last word on that issue; he says that with nearly every loan without collateral he will have to put up the same fight all over again. Yet one is emotionally left with the impression that he has cleverly and lovably won his fight and will win it on every subsequent occasion, and the hints that his own bread and butter are and will be increasingly in jeopardy if he keeps his courage are so discreet as to be all but inaudible. As a footnote to this his boss, played by Ray Collins, is represented, not with the cool realism which could here have been so good and so nearly unprecedented in an American movie, but in the kind of skilful caricature which, like so much of Gilbert and Sullivan, makes every punch a kind of self-caress.

The only boss types represented cruelly are the manager and floor-walker of a chain drugstore—that is, men in a job predicament in which they are as much bullied as bullying; and it is not shown that they are bullied. The only business type who is represented with what seems like perfect justice is the father of the sailor's sweetheart, a specialized, fussy, feminine little man who nervously tries to badger the sailor about his plans for the future. Or for still another major fault—and here direction and playing are as much to blame as the script—the very interesting and, for movies, new character of the banker is only hinted at, not solidly presented. Only the psychologically sophisticated can gather from the film that his marriage is only nominally happy and is actually precarious, and that the people who made the movie may possibly be on to this; and March's benders, though extremely well done in their way, are staged with all but frantic gratitude as broad comic relief, as if professional entertainers who were also good artists were on these occasions very glad to betray their responsibilities as artists for the sake of getting a little bit of sure-fire—and commercially much-needed—fun into the show.

In fact, it would be possible, I don't doubt, to call the whole picture just one long pious piece of deceit and self-deceit, embarrassed by hot flashes of talent, conscience, truthfulness, and dignity. And it is anyhow more than possible, it is unhappily obligatory, to observe that a good deal which might have been very fine, even great, and which is handled mainly by people who could have done, and done perfectly, all the best that could have been developed out of the idea, is here either murdered in its cradle or reduced to manageable good citizenship in the early stages of grade school. Yet I feel a hundred times more liking and admiration for the film than distaste or disappointment.

[Mr. Agee's review of "The Best Years of Our Lives" will be concluded next week.]

THE WORLD'S OLDEST ENEMIES

Can they live at peace?

● Of all pigmented peoples, only the Yellow Man has risen seriously to challenge the White. A thousand years before Columbus, he battered the doors of Europe. Then the White Man, too, moved, expanded, to become eventual aggressor in Asia. Today, these two groups stand at troubled truce. But what of tomorrow? Is there promise of permanent peace?

WHITE MAN—YELLOW MAN

ARVA C. FLOYD

● "The causes of war are not always casualties of war," writes this penetrating author, professor of missions and Oriental history at Candler School of Theology, Emory University. He points out that the empire system and racial tensions are problems with which our generation must yet deal. Here is an absorbing, well-balanced survey, painstakingly written from sound factual data. Ranging from earliest beginnings to our own day, it shows underlying causes of conflict, and points a course—a positive course—that can lead to enduring international good will.

B. H. HAGGIN

TECHNICHORD Records (90 Massachusetts Avenue, Cambridge, Mass.) has issued a recording of Bach's Cantata No. 106, "Gotteszeit ist die allerbeste Zeit," performed by 21 members of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society and seven instrumentalists under the direction of G. Wallace Woodworth (Set T-6: 3 records; $7.55). This is an early work of Bach, with a couple of slow movements that achieve at moments something of the power of his greatest choral writing, but with a great deal besides that I find unimpressive. I could imagine a performance with more sensuous beauty of sound and more subtlety of inflection; but this one is sufficiently agreeable to the ear and musically acceptable. Its over-all sound on the records is good; but there are times when the instruments sound near and the voices far away, and when the soprano line is blanketed by the other vocal lines. The red vinylite records allow one to hear the performance in quiet most of the time; but there is an occasional series of clicks; and there is the dust that must be cleaned out of the grooves before each playing (but at last I have learned of a compensating advantage of the red vinylite over the black: it is, according to an engineer who should know, harder than the black). The set is provided with a pocket-size full score of the cantata, with a sheet on which each line of the German text is given with the corresponding line of the English translation used in the performance, with notes on the work by Mr. Woodworth, and with instructions on the proper care of vinylite records. These permit the use of a pickup weighing up to two ounces; I advise against using one that weighs more than one ounce.

Columbia's December albums offer a good and well-recorded performance of the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Rodzinski with the New York Philharmonic (Set 641; $4.85); and music of Alec Wilder performed by a group of excellent C. B. S. musicians under the direction of Frank Sinatra, whose enthusiasm for the music I don't share (Set 637; $3.85).

Victor has begun a "Heritage Series" of red vinylite pressings of recordings made by the legendary singers of the past. The first five records ($3.50 each) offer beautiful performances of the Willow Song and Ave Maria from Verdi's "Otello" by Alda (15-1000), and of Eri tu from Verdi's "Masked Ball" and Dio possente from Gounod's "Faust" by Ancona (15-1002); Tetrazzini's brilliant performance of the Polonaise from Thomas's "Mignon" and her unimpressive one of Voi che sapete from Mozart's "Figaro" (15-1001); the splendor of Caruso's voice in his 1911 performance of Ah! fuyez, douce image from Massenet's "Manon," and the darker magnificence, better recorded, of that voice in his 1920 performance of the famous aria from Halevy's "La Juive" (15-1004); and Journet's sonorous performances of two extremely uninteresting pieces of music, the Piff! paff! from Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" and Au bruit lourd des marteaux from Gounod's "Philemon et Baucis" (15-1003).

It is not for lack of appreciation of these performances that I am amazed and disappointed by Victor's failure to issue Hempel's recordings of Der Hölle Rache from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and Deh vieni, non tardar from his "Figaro," and John McCormack's of Il mio tesoro from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and Una furtiva lagrima from Donizetti's "Elisir d'Amore" on these first records. It is rather because of the fact that these Hempel and McCormack performances are among the supreme examples of vocal and musical achievement, and that they should be brought to the attention of the public, which knows nothing about them and already knows about Caruso and Tetrazzini.

Let me point out, also, that our heritage includes other great performances which Victor should make available to the public again: the Kreisler-Rachmaninov performances of sonatas by Beethoven and Schubert; the Cortot-Thibaud-Casals performances of trios by Schubert, Beethoven, and Haydn. And there are the fine recordings that Victor stopped pressing during the war and has not yet begun to produce again.

There are no plant, materials, and labor for the Glyndbourne "Marriage of Figaro," but only for a volume of "Highlights from 'Madama Butterfly,'" well-sung by Albanese, Melton, and Lucielle Browning with an orchestra under Weissmann, and excellently recorded (Set 1068; $3.85). And for a volume of the favorite vocal excerpts from "Carmen," well-sung by Swarthout, Albanese, Ramon Vinay, Merrill, other minor singers, and Robert Shaw's chorus with an orchestra under the direction of Leinsdorf. These performances are well recorded (Set 1078; $7).

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Christianity and Poetry

Dear Sirs: Your reviewer, Robert Fitzgerald, is the only critic so far who has realized what was the main problem gnawing at me while I was writing "King Jesus": namely, how far can Jesus be historically as well as poetically identified with the doomed hero of the "one story and one story only" assumed in my poem, "To Juan at the Winter Solstice" (published in The Nation of July 6). In other words, is Christianity compatible with poetry? I am grateful to him for his generosity, since his point of view is plainly Catholic, in treating my presentation of the problem with such respect.

A few points to be corrected. I am not Welsh except by grace of serving with the Royal Welsh Fusiliers in the last war but one; but Scots-Irish on one side, grandson of Bishop Graves of Limerick, the antiquarian and mathematician, and German-Danish on the other, grand-nephew (not grandson) of Leopold von Ranke, the father of modern history.

The "cultist" survival in Palestine is not one of my assumptions but an unshakable historical fact; I recommend Mr. Fitzgerald to read Sozomen, the Byzantine ecclesiastical historian, on the primitive goings-on at Hebron, an original center of Judaism, which were suppressed by the Emperor Constantine—yes, "a mysticism to do with oak trees" and concerned with the patriarchs buried in the cave of Machpelah.

The "late and propagandist Gospel of St. John" does contain, as emphasized, a submerged Aramaic original, the historical details of which are essential to the understanding of the Gospel story.

I will leave Mr. Fitzgerald to argue the meaning of Amen with the Hebraists. The view I quote is the most recent. Jesus seems to have been the first to preface his statements with this word, which had hitherto been used only as a final clinching in God's name of religious sentiments.

Aholah and Aholibah are personifications of Jerusalem and Samaria, because the cult of Anatha, the Juno with a lion, was centered at Jerusalem, that of Ashima, a Minerva with a dove, was centered at Samaria; the Jews accused the Samaritans of Ashima-worship in very late times. Ezekiel referred to Aholibah and Aholah as Jehovah's wives; and meant it, as the Elephantine temple records—read in the light of the analogical cult of the Syrian trinity at Hierapolis—prove. Lucian's "De Dea Syria" is of paramount importance in this context.

About Jesus and Lazarus. Jesus himself said that Lazarus was not physically dead but only in a trance; nevertheless, when he delayed his coming and Lazarus was officially committed to the grave, a life was required in payment for the restoration. The flaw in poetic logic with which I am charged—namely, that Jesus did not in fact pay with his own life—is not a flaw: I make it clear that Judas, repenting of his disobedience, paid the debt on Jesus's behalf—not by the knife or water or the sword but by hanging, a death that would necessarily give him over to Sheol, because of the Deuteronomic curse.

Yes, Judas, the only true Jew among the twelve disciples, the rest being Galileans, was of superior intelligence. This is proved by his asking thirty shekels from the Temple Treasurer: it showed that he understood exactly what prophecy Jesus was trying to fulfil. If he had asked fifty or three hundred he would have been in the same class as his fellows, whose eyes had been blinded and ears stopped.

I apologize for the shortness of the "Historical Commentary"; this defect will be repaired in my "White Goddess," to be published next year, a full-length study of "The Female" against whom Jesus declared war, and of her rebellious sons.

St. John's Gospel as we have it is second-century Gnostic. Gnosticism is a fantastic theological muddle compared with the fine Apocalyptic literalness of Jesus.

The Deeper Cure

Dear Sirs: Dr. Martin Gumpert, in his article, "What to Do with Neurotics" (The Nation, November 16), refers to a paper by Dr. Peter G. Denker on the "disability" records of some 500 patients, under the diagnosis heading of psychoneurosis.

Dr. Gumpert compares the percentage of the cessation of disability with statistics of the cures of psychoneuroses. He should know that the patient suffering from psychoneurosis is not necssarily cured when he starts working. In the statistics of psychoanalytic clinics a cure is understood not only as the ability to return to work but as the regained ability to enjoy life, to be free of sexual inhibitions, and to function on the highest level. Statistics of insurance companies do not say anything about the continued suffering of these patients after the resumption of work.

Many of the conclusions drawn from Dr. Gumpert's comparison are therefore very possibly false.

Answering a Charge

[In a letter printed in The Nation of October 5 Juergen Kuczynski accused Mark Starr of misstatements in a review of Mr. Kuczynski's book, "Labor Conditions in Great Britain." Mr. Starr was in Japan at the time, and has only now been able to reply.]

Dear Sirs: My abbreviated review of Mr. Kuczynski's book originally went into more detail about the claims made by the book jacket. My information was received directly from the A. F. of L., and apparently it disagrees with Mr. Kuczynski's recollection.

The quotation used in the short review of his book is enough to answer the charge that I twisted his conclusions. Apparently, both Mr. Kuczynski's memory and his understanding of his own writings are somewhat less than perfect.

The Shape of Things

DEAN ACHESON'S STATEMENT ON FOOD AND armies has a plausibility about it which will appeal to persons who think of relief in terms of politics. What sounds more reasonable than an argument that we should cease supplying the human needs of nations that are impoverishing their people in order to maintain vast armies? The catch is that it injects a threat of unilateral intervention into a debate on disarmament which, during the last few weeks, has made significant progress. The United States happens to be the one nation with a large surplus of food and, at the same time, preponderant military resources. It has consistently urged that arms reduction and arms control must come under international direction. Now, it appears that nations judged by us to have inordinately large armies must cut these to the bone if they are to receive food from the one nation capable of supplying it. Moreover, Secretary Acheson's ultimatum comes as a culminating move in a series of point-blank refusals to continue the work of UNRRA, today more desperately needed than ever. Mr. LaGuardia, who surely cannot be accused of sympathy with totalitarian regimes, has made a moving protest against the State Department's punitive conception of one of the Four Freedoms. His words should be heeded. We suggest that Mr. Acheson leave the armaments discussion to the General Assembly and Security Council, where it properly belongs. And we direct a last, urgent plea to the State Department that it consider the plight of the starving men, women, and children of Europe and revise its stand in favor of Mr. LaGuardia's original proposal for an emergency fund of $400,000,000 to be placed at the disposal of the United Nations.

JOHN L. LEWIS VAINLY ATTEMPTED TO MAKE his back-to-work order sound like a strategic retreat; it was, in fact, as James Wechsler makes clear on page 683, unconditional surrender. Sure of his own strength, contemptuous of the Administration, Lewis challenged the government and found himself maneuvered into fighting on the issue of the sovereignty of the state. That is an indefensible position for any sectional group, and defeat became inevitable unless the President lost his nerve. He didn't: on the contrary, having gained the initiative in the court phase of the struggle, the Administration indicated its readiness to counterattack at all points. And, despite bitter criticisms by labor of the use of the injunction, Mr. Truman appeared to have most of public opinion behind him. What can Lewis do now? He has set March 31 as the day for renewal of the struggle, but unless the courts uphold his claim of the right to terminate unilaterally the contract between the United Mine Workers and the government, his position then will be weaker, not stronger. His one hope is to negotiate an agreement with the operators, but they will not prove easier to deal with than before the strike and may well stall in view of the prospect of stringent anti-labor legislation in the next session of Congress. Lewis, in fact, has committed the classic blunder of dictators: through overconfidence he has exposed himself to a concentration of superior forces and suffered a defeat which may prove disastrous not only to the miners but to all labor.

TWO OF THE PROFESSED OBJECTS OF THE German merger agreement are to lighten the burden of occupation costs and to stimulate the economy of western Germany by removing barriers to the flow of goods. The third Anglo-American object is admittedly to counter the Russian policy now being followed in eastern Germany: if the Soviets continue to hinder the unification of the German economy while organizing industry in the east according to their own needs, then Britain and the United States will incorporate their sections of Germany into the Western economic system. The Russians are invited to join us, but if and when they do so they also will meet an accomplished fact. It would be unreasonable to deny all justification for the Anglo-American merger, since the western zones, after more than eighteen months of delay in making effective the economic clauses of the Potsdam Agreement, have sunk to a dangerous level of destitution. Unless their inhabitants are to subsist indefinitely on doles from the American and British treasuries, industry must be sufficiently revived to enable payment to be made in goods for the necessary minimum of imports. The question is whether such a revival will require an increase in production above the level previously sanctioned by the Big Four. If it does, we can expect violent protests from Russia and France, both of which fear the restoration of the German war potential under Anglo-American auspices.

THE BEST WAY TO PREVENT THE GROWTH of such suspicions would be to expedite British proposals for socializing the major German industries and to give new life to the accepted principles of denazification and economic decentralization. So far, unfortunately, all plans for basic economic reform in the American and British zones appear to have bogged down: Washington and London issue directives, but the men on the spot ignore or circumvent them. The Meader report has pointed to Brigadier General Draper, chief of the American economic staff in Germany, as one of the leading opponents of decartelization. In Britain, there are constant complaints about the difficulty of getting the occupation authorities to tackle seriously such matters as socialization and the revival of trade unionism. And, in both zones, denazification appears to have proceeded on haphazard lines, with many industrial bigwigs receiving undeserved clearance. For instance, Alfred Hugenberg, the old Nationalist leader who gave powerful support to Hitler, is not only free but still nominally head of his big coal and steel combine. There is no very good reason to suppose that the merger of the zones will lead to a change in this situation. On the contrary, there is grave danger that the Anglo-American economic staff, composed for the most part of men antipathetic to socialism, will concentrate on the "practical" job of reviving industry and exports and neglect the even more important task of institutional reform. The result would be doubly evil. It would arouse the intense antagonism of Russia and France; it would tend to thrust Germany into a new Weimar cycle with all its frustrations and incentives to desperate action.

THE APPOINTMENT OF AN AMBASSADOR IS not often accompanied by an obviously inspired press campaign designed to show that he holds opinions the exact opposite of those held by the government with which he is to deal. But such has been the case with O. Max Gardner. That the new ambassador to the Court of St. James's is an able man we knew without being told by complacent journalists. We are also aware that Mr. Gardner has been one of the most stubborn opponents of the progressive reforms inaugurated by President Roosevelt, to whom the new ambassador gave the grudging loyalty of a Democratic Party machine politician. It is to be expected that the British and American peoples will derive some profit from Mr. Gardner's knowledge of orthodox finance and his skill in business negotiations. We hope, too, that the British government will enjoy his pleasant Southern accent and courtliness. It is also our hope that when Mr. Gardner displays his talents as a crusading free-enterpriser he will be met with a certain dour skepticism expressed in a good Scotch burr or homely west-of-England drawl.

*

THAT'S A HANDSOME CHRISTMAS PRESENT which the Interstate Commerce Commission has handed to the railroads and charged to Mr. and Mrs. Consumer. A cool billion dollars in added freight charges and indefinite continuation of the "temporary" 10 per cent passenger-fare increase granted in February, 1942, offer prospects of a very happy New Year to the recipients. For the rest of us, it means another upward thrust of the cost of living, a new twist to the inflationary spiral. One consequence is that, although the miners have gone back to work without any pay increase, there will be a 15 or 20 cent increase in the price of a ton of coal. The railroads could hardly have expected more generous treatment, but they are not manifesting much gratitude. The increase, some of their spokesmen have indicated, is only just about sufficient to make possible a modest profit for the Class I roads as a whole next year. Operating costs, they point out, have risen by $2,166,000,000 since 1939, with pay increases alone accounting for $1,457,000,000. They omit to mention, however, that estimated gross revenues this year are about double those of 1939 and that the railroads' net income, even if we accept their own pessimistic forecast, is likely to be well above the pre-war level.

Small-State Revolt

THE unavowed intentions with regard to Spain that have involved London and Washington in so many glaring inconsistencies have had their familiar results at Lake Success during the past week. The American resolution presented by Senator Connally contained a double invitation: it urged Franco to surrender his power to an interim regime that would hold a free election, and invited the Spanish people to "establish the eligibility of Spain for admission to the United Nations." Yet in the course of debate upon amendments to this resolution, the old arguments were brought out: that it would be a violation of sovereignty to "intervene" in Spain and that civil war was the one great evil to avoid. In other words, we nominally threaten Franco with a revolution that we declare must never take place and shall do nothing to help. The inconsistency is purely verbal, of course, for the underlying meaning of the resolution is unmistakably clear: it was an invitation, not to the Spanish people, but to cliques and cabals within the reactionary classes—to the "strong" and the "influential men" in Spain, as Senator Connally put it.

It is to be expected that the charge of conspiracy with palace revolutionists and military putschists will receive official denial. Yet nothing else can explain the inconsistencies, the endless equivocations, of the American delegate which were pointedly brought to the attention of the State Department and the delegates in a letter from the Nation Associates to Secretary Byrnes. And denial is further robbed of its force by too much in the sordid history of our political intervention in Europe—the courting of Vichy, Darlan, Badoglio, and the House of Savoy, and the disastrous maneuvers in Greece.

It is useless to say that the melancholy spectacle presented by Senator Connally and Sir Hartley Shawcross at Lake Success is merely the result of an inherited policy. True, before he quit office, Mr. Churchill had begun to negotiate with the Duke of Alba and his cabal for a restoration of the Spanish monarchy. But the failure of that effort would have given a truly democratic successor the right to abandon the policy. Nevertheless, Mr. Bevin, while professing to abstain from intervention, has merely added a few variants and decorations. At the recent Bournemouth Conference of the Labor Party, he made a blundering confession. "I believe that if other countries had not intervened in the internal affairs of Spain, Franco would have been gone," the British Foreign Secretary said, evidently referring to Russia and other states with similar views. A moment later, he added: "And, therefore, I believe that the steps we are taking . . . which, for obvious reasons I am not going into here, and the policy we are following are right." He was against steps, but he had taken steps. The Spanish people did not want war, "but if left alone there are wide classes in Spain anxious to get rid of Franco." Presumably these "wide classes" are the reactionaries with whom Mr. Bevin was negotiating in the summer of this year.

For once, a United Nations subcommittee, to which the various amendments were referred, contained a majority of pro-Republican delegates. The result has been something of a revelation, for the Big Two have had few lieutenants and less control of strategy, and their speeches have been countered by others of exceptional quality. In particular, the delegates of Guatemala, Venezuela, Poland, Yugoslavia, and Norway presented fully documented and rigorously logical answers to Mr. Connally's stump speeches. In fact, so formidable has been the opposition that Senator Connally seriously embarrassed his colleagues by declaring that even if the United Nations decided upon a rupture of relations with Spain, the U. S. would not consider itself bound by the decision.

As we go to press, the subcommittee has agreed upon an amended resolution urging the United Nations, which have collectively refused to maintain relations with Franco, individually to sever relations, and also to end imports of food from Spain. What will be the fate of this resolution in the full committee it is impossible to say, but it is difficult to believe that the Connally version can be forced through by Anglo-American insistence; and it must not be. For, to revert to its central point, the resolution would justify the taking of a plebiscite by an undesignated group and without guaranties. It is not likely that the dictator will abolish the Falange or neutralize the army and his repressive forces, without which measures an election would be a farce and a tragedy. Senator Connally's resolution could easily serve at a later date as legal justification for the recognition of a regime lacking all democratic guaranties, a regime that would condemn Spain to endless and costly turbulence. But if the outraged small states maintain their resistance, the British and Americans will have to back down.

Time to Act on China

A DECISION must be made soon on American policy in China. A year ago, President Truman issued a detailed statement of policy in which he made continued American aid conditional upon the "modification of the one-party 'political tutelage'" and the creation of a "broadly representative government." The opening of the unrepresentative National Assembly a few weeks ago marked the final breakdown of General Marshall's efforts to achieve the aims outlined in the President's statement. As the Assembly continues its sessions, the situation grows steadily worse. Instead of adopting the reasonably democratic draft constitution that had been worked out at the All-Party Political Consultative Conference last spring, the hand-picked Assembly has apparently decided to return to the totalitarian pre-war draft. Acceptance of this would so crystallize the Chinese government in a totalitarian mold as to make any future democratic settlement almost impossible. It would mean that war-weary China was doomed to the agony of a protracted civil war which could only end in exhaustion and even more complete economic collapse, carrying with it the added danger of a general world conflict.

The determination of the right-wing Kuomintang leaders to retain their dictatorial control of the government appears to spring from a conviction that they will continue to get American aid irrespective of their behavior. This conviction has been nurtured by the steady and substantial flow of American goods during the past few months, when it was obvious that General Marshall's efforts were proving unsuccessful. The reactionary wing of the Kuomintang has taken this as evidence that in a showdown the United States would support the government against the Communists in order to keep China in the "democratic" orbit as a bulwark against Soviet Russia. And statements by irresponsible American military leaders have encouraged them in that belief.

Within the last week or so there have been indications that we are trying to extricate ourselves from what every American agrees is an intolerable situation. The number of marines in China is being gradually reduced. Reports have been published, without confirmation, that China would get no further financial assistance at this time. And John Carter Vincent, director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs of the Department of State, has warned private capital against investing in China under present conditions. But as huge amounts of American excess war materials are in the process of being turned over to the Nanking regime and American officers are still cooperating with the Kuomintang general staff, these indications of a gradual shift in policy mean very little. The Kuomintang reactionaries cannot be blamed for believing that with existing American aid they can crush the Communists in five or six months. Only immediate dramatic action on the part of the United States can shake this belief and stop the drift toward catastrophe.

Another official statement of policy is clearly called for. As a minimum, in order to make it clear even to the irreconcilable diehards that we want no part in China's strife, the President should announce immediate and complete withdrawal of American military forces in China and order the present flow of financial and military aid to be stopped completely, with no further assistance given until the terms of the directive of December 15, 1945, are carried out.

Molotov's Olive Branch

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

WITH the effect of brushing off cobwebs, Mr. Molotov last week swept away half a dozen issues which for long months have served as concrete roadblocks in the way of international agreement. In the Council of Foreign Ministers, the peace treaties with Italy, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Finland were all but finished; the points remaining unsettled are so small compared with those cleared up that further prolonged wrangling is most unlikely. In the General Assembly, Russia accepted the principle of international inspection and enforcement—without benefit of veto—once a system of atomic-energy control and general disarmament has been agreed upon by the Security Council. So suddenly did these things happen that incredulity rather than satisfaction was the first reaction in the press. But doubt has tended to disappear as Molotov's mild replies to the provocative comments of Connally and Shawcross have been reinforced by one specific concession after another.

What remains in the minds of observers seems to be a vast bewilderment over Russia's probable reasons for "coming around." The view most generally expressed is that American firmness has at last accomplished its purpose, but a few people who know Russia well are insisting that firmness by itself would have got nowhere if Molotov had not sensed behind it a will to peace rather than a threat. If this is a true explanation of Moscow's conciliatory attitude, then the new Russian policy is even more encouraging: in other words, it represents confidence rather than appeasement.

Not to be ignored as part of the story are Russia's and Eastern Europe's material needs. Acceptance of the principle of free trade and navigation on the Danube, for example, may be a small sacrifice to make in return for larger imports of necessary supplies to that area, especially if UNRRA contributions are cut off and no substitute relief system set up. And so with other concessions, notably the Trieste agreement. Right or wrong, Russian objections to the safeguards demanded by the Western powers in the statute for Trieste have been an obstacle not only to establishing the Free Territory itself but to a whole complex of arrangements essential in restoring the economic life of Italy and Eastern Europe. The long stalemate has meant chaos and hunger and political tension, the sort of death-in-life described last week by G. E. R. Gedye in his article on Austria. It is no disparagement to the Russians to suggest that the new policy reflects, in part, a realization of the need for a revival of trade within Eastern Europe and with the West—plus credits if any are available. If Russia has given up any legitimate social objectives to get this result, such as a planned economic development of the Danube area geared into its own economy, the sacrifice may be more theoretical than real. At this stage, bare survival is the problem rather than schemes of economic coordination. Those can wait, for whatever Russia may yield in matters of trade or international control, the tides are running strong against Western capitalist ideas; and America is far away; and Russia is near.

One interesting line of speculation has been set off by Moscow's disarmament proposals. If all weapons of wholesale destruction are outlawed along with the atomic bomb and the veto is eliminated as "irrelevant" to the job of punishing violations, Mr. Molotov has perhaps calculated that, in the end, the balance of advantage will be with his country. This possibility was analyzed the other night by Raymond Swing, who said:

> People who have figured that the Russians were opposing our plans because they could not afford to have foreigners inspecting behind their so-called iron curtain may not have realized the basic facts of the problem. Russian strength lies chiefly in man-power, which cannot be reduced. Our strength lies in our war equipment, which can. Thus we have a navy, now fully twice as large as any navy that could be brought together to oppose it. We have a great strategic air force. We are on the way to develop the long-range rocket, with the best German scientists and engineers giving us the fruit of their invention. And we have atomic energy, which we shall continue to make even if it is not for use in atomic bombs. So inspection will have a wide field in this country, which may be one reason why the Russians favor it.

Not only will inspection have a wide field, but our mechanized power cannot be quickly reconstructed once it is reduced or scrapped. Russian military power, consisting largely of a huge army, less highly mechanized, can be reduced to nothing and then reassembled, in case of need, with relative ease. One can see hard reasons why Molotov advocated a broad scheme of disarmament and the elimination of the veto over enforcement.

For pointing out this aspect of the Russian proposals, Mr. Swing was attacked by Arthur Krock in a column in the New York Times that was both underhanded and, in my opinion, libelous. Krock did not mention Swing by name but merely quoted several sentences from his broadcast and then charged him with speaking, in effect, as a Moscow stooge. The broadcast suggested, it is true, that the United States might find itself "caught in a kind of trap" if for some political reason we should want to go slow on disarmament. We have talked so much about the veto that any further effort to stall in the matter of arms control would open us to the charge of "maintaining our military power solely to exert our will in the world." In saying this, Mr. Swing was only stating a patent truth. No one can doubt that some of our military men will be reluctant to extend to all forms of armed power the restrictions which sheer self-preservation dictates in the case of the atom bomb. Mr. Swing concludes with the urgent hope that, now the veto hurdle has been removed, "we shall be able to interest the Russians in our atomic plan, to set up a world authority to which is assigned the entire mining and production of atomic energy. For our experts have come to the conclusion that only such a plan will in any way adequately bring safety to the world in the use of atomic energy. Having such an authority, the great scientists will themselves be the chief inspectors, and atomic energy can become a servant of peaceful industry. No elaborate inspection system to prevent the illicit manufacture of atomic bombs seems to meet the requirements. This still may be a theme that the Russians need to have made clear to them. If it is, and they accept it, then despite the toughness of negotiations, this weary and woebegone world might still be steered into the channels of peace." If these are the words of an agent of Moscow, I wish Mr. Krock would sign up with the Kremlin, too.

The Issue Is Sovereignty

Lake Success, December 7

EVERY subject the U. N. Assembly touches on—Spain, disarmament, the treatment of Indians in South Africa—sooner or later brings about a discussion of the fundamental issue of our time: the need to adapt the traditional concept of national sovereignty to the realities of modern international society. Where are we going to draw the line between matters of solely domestic concern and matters of concern to the entire community of nations? Is the production of armaments within a country a proper subject for international inquiry, inspection, and control? If it is, should not political regimes bent on producing armaments and using them for aggressive purposes also be subject to inquiry by other nations? Is racial discrimination to be blinked at by the international community as long as it has not been specifically interdicted by treaty, or is it a proper matter for investigation wherever it occurs, under the human-rights provisions of the U. N. Charter?

In the course of committee discussions at Lake Success two schools of thought are gradually emerging on this general question of sovereignty versus international organization. One school adheres rigidly to the letter of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter, which states that "nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under the present Charter." The United States, on the question of Spain, has constituted itself the chief supporter of this position, defending the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of nations and, on that ground, vehemently opposing the breaking off of diplomatic relations with the Franco government.

This view was presented with violent intransigence and at one point with cheap theatricalism by Senator Connally on December 7, when he asked rhetorically, waving a water tray, whether the United Nations should offer Spain democracy on a platter—displaying shocking ignorance of what Léon Jouhaux of France, with dignified eloquence, had pointed out earlier in the debate: that the people of Spain had achieved democracy in the 1930's, only to have it snatched from them by Nazi-Fascist intervention, which the democratic powers declined to oppose. Yet the United States apparently considers it consonant with the principle of non-intervention to urge Franco to surrender his power to a provisional government and to invite the Spanish people, over the dictator's head, to liberate themselves—an appeal which, as several Latin American spokesmen have pointed out, could turn out to be incitement to bloody civil war, without the slightest offer of help on the part of the United Nations. Nor is it clear how the United States squares its insistence on non-intervention in the case of Spain with its demand for strict international control of the use of atomic energy and its constant inquiry into the political situation in Bulgaria, Rumania, Hungary, and Poland (although Washington would justify this action by the existence of the Yalta pledges). Yet in all fairness it must be recalled that when this country has intervened in the internal affairs of countries in this hemisphere, it has been subjected to criticism not only by the Latin Americans but by many of our own liberals; and it is not mere coincidence that one of the strongest supporters of the doctrine of non-intervention in the Assembly turns out to be Nicaragua, which has not forgotten the American marines.

Yet it is among Latin Americans that the second school of thought, which supports a broad interpretation of collective action, has found its most vigorous spokesmen. Future historians of the U. N. will unquestionably point to the speech made on December 3 by Dr. Alfaro, the judicial-minded former President of Panama, as one of the trail-blazing statements of our times. Dr. Alfaro, discussing Spain, declared without any "ifs" and "buts" that intervention is a "fetish word." In the wars of the nineteenth century, he said, we were struggling to achieve national independence (and this, of course, led to strong emphasis on the concept of national sovereignty); in the wars of the twentieth century we have been struggling to achieve interdependence. The theory that no individual state can intervene in the affairs of another, contends Dr. Alfaro, does not bar collective action by the community of nations. The clause in the Charter about domestic jurisdiction does not, in his opinion, prevent U. N. intervention in the affairs of individual members. Otherwise the U. N. would be powerless to act, and the Charter would not be worth the paper it is written on—for every nation could resist U. N. action on the plea that, for example, the production of armaments is a matter of domestic jurisdiction.

Dr. Alfaro's concept of national sovereignty in the atomic age would not at the present time receive the whole-hearted support of either the United States or Russia, both of which support only the kind of intervention that happens to suit their national objectives. Mr. Baruch would be on Dr. Alfaro's side with respect to atomic energy; Mr. Molotov would be on his side with respect to Spain. Gradually, however, the no man's land of national action regarded as closed to international inquiry is being narrowed in the Assembly committee debates; and this will be an accomplishment of lasting significance even if no concrete action comes out of the current session.

Unconditional Surrender

BY JAMES A. WECHSLER

Washington, December 8

JOHN L. LEWIS has not retired from public life or fallen on his rusty coal pick, but it will never again be possible to take him quite so seriously as the nation—and a large part of the world—have taken him for the past decade. His grip over the mines will survive this débâcle; conceivably he may strut the boards again in a few months, assuming magnificent postures and reciting grandiloquent lines. But the audience will remember that less than seventy-two hours after he had risen in a courtroom to shout his defiance of the judicial process, the United States government, the cruel coal barons, and the perverse fates, he made a bow to the Supreme Court and surrendered unconditionally to diminutive Harry Truman. He could have yielded earlier with grace, but he insisted upon setting the stage for the biggest show of all.

The proportions of this defeat are infinitely greater than that of 1919, when he yielded to a court injunction, or than his strategic retreat in 1943, when he halted a strike on the eve of a Roosevelt broadcast. In 1919 no such speeches had been made for the history books; no similar self-portrait had been painted showing preparation for martyrdom. In 1943 the government was split, the nation was at war, and neither Roosevelt nor Lewis had drawn the issue of sovereignty so sharply or committed themselves so far. This time all the chips were down. The struggle was a naked test of power.

Lewis's climactic bluff was staged in the courtroom on Tuesday and Wednesday. On Tuesday, after the defense unexpectedly rested without calling any witnesses, he sonorously read his anti-injunction manifesto, picturing himself as labor's voice in the legal wilderness, declaring his readiness for any punitive ordeal. The next day, after the $3,500,000 fine had been imposed on the union and sentence was about to be pronounced on himself, he wrathfully stood up again, inviting the court to deal him any blows it saw fit. His manner exuded contempt as if he were exulting in the quaint notion that the banner of Debs was being held aloft by the Republican Lewis.

But on Saturday the flag was white. Displaying neither anger nor sadness, acting as if he had almost exhausted his emotional repertory, he prefaced the reading of his statement to the press with a long, rambling discourse. "Questions as to motives will be pure speculation," he intoned; "a philosopher has said the pursuit of motive is the most elusive task in the world, as you gentlemen well know." The scene was the crowded, smoky basement of the Mine Workers' Building, pervaded with the Lewis legend of invincibility. He provided little to sustain the legend.

Lewis was a badly whipped man, and he knew it. If there is any bitter solace for him, it lies in the knowledge that all of labor, as the opening of Congress approaches, is in the most precarious position since pre-New Deal times. The United Mine Workers may ultimately pay the contempt fines, but all unions will pay the legislative bill.

Lewis was beaten because he could not divide the Administration and he could not write the law. Mr. Truman has great tenacity once he fully embraces an idea; the pity is that he has reached that state of passionate conviction only twice during his administration—in the rail strike and the mine stoppage. Similar purposefulness might have impressed the steel magnates when they extorted higher prices last winter, and the meat interests when they put on their autumn sitdown. In the coal crisis Truman finally relied on Secretary of the Interior Julius Krug, Clark Clifford, and the Justice Department attorneys who repeatedly outmaneuvered the union. Lewis could not get anywhere through friends at the President's court any more than he could score in Judge Goldsborough's bailiwick. In retrospect it is clear that the courtroom orations were a final attempt to frighten the Administration by conjuring up images of disaster.

Lewis's desperation was mounting even while he held the stage in court. On Wednesday his attorneys, meeting with Goldsborough in chambers, asked for delay in imposition of the sentences to permit new negotiations with the operators. Young John Sonnett, who directed the government's legal strategy, went secretly to the White House. The President was adamant.

The suddenness of the surrender amazed the White House. A deal between Lewis and the operators had been regarded as the most likely way out; Mr. Truman was merely taking the position that he would not actively promote the deal. But the government's stand and the courtroom results stiffened the operators. Lewis's admirers in industry could not swing a backroom settlement. Lewis was alone and he was cornered. What was probably more crucial than all these factors, his lawyers were finally telling him the grim news; they could not guarantee reversal of the contempt verdict.

It is widely felt here that the union made its fatal legal mistake when Lewis ignored the initial restraining order and let the strike proceed on schedule. The order was not contested until the contempt action was begun. By that time the government could contend that, regardless of the applicability of the Norris-LaGuardia act, the union was guilty of contempt. It stood a strong chance of sustaining that view in the Supreme Court. If the strike dragged on and the high court upheld the government, on the narrow ground, Lewis and the United Mine Workers might be paying an additional $250,000 for each day's delay in ending the walkout.

That reasoning, I am told, brought the decision to capitulate. Lewis was reduced to a choice between saving his face or his neck: destruction of the union treasury meant the end of his rule.

None of the major labor leaders who voiced the courage of Lewis's legal convictions offered any tangible help. When the government wisely opposed imprisonment of Lewis it averted the threat of sympathy strikes. Heads of other unions were increasingly restive over mounting unemployment; other wage negotiations were imperiled. Lewis has a talent for hell-raising, but intellectually he is a conservative, with no social idealism to sustain him in a seemingly lost cause and no long-range solution to the crisis he had created. The threat of nationalization might have induced the operators to temporize. Lewis never uttered the horrid word.

In this hour of hard-won triumph President Truman may be forgiven momentary delusions of grandeur. It will be tragic, however, if the celebration obscures the storms ahead. Lewis's defeat does not resolve the legitimate grievances of labor in an uncontrolled, inflationary economy; nor does it cure the chronic malady of the coal industry. The danger is that powerful industrial and financial interests will be stimulated by Lewis's defeat to revive their oldest, ugliest habits in labor relations and to resist reasonable union demands. The Congressional atmosphere will encourage that form of folly. Mr. Truman may swiftly get a new chance to demonstrate that his toughness is not exclusively reserved for intransigent labor leaders.

Free Press in a Free World

BY WILLIAM K. REED, JR.

THE American concept of freedom of the press is now on trial before the world. During the next few months it will be weighed against foreign views by three different United Nations bodies attempting to formulate a plan for freedom of information throughout the world. The U. N.'s interest here, as in other international affairs, is based on its interest in preserving peace. Misunderstandings between peoples, the belief is, could be prevented if the free flow of news across national borders were insured. It is hoped, too, that this freedom, once secured, would protect such other human rights as freedom of religion and racial equality.

It was, in fact, the Commission on Human Rights that first grappled with the issue by recommending the creation of a Subcommission on Freedom of Information and of the Press. Last June the Economic and Social Council granted authority to put the recommendation into effect. Because of the tedious administrative procedure required to establish a new U. N. body, the subcommission probably will not meet until next spring. Meanwhile our State Department has drafted a plan which has been presented by Chester Bowles to the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization now meeting in Paris. This plan asks for a removal of all barriers, political or economic, to the free flow of information. A proposal to prepare a report on the subject has been passed by a UNESCO subcommittee on mass media.

A less ambitious project has been adopted by a committee of the General Assembly. Proposed by the Philippine delegation, this asks that the U. N. call an international press conference for the purpose of obtaining greater cooperation among journalists of member nations. Further interest in the topic was aroused recently when the inter-American press conference at Bogota, Colombia, authorized the establishment of a commission to investigate freedom of the press in all the countries of the Western Hemisphere.

Much international debate on the problem is thus slated for the future. The Subcommission on Freedom of Information and the Press is enjoined "in the first instance" to "examine what rights, obligations, and practices should be included in the concept freedom of information." The need for a definition was properly emphasized, for different interpretations of what constitutes freedom of information have been at the bottom of many international disputes.

Since government control of radio and motion pictures has long been accepted in most of the major countries, it is around the question of control of the press that the conflict rages most fiercely. Complete independence from government control is, primarily, what is meant by freedom of the press in the United States. A press thus free is believed to be automatically a responsible press. How this works in actual practice was explained by Arthur Hays Sulzberger, publisher of the New York Times, in a recent speech before the eighteenth annual Boston Conference on Distribution. Press evils must be dealt with by newspaper readers, Mr. Sulzberger asserted, "through a slow but remorseless selective process. . . . The people have the power, under our system, to perpetuate the paper of their choice." Responsibility for a good press, therefore, rests not only on the conscience of the publisher but also on the readers at the newsstand.

WILLIAM K. REED, JR., is a feature writer for Editor and Publisher. During the war he was editor of the Pacific edition of the army magazine Yank and also a combat correspondent.

The proposal of the State Department goes one step farther. After asking that the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization remove all obstacles to the use of information media, it states plainly that the organization should concern itself with "the protection of the peoples of the world against any misuse of these media such as might result in their degradation and perversion to the point of fostering international ill-will and misunderstanding." This was apparently a concession to other nations which had already voiced concepts of freedom that differed considerably from those of American publishers.

Dr. C. L. Hsia, Chinese member of the Commission on Human Rights, opened the discussion of the recommended subcommission by declaring that a plan viewing the world problem through "American eyes" could not be applicable to all nations. He suggested, therefore, that the subcommission include "representatives of countries at different stages of development in this field." Dr. Hsia's point is worth attention. In a country with a high rate of illiteracy, a low standard of living, and relatively undeveloped communications, there is something to be said for the traditional double role of the Chinese journalist—to inform and to lead. And it is questionable whether the inhabitants of such a country could deal with press evils through the "selective process" Mr. Sulzberger suggests for American readers. Conceivably, then, there is an argument for international control of press policies in certain parts of the world. Some of Dr. Hsia's colleagues thought that such control should be universal.

Dusan Brkish, the delegate from Yugoslavia, said flatly that the subcommission should study measures to be taken "against those who abuse freedom of information by publishing false information and poisoning public opinion." His idea was warmly supported by Professor René Cassin of France, who noted regretfully that the privilege of a free press in his country had been "used by the enemies of freedom against freedom itself."

When the debate reached the Economic and Social Council, similar opinions were expressed. The delegates from Greece, Yugoslavia, the United Kingdom, and Belgium agreed that any plan for world freedom of information should contain provisions for preventing its abuse. There was a difference of opinion, however, about what these measures should be. Opinions ranged from the view of the Belgian delegate, Fernand de Housse, that "information supplied by the United Nations should be inserted compulsorily in the press of all contracting states" to that of Philip J. Noel-Baker, British delegate, who thought the U. N., "in cooperation" with the press and radio, should attempt to restrain "perversions" of the truth.

As if further to accentuate the divergence between American thinking and that of other countries, the first meeting of the International Organization of Journalists in Copenhagen passed a resolution that "press freedom can never be fully assured while newspapers, news agencies, and broadcasting systems are solely in the hands of individuals or private monopolies with no resposibility to the people." Obviously aimed at the Anglo-American press, this statement may have had its first actual repercussion when journalist members of the House of Commons in England recently sponsored a proposal for an investigation of newspaper monopolies. The fact that the resolution was passed in a free vote indicates that the United Kingdom may go hand in hand with other powers on some of the less radical demands for press control. The British, like the French, have begun to question whether their cherished ideal of press freedom has been an unadulterated good.

Faced with this array of clashing world opinion, it is well that our UNESCO delegates carry instructions which support the idea of protecting people against the irresponsible use of freedom by the press. Their directions do not, however, presume to state exactly in what manner effective control measures can be reconciled with our understanding of press freedom.

It should be noted that the choice is not simply between the independent American press and the rigidly controlled government press of Russia. Gradations of control may be found in other industries in the United States and in the publishing industry in other countries. Of these various systems, American publishers would probably be most willing to accept a form of voluntary control within the newspaper business. As early as 1923 the American Society of Newspaper Editors adopted indisputably high professional standards, which they set forth in the "Canons of Journalism." At that time Herbert Bayard Swope insisted on putting "teeth" in the canons, but he was overruled and they have never been enforced. With the canons as background, however, it is possible that American publishers would agree to punitive measures in a similar international code, provided they themselves drafted and administered it.

Another form of control within the industry is that exercised by unions of journalists. The Australian Journalists' Association, which claims nearly 100 per cent of the newspaper writers in the country, enforces through fines and suspensions a rigid code of ethics dealing with distortion, untruth, and gross inaccuracy. It is not concerned with opinion unless the opinion is based on something said to be not a fact. At present the code cannot be enforced against non-members—that is, publishers and certain editors—but the union is agitating to obtain this right through statutory action.

Control by a combination of publishers, journalists, and printers is suggested in a proposed French press law. This provides that newspapers shall be run by a council of administration composed of representatives of both capital and labor. Printers' and writers' unions will elect the labor members; capital members will be appointed by the owners. The council will elect its own chairman, but no man can be chairman who owns or controls another business enterprise.

While the control of press policies by the industry itself is closest to the desires of American publishers, foreign publishers might be more willing to accept a control exercised by the United Nations. The authority for examining newspapers and monitoring radio broadcasts to detect propaganda injurious to world peace could rest with an autonomous U. N. unit, as recommended by the University of Chicago Commission on Freedom of the Press. Such a body would make periodic reports to the General Assembly about "areas in which distortion of facts and fomenting of international discord are being carried on."

Another step in the same direction would give an international group the same power over the press as our own Federal Communications Commission has over radio. But if this step were taken, constitutional safeguards should be established to preserve freedom of comment.

A third form of control is exercised by political parties. This is still prevalent in a large sector of Europe and in some areas in the Far and Near East. In many countries political groups subsidize newspapers which follow the party line in their editorials and, too often, in their news columns as well. Pre-war France had a notoriously biased and venal political press. A provisional press law in Czechoslovakia permits only political, labor, cultural, and religious organizations to publish newspapers and magazines. This, I am told, has had the effect of turning the press of the country into political or quasi-political organs. An interesting method of preventing such subservience has been set up in the American zone of Germany, where each newspaper is administered by a board of directors representing all shades of political opinion. Among the members, for example, would be Christian Liberal Democrats, Social Democrats, and Communists, with a non-partisan member thrown in if he could be found. I am informed that in some areas our occupation officers have taken great pains to find Communist newspapermen to round out the boards.

As these illustrations show, there are other ways of controlling press policies than by the restrictions of a dictatorial government, the scruples of a publisher, or the choice of readers as it is reflected in the popularity of newspapers.

The problem is not simply whether it is practical to extend the American concept to all the United Nations. Other countries are already on record as opposing this. The question is how far we are willing to go, in order to prevent war, in compromising a basic American tradition. If we are inclined to be adamant about it, the world project will degenerate into a cosy corporation of nations which already think exactly as we do. We have seen international corporations in other fields that failed to include everybody. They have almost always been a threat, rather than an aid, to world peace.

What Russia Wants

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Moscow, December 3

NEVER before probably has the Russian average citizen been so world conscious or so "disarmament conscious" as in these days of the disarmament debates at the U. N. The press prints columns and columns of verbatim reports, with comment, of what Molotov and Vishinsky, Connally, Shawcross, and Noel-Baker say at Lake Success; all these columns are carefully read by the ordinary citizen—you have only to watch him in the Moscow subway any morning; and every day there are countless meetings at which it is all discussed, explained, and digested. The interest is not just academic; everybody feels that the decisions reached in the U. N. will affect the whole course of events in the world.

Sometimes I wonder whether in any other country today the rank and file follow so conscientiously the tortuous progress of the disarmament discussions precipitated by the Molotov proposals. Russians are convinced not only that the issue is of the utmost importance but that the Soviet Union took the initiative in opening up the whole subject. American reactions, too, are being eagerly watched. "So the New York Times and Herald Tribune are beginning to pay tribute to Soviet initiative, and no longer just PM—our people must have made a big impression," Soviet citizens note with satisfaction. They also feel that Molotov is making a serious effort to cut the ground from under the feet of his critics, and heaven knows there has been more criticism than is good for anybody.

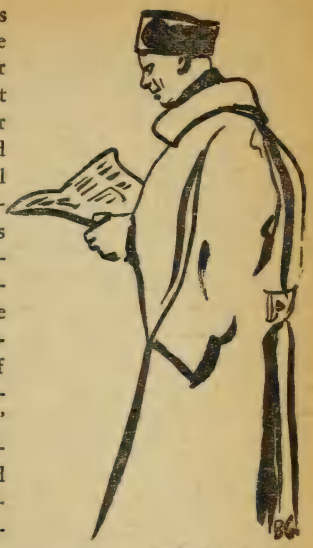
Do the Americans wish to extend the inventory of troops in non-enemy countries to troops abroad generally? O.K., say the Russians. Do they assert that all disarmament talk is futile unless the Russians accept inspection? O. K., say the Russians; we not only accept but formally propose control and inspection. But when Bevin demands in effect, Tell us the number of your home troops, the Russians again reply O.K.—provided you people tell us what arms you have. And when that is refused, the Russians are in a position to say, We have offered to put all our cards on the table, but you other fellows won't. That is how the disarmament discussion presents itself to the Moscow reader: the Soviet delegation is ready for all-out disarmament with disclosure of effectives and arms, while Britain and America are willing to disclose the number of their home troops, which is of very minor interest to the Russians, but want to keep their weapons a secret.

Russia, in the midst of economic reconstruction, is not anxious to engage in an armaments race, is willing to go to considerable lengths to avoid it; it is even prepared to accept inspection. It considers the outlawing or, better still, the abolition of atom bombs of cardinal importance; they are the sword of Damocles hanging, as Vishinsky said, on a thin—very thin—thread over humanity's head. One of the chief reasons why the Russian public is so passionately interested in these disarmament discussions is just because they may put an end to the atom-bomb menace. It thinks this may be accomplished in the U. N., and its anger is great when papers like the London Daily Mail or Telegraph say the U. N. might as well close down since the Russians will not compromise on the veto question. And when the Daily Mail asks, "One world or two?" the Russians reply fiercely, "It is we who want one world; it is you and Winston Churchill who want two."

Russia has undoubtedly a genuine desire for disarmament—"and don't pickle the atom bomb like cabbage or cucumbers for the winter, just in case," Vishinsky emphasized. Behind this desire are both home and international reasons, one of the latter being the wish to obtain the good-will of ever-growing sections of world opinion by taking the lead in this matter. There has been too much propaganda abroad about Russia putting a spoke in the wheels. The Russians want the world to see that their proposals, if they are not torpedoed, will make the United Nations a reality.

It is recognized here that in all countries some people want to live peacefully with the Soviet Union and others, whether they want it or not, "don't believe in the possibility." The world is in a state of flux, and progressives everywhere realize that Russia is the source of ideas for millions of people in Europe and Asia; the new economic democracy is one of these ideas, race equality another. Other people either won't recognize this fact or refuse to accept it, and consider a physical clash, a great ideological war, more or less inevitable. The Russians have been following with immense interest all manifestations in the world of what they call "progressive humanity," people who do not forget Russia's war record and who admit its present importance—Wallace and other groups in America in both the Democratic and the Republican Party, the anti-Bevinites in England. The New Times this week prints a survey of the world showing the growing leftward movement in every country of Europe. It is important to show these groups and as many other people as possible that the Soviet Union stands for peace and disarmament, that it is "an ally of all progressive forces in the world," that it is in the vanguard of the struggle against Franco, that it is a "supporter of good causes."



Drawing by Golden

All Russian writers who have recently visited America —Simonov, Ehrenburg, Korneichuk, Galaktionov—report that anti-Soviet propaganda there has reached alarming proportions. Regarding America two things are now noted with some satisfaction—the relatively favorable reaction to the Russian disarmament initiative, and the fact that the principal clashes of the Russian delegates are not with the Americans but with Bevin, the Americans at some stages even mediating between the Russians and the British, though the Anglo-American front is invariably soon restored. The fact that there have been moments when the Americans were "more progressive" than Bevin has been noted with interest. Russians are also convinced that among the small nations of the U. N. the Soviet proposals have caused much thinking and heart searching: "Wouldn't it be a better world if the Russians really got the atom bomb completely eliminated from human affairs?" If the disarmament talks break down completely, the disappointment will be acute, for with an armaments race in full swing everything is thought likely to go from bad to worse. Hence the immense public interest in the U. N.

It is considered gratifying that the discussions among the Foreign Ministers have also been going well lately, that they have been, indeed, proceeding on a slightly different basis—not always with Britain and America against Russia. Thus on the question of Bulgarian and Italian reparations the British were on one side of the fence and the Russians and Americans on the other. An extremely detailed report in Izvestia this week on the Foreign Ministers' discussions registers great satisfaction over the progress achieved on Trieste and other questions; it is very conciliatory in tone and not only pays tribute to the Soviet delegation's firmness, patience, and capacity for compromise when necessary, but clearly indicates that the Western Allies too were determined to lead the peace talks to a successful conclusion.

The Russians have never believed there was any ground for the pessimism which marked the comments on the peace conference at Paris, for they are convinced that in the last analysis all the great powers are equally anxious to arrive at a settlement. The danger that separate treaties would be made by Russia on the one hand and the Western powers on the other never existed, they feel, except in the imagination of those who wanted to see "two worlds." In the Russian approach to the final stages of the peace settlement with Germany's allies, one observes the same desire for conciliation, for a peaceful modus vivendi in the years to come, and the same wish to impress this upon world opinion, as in Russia's approach to disarmament. Germany is admittedly a far more difficult problem than Italy and Bulgaria, but the present Russian attitude creates a more hopeful atmosphere for the impending inter-Allied discussions on Germany.

I have often asked my Russian friends why their obvious desire to arrive at a modus vivendi with the rest of the world is accompanied by such a sharp ideological line at home. Apparently the incentives to work must be created, rigid discipline must be restored, and the people must be persuaded that it is vitally important for them to behave always as conscientious, self-respecting citizens for whom the common good is more important than individual profit. Private profit-seeking has been vigorously denounced on numerous occasions in the recent past, by Stalin personally and by the Zhdanov decree against the abuses and malpractices that have developed on the collective farms.

Literature, the cinema, and the theater have all been mobilized for what is called the education of the masses. What is taken abroad as long-term policy is often in fact relatively short-term policy dictated by conditions and dangers existing during the present transition period from war to what, let us hope, will be peace. "Our writers must march in serried ranks, and he who steps off the road to pick flowers in a field is like a deserter," Constantine Simonov recently said. "Our views on the duties of literature are different from what those duties are conceived to be in the West," is one of Zhdanov's themes.

Writers who are not "divorced from reality"—J. B. Priestley, for example—continue in high favor in the Soviet Union; others, we are told, should not be imitated by Soviet writers. The current issue of the literary magazine Znamia says that critics must be intransigent in condemning writers who imitate Proust, Remarque, or Hemingway. Proust is obviously too introspective, individualistic, "morbid." Remarque is a debunker of military heroism. True, Remarque portrayed the horror and squalor of an imperialistic war, but any such treatment of the recent war must be avoided by Soviet writers. Hemingway took the glory out of war in "Farewell to Arms," but he is out of favor for other reasons also, even though he has numerous fans among the intelligentsia and has been highly praised by Ehrenburg. He is too individualistic, he has stylistic mannerisms which the Russian writers must avoid, and he often lapses into "obscenity" and eroticism. Eroticism is not favored in Soviet literature. Recently a novel was denounced because its hero developed "dark instincts" which turned his family life into a sordid triangle. The critics said that although such things unfortunately did happen, they were not typical of Soviet family life and were therefore not worth portraying.

But all this drive for a "purer and nobler" literature cannot be treated separately from the general policy of smartening up the people in the post-war period and of avoiding a lapse into the atmosphere of the early twenties. This approach to literature is so different from the Western approach that any common intellectual undertaking, say in UNESCO, seems impossible. Russia's present literary policy is very sharply defined. The great question is whether it is a short-term or a long-term policy.

The Russians are much concerned over the future of UNRRA. All their sympathy is with LaGuardia's stand, and they are strongly against making further aid the subject of bilateral agreements. Under these, if the political implications of the proposal are what the Russians suspect them to be, Byelo-Russia and the Ukraine would be unlikely to benefit. Nor would countries like Poland and Yugoslavia; and it is considered an ominous sign that the first of such bilateral agreements was reached with Greece. Byelo-Russia and the Ukraine, as LaGuardia knows, really need UNRRA help; the urban populations of these countries have been largely dependent for the past year on UNRRA supplies for meat and fats. If they have to depend on Soviet reserves, which as a result of the poor harvest are not high, they will suffer increased hardships. Gromyko, therefore, has strongly pressed for a purely humanitarian and non-political approach to the question of extending UNRRA.

How to Stop the Depression

BY CHESTER BOWLES

IN LATE June, 1946, a combination of Republican Congressmen and Senators and some reactionary Democrats finally succeeded in knocking the props out from under effective price control. The Rube Goldberg price-control bill which the President signed in July had little chance of success. In the next four months the cost of living rose two and one-half times as much as in the three previous years.

As prices have risen, the working people of America —the sixty million men and women who man our assembly lines, drive our trucks and combines, work store cash registers, and run office comptometers—have watched their war-time prosperity fade, their real income dwindle. And they face additional troubles in coming months.

Corporation profits after taxes and net farm income, after the payment of all expenses, will be far greater in 1946 than they were during the peak production of the war years. Labor's take-home pay will be less; it will be roughly the same as in the spring of 1943. And yet conservative editorial writers and radio commentators, taking their cue from the propaganda of certain business groups, have been proclaiming to high heaven that it's time labor was taught a good lesson.

Since the crushing Republican victory of November the more reactionary industrial interests have been making it abundantly clear that from now on they will have the whip hand. This can spell considerable trouble for all of us in the months ahead. Out of such a situation can grow a depression which will shake our economic system to its foundations. Much of our ability to maintain full employment will depend on government action. But to an even greater extent the success of our efforts to keep our economy rolling at top speed will depend on the wages and salaries which are arrived at by collective bargaining.

In every generation since the Civil War the productive capacity of our industrial plants has doubled. Certainly in the new age of atomic energy we can expect this rate of increase to be continued. Unless we increase proportionately the amount of purchasing power in the hands of the people, all the people—workers, farmers, and business men—we shall not be able to buy the volume of goods which we are capable of producing. Production will then slow down, workers will begin to be unemployed, purchasing power will be reduced still farther, and we shall find ourselves headed for trouble. Our forty million families will have the funds with which to buy our increasing output of goods only if wages, salaries, and farm income move steadily upward. How fast they will move will be decided by agreements reached through democratic collective bargaining. A constructive approach on both sides will be called for and a clear understanding of the economic issues involved.

CHESTER BOWLES, former head of the OPA, has recently brought out a book, "Tomorrow Without Fear." He is now in Paris as a member of the American delegation to UNESCO.

THREE WAYS TO RAISE WAGES

There are only three ways in which wages can be raised. The first is to increase the productive output of each worker and to pass on to him in the form of higher pay a major part of the results of his increased efficiency. By and large, this is the way we have raised our standard of living in the past. It is by all odds the best method because it assures the consumer stable or even lower prices and allows business to maintain the profits which are essential for enlarging plant facilities and further stepping up industrial efficiency.

Opponents of price control used to tell us that higher wages invariably meant higher prices, but this statement betrays grave ignorance of the workings of a modern economy. Between 1919 and the spring of 1946 the average hourly earnings of our factory workers slightly more than doubled, profits trebled—and prices remained roughly the same. In many industries increased efficiency has enabled manufacturers to improve markedly the quality of their product, lower prices, raise wages, and increase over-all profits. That is the way our economy must work if we are all to benefit from a rising level of prosperity. Any other course spells economic disaster, not only for the workers but for business men.

In the absence of increased output per hour of effort, wages can be raised by adding the increased wage cost to the price charged to the consumer. In certain industries greater efficiency is unattainable, and this method of raising wages may be justified. But if we followed such a policy extensively enough to affect our whole economy, we should clearly get nowhere. The extra money paid out in wages would be spent, not on additional goods, but on higher-priced goods, and the standard of living would remain the same.

Another way to increase wages in those industries where labor productivity has not risen is to decrease profits. Certainly this approach is justified where profits are exorbitant, as is the case in several areas in our economy today. But if profits generally are decreased below a certain point, the whole economy will bog down. This is not simply theory. We saw it happen in England and France in the years before the war. The capital necessary to increase the efficiency of British and French plants was lacking. As a result, the output per worker remained stagnant in England from 1929 until the outbreak of the war. In France it was actually reduced by 25 per cent as machinery became antiquated. Under such circumstances it was impossible for the British and French people to increase their standard of living.

Except in industries where profits are out of all reason, our ability to increase purchasing power depends on our ability to increase industrial efficiency. How, then, can the output per hour of industrial workers be raised? By far the most important way is through the use of better machinery and improved techniques of engineering and management. We can look for tremendous advances in this field during the next two or three years. And with the development of atomic energy, almost anything is conceivable.

Many business men also say that production can be increased by more effort on the part of their employees. In some cases this claim may be reasonable. But studies have proved that when production falls off, the cause is usually, not labor's unwillingness to work, but the inefficient use of labor. In most instances the drop has occurred when assembly lines have been disrupted by an inability to maintain a reservoir of certain basic materials and key parts.

If in some industries workers are actually putting in less physical effort, what is the remedy? In 1939, with eight million workers unemployed, a foreman could step up production by simply reminding the men that there were plenty of others who were anxious to work. This fact has led some of our more hard-hearted industrialists to the conclusion that what we really need to keep the workers on their toes is a permanent pool of four or five million unemployed. In a civilized economy, however, factory workers should not have to be goaded to increased effort by the fear of losing their jobs. A better method is to improve working conditions and set up some modified system of incentive payments.

Many labor leaders are opposed fundamentally to the whole idea of incentive payments. They can remember only too vividly how in the days before labor was organized such incentives were used to speed up the work tempo until men over forty-five found it impossible to maintain the pace. In an age of strong labor organizations this objection seems somewhat unrealistic. The unions today are in a position to bargain for high minimum pay for those who are capable of a certain output, with increased hourly wages above that figure for those who are willing and able to add to their weekly pay check through extra effort.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING MUST WORK

The responsibility of both management and labor in the field of collective bargaining will be a heavy one during the next few years. The health of the national economy, and indeed our ability to preserve the advantages inherent in our modified free-enterprise system, will depend on the result of their efforts. If the economy once starts into a tailspin, we can be sure that government will be forced by the will of the people to take a far more active part in managing our economic affairs. Let us not fool ourselves. Unless we do a better job in dividing the increased income produced by our factories, the government will eventually have to handle the job for us.

Probably the greatest hurdle in our way is the lack of economic understanding shown by many powerful business interests. American business men, in general, have a far greater knowledge of engineering, organization, and merchandising than their British counterparts. But British business men, producing in a country of limited demand which depends largely on foreign trade, have perforce learned more about how economic forces operate. Last winter a prominent British industrialist said to me: "I am deeply disturbed about the lack of economic understanding in America, particularly among those who make the most vital decisions. I found the greatest awareness of economic principles among the workers on your assembly lines. The next best-informed group are your foremen. Most of the business men with whom I talked seemed dangerously ignorant of what makes your economy function. But the greatest ignorance of all is displayed by your bankers."

Labor leaders must also be held responsible for our economic progress or its lack in the years ahead. Blind demands for nation-wide wage increases in advance of increased productivity can only result in higher and still higher prices. On the other hand, if labor leaders fail to bargain aggressively for a major share of the greater income which comes from greater output, unemployment will be inevitable.

A good deal of the heat and bitterness in collective bargaining could be removed by the establishment of labor-management committees which would determine the increase in output per worker from year to year in individual industries. Reliable statistics would give each side a sound basis for bargaining. With efficiency likely to increase rapidly in the next two or three years, labor has everything to gain from the collection of such statistics.

Labor should recognize the need for some system of incentive payments in many industries. It is strong enough today to make sure that the principle would not be abused. Labor should also insist on its right, as a major factor in the creation of economic wealth, to know all about how an industry is run, including the division of profits. In the past thirty years the Amalgamated Clothing Workers have developed an efficient working relationship with their employers—a relationship based on a full knowledge of the profits of the industry from year to year. In times of economic stress this knowledge has given the men who head the Amalgamated a sense of responsibility. In good times it has enabled them to obtain for the workers their proper share of the industry's total dollar income.

The next few months are bound to be uneasy. Many industrialists will view the results of the election as a signal to crack down on labor. Reactionary Congressmen will try to push through punitive labor legislation. The situation calls for understanding and tolerance on both sides, for much will hang on the final outcome.

Our ability to maintain an essentially free-enterprise system in a world tending toward socialism will largely depend on the ability of labor and management to construct a solid economic basis for the equitable division of the wealth produced by American industry. The purchasing power of all our people, with organized labor as a spearhead, must be pushed gradually upward year after year as we increase our national wealth. If we can solve this problem through collective bargaining, a great victory will be won for the American ideal of economic democracy. Failure could start far-reaching changes in our entire economic system, for Americans will no longer accept economic stagnation and unemployment in a land of potential plenty.

The Klan: Post-War Model

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

Los Angeles, December 1

GOVERNOR ARNALL of Georgia has been racing against time to smash the Ku Klux Klan in that state before Governor-elect Talmadge takes office. On November 9 Assistant Attorney General Daniel Duke, designated by the Governor to prosecute the Klan, filed new charges in the Superior Court at Atlanta as an amendment to an earlier suit to revoke the Klan's charter. In them the state alleged that in 1940 the Klan sought to merge with the German-American Bund in one racially supreme all-Aryan organization and that even now it is trying to combine ultra-nationalist veterans' groups with anti-Semitic and anti-Negro factions. The state asked revocation of the Klan's charter on the ground that the KKK was "systematically carrying out a policy designed to violate the rights of Georgia citizens guaranteed under the constitution of the state and of the United States."

On November 29 the Klan asked that the state's suit be thrown out of court, filing a claim of improper service of the papers and a plea in abatement containing demurrers to every paragraph in the state's amended suit. The plea in abatement cannot be heard until after the disposition of the traverse-of-service claim, to which the court has ordered that a reply be made by December 13. Since court recesses on December 15 for the rest of the year, there is now little likelihood that the state's case against the Klan will go to trial. Governor-elect Talmadge is expected to order it dropped as soon as he is inaugurated.

But not in Georgia alone is the Klan again in the news. For a year the papers have been carrying accounts of its revived activities throughout the South and also in other parts of the country. It is difficult to obtain precise information on the vigor and extent of its resurgence, but a general report can be patched together from news stories, magazine articles, and the investigations of private agencies.

CAREY McWILLIAMS, a staff contributor of The Nation, has written extensively on racial conflicts in the United States. Among his books on the subject are "Brothers Under the Skin" and "Prejudice."

An effort to revive the KKK was anticipated before the war ended. Elmer Roper predicted it in April, 1945, for the Roper polls indicated a general rise in racial feeling, with the scapegoat group varying in different regions. At about the same time Dr. Scudder Mekeel of the University of Wisconsin warned of "the imminent creation of such an organization as the Ku Klux Klan." "So far," he said, "we have not had a hate and super-nationalist organization that combined with prejudice a definite ideology to apply to government." But the fact that "the active use of racial prejudice in this country is definitely associated with reactionary and illiberal ideas," suggested, he thought, that such a combination might be made in the post-war period.

It should be noted that the KKK was never actually dissolved after the First World War. From a peak of 8,904,871 reached about 1924, the membership dropped to 2,000,000 in 1926, to 321,000 in 1927, to 82,609 in 1929, and to 39,694 in 1930; but the organization itself never ceased to function. All during the thirties there were news stories of attempts to revive it. Finally, on April 23, 1944, the Ku Klux Klan, Inc., the parent organization behind the 1915-to-1924 revival, being pressed by the Treasury Department for payment of delinquent taxes in the amount of $685,000, held a national convention in Atlanta at which the officers "repealed all decrees, vacated all offices, voided all charters, and relieved every klansman of any obligation whatever" (New York Times, June 19, 1946). It is apparent, however, that this was a dissolution de jure, to avoid the processes of the Treasury Department, and not de facto, for it was decided at the same convention to keep the charter alive and, pending reorganization, to establish an informal Association of Georgia Klans. But at any rate, the Ku Klux Klan suspended its corporate activities on June 4, 1944, and for purely fiscal reasons went underground.

BURNING CROSSES APPEAR AGAIN

The first sign of its emergence came on October 10, 1945, when a fiery cross was burned on Stone Mountain near Atlanta. Shortly afterward Drew Pearson reported that Klan chapters were holding regular meetings in Atlanta, Knoxville, Birmingham, Key West, and a number of other Southern communities. This upsurge of activity seems to have been related to the fight in Congress, in the summer of 1945, over an appropriation for the continuance of the Fair Employment Practices Committee. When the filibuster against the FEPC began in the Senate in January, 1946, rumblings of KKK activities could be heard all over the South. The defeat of the motion to invoke the cloture rule on February 9, 1946, was followed on February 26 by the Columbia, Tennessee, race riot—the first after the war.

On March 21, 1946, a corporate registration fee was paid for the KKK in Atlanta, and the 1943-46 franchise taxes were paid. On May 10 another meeting was held at Stone Mountain with much fanfare, including the burning of crosses, the appearance of seven hundred hooded members, and the initiation of several hundred new members. Even before this meeting, however, the sparks had begun to fly. On March 21 crosses were burned in Flint, Michigan, in response to the announcement that George Friley, a Negro, would be a candidate for a city commission. Between V-J Day and June 1, 1946, eleven crosses were burned in Chattanooga, and Mrs. Kate Robbins, a Jewish woman, was compelled by Klan threats to close her store in Redbank, a suburb.

On June 14 President Green of the A. F. of L. filed a complaint with the Department of Justice that Willie Dudley, a Negro trade unionist, had been abducted and beaten by masked Klansmen at Gordon, Georgia. Incorporation papers for the Klan were filed in Birmingham on July 12, and a statement was issued that there were four "klaverns" in Birmingham, with a membership of about 1,000, and some forty or fifty others scattered over the state. In a letter to the Wheeling, West Virginia, News-Letter, the Exalted Cyclops announced that the Klan had been revived throughout eastern Ohio and boasted of cross burnings in a dozen communities. A two-column paid advertisement inserted by "reliable persons" in the Chambersburg Public Opinion of August 23 said in part: "Now, folks, you judge if there is any un-Americanism in the Klan. The Jews have their organizations, the Catholics theirs, and the Protestants have the Klan. We are here to stay, and God help America if we die." On September 9 the United Press reported Klan activity in fourteen states.

Even more alarming if less spectacular than these stories have been the evidences of mounting racial tension. On April 19 last the B'Nai B'rith reported increasing discrimination in employment and a marked rise in discriminatory advertisements. On the same day PM carried the report of Colonel Homer Garrison, Jr., director of the Department of Public Safety in Texas, stating that racial clashes had increased 900 per cent in 1945 over 1944. On May 1 the American Jewish Congress revealed that ads carrying discriminatory specifications had tripled in number in the Philadelphia press.

Public reaction to these events has been delayed and somewhat confused. Since some of the cross burnings were found to be the work of juvenile hoodlums, there was a tendency, encouraged by many officials, to write off all KKK incidents as unimportant. The setting up of a fiery cross, however, is a manifestation of the Klan spirit, whether the torch is lighted by an adult member or a juvenile hoodlum.

THE OFFICIAL COUNTER-CAMPAIGN

Credit for initiating a counter-campaign, on an official basis, must go to Attorney General Robert W. Kenny of California. After a cross was burned at Big Bear, Mr. Kenny lost no time in bringing a successful court action to revoke the charter of the KKK in California. This is the necessary first step in any effort to outlaw the organization. In order to carry on its "racket," the Klan must have its name and legal standing protected: if a dozen different groups solicit funds and membership in the name of the KKK, the "take" is inevitably lessened. Loss of a corporate charter makes it impossible for any one group to monopolize the magic letters KKK. Mr. Kenny's prompt action was quickly followed by similar applications in Georgia; in New York, where the charter was revoked on July 30 and the names of 1,100 Klansmen turned over to the FBI; in Kentucky, where the charter was revoked on September 14; and in New Jersey. Official investigations have been launched in Michigan, Pennsylvania, and Ohio.

While this type of action has checked the reorganization of the Klan, it is by no means certain that the setback is more than temporary. It is noteworthy that the Klan has been most active in the South wherever trade-union organization drives, particularly the C. I. O.'s "Operation Dixie," are under way. A Birmingham industrialist who was interviewed by Harry T. Brundidge in the August Cosmopolitan said that hell was "already a-poppin'" in many towns in which the Amalgamated Clothing Workers' drive was on. The Covington County News (Alabama) carried an open invitation to the citizenry to join the KKK in order "to Klean out the union organizers." Brundidge also found three organized Klaverns in St. Louis, where the Amalgamated Clothing Workers have been active.

The federal government has moved even more slowly than it did after the First World War. Since the Wood-Rankin committee has announced that it does not intend to investigate the Klan, there should be action by the Treasury Department to collect delinquent taxes, an official Congressional inquiry, a daring use of the skeletonized remnants of the Civil Rights act, and a nation-wide investigation by the FBI. National opinion should be mobilized by an ambitiously planned and systematically promoted publicity campaign.

The immediate objective of such a campaign should be the restoration of law and order in the South. The wave of lawless beatings and shootings that is sweeping over the South, whether Klan-inspired or not, is the most dangerous symptom in American life today. Much of it has not been reported in the national press, but the Negro press has noted the steadily mounting violence —the blow-torch lynching of a Negro near Minden, Louisiana, on August 8; a Negro whipped to death at Lexington, Mississippi, on July 30; the uninvestigated lynching of two Negroes in Marshall, Texas; mob violence at Magee, Mississippi, on August 20; at Athens, Alabama, on August 10; at Crowley, Louisiana, on August 26; and at Florence, South Carolina, on September 19.

THE NEGRO VETERAN

Russ J. Cowans, in a series of articles from the South which have appeared in the Negro press, says that much of the trouble is caused by white resentment of the Negro veterans. These veterans, a Louisiana Negro told him, "enjoyed a freedom during the war that they had not enjoyed here in the South. They've come back home and they want to keep getting that freedom, but the white man here is just as determined to keep them from having it." Harold B. Hinton in a dispatch from Atlanta to the New York Times reported that Klan members were trying to find a basis of collaboration with veterans "in the specter of returned Negro war veterans getting out of their place."

It may be recalled that Senator Bilbo's speech in Jackson, Mississippi, on June 22, when he appealed to "red-blooded Anglo-Saxons" to bar Negroes from voting and said that "white men have the right to resort to any means at their command" to achieve this end, was prompted by the attempt of Elroy Fletcher, a Negro veteran with twenty-three months' service in the Pacific, to register. For this offense Fletcher, a G. I. student at Jackson College, was flogged with a heavy wire cable. It is the position of the Negro veteran, as seen against the background of the current trade-union drive and other industrial and cultural changes, that warrants the most serious apprehension about further violence in the South.

While the Klan's tactics are much the same as those used after the First World War, the objective situation in the South and in the whole country is by no means comparable to that which existed in the years 1922-24. Today Negroes are voting in sizable numbers even in Georgia and Texas; new organizations such as the Southern Conference for Human Welfare and the C. I. O. are active in their behalf; the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has discarded its traditional taboo against political action; the United States Supreme Court continues its gradual encirclement of Jim Crow with one important decision after another; industrial change has begun to undermine the whole structure of bourbonism in the South, and a large section of the white population is reported "cool" toward the Klan. The way in which national opinion recoiled from the frightful murders in Monroe, Georgia, was quite unlike the reaction to similar occurrences in the past. Moreover, the traditional alliance between the South and the West on racial questions has been severed: the FEPC was sponsored in the Senate by Dennis Chavez of New Mexico and Wayne Morse of Oregon.

A Christmas Amnesty

BY DOROTHY CANFIELD FISHER

WE AMERICANS, even the thoughtless, take-it-easy, insensitive ones among us, are very nearly distracted these days. During the war we were torn by anxiety and sorrow and fear, but we were not so oppressed by uncertainties as we are now—uncertainties about such life-and-death questions as how to handle the atomic bomb, how to organize the world for peace, how to find a way to live in peace (well, without war anyhow) with nations whose basic ideas don't jibe with ours.

But there is one question to which we know the right answer, in our hearts, at least. We know that we should free between 700 and 1,000 young Americans still in federal prison because their consciences would not let them take part in war, and restore their rights as citizens to the 5,300 others who have finished their prison terms as conscientious objectors. The penitentiary doors have shut behind them, but because they have a prison record they are not yet full and free citizens. Their professional or business life and their personal happiness must suffer from a continuing disability unless the President of the United States extends amnesty to these men, who, like Thoreau, felt that to obey the legal law was to break the moral law.

The C. O.'s have not committed a crime, nor are they the kind that is likely ever to commit a crime. They are thoughtful, earnest, idealistic young men who have proved their willingness to suffer for their ideals. We may not think that the means they used to forward the cause of peace was the most effective way to go about it, granted the situation of the world after Pearl Harbor. But practically all of us feel that the effort to attain peace is now the one cause for which every decent human being should be willing to make any sacrifice. To exclude from freedom and citizenship those who have gone to prison for that cause seems unbearably illogical.

DOROTHY CANFIELD FISHER, novelist and critic, served in various volunteer capacities during both world wars—in the first war largely as a relief worker in France, in the second through her contributions to magazines and the O. W. I. Her only son, Captain James Canfield Fisher, was killed in action in Luzon.

Hundreds of clergymen, labor leaders, authors, artists, and other distinguished Americans have addressed amnesty appeals to the President. The Washington Post, the Chicago Sun, the New York Times have published editorials calling for an amnesty. The Synagogue Council of America, the Brotherhood of Sleeping-Car Porters, the American Veterans' Committee, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, these and other groups have gone on record as "in favor of the release of all conscientious objectors from federal custody."

An overwhelming body of public opinion of this same kind exists outside America also. On August 15 the Canadian Minister of National Defense made an official announcement which amounted to a general amnesty for 14,000 men. Since the end of the war political prisoners have been freed in Brazil, Bulgaria, Greece, India, Italy, the Soviet Republic, and Yugoslavia. A year ago General MacArthur released about a million political prisoners in Japan, including conscientious objectors; and last August Lieutenant General Lucius D. Clay proclaimed an amnesty for a million German political prisoners under twenty-seven years of age.

Why do we lag so far behind in America? Not because of a rigid tradition. On the contrary, nine American Presidents have availed themselves of their amnesty powers under the Constitution. George Washington was the first, when in 1795 he pardoned participants in the Whiskey Rebellion. And these were men who had actually borne arms against our government.

But we need not go so far back. A Supreme Court decision some months ago reversed the conviction of two young men who belonged to the organization of Jehovah's Witnesses. In his comment on this vital decision Justice Frank Murphy said, "All the war effort will have been in vain if, when all is finished, we discover that in the process we have destroyed the very freedom for which we fought."

The best of the 365 days in the year, the kindest of festivals, draws near. Shadowed with dark forebodings though it will be, Christmas, 1946, will have its hour of glory if on that day our government acts on the one moral certainty which almost all of us feel.

The People's Front

LAST week's debate on the Spanish question at the United Nations revealed Great Britain and the United States as poor spiritual leaders of the democratic world. In a recent speech British Prime Minister Attlee charged that the Russians are using the U. N. as a propaganda instrument to discredit the Western democracies. But the angry observations of Mr. Molotov and the witty, caustic perorations of Mr. Vishinsky have done far less damage to Britain's good name than the speech delivered by its own delegate, Sir Hartley Shawcross, during the debate on Spain. To judge from comments I heard later in the corridors, his argument embarrassed even supporters of the Anglo-American position, while critics of the present British government openly rejoiced at the spectacle of a Labor Minister defending a bad cause in much the same language Alexander Cadogan has used. As for the Socialist delegates at the U. N., they felt deeply ashamed. Two weeks ago I promised to discuss in this page the causes of Socialist decline in Europe. I could easily base my whole analysis on quotations from Sir Hartley's speech. For in it was epitomized the whole record of the British Labor Party on foreign policy in the past eighteen months, which has done more than any one other thing to undermine the influence of the European Socialist movement.

The British Attorney General was very eloquent in his condemnation of Franco—almost as eloquent as he had been at Nürnberg in his indictment of the war criminals. One wonders, in retrospect, whether he would have pressed his case so vigorously at Nürnberg had the Soviet Union insisted on its indisputable right to put Franco in the dock along with the other defendants. (The Russians did not insist only because they wanted to avoid an issue that might have aggravated already existing frictions and perhaps prejudiced the conduct of the trial.) Yes, Sir Hartley was ruthlessly explicit in his denunciation of the Spanish dictator; yet when elementary logic called for the condign punishment of a criminal such as he described, the British delegate ended with a plea for clemency, largely on the ground that a break with Franco would deprive Britain of orange juice.

The Thirteen Points which constituted the program of the Republican government during the Spanish war did not, it is true, specifically provide for shipments of Valencia oranges to England. But the Attorney General and his Labor friends might reasonably assume that a government capable of eliminating the present economic chaos in Spain should be better able to promote trade between the two countries.

Senator Connally used his rhetorical gifts to subtract further from the meaning of the American proposal, which was already 50 per cent meaningless. The first part of the resolution offered by this country was a forthright attack on the Franco regime; the second half was confused and contradictory—because it was meant to be confused and contradictory: a hymn sung to the Munich tune of non-intervention with an obbligato on the theme of a clerical-military regime along lines approved by Washington, London, and the Vatican.

In a magnificent speech that went beyond the limits of the Spanish problem to examine the whole international situation, Léon Jouhaux, the French labor leader, ripped away the fabric of untruth and hypocrisy which cloaks the Anglo-American policy toward Spain. He served a warning that should be pondered seriously by diplomats here and in Britain: if the masses of the world—and Jouhaux was surely thinking of the French workers as he spoke—see that the U. N. is incapable of fulfilling its obligations, they will take into their own hands the task of helping to restore democracy in Spain. Nothing in the repeated statements of the American and British delegates sounded more insincere than their pious desires to avoid "civil strife and chaos" in Spain. In fact, it has been the Anglo-American strategy of supporting Franco with action while repudiating him with words which has produced the civil strife and chaos that rule in Spain today. As Léon Jouhaux said, "You talk of avoiding another civil war; you seem to forget that the civil war in Spain has never ended, that Franco means continuing civil war. You talk of avoiding international complications; by preventing the U. N. from accomplishing its duty, you will cause Spain to be transferred into a battleground of antagonistic nations." This was equally true in 1939, and the diplomats who precipitated World War II are today laying the groundwork for World War III.

Unable to answer the solid argument of Ambassador Oscar Lange of Poland for severance of diplomatic relations, the speakers who followed him, particularly the Latin American delegates, turned to an involved historical discussion of the non-intervention principle. But they received a verbal thrashing from Dr. Ricardo J. Alfaro, Panama's Foreign Minister, who exposed the thesis advanced by Connally and his Latin American disciples as a shameful pretext for continued support of Franco. Dr. Alfaro, Pedro Zuloaga of Venezuela, Luis Padilla Nervo of Mexico, Jorge Garcia Granados and Vicente Saenz of Guatemala, and the delegates of Chile and Uruguay managed to save the prestige of the Latin American republics. But if the Good Neighbor countries had, from the beginning, more strongly resisted Washington's pressure, the whole discussion on Spain might have taken a very different turn. Nevertheless, after three days of heated debate, the Anglo-American attempt to "drown the political aspects of the case in a sea of juridical interpretations and definitions," as Mr. Gromyko described it, failed. In spite of Anglo-American opposition, a subcommittee was appointed to seek a unanimous formula for action.

In this debate Great Britain and the United States have forfeited whatever authority they may have claimed until now to speak for the Western democracies. When next they address a note to the Rumanian or Bulgarian or Polish government protesting against undemocratic procedures, those countries will certainly reply, "You had better look first to your own record on Spain."

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Britain's Export Drive

AN AMERICAN business man just back from England recently remarked at a press conference that the British people were getting tired of "austerity." Of course they are: the kind of austerity they have been enduring for the past six years is nobody's idea of fun. But while there is a certain amount of grumbling, there seems to be a broad understanding in Britain of the absolute necessity for continuing restraints on consumption. It is realized that the abolition of rationing, for instance, would mean a breakdown in the price-control system. That might bring about an appearance of plenty in the stores, but it would be a plenty available only to the moneyed few; the masses would suffer greater hardships than at present. A major virtue of the British war-time controls has been their assurance of a fair distribution of necessities to all, irrespective of income. That is why, on the whole, they have been accepted cheerfully.

What has been harder to take in the past year has been the priority given to exports. All sorts of goods which are in extremely short supply in Britain are being shipped abroad by government order. American department stores display large quantities of fine British china, while the only kind of cups and plates that can be bought in Britain is the plain white "utility" variety. It is a similar story with many other sorts of consumer goods from penknives to automobiles; despite an almost unlimited home demand a large proportion of the output is being set aside for export.

Naturally enough, the British woman without sufficient ration "points" to buy a new dress, even if she could find one in the stores, feels a little sore when she sees pictures in the papers of magnificent gowns labeled "for export only." Yet Britons have so long lived by foreign trade that they have an almost instinctive grasp of the reasons why so much production must be diverted to foreign markets. The housewife buying New Zealand lamb, Danish butter, Canadian bacon, California canned peaches, Alaska salmon, cannot fail to be aware of the extent to which she depends on overseas products; the worker in the factory handling Texas cotton, or Swedish wood pulp, or Moroccan iron ore, or Rhodesian copper, or Australian wool knows that his job hangs on a steady flow of foreign raw materials. But such goods have to be paid for, and Britain's ability to finance imports was severely reduced during the war, first, by the liquidation of foreign investments which produced an annual income of some $400,000,000, and second, by the contraction of foreign debts the repayment of which will impose a heavy charge on external income for many years to come.

If Britain is to meet its obligations and to pay for its pre-war volume of imports, it must sell vastly more goods to the world than before the war. The only alternative would be to cut down its expenditure on imported goods, which means in effect, since few of these commodities are or can be produced at home in sufficient quantities, resigning itself to a permanently lower standard of living. Britain has chosen to solve the problem by expanding exports even though, at first, that requires skimping the home market for the benefit of foreign customers. The government's economic advisers have estimated that it will be necessary to raise the volume of exports to 175 per cent of the 1938 volume.

This is an ambitious goal, but since the end of the war considerable progress has been made toward it. Taking 1938 as 100, the export index figure for the first quarter of this year was 84, for the second, 97.6, and for the third, 104. Preliminary returns for the month of October indicate an export volume about 17 per cent above the 1938 monthly average. The extent of this achievement is best appreciated by recalling that during the war British exports fell to under 30 per cent of their 1938 volume. "Our total overseas deficit," Hugh Dalton, Chancellor of the Exchequer, told the House of Commons on November 26, "is likely, in terms of sterling, to be substantially less when this financial year has run its course. This reflects great credit on the export drive, which has succeeded beyond expectation and beyond estimate."

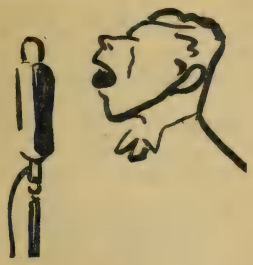
In some quarters, however, fears have been expressed that the upward curve is beginning to level off. Certainly a great many obstacles have yet to be surmounted. One of the most serious is a shortage of steel, since it tends to cut down production of machinery and vehicles, which are among the most rapidly expanding exports. The present rate of British steel production is around 12,700,000 ingot tons per annum, which is near capacity, while effective domestic demand could absorb 16,000,000 tons. Hopes that imports, particularly from this country, would fill the gap have been disappointed, and now the coal strike postpones to a still more distant date the time when our steel will be available.

An even more formidable problem is the shortage of man-power in Britain. This is the main reason why such former export staples as coal, cottons, and woolens today make a very poor showing in the trade returns. In 1937, 53 per cent of Britain's production of cotton piece goods went abroad; today there is a worldwide unsatisfied demand for cloth, but after providing for minimum home needs only 16 per cent of the output can be spared for exports. The reason for this situation is not shortage of raw material but the drift of textile workers to more lucrative or pleasanter occupations. And with almost every industry clamoring for more labor, it is not easy to arrest this movement.

With Britain's total working population, after deducting the armed forces, more than a million less than before the war, it is fairly obvious that only through greater productivity will it be possible to turn out the additional exports required and at the same time to meet home needs, including the vast demand for houses. To this end the Labor government is supplementing its export drive with a production drive and is covering the hoardings with the slogan: "Extra Effort Now Means Better Living Sooner." The question is whether a tired people, lacking the emotional stimulus provided by the threat of invasion, is capable of that extra effort unless some additional incentive is provided. It may be that, in the long run, the export drive would benefit by the release of more goods for the home market.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL



IN THE flood of mail pouring in, I find various formulations of an extremely provocative question. I will quote a few of them and then attempt an answer.

Dear Sir: What has become of John W. Vandercook? I hope he was not put off the air because of his progressive views?
Hollywood B. S., JR.

Dear Sir: Orson Welles was suddenly dropped as a commentator by ABC, and right in the midst of his campaign for the apprehension and trial of the South Carolina police official who had beaten and blinded a Negro veteran. Welles was extremely popular here. The cancelation of his program brought a deluge of telephone calls to the station and a pile of letters to the radio editor of the Cleveland Press. My own hunch is that the networks do not care for the red-blooded type of crusading done by Welles. Robert St. John's dismissal strengthens my belief.
Cleveland E. S. N.

Dear Sir: As the special West Coast edition of The Nation stated, liberal commentators have been completely kept off the air in this area. Sam Balter has disappeared; James Roosevelt has had no commercial sponsor for weeks; Alvin Wilder has disappeared from his weekly evening spot; Frank Kingdon was scheduled for a daily fifteen-minute evening program on KFWB but never came on; Averill Berman is struggling along with no commercial sponsor; and now even Raymond Swing has been dropped. This, I feel, is the most severe blow that has yet been dealt to the listening public.
Santa Monica

Numerous other listeners and readers are upset about the swing to the right in radio. There are three reasons for it: First, the political trend of the nation is to the right, as the recent election shows. Second, radio is reacting to the change in political temperature. Third, the popularity ratings of the commentators reflect the political shift; consequently the networks, which by nature are in sympathy with the thinking and desires of the conservative camp, are not hesitant about dropping the progressive spokesmen.

There is one other factor in this reshuffle of the commentators. Radio today is reverting to the lack-luster, non-controversial type of news coverage of the period before the New Deal. In those days about the only personalities in radio news were the late Floyd Gibbons and Walter Winchell. Executives leaned over backward to keep their news coverage straight. Then, as the political tempo of the nation speeded up under the New Deal, news broadcasting took on more color, and personality journalism came on the air. There were liberals and conservatives and middle-of-the-roaders among these commentators just as there are now—except that now there are fewer liberals.

What can be done about it? In order to influence the FCC literally thousands of persons must write to it and to their favorite station and network as well. Say something like this: "I want to hear the liberal viewpoint on my air. Give us liberals and progressives in at least the same proportion as the vote in the last election." The idea is to capitalize on radio's responsibility to minorities by arguing that while liberals are now a minority, they are not so infinitesimal a minority as the number of liberal commentators in proportion to the conservative.

But remember this: be realistic; don't expect liberal commentators to stay on the air if people don't listen to them.

One more letter:

Dear Sir: It was high time! Lou Frankel's column can do a lot of good; not all radio executives are morons, and not all are sunk in greedy commercialism. We may achieve valuable reforms by means of publicity, appeal to common sense, and persistent moral pressure.

I'm writing this brief note to urge you to insist on two reasonable concessions by the radio chains and stations.

1. Let the ads for the sponsors precede and/or follow the program, whatever it is—lecture, news, music, debate. No interruptions, please, in the middle. Two ads should satisfy any sponsor. The interruptions are nuisances, and very offensive ones. They do not pay. We get mad and boycott the offender.

2. The radio chains give us very little chamber music, though it is eminently suitable. Thousands of music lovers are thus deprived of a pleasure which radio, if intelligently managed, could bring them. "There's no money in it"—therefore sponsors for chamber music are hardly to be expected. Still, a few sustaining programs of good chamber music would not bankrupt our chains.
Chicago VICTOR S. YARROS

My reply is that the middle commercial will not be removed until radio presents a solid front to the advertisers. This in turn will not happen until research shows a majority of listeners antagonistic to middle commercials. Right now both the advertiser and the broadcaster know, from detailed surveys, that the practice is not unpalatable to most of the audience. However, not all advertisers present their interruptions with the same deft touch. When enough listeners are annoyed by blatant midway announcements, the practice will cease.

The presentation of chamber music, so far as the networks are concerned, is a case of satisfying thousands at the expense of millions. Look to your local stations for the more specialized programs such as chamber music. Talk up, write, ask for it, and you will get it.

WORTH HEARING

ARTHUR GODFREY'S TALENT SCOUTS (CBS, Tuesdays). The humor and humanness of Godfrey, new faces, and none of the sanctimoniousness of the late Major Bowes.

HARVEST OF STARS (NBC, Sundays). Good music by Frank Black and good singing by James Melton, plus restrained commercials.

CLEVELAND SYMPHONY (MBS, Saturdays). Relax for an hour after dinner.

TIME FOR REASON (CBS, Sundays). Paley's network goes to bat for radio. Must listening for every critic of radio.

DREW PEARSON (ABC, Sundays). Has a voice that grates, but his material measures up to his column.

The Nation has included seventeen Borzoi Books in its selection of Outstanding Books of 1946. You will find each of the seventeen described on these pages, and they can all be examined at your leisure at any good bookshop.

I believe several forthcoming Borzoi Books will also be of interest to you. If you will send me your name and address, I will arrange for you to receive our catalogue of books to be published between January and April, 1947, as well as occasional news bulletins regarding Borzoi Books.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Dialectic of the Thaw

THE SHORT NOVELS OF TOLSTOY. Translated by Aylmer Maude. Selected with an Introduction by Philip Rahv. The Dial Press. $4.

FOR about half a century Tolstoy has been for many idealistic people a kind of one-man National Academy representing top standards in such departments as Letters, Philosophy, Religion, Politics, Domestic Affairs. On the other hand, for much the same reasons he has appeared to lovers of a more formal art as a busybody of genius who spoiled the effect of noble descriptive passages with his theories and moralizing. Were his scene-painting and ideas all there is to Tolstoy we could abandon him forever to the controversies of these two camps.

There is, however, a dialectical life in Tolstoy that makes it impossible to pass him by either as a monument or a corner preacher. Drawing on one of his most famous chapters, we might call it the dialectic of the thaw. What happens in Tolstoy's world is that a static social structure has been formed, hard as ice or a bureaucrat's routine, and made up of innumerable commonplaces; then something attacks this structure from within or without, undoes its joints, and threatens to disintegrate it into a mass of debris; the old form resists; and finally the enemy retires and a healing begins with a new burst of life and hope. You find this movement, or part of it, in the large novels and in all of the eight shorter ones gathered in the present collection.

Thus Tolstoy builds his art out of two systems of elements —the details of social and natural life which constitute normal existence, and the movement from the "outside" which invades the normal. As an observer of the normal, Tolstoy ranks with the best of naturalists. But what is most magnificent is his tenacity in following the fate of the invading movement—whether it be Napoleon's army, or the slow opening out of the emotions of the lovers in "Family Happiness" until they cover all routines like a flood, then ebb and turn inward, dividing into sluggish streams and at length drying up, while the shapes of the social begin to emerge again in their separateness; or the coming of the pain that nudges into Ivan Ilyich's side and turns him on his proud magistrate's seat, then sinks away, only to return again and again, more furious, suddenly almost vanishes, but inexorably appears once more, until it becomes the very substance of Ilyich's existence and he can only howl in anguish for three whole days and die.

The relation between the conservative social organism and the outsider who comes into it, more or less violently, provides the terms of Tolstoy's values and his speculations on the good life. Even in the early "Two Hussars" the issue is the different effects of the arrival of father and son in the same provincial village. In "The Cossacks" and "Hadji Murad," which would otherwise be pure "noble-savage" documentaries, Tolstoy tests the communes of the Caucasus against the Russian occupying troops. He admires the native aoul for successfully resisting the foreigners quartered on it, just as he admires the serf Nikita for his resistance to the conditions that drive his more "civilized" master to madness and destruction. In this capacity to resist the strange which he finds in the primitive and the passive lies the ground of much of Tolstoy's thinking on different levels—his military conceptions, his antagonism to medicine and science in general, his mystique of the organic, his archaism.

The thoroughly doomed are those whose flesh and spirit are grown into the dead substance of polite society. "Ivan Ilyich's life had been most simple and most ordinary and therefore most terrible." Had Tolstoy been capable of creating a literary form exactly equivalent to the quality of petrified life he imagined for Ilyich, his hero would have turned into some sort of monster, as in Kafka's "Metamorphosis" or "The Burrow," both of which, despite Philip Rahv's contention in his preface that "the theme of death is absent in Kafka," deal with the same final invasion of a structuralized life as "The Death of Ivan Ilyich."

Yet Tolstoy will not permit the victims of convention to escape their living death either through personal passion or through becoming outsiders themselves. Like Anna Karenina, the hero of "The Devil" is destroyed by an outlaw love affair. Tolstoy's norm is always the social, even when he rejects a particular society as hostile to life. And this fact suggests the limits of Tolstoy as a writer and the explanation of why in all matters he needs to play the prophet. It accounts also for his enormous official popularity in the U. S. S. R., where all values are social values.

That, absorbed in the onslaught of the destructive outsider, Tolstoy never forgets the image of the normal, the value of normal living, makes him seem more "whole" and "healthy" than writers like Dostoevski or Kafka, who "distort" the normal or even eliminate it altogether. But this "wholeness" can be looked at another way. Since the society that Tolstoy is describing is actually disintegrating, the individual who lives most fully is already, like Tolstoy himself or his revolutionary contemporaries, mostly outside the social norm. But Tolstoy refuses to deal with this fuller man projecting hugely out of society. He prefers to look back from the superior height of his own "revolution" upon the social organism and those who are still stifling in it, and condemn and instruct them. Thus instead of Dostoevski's "geniuses" and suffering isolated men, who really represent the dynamics of modern life, he gives us abstract social types who do not so much feel as they are carried away by feelings.

Since he never gets beyond the socially given, Tolstoy ought not to be regarded, as he is by Chestov and others, as a philosopher of life and death. Neither "The Death of Ivan Ilyich" nor "Master and Man" actually deals with the situation of humanity in the face of death, but with an extreme criticism of conventional life, the life of the special type committed to success in social terms, who is much more

What terror stalked a hidden beach?

WHAT IS HAGANAH? WHO ARE THESE GAMBLERS WITH DEATH AND TERROR? READ

This was a night that terror walked among men.

Dread fear prowled among twelve-hundred people huddled on a lonely beach — laid a cold finger on their lips, commanding, "Silence! Be still! No talking, there!

And twelve-hundred travelers out of Hell were silent. Silent as death.

But their eyes looked out to the sea.

Where was the ship? The ship that Haganah had promised . . . had brought them here to meet. The ship that meant freedom from hate and terror and living death. Where was the ship?

And their eyes looked back to the mountains, rising in huge, dark shapes against the sky.

Were the carabinieri coming? Did those dark hills hide the police . . . with men in uniforms, and guns, and orders to block the road to freedom? How soon would they come marching out of the night? "Oh, God, where is the ship Haganah promised"?

UNDERGROUND TO PALESTINE

by I. F. STONE Famous newspaper correspondent

ALBERT EINSTEIN says:

"Like a genuine artist, I. F. Stone has described what he saw and lived through. Everyone who wishes to form an independent opinion about the burning questions of international politics should read this book carefully.

"Whoever shuts his eyes to avoid seeing the bitter injustices of our times shares the guilt for their tragic continuation."

LEWIS GANNETT

In the N. Y. Herald Tribune says:

"This book lives and breathes . . . Mr. Stone came home a changed man. He had watched a crusade. His American correspondent's uniform had set him apart, but for a time he, too, had been a crusader."

Walter Winchell says:

"If Bevin has a conscience this compelling book should make it impossible for him to live with himself."

This is the thrilling, heart-breaking, fear-laden story of the greatest exodus in history . . . the flight of the Jews from the ravaged wilderness of Europe to their promised homeland . . . Palestine!

By the tens and twenties they start, slipping across borders, dodging hostile guards. By the hundreds they come, foot-sore, starving, praying, pushing, out of Europe at any cost. By the thousands they are marching, hiding, dying on the Underground to Palestine!

And you march with them in this dramatic story of adventure, one of the most exciting stories of our time. The story of how Haganah is saving the Jews of Europe, told by I. F. Stone, a great reporter who got the whole story while he traveled the underground to Palestine.

Haganah, and only Haganah

Haganah is the Jewish Underground. From the new Ghettoes of Poland, from the countries where they are still hated, from slums, and ruins, and the dark corners of Europe where terror and death still wait for Jews they flee. And the flight leads to the one place they want to go. Palestine.

How do they go? Only Haganah knows. How do they cross Europe, and the Mediterranean? Only Haganah knows. How penetrate the British blockade? Haganah and only Haganah holds the answer.

When you finish the UNDERGROUND TO PALESTINE you'll know. And you'll never forget the most exciting journey of your life. Buy your copy, today!!

Get behind the headlines

As you travel the UNDERGROUND TO PALESTINE with I. F. Stone, your newspaper comes into new focus.

- What is the difference, if any, between a concentration camp, and a DP camp?
- How can a man live after 120 lashes from SS whips, and what does he do when he is free?
- What really happens when a British destroyer stops a Jewish refugee ship on the high seas?
- How can Haganah keep the underground running, and one small determined group against the might of the British Empire?

frenzied than most men in holding on to existence, and who even when the end comes sees it through the eyes of his author not as an inescapable fate but as a lesson on how to live better. ". . . Worse than the physical sufferings were his [Ilyich's] mental sufferings which were his chief torture. . . . 'What if my whole life has really been wrong?'" As if Ilyich could, as Tolstoy says, have avoided dying had he lived properly.

By his translations of extreme human situations into social problems which he could solve Tolstoy consistently betrays his themes and emerges as the great sectarian. On no account will he admit himself baffled by beauty or by tragedy—deliberately he makes himself the ally of the practical man against all the uncommunicative chimeras of art from "Oedipus" to "Hamlet." If Tolstoy is "whole" and "healthy" it is in contrast not only with the "morbid" modern artists but with art itself, and even with life itself. Neither Homer nor the Old Testament is so healthy as Tolstoy, since the gods and fates that "sicken" the epic world cannot always be managed by formulas for right living.

HAROLD ROSENBERG

FICTION IN REVIEW

THE jacket of Robert M. Coates's "The Bitter Season" (Harcourt, Brace, $2.50) is misleading when it tells us that this is a novel about how men who were a "little too old or a little too frail to be warriors" felt about their exclusion from war service. Actually it is a novel about all of us in war time as we are seen by Mr. Coates's narrator and as this one person is representative of a broad segment of civilian life. The novel's protagonist is a painter-writer, a typical decent, thoughtful product of his century, who came to maturity—or supposed he did—in the period following the First World War. Now, in the midst of another war, he finds himself very little farther than where he started in both his personal life and the life of his country. The parallel between his narrator's personal history and the history of our times is Mr. Coates's means of tracing some of the antecedents and possible consequences of the present condition of the world; through the eyes of this sensitive observer of human behavior in a period of stress Mr. Coates attempts to assess the society that makes and is made by war. It is a large fictional undertaking, larger than the effort to analyze the state of mind of people unfit for military duty—though this too, of course, would be a good subject for a novel—and if Mr. Coates is not wholly successful in it he at least deserves the credit of his attempt.

The failure of "The Bitter Season" to be equal to its intention is chiefly due, I think, to the confusion of its method; and this in turn seems to me to be due to Mr. Coates's lack of confidence in the power of a fictional incident to communicate more than it may superficially appear to. Thus Mr. Coates's personal narrative not only follows no time sequence but is constantly interrupted for philosophical asides and for quick sketches of war-time habits and manners. And even these contemporary social observations are so crowded and handled so fancily that their import is lost; it is only with a certain effort that one realizes that a single principal thread—the thread, and threat, of suppressed or only half-suppressed violence in our most ordinary human encounters—runs through all of them. There are few current novelists who see the small business of life—how bartenders and bar customers, waiters, taxi drivers and bus conductors act and talk—with Mr. Coates's accuracy and intelligence, which makes it all the more regrettable that "The Bitter Season" is not a better job of dramatic distillation.

Jerome Weidman's "Too Early to Tell" (Reynal and Hitchcock, $3) is about the undisciplined goings-on in a bureau of psychological warfare which its author does not call the OWI. It bears very little relation to Mr. Weidman's earlier novels. Certainly one never thought to be able to accuse the author of "I Can Get It for You Wholesale" of dulness, of lack of narrative flair, of spreading himself transparently thin, of—in short—sweating out a novel. It is true that because Mr. Weidman's bureaucrats and other civil-service types are not particularly attractive people "Too Early to Tell" has been easily labeled another of his usual caustic efforts. But this is to look for trouble where for this reader any kind of trouble would have been preferable to tedium.

The literary case of Mr. Weidman interests me very much. Never a major talent or even the promise of one, if only because his imagination has so limited a range, Mr. Weidman has yet seemed to me one of the quirkily arresting writers of our time who have received a peculiarly bad deal from the critics. I have the impression, in fact, that he has been singled out as whipping boy for the bad conscience of a literary period sanctified to the doing of good works. The notable instance is the outraged response that has greeted his writing about Jews. Conspicuously ignoring the question whether the characters in his earlier novels were faithful representations of a section of the Jewish population, Mr. Weidman's critics have taken the attitude that Mr. Weidman himself was as wicked as the people he described just because he described them, that practically single-handed he was bringing Hitlerism to America. The result of this kind of moral pressure was that, in his novel called "The Lights Around the Shore," Mr. Weidman sublimated a group of obviously Jewish characters into Gentiles, thus robbing them of an important reality, and that in his newest novel he touches virtually no reality at all. Present-day liberalism, in all its astigmatism and self-righteousness, has many large cultural as well as political sins to account for at the Day of Judgment; I am not saying that its pressure upon one minor literary figure is among the largest of them. But I do feel that the unofficial censorship of Mr. Weidman cannot properly be overlooked if we are to understand the relation of politics and literature in our time.

"The Liberators" by Wesley Towner (A. A. Wyn, $2.75) is a pedestrian but thoroughly earnest, decent study of the problems of the occupation of Germany. While I cannot recommend it as a work of fiction, I can recommend it as an unusually enlightened and honest report on our conduct in victory, rather a relief after such sentimental fantasies as "A Bell for Adano."

If you have been puzzled by announcement of the publication of "The Memorial" by Christopher Isherwood (New Directions), you might want to know that this is an early novel published in England in 1932.

BRIEFER COMMENT

The War

IT IS CERTAINLY too early to write a definitive interpretative history of the war that shall be both a vigorous treatise on the controlling social processes and an accurate and comprehensive account of the military campaigns. To trace the operation of causes implies selection, fulness here and condensation there, and much speculative effort. Nevertheless, Professor Hall's "Iron out of Calvary" (Appleton-Century, $4) will be an extremely useful book to those whose interest in the war is not primarily military.

Professor Hall, a liberal historian, prefaces his account with a quite objective survey of the confusion out of which the war developed. In his view the three principal phenomena of that confusion are economic maladjustment, intensified nationalism, and a steady loss of confidence in the liberal heritage of the nineteenth century. The association of capitalism and democracy had been weakened and its validity called in doubt by unmanageable economic crises. The result was that new authority principles attracted many followers. In this state of confusion the desire for peace as often as not worked in the interest of war. While radical thinkers on the right and left worked vigorously for peace on their own terms, or for war in behalf of their aims, great masses of people lost their nerve or suffered a repressive frustration of their energies.

The narrative section of this book is very good indeed. Professor Hall possesses great powers of organization and a sense of proportion; his book contains an immense amount of significant fact. One of its merits is that it deals in some fulness with the political and social measures that were taken by the various governments in support of their war effort. And the book is written vigorously but does not draw its vigor from journalistic devices.

Yet it is not improper to suggest that the criticism given above applies even to the historical part. Professor Hall is a liberal Democrat. He is not a mere partisan of the social and power aims of any one of the great powers. Yet he does not sufficiently weigh that view of the war which Russian thinkers once called "the theory of Parallel War." That British and even American strategy differed from Russian strategy he is fully aware, but he does not adequately relate this awareness to the phenomena he describes so well. It would be unfair to press this criticism too far, however, and one's final opinion must be that this is the history of the war that, to date, Nation readers will find most useful.

RALPH BATES

Poems

IN WRITING ABOUT "A Little Treasury of Modern Poetry (Edited by Oscar Williams, Scribner's, $2.75) it is easy to be hard on Mr. Williams. He asks for it by writing introductions full of pompous and affected half-truths, such as, "When a poet promulgates the sensuous pleasures he is no less moral than when he paints the hope of heaven or reveals the truth of tragedy. To be on the side of life is to be moral." He asks for it by including nine of his own poems, presumably on the ground that each of them "gave me that experience which I have learned comes as a reaction to reading a true poem." He asks for it by including, on this ground, a careful selection from the works of such other distinguished poets as Sarah Cleghorn, Timothy Corsellis, H. H. Lewis, and Shamus O'Sheel. It is easy to be hard on Mr. Williams, and, up to a point, quite right. No good book would include any of these things; mere common sense would exclude most of them.

But there is another side to Mr. Williams's book which ought also to be noticed. There may be defects in his taste and deficiencies in his common sense, but I would guess that his devotion to poetry is very real; there is an earnestness about him when he is talking of such things as "promulgating the sensuous pleasures" which convinces you in spite of the absurdity; and—what is after all the main point of a book like this—there are more good poems by more good twentieth-century poets here than in any other book of the kind.

For all its occasional foolishness and minor irritants, its curious notions about what is light verse and what is not, its refusal to arrange the poems in any reasonable order, its photographs of the poets, its dust-jacket account of how well-known a poet Mr. Williams is (with a photograph), this is the best single collection of twentieth-century poetry you can get right now. Scribner's have made it a handsome little book, too.

ARTHUR MIZENER

Meat

LIKE THE OLD FORD, Stefansson in his "Not by Bread Alone" (Macmillan, $3.50) rambles, rambles right along. In the midst of all these "meat" discussions, we have discourses on the Stone Age man, the dentist, scurvy, pemmican, and so on. There is much of interest to the anthropologist when Stefansson deals with customs among the Eskimos; there is little of importance to the scientist when he discusses necessary foods. Just as Hindhede became notorious by his advocacy of low-protein diets, so Stafansson has been pushed to the forefront because he is all out for meat eating. At least, so I thought until I came on this passage in the book (page 52): "These months on fish were the beginning of several years during which I lived on an exclusive meat diet. For I include fish when I speak of living on meat, using 'meat' and 'meat diet' as if I were a teacher of anthropology rather than an editor of a housekeeping magazine. The term in this book, and in like scientific discussions based on my work, refers to a diet from which all things of the vegetable kingdom are absent."

In the light of this strange definition of a "meat diet," it merely remains to be added that the Committee on Foods and Nutrition of the National Research Council would approve of such a diet provided fruits, vegetables, and cereals were included. And with all due respect to the estimable author, the collective opinion of the best brains in the field of nutrition—based as such opinion is on (a) experimental findings, (b) enormous statistical data, (c) war experiences, (d) army needs—more than counterweighs Stefansson's prejudices.

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"NO EXIT" (Biltmore Theater) is the English version of a phenomenally successful French play by Jean-Paul Sartre, high priest of existentialism. The scene is hell, the running time only a little over an hour and a quarter, and the total effect that of a rather ingenious shocker of a sort which would not have been out of place on the program at the Grand Guignol a generation ago. Three people—a Lesbian, a male collaborationist, and an American playgirl who murdered her child—find themselves after death shut up together in a hotel room. They enter at once upon a brief cycle of disputation in the course of which each manages to torture the other; then, as the cycle begins to repeat itself exactly, the curtain goes down. The three, it is evident, will pass eternity going over the same painful ground again, and again, and again. Since they will never sleep, hell, as one of them says, is merely life with no time off.

Of existentialism I know only what I read in the papers—including The Nation. It is, I have been told on various occasions, the theology of Kirkegaard with God left out; the conviction that though the world is both evil and without meaning nothing much can be done about it; and, finally, the determination to reject society while acting as an atomic individual. So far as I can see, it neatly combines the disadvantages of religious faith with those of nihilistic atheism. It seems, in other words, to assert moral responsibility while at the same time insisting that virtue has no reward, and it thus enables M. Sartre to revive the ancient proclamation, "There is no God and I am his prophet." But if this summary is inadequate, the fact is of no great importance at the moment, since no more—indeed hardly that much—could be deduced from the present play, whose virtues and limitations are obvious enough even to a spectator who has received no previous indoctrination.

Chief among the virtues is a genuinely macabre quality which makes itself felt most effectively during the first fifteen minutes, when the central conception is being presented and the atmosphere of horror being established. The ugly room, furnished in rather expensive bad taste and hideously lit by an unshielded chandelier in the ceiling, is just small enough to generate in the spectator a disconcerting claustrophobia, and as the victims are introduced one after another we share to some real extent both their nervous apprehension and the horror with which they realize the implications of their situation. Baudelaire talked about the frisson nouveau, and though it is no longer exactly new the shiver or thrill can still be provoked. Unfortunately, like most plays based upon a conception which can be effectively stated in a few words, "No Exit" suffers from the fact that the interest tends to decline steadily from the moment when the conception has been grasped and the playwright begins to try to fill in with sufficient material to stretch the action out beyond playlet length. In the present instance the revelation at the very end that the action is to repeat itself exactly through all eternity does provide an effective curtain, but up to that moment the tension has been going down rather than up, and there is no very good reason why the whole should not have been presented in half the short time now given it.

The popular French actor Claude Dauphin, who has been brought over to undertake the leading male role, gives a very effective if necessarily unpleasant performance as the bad-tempered, cowardly, neurotic, and self-despising collaborationist. Indeed, he seems to feel and transmit the emotions called for to a degree never approached by Annabella and Ruth Ford, who play competently enough the other two principal parts. But not even the genuineness of his performance can conceal the fact that the main action itself is not very different from that of a sensational triangle play as, let us say, Bourdet or even Bernstein might have written it. It is one thing to say that hell will merely be life lived eternally and without respite. It is another to illustrate that statement by an action not essentially different from one which has been presented many times by dramatists who were saying merely that life is sometimes hell, not—what is really quite different—that hell is life.

To compare the reaction of an American audience with what is said to be the reaction of Parisians is to realize how much the success of the play in France must be the result of the special state of the post-war mind. Here it was being discussed during the one brief intermission merely as a tour de force, a sensational novelty; there it obviously means something to a population whose pessimism has become not so much an intellectual conviction as a neurotic derangement. Existentialism would appear to be less a philosophy than a state of mind, and less a state of mind than a state of nerves. "Hell," said Shelley, "is a city much like London," but that does not make Shelley an existentialist, for the simple reason that he was neither cold, nor hungry, nor defeated. And the difference makes the artistic as well as philosophical difference between "Peter Bell, III," and "No Exit."

JAMES AGEE

[This is the concluding section of Mr. Agee's review of "The Best Years of Our Lives." The first half was printed last week.]

IT SEEMS to me that the movie's basic weaknesses are in the script—or are, more likely, in the writer's knowledge of all that he would have to go easy on as a part of the rather remarkable bargain by which he got away with all that he managed to. Yet this is a most unusually good screen play. Although the dialogue has a continuous sheen of entertainment slickness it is also notably well-differentiated, efficient, free of tricks of snap and punch and overdesign, and modest in its feeling for how much weight it should carry on the screen; and most of the time there is an openness about the writing which I don't doubt every good screen writer tries for but which few achieve. By openness I mean simply that the scenes are so planned, and the lines so laid down, that every action and reaction, every motion and everything that is seen, is more centrally eloquent than the spoken lines. The movie thus has and takes its chance to be born in front of the camera, whereas the general run of screen plays force what takes place before the camera to be a mere redigestion of a predigestion.

With a director and camera man in charge so gifted as Messrs. Wyler and Toland it is impossible to guess which of them, or Mr. Sherwood, is most to be thanked for the great force, simplicity, and beauty of some of the scenes and countless of the camera set-ups; so it is purely my hunch, with apologies in advance, that the real heroes in this film are Wyler and Toland, with invaluable assists credited to the set designer and art director, who provide some of the best stages for the action that I have ever seen in a movie. I can't think of a single shot of Toland's that doesn't show the amount of will, creative energy, and taste, and doesn't add with perfect power and modesty its own special kind of expressiveness, which of course ought to be evident in every shot in every good movie, and which of course plenty of people try for without more than spasmodically achieving. I can't remember a more thoroughly satisfying job of photography, in an American movie, since "Greed." Aesthetically and in its emotional feeling for people and their surroundings, Toland's work in this film makes me think of the photographs of Walker Evans. Toland either lacks or subsumes any equivalent intellect, irony, and delight in the varieties of texture, edge, meaning, mystery, and shape in clothing and in all inanimate things; but it is a question how much such powers of perception could be used in telling a story in motion.

William Wyler has always seemed to me an exceedingly sincere and good director; he now seems one of the few great ones. He has come back from the war with a style of great purity, directness, and warmth, about as cleanly devoid of mannerism, haste, superfluous motion, aesthetic or emotional overreaching, as any I know; and I felt complete confidence, as I watched this work, that he could have handled any degree to which this material might have been matured as well as or even better than the job he was given to do. His direction of the non-professional, Harold Russell, is just an exciting proof, on the side, of the marvels a really good artist can perform in collaboration with a really good non-actor; much more of the time it was his job to get new and better things out of professionals than they had ever shown before. One conspicuous failure —good as it is in its regrettable way—is March in his drunk scenes; and Myrna Loy, as his wife, is surprisingly uneven. But March is far outside his normal habits, and very good indeed, in, for instance, his interview with Dana Andrews over the question of the March daughter. And such a scene as that in which the sailor's father helps him get ready for bed seems to me so quietly perfect that I would set it in the world with the best fiction, or poetic drama, or movies that I know.

Almost without exception, down through such virtually noiseless bit roles as that of the mother of the sailor's fiancee, this film is so well cast and acted that there is no possible room to speak of all the people I wish I might. I cannot, however, resist speaking briefly, anyhow, of Teresa Wright. Like Frances Dee, she has always been one of the very few women in movies who really had a face. Like Miss Dee, she has also always used this translucent face with delicate and exciting talent as an actress, and with something of a novelist's perceptiveness behind the talent. And like Miss Dee, she has never been around nearly enough. This new performance of hers, entirely lacking in big scenes, tricks, or obstreperousness—one can hardly think of it as acting—seems to me one of the wisest and most beautiful pieces of work I have seen in years. If the picture had none of the hundreds of other things it has to recommend it, I could watch it a dozen times over for that personality and its mastery alone.

I can hardly expect that anyone who reads this will like the film as well as I do. It is easy, and true, to say that it suggests the limitations which will be inevitable in any Hollywood film, no matter how skilful and sincere. But it is also a great pleasure, and equally true, to say that it shows what can be done in the factory by people of adequate talent when they get, or manage to make themselves, the chance.

Can Industry Pay More?

THE C. I. O. has opened its new wage drive by publishing a report showing that real wages have fallen sharply in the past two years, while corporate profits have tremendously expanded. Prepared by Robert N. Nathan, the well-known economist and former deputy director of reconversion, the report seeks to prove that, with the present trend of industrial profits, "a substantial wage increase is possible, justifiable, and essential"; in fact it concludes, "without that, or a sharp drop in prices, we are flirting with collapse."

As was only to be expected, Mr. Nathan's arguments are being hotly attacked by the spokesmen of business who continue to insist that a new round of wage increases will inevitably be reflected in prices, and give another boost to the inflationary spiral. That, however, is not necessarily so. Now that OPA is abolished, prices in many instances are being determined not by any fixed relation to costs, but on the principle of "what the traffic will bear." Corporations faced with higher labor costs will pass these costs on, if they think the customers will stand for it; if not, they will trim margins and, as the Nathan report indicates, many of them have margins which can stand some trimming without reducing their shareholders to poverty. Suppose, for instance, that all corporations reduced their average rate of return on sales to the average of 1936-39; their net earnings would then be running at an annual rate of $8,250,000,000 instead of $15,000,000,000.

It is, of course, true, as the New York Times has hastened to point out, that the profits of industry as a whole are not a pool which can be drawn from to pay higher wages in any branch. One cannot, for example, lift the earnings of steel-workers on the basis of the inordinate profits of the liquor companies. But that point is fully recognized by the unions. Philip Murray, when introducing the Nathan report, was careful to say that the conditions it described did not necessarily apply to every collective bargaining situation and that it would be adopted by C. I. O. unions only as a "guide-post."

Actually, while some industries encountered heavy weather in the first half of this year, there are now few which are not sharing the general prosperity. Steel, automobiles, and electrical-equipment manufacturers are often mentioned as particular sufferers from the squeeze between labor costs and prices, but all three seem to be convalescing rapidly. The steel companies reported very fair profits for the third quarter of this year, while the other two groups appear to have hit their stride in the last three months. Most leading concerns in the "depressed" categories, it is interesting to note, have continued to pay substantial dividends, even though these were not earned—good evidence that their directors regard their troubles as transitory.

But the opponents of increased wages are not so anxious to question the accuracy of Mr. Nathan's figures and forecasts as to argue that they are irrelevant. They are no more inclined than were the General Motors' managers, a year ago, to discuss the level of profits or ability to pay. The orthodoxy of the present hour is that wages can only safely be raised pari passu with increased production. One weak point in the argument is its failure to recognize the fact that labor productivity is not just a matter of increased effort or skill. In a mass-production industry, full labor efficiency can only be obtained when output is at or near capacity. That condition has not been achieved in many plants since the war, partly because of strikes, partly because of shortages for which labor is not responsible. But we are told that these difficulties are being overcome, and that if the workers will only refrain from strikes, it will be possible to reach a sustained flow of production. But will it? That condition implies a sustained flow of orders, and at present wage and price levels the only group in the country which can provide such a flow, the wage and salary earners, is being excluded from the market by lack of purchasing power.

It may be said that, if the workers are patient, this situation will be corrected by the lowering of prices as production rises and costs fall. But this argument presumes the operation of an intelligent self-interest on the part of business men which, experience warns us, we cannot count upon. In practice, we know that business always waits too long to cut prices; waits until depression has arrived and demand has evaporated, even at a lower price level. There is very little hope, in fact, that the price-reduction method of holding on to prosperity, even though it is supported by conservative economists, will voluntarily be followed by business. That leaves wage increases as the only practical method of getting a better balance between the rewards of labor and capital.

We hope this objective can be achieved without a new round of strikes. So, clearly, do the leaders of the C. I. O. who are fully aware of the dangers involved in long stoppages. They will, we are certain, be prepared to accept reasonable compromises and if employers, refraining from the temptation to exploit the Republican victory, will do likewise, there is no need to anticipate another winter of labor warfare.

The Laski Libel Case

NATION readers do not need to be convinced that Harold Laski has never advocated revolution by violence as a method of social change. But he was accused of just that by several journals in England in the course of the election campaign in 1945, and he brought suit against one of them, the Newark Advertiser and South Notts Gazette, to put a stop to libelous charges which might easily have damaged Labor's chance. The other day he lost his case, and the full account of the trial, now available in the London papers, provides an instructive example of British justice tempered by British reaction. Ten witnesses swore they had attended the meeting at which Mr. Laski was reported as having advocated violence and revolution without hearing any such statement made; four said they believed the report was substantially correct. Mr. Laski himself testified that he had merely said, in response to a heckler —who was, incidentally, the press agent of the Conservative candidate in that district—that with the end of the war, if reforms were not brought about by constitutional means, there was danger of a drift toward violence and revolution.

But the final verdict probably resulted less from the evidence than from the provocative tactics used by Sir Patrick Hastings, the noted barrister, formerly a Labor Party member himself, who represented the defendant. His cross-examination was clearly designed to expose the plaintiff to ridicule and contempt, and his address to the jury cleverly blurred the distinction between advocacy of revolution and a prediction that revolution might occur. In the end, the jury was undoubtedly left with the impression that Laski was at best a rather dangerous sort of fellow who might easily have used the words quoted in the Newark weekly. A friend in England has sent us this comment on the verdict:

> The jury played hell with Harold Laski's case. Hastings did not misunderstand them. He gave them a few simple stimuli to vulgar prejudice, and they reacted accordingly. I guess Freud shows the limitations of all jury trials in which a demagogue is allowed to play on the subconscious while the judge stays upstairs with the law.

The action had to be brought, in the opinion of Mr. Laski and his friends, in order to stop the unprincipled attempt of the extreme right to discredit the Labor Party in the midst of the campaign by smearing its leaders with the revolutionary label. Now that the case has been lost, we are glad to see that the Labor Party and the trade unions are asking for contributions from members to meet the exorbitant and obviously punitive costs charged against Mr. Laski—costs that will amount to something like $60,000. It is unthinkable that he should be allowed to shoulder any part of this outrageous burden.

Germany Next

THE Moscow session of the Council of Foreign Ministers will at last bring the Big Four face to face with the gravest and most complex problem of all, that of Germany. While we do not underrate the importance of the agreements that have been reached to date, it is clear that the treaties with Italy and the Balkan Axis satellites will lose all meaning if we fail to solve the German question. A breakdown over Germany would mean a division of Europe into two blocs, each having its own mode of life and oriented towards powerful and hostile states. In such a situation, the agreement about the Danube would be meaningless and the long discussions of frontiers and constitutions utterly futile.

The comparative ease with which the Foreign Ministers have reached agreements within the last few weeks gives ground for a balanced optimism. Positions have been taken, and bargaining points have been made, in readiness for the Moscow session. Yet there are unmistakable signs that the Big Three are ready to yield on matters that, in the earlier stages of negotiations, seemed beyond the reach of compromise.

It is not the question of frontiers that will endanger success at Moscow, but the necessity of evolving a plan for the structure of German society, upon which depends the whole future of Europe. Here, again, steps have been taken that at first sight seem irreversible. Russia has largely socialized the economy of eastern Germany, and has incorporated it into its own system of exchange. London and Washington, no doubt, had the forthcoming session of the Council in mind in signing the recent merger agreement by which the industry of their zone, cut off at present from eastern and western European sources and outlets, may find markets in the Western world. That these measures are drastic must be admitted. The orientation of eastern Germany's economy toward Russia tends to freeze existing economic and political divisions, condemning western Germany to an artificial and poverty-stricken existence. The merger of the British and American zones may have a similar effect, although in the short time before the Moscow conference the situation cannot be greatly changed. It is a known fact, however, that American policy has been strongly influenced by those who wish to abandon denazification and decartelization. The champions of free enterprise are energetic and powerful and they see in the Russian program an excellent justification for establishing the merger on a firmly conservative basis. This intention can be frustrated only by a determined effort on the part of the British government, backed by democratic elements in Germany, to socialize the basic industries of the western zones in spite of American opposition or indifference. Any sign of Russian willingness to compromise and so assist the unification of German economy, would also help cut the ground from under the feet of the conservatives, both in England and America.

This, then, is the problem which the Foreign Ministers must consider during the Moscow meeting. The dangers to which they will be exposed are different in each case. The Soviet leaders must be prepared to give up their doctrinal rigidity and take a more sober view of the problem of their security. The British must throw off the burden of fear concerning their empire, and must be bold in following the implications of their tentative and timidly executed plans for German industry. For both Russia and Britain, this will be difficult. America, lately emerged from isolation, needs even greater courage and imagination. Private enterprise is a dying system in Europe and if we attempt to revive it we shall, in the long run, invite catastrophe.

The Shape of Things

DESPITE FIORELLO LA GUARDIA'S GOOD fight, the State Department has succeeded not only in blocking a new U. N. relief agency, but in injecting politics into the disposal of the remainder of UNRRA's funds. Of course, the American representatives in U. N. and UNRRA councils have flatly denied that the United States has been motivated by political considerations in seeking to change the existing relief pattern. They have insisted that their desire to give additional aid to Italy, Austria, and Greece, and less to Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and Poland, is based solely on the greater need of the former countries. There is at least a grain of truth in this contention. The food situation in Austria is extremely grave, as our recent article by G. E. R. Gedye clearly showed, and it is not much better in Italy. But reports from Poland, White Russia, and the Ukraine indicate that any diversion of the food which has been promised these areas would lead to acute malnutrition. If, as a result of American pressure, the existing commitments to these countries are repudiated, it is going to be very difficult for the United States to persuade the world that it is not utilizing food for political purposes. Senator Wherry is somewhat more honest, if less concerned for our reputation as a Good Samaritan, in declaring that the "cause of democracy is being lost" in Europe because "the United States is not getting credit" for the relief distributed by UNRRA. Significantly enough, neither the State Department nor Mr. Wherry has complained about the use of UNRRA supplies without credit where they were used, as in Greece and China, to buttress reactionary governments.

VICTORY ON THE SPANISH ISSUE CAME AFTER one of the most heated and interesting debates that has yet taken place in the United Nations. Perhaps the most important lesson of the fight has been to show that the big powers can be defeated when the cause for which they stand is an indefensible one. The American resolution was voted down—despite the fact that many countries were originally inclined to go along with Washington—because it tried to put across a proposal that would have meant a negotiated settlement with Franco and other reactionary elements in Spain. On the positive side, the adoption of the Belgian resolution by an impressive 32-to-6 vote is the first clear admission that Spain is the business of the United Nations. Until last week, the entire argument in the Security Council and the General Assembly had revolved around the single question of whether or not the United Nations were empowered to take any action against Franco, beyond that of barring him from membership. Now, the Belgian resolution places the Spanish issue squarely within the jurisdiction of the international organization, disposing, once and for all, of the nonsensical belief that action by the U. N. would constitute intervention in the internal affairs of a sovereign country. We have no assurance that the British and Americans will abandon their efforts to replace Franco's hated regime by a clerical-military government. But last Thursday's vote will make such a maneuver much more difficult.

THE CHOICE OF NEW YORK AS THE SITE FOR the permanent home of the United Nations was made by punch-drunk delegates wearied by a two-months' bout of unremitting debate, exasperated by the frustrations of commuting, rendered claustrophobic by their rabbit-like existence in the dark warrens of the Sperry plant at Lake Success. The promise of a skyscraper City of Peace made by the builder and creator of the magic Radio City seemed like an apocalyptic vision at the end of a nightmare. Not even the eminently rational choice of the parklands of Philadelphia, which the site committee had settled on, could stand up against John D.'s dramatic munificence. The whole matter was signed and sealed with a speed more reminiscent of a Florida boom than the serious counsels of responsible men. It may be all right. New York is the world's capital in more than a peaceful sense. Intelligent planners and good architects can do something useful with those seventeen acres in midtown Manhattan. And Nation editors can reach the U. N. at the third subway stop. But we have certain qualms. The baby U. N. will find it has not much room to grow. Then there is the question of housing. The members of the permanent U. N. staff who found the commuting from New York to Great Neck irksome are going to discover that commuting from Great Neck to Forty-second Street is just as tiresome—that is, if they are lucky enough to find homes in Great Neck. We wish the United Nations luck on their new site, but we can't help feeling that when they begin to work out the details they may find they have married Mr. Rockefeller's millions in unseemly haste.

LAST JUNE, THE SENATE VOTED 49 TO 16 TO reform itself in several ways and, in particular, to renovate its barnacled and incoherent committee system. Leading Republicans, among them Senator Taft, supported the measure. Unimpeachable in itself, the theoretical case for it was made irresistibly attractive by provisions for a 25 per cent salary increase and pensions for retired legislators. And, finally, the act promised a monumental headache to the majority party, which would have to divide fifteen chairmanships among thirty-three ex-chairmen. What the Republican Senators failed to figure on, last June, was that they themselves would constitute the majority only six months later. Faced with an outburst of intra-party jealousies and a factional struggle for power, they now find their ardor for the Reorganization Act rapidly congealing. Senator Taft complains that the Republican Committee on Committees has been "practically put in a straitjacket" by the plan, and his remarks have been widely echoed. The revolt has gone even farther in the House, which originally passed the act by a vote of 229 to 61. Six members are hard at work, canvassing Republicans of the lower chamber, to force an amendment whereby the Naval Affairs Committee and the Military Affairs Committee will continue to go their separate ways. We hardly believe that the Republican leadership will be brash enough to scrap the act outright, especially since the House Steering Committee, less than a month ago, voted overwhelmingly to give it a try. But if an exception is made for the military and naval committees, the act may as well be filed in the nearest wastebasket. Once this "bulge in the line" is established, it will be only a matter of time before the whole plan collapses, except the pensions and the salary boost—both of which, we can report, are being accepted with remarkable party discipline and good spirit.

THESE RUMBLINGS OF DISCONTENT, AND A rather raw effort being made to rig committees by increasing the Republican majority, tell something of the conflicting currents in the G. O. P. The seniority rule is under fire from the Senate's Westerners, who added appreciably to their ranks in November but who will have only a small voice in policy-making unless geography is introduced as a determining factor. As Senator Robertson of Wyoming points out, "No Senator from west of the Dakotas will get a chairmanship under the seniority rule." To make more posts available, and to reduce a dangerous concentration of power, the Westerners and other rebels are out to prevent dual job-holding. Specifically, they hope to stop three men from holding down six top posts: Taft, who heads the unofficial but powerful G. O. P. Steering Committee; Wallace White, slated to be floor leader; and Vandenberg, who is certain to be elected president of the Senate. All three have their eyes on crucial committee chairmanships as well. There will be a fight to break up this concentration of control—and another, we hope, over the attempt to swell the Republican majority on four key committees. The count, in the Senate as a whole, is 51 to 45 for the Republicans. It is fair enough, therefore, for the Republicans to have a 7-to-6 majority on thirteen-man committees. The fact that they are asking for an 8-to-5 ratio is an indication that they are not certain of their own solidarity. We suspect they are afraid that on the Labor Committee, for example, Senators Morse and Aiken might on occasion vote with the Democrats—which, if a single vote were decisive, would probably give a dangerous impression of party weakness and spoil a lot of fun.

THE RESIGNATION OF WILSON WYATT AS National Housing Administrator has meant the death of the veterans' housing program. A Washington letter by Bryant Putney on page 722 describes the triumph of as slick a lobby of selfish interests as the country has ever seen. The only meager consolation in the whole shameful business is that it has awakened a public which has been somnolent too long, and focussed that public's attention on the nation's number one social and economic problem. Unfortunately, even those most concerned about the problem are apt to think in terms of a "post-war emergency." Too few will accept the fact that the plight of veterans who deserve better from their country simply dramatizes a dismal situation which millions of Americans have been putting up with, year in and year out, war or no war. The responsibility of the government is conveniently stated in terms of the post-war emergency, but the roots of the housing scandal run deep into the economics of an archaic building industry, into the callous disregard of an acquisitive society, into an abyss of public ignorance, into a bankruptcy of public policy. For these reasons, The Nation has asked Charles Abrams, one of the country's outstanding housing experts, to write a series of articles, the first of which appears on page 723, exposing and explaining the basic causes of America's failure to provide homes.

OF COURSE, WE SHALL BE DELIGHTED IF AND when Theodore Bilbo is booted out of the Senate. But the question of his departure seems to us far less important than the process employed to get rid of him. It begins to appear now that, if he is ousted at all, it will be for a war record of outstanding shadiness. Bilbo would then return to Mississippi merely as a crook, utterly without significance. We had a grander role blocked out for him. We saw him as an historic, if unsavory, figure: the first Senator to be barred for campaigning on a platform of intimidation and anti-democratic incitement. It now appears that this hoped-for precedent will not be set, thanks to the audacious whitewashing job performed by Senator Ellender. The hearings he conducted in Mississippi were useless, since he was determined from the start to excuse Bilbo. More important, the hearings were needless. It did not have to be proved that Bilbo's inflammatory speeches kept a single Negro away from the polls; much less that he would have lost the election without such intimidation. When the Senate barred Boss Vare, some years ago, it did not first require proof that his slush fund had purchased certain specified votes, or that the results would have been different without his money. It was held sufficient to show that his actions had "tainted the seat with fraud." Bilbo was widely reported to have called repeatedly "on every red-blooded white man to use any means to keep the niggers away from the polls." All that was needed was to verify the quotation. That alone should have "tainted the seat"—and cleared the air.

BREAKDOWN OF THE LONDON CONFERENCE on India, following the withdrawal of the Moslem League from the Constituent Assembly, has produced a new crisis of extraordinary complexity. Farsighted patience and tact will be required for its solution; and one can understand the British government's reluctance to yield to the demand for a Commons debate. In the light of his long record of obstruction, Mr. Churchill's object was clearly to hinder the achievement of Indian liberty. The event has justified the government's fears, for in a speech shot through with malice the former Prime Minister did his utmost to sharpen the conflict in India. By charging Sir Stafford Cripps with angling his plan to favor Hindu domination of the Moslem minority, and by calculated prophecy of civil strife, Mr. Churchill has incited Mr. Jinnah to continue the obstructive tactics he has so tragically employed in recent months. That the government's reply would be more than cautious was to be expected. British Labor is irrevocably committed to the course it has taken. Fearing renewed bloodshed in India, it cannot boldly challenge Mr. Jinnah by declaring that it will unreservedly accept whatever proposal the one-party constituent Assembly may make. Yet its failure to do so must necessarily weaken Mr. Nehru and undermine his prestige with both right and left opposition. The only available recourse would seem to be to persuade Nehru to make further concessions. And since the Congress Party will never consent to a divided India, the only hope would seem to lie in adoption of the federal idea. No one knows how far the Congress Party will be willing to go in this direction, or whether Jinnah, who would prefer British rule to a free and united India, will accept anything less than an extreme interpretation of Pakistan. The answer to these questions will be given in Delhi, not London.

THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC SEEMS TO BE IN danger of turning back to the days of the infamous Padlock Law of the thirties. Those most persistent and humorless proselytizers, the Jehovah's Witnesses, have recently been distributing, on the streets of Montreal, an anti-Catholic pamphlet entitled "The Burning Hatred of Quebec." When a dozen or more Witnesses were arrested, bail was provided for some of them by Frank Roncarelli, a well-known restaurant owner. In a sprightly retaliatory spirit, Maurice Duplessis, in his dual role as Premier of the province and Attorney-General, ordered the revocation of Roncarelli's liquor license. M. Duplessis, the Premier, attempts to justify his action by the quaint argument that to permit Roncarelli to aid the Jehovah's Witnesses with funds derived from the sale of liquor would make M. Duplessis, the Attorney-General, an accomplice. Religious dissenters are not the only objects of Duplessis's campaign. On December 10, Captain Jack Ennis's anti-subversive police detail made simultaneous raids on the headquarters of the English, French, and Jewish branches of the Labor Progressive Party (the present vehicle of the Communist Party), and also raided the home of Michael Buhay, a city councillor. The purpose of the raids, so it has been announced, is to prevent the distribution of a pamphlet entitled "Defend Fred Rose." If the trend of recent Quebec history is not altered, M. Duplessis is likely, once again, to invoke the Padlock Law.

Bilbo on the Griddle

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, December 13

THE luck of Senator Theodore G. Bilbo is beginning to play out. This little sawed-off man, with his sunken cheeks, his watery eyes which squint through metal-rimmed spectacles, has now became a political issue.

Republican Senators from industrial states feel that they are committed to throwing "the Man" out of the old chamber in the northern wing of the Capitol. Arthur Vandenberg has told reporters that Bilbo's ouster is high on the priority list.

Many Northern Democrats consider the Mississippi Senator a dangerous political liability, who might cost their party many seats and the Presidency in 1948. The Southerners, who are usually quick to defend the honor of their Dixie kin, are showing no haste or enthusiasm to support the cause of Theodore Bilbo.

The determination of many Senators on both sides of the aisle to cross out Bilbo is indicated by the fact that within two weeks two separate Senate committees have investigated his fitness to hold office.

The more sectionally sympathetic group was the Special Committee to Investigate Senatorial Campaign Expenditures, headed by Louisiana's Allen Ellender. Its members do not show great crusading zeal. The ranking Republican, Styles Bridges of New Hampshire, apparently regards Ellender's obvious efforts not to blacken Bilbo or the South as part of a political tug-of-war in which he, Bridges, is involved only on the side.

The Subcommittee of the War Investigating Committee shows more spirit. Chairman James Mead, who was defeated for Governor of New York, has told friends that his final act on Capitol Hill will be to make a strong case against Bilbo on charges that the Mississippi Senator profited personally from war contracts. Senator Mead feels personally committed to using all his talents as an investigator in this case. Other Democrats, on the War Investigating Committee itself, are supporting him. Harley Kilgore of West Virginia, who succeeded to the chairmanship, has given his blessing and support to the Bilbo hearings.

Some Democrats see Bilbo building into an issue that could be of crucial importance in the 1948 elections. He has become a symbol to civil-liberties and Negro groups. Negro voters, after deserting the party of Abraham Lincoln in 1932, have now begun to drift back to the Republicans. The Democrats cannot win without them in 1948, and the G. O. P. must try to prevent their defection. Five Negro correspondents are covering the Mead committee hearings, and representatives of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People are in the audience.

Some of the more cynical Washington politicians have decided it would be easier to send Bilbo back to Mississippi than to pass the FEPC or the anti-poll-tax bill. Bilbo is only another Senator, while these bills lead to a fundamental change in the condition of Southern life.

The war-profits hearing began on a gray and warm morning this week. Bilbo ambled into the glittering Senate caucus room with his irregular, bow-legged gait. Wall Doxey, the handsome and distinguished-looking Senate sergeant-at-arms, rushed up to Bilbo, and with much bowing and scraping led him past the press table. Doxey is a former Senator from Mississippi himself and was allied with Bilbo. Noting the curious stares of the reporters Doxey drawled happily to Bilbo, "They all got to look at you." Soon after Bilbo sat down at a place usually reserved for committee officials, Jim Mead strolled in, smiling to old friends. Noticing Bilbo, he said jocularly, "Hi, Theodore, how's your good health?" There was no note of deep concern in his voice.

Homer Ferguson, the white-haired Republican from Michigan, came next into the chamber. Photographers, looking for a picture, shouted to Ferguson and Bilbo, "Come on, shake hands there!" Ferguson kept his hand flat on the table as if he had not heard. Bilbo inched his hand forward a little, then let it rest.

Senator Mead gave the charter and purpose of the hearing in his opening statement: "The allegations will be treated in the same manner as in any other case. There has been a preliminary investigation by the staff. The committee voted unanimously to investigate. This subcommittee has an open mind, without prejudice, although the full committee does believe there is a prima facie case."

The Senator's voice rose strongly as he said, "All men are equal before the law, in a democracy." He did not look at Bilbo as he said this. The Mississippi Senator was calmly smoking a long, black cigar. His feet were on the table before him.

Bilbo's young attorney asked if he would have the privilege of cross-examining witnesses. Senator Mead answered a polite but firm "No." He explained, "You will be given a full chance to state your case. But we will not transfer to anyone the authority of this committee to question witnesses. If you have any recommendations to the committee, you may put them in writing."

The hearing thus far has established several points: (1) Bilbo was a nuisance around the War Department when it came time to award war contracts in Mississippi. The army's attitude was summed up in a sentence taken from a telephone transcript: "Keep Senator Bilbo off our neck." (2) Many political associates of Bilbo participated in the Mississippi war contracts. (3) The contractors contributed generously to Bilbo and to political campaigns in which he was interested. Some $30,000 was paid directly to Bilbo. One unhappy witness, a pudgy, red-haired Mississippi contractor testified to writing checks amounting to $25,000 and putting them on a desk in Bilbo's office.

Most of the questioning is done by Senator Ferguson, who won his seat on his record as a prosecutor. His questioning is slow, deliberate, even painful in its exactness. Then, suddenly, he will strike hard, and by the mere inflection of his voice raise issues of integrity and honesty. Ferguson is trying to lay a sound basis for the accusations to be leveled directly at Bilbo within a few days. There has been some melodrama in the hearing—the case of Bilbo's missing secretary, who is said to fear assassination and kidnapping—but it is aside from the real story. The real story is that a combination of influential Republicans and Democrats have decided that Theodore Bilbo shall not sit in the Senate.

The Ellender committee will probably send a divided report to the Senate on alleged election misconduct. But the Kilgore committee, without the necessity of commenting on the delicate question of whether Negroes should vote or not, seems likely to send down a scathing indictment of Bilbo. Jim Mead wants to make this document the best he has worked on during his time on the investigating committee.

United Nations' Balance Sheet

BY VERA MICHELES DEAN

Lake Success, December 14

AS DELEGATES to the U. N., weary from an uninterrupted round of day and night sessions, were packing up their bags for departure on the Queen Elizabeth in time to spend Christmas at home, the General Assembly in a burst of intense activity wound up the second part of its first session, which is destined to leave a deep imprint on the history of international organization. To an encouraging degree the debates of the General Assembly and its committees were free from the grandiloquent phrases about eternal peace which had done so much during the inter-war period to discredit the efforts of nations to create a system of collective security. There was little glamour about the proceedings at Lake Success or Flushing Meadows, and not much oratorical display. But there was something far more important for the future of the U. N.—and that was a genuine desire to work hard on issues of concern to all nations.

The record of accomplishment of the General Assembly in the more than seven weeks that it was in session is impressive, especially considering the amount of disagreement that existed at the start. Here is a brief list of the major decisions.

Trusteeship. On December 13 the General Assembly by a two-thirds' vote accepted eight agreements under which as many territories formerly under mandate from the League of Nations will be transferred to the trusteeship of the United Nations. This decision opened the way to the creation, on December 14, of the Trusteeship Council, the last of the major U. N. organs to be established. The trusteeship agreements covering New Guinea (mandated to Australia), Western Samoa (New Zealand), Ruanda-Urundi (Belgium), Tanganyika, British Cameroons, and British Togoland (Britain) were accepted by forty-one to six with six abstentions. The six negative votes were cast by Byelo-Russia, Liberia, Poland, the U. S. S. R., and Yugoslavia. On the two other agreements, covering the French Cameroons and French Togoland, Poland changed its vote from "no" to abstention. India, which had sided with Russia in opposing the trusteeship agreements in their present form during the committee discussions, abstained from voting in the General Assembly.

Important also was the decision of the General Assembly on December 14 to disapprove the proposal of the Union of South Africa for annexation of Southwest Africa, which it holds as a mandate from the League of Nations, and to ask that South Africa submit a U. N. trusteeship agreement for that territory. The resolution covering this matter had been prepared by the United States, Denmark, and India.

To the last Nikolai N. Novikov, Russian ambassador in Washington, contended that the trusteeship agreements should be rejected because they violated the U. N. Charter, and especially because the Trusteeship Committee had failed to agree on a definition of the phrase "states directly concerned." Under Article 86 of the Charter, Australia, Belgium, France, New Zealand, and Britain become members of the Trusteeship Council by virtue of the fact that they are named administering authorities under the trusteeship agreements; China, the United States, and Russia, as permanent members of the Security Council which do not hold trust territories, also become members of the Trusteeship Council ex officio; and two countries—Iraq and Mexico—have been elected to the Council for three-year terms. The first meeting of the new Trusteeship Council is scheduled to be held on March 15.

Relief and Refugees. In deference to the point of view of the United States, which after furnishing 72 per cent of the funds for the work of UNRRA, slated to end in Europe the first of the year, opposed the creation of a new international relief agency as proposed by LaGuardia, the General Assembly decided not to set up a new agency to complete the task of relief. Instead, it instructed the Secretary General to arrange for consultations among governments to ascertain existing needs and available supplies. In addition, a ten-nation technical committee was appointed to report on the food needs and foreign-exchange deficits of the countries of the world.

The final decision as to the allocation of food, however, will remain with the individual contributing countries, which, as urged by Washington, will conduct their relief negotiations bilaterally after informal consultations through the U. N. Secretariat. The Secretary General was also requested to prepare a report on a suggestion made by Dr. Aake Ording of Norway that the organized workers of the United Nations be invited to contribute "one day's work for one free world"—a contribution which, it is estimated, would amount to more than $100,000,000.

Russia and several of the countries of Eastern Europe and the Balkans which have been recipients of UNRRA relief vigorously opposed the decision of the Assembly. In accepting this decision Andrei A. Gromyko declared that "full responsibility" for its results "will fall squarely" on the countries supporting it.

In spite of persistent objections by Russia, Poland, and Yugoslavia the Assembly approved the charter of the International Refugee Organization (IRO), which is to handle the problem of the nearly one million displaced persons still in camps, chiefly in the American and British zones of Germany. As already pointed out in this series, Russia and several other countries of Eastern Europe and the Balkans contend that the D. P.'s, most of whom come from their territories, should be forced to return, and are unwilling to make any financial contribution to their resettlement in other lands; while the Western powers are unwilling to force repatriation on people who resist it on political or religious grounds and hold that the resettlement of these people outside Germany is a common responsibility of the United Nations. Probably on no other question before the Assembly was the gulf between East and West so profound—nor can it be said that this gulf has yet been bridged.

Reduction and Control of Armaments. The most far-reaching issue debated by the Assembly was the reduction and control of armaments, including the census of troops and weapons, at home and in foreign countries, both friends and ex-enemies. The tide of opinion flowed back and forth so rapidly during the closing sessions of the Assembly that at some moments, notably during the stormy night session of Tuesday, December 10, when Sir Hartley Shawcross appeared to be improvising a new British policy, few even among the experts were quite sure what was happening. On December 13, however, Byrnes, Bevin, and Molotov took pains to elucidate the position of their respective countries on the tangled skein of armaments problems. The net result of the extremely complex discussions, embodied in the disarmament resolution adopted by the Assembly on December 14 by acclamation, can be summed up as follows:

The Assembly recognizes the necessity of "an early general regulation and reduction of armaments and armed forces." The Security Council is requested to expedite consideration of practical measures for reduction and regulation, and to submit the resulting plans to a special session of the General Assembly.

The prohibition of atomic and all other major weapons, including those that may be developed in the future, is listed as an urgent objective, and the Atomic Energy Commission is asked to expedite its work. The core of the resolution is that the international system of inspection and control shall be "within the framework" of the Security Council (as proposed by Russia), but that special inspection organs shall derive their power and status from the conventions establishing them (as urged by Australia and Canada). Secretary of State Byrnes told the General Assembly that the United States recognizes that the veto rights of nations on the Security Council applies to the drafting of these conventions.

Veto Power. In this connection it should be noted that on December 13 the Assembly adopted by a vote of thirty-six to six a resolution urging the great powers to make every effort to use the veto in such a way as not to impede the Security Council from reaching decisions promptly. The resolution did not contain censure of the great powers for abuse of the veto, as urged by Australia. The United States and Britain voted for the resolution; France and China abstained; Russia accused the Western powers of playing "the game" of small countries and said that "warmongers" were trying to get rid of the veto, thereupon voting against the resolution.

The work of the General Assembly thus reveals a variegated pattern of diverging national views. The great powers did not by any means always agree with one another, thus at least spiking the fear of small countries that the "Big Five" would become a new Holy Alliance. On one issue after another Russia, which continued to demand great-power unanimity, opposed the United States and Britain, but without blocking United Nations action by its opposition; and it took the initiative in making helpful suggestions, notably on disarmament. France sought throughout to play the role of moderator between East and West. The Latin American countries, which at first had been regarded as a permanent bloc, split wide open on the question of Spain, and some of them, notably Chile, were found on occasion supporting Russia. The British Dominions, as is their wont, showed a spirit of independence in their attitude toward the great powers and made constructive contributions to discussions of major problems.

For different reasons many of the nations came closer to accepting the concept of collective intervention in internal affairs than could have been anticipated when the Charter was drafted in San Francisco. The Assembly adopted a resolution urging member nations to recall their envoys from Franco Spain, condemned the treatment of Indians in South Africa, and laid the groundwork for an elaborate system of international inspection of troops and armaments, as well as of the use of atomic energy for peace-time purposes. We are still far indeed from anything resembling world government, but we can hardly expect nations to make so sharp a transition overnight, without preliminary readjustments. What we do have now—and that is the fundamental achievement of the General Assembly, which has justified its assigned function of "town meeting of the world"—is a growing consciousness, in John Donne's memorable phrase, that as nations, no less than as individuals, we all "belong to mankind."

Obituary for Veterans' Housing

BY BRYANT PUTNEY

Washington, December 15

THE Veterans' Emergency Housing Program, in a serious condition since Wilson Wyatt resigned two weeks ago, died yesterday. President Truman delivered the funeral oration—an announcement that some housing controls will be abandoned and the rest greatly relaxed. The President's statement makes it clear that from now on the Administration will depend mainly on pious hopes rather than on forthright action to deal with the housing crisis. The government's housing program is no longer an emergency program. And most certainly it is not a veterans' housing program.

The President's action paved the way for a speedy return to a building free-for-all in which speculative profits will come first and homes for veterans last.

This turn of events is a signal triumph for what Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., accurately described as "one of the highest-powered, most selfish lobbies known in the annals of our country"—the combination of real-estate and banking interests, speculative builders, and building-materials producers. During the last few months these groups have whipped up one of the slickest grass-roots propaganda campaigns ever organized, in an effort to persuade the country that governmental red tape was strangling builders' efforts to put up houses.

Whatever its effect on the average citizen, the campaign made quick converts of George Allen and other members of the palace guard. One of the first moves of the Presidential clique was to block Wyatt's efforts to get RFC loans for producers of industrialized houses. This was easily accomplished, with Allen sitting on RFC's board of directors. Next, price controls on building materials were swept away in the general decontrol débâcle of early November. At this point Wyatt visited the White House to find out how the President really stood on housing.

Although the White House has, until now, suppressed Wyatt's recommendations, the contents of his report leaked out a few days ago. Decontrol of prices and wages made it "doubly necessary to utilize fully and effectively the remaining controls and other available tools to speed and aid residential construction," Wyatt told the President. He added: "There are really only two choices. The country must adopt and carry through an all-out veterans' housing program—a real emergency program—or return to building as usual. The ground between offers nothing but confusion and blasted hopes to the homeless veteran."

Truman made his choice. "We have reached the period of the relaxing of war-time emergency measures," he said. Wyatt, an honest liberal and realist, had no alternative but to resign.

Much of the blame for the defeat of the emergency housing program must be pinned on the national leaders of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Amvets. For months these outfits played along with the builders' lobby, resisting strong rank-and-file pressure to support Wyatt. The American Veterans' Committee, alone among the major veterans' organizations, consistently and vigorously fought for the program.

After the V. F. W. convention approved a resolution supporting the program last September, National Commander Louis Starr tried to disclaim it—on the extraordinary grounds that the noise of a passing train had prevented delegates from hearing the resolution on which they were voting! The V. F. W.'s executive board finally had to order Starr to get behind the program. National officers of Amvets likewise underwent a last-minute conversion, following that organization's November convention, but by that time it was too late. Legion officers have, at least, remained steadfast in their loyalty to the interests opposing Wyatt and are now advocating the liquidation of the NHA.

That Wyatt had the uncompromising support neither of veterans—who were most vitally affected by his program—nor of the Truman Administration as a whole makes the job he has done in the last twelve months the more remarkable.

The F. W. Dodge Corporation predicted last year that not more than 325,000 dwelling units would be started in 1946. But in the first ten months of this year nearly 580,000 permanent units were begun—not counting conversions or temporary structures, which bring the total up to 882,000. Total "starts" for the year are now expected to reach a million. The volume of housing units completed has been rising steadily each month and by the end of October totaled over half a million, of which 341,000 were new permanent homes and apartments.

It is important to note, also, that a substantial proportion of the houses being built are priced at levels that veterans can afford. Although the ceiling until now has been $10,000, half of the houses so far authorized will sell for not more than $7,500, or rent for $60 or less.

Wyatt's efforts to break the materials bottleneck have been highly successful. Over-all materials production is nearly double what it was a year ago, and more than half again as large as in 1939. "With few exceptions," says the latest report of the Civilian Production Administration, "critical building materials made spectacular production gains in October." New all-time highs were reached, CPA reported, in the production of sinks (up 42 per cent over September), watercloset bowls (up 22 per cent), gypsum board and lath (up 16 per cent), warm-air furnaces (up 14 per cent), and water heaters (up 19 per cent). Output of bricks, plywood, nails, hardwood flooring, and radiators set new post-war records.

Besides stimulating builders of conventional dwellings, Wyatt undertook to encourage the development of factory-built houses made of steel, aluminum, plastics, and other unorthodox materials. He foresaw that the machine-made, mass-produced house offered a means of emerging from the technological Dark Ages of the housebuilding industry, of cutting the cost of shelter in half, and of ultimately making home-owners out of slum-dwellers. To telescope into a few months a development that otherwise would take years, Wyatt worked out a special program of assistance for industrialized house-producers —including RFC loans to finance large-scale production, guaranteed market contracts, and other devices.

Wyatt's plan for government aid to this fledgling industry was squarely in the tradition of Alexander Hamilton's "Report on Manufactures." It contemplated subsidies which were trifling in comparison with those dealt out in the past to the railroad, steamship, aviation, and automobile industries, among others. But it aroused violent opposition from the numerous groups which have a vested interest in conventional high-cost building. These groups displayed the same stubbornness—and the same want of foresight—as the carriage-makers, who, thirty years ago, threw Tom Durant out of their shops when he suggested they convert to automobile production.

Leading the fight against this New Deal for housebuilding, George Allen's RFC first stalled, and then flatly refused NHA-backed loan applications from several promising industrial house manufacturers on the ground of "insufficient equity." (Among the applications rejected was one from the Lustron Corporation, in spite of the fact that the First National Bank of Chicago had notified the RFC it would lend this company $20,000,000 if the government would issue a 90 per cent guaranty.) The RFC's action shattered Wyatt's hopes of producing 500,000 or more metal and concrete homes next year. It made imperative the White House showdown, from which the defenders of the status quo in housebuilding emerged victorious.

Under the plan announced yesterday by the President a façade of controls will be retained to create the illusion that the Administration is taking care of veterans' housing needs. But with the $10,000 ceiling on new-housing prices removed and home building opened up to non-veterans, builders will speedily return to the pre-war practice of skimming the cream off the housing market—putting up luxury homes beyond the reach of most veterans. The promised relaxation of controls on non-residential construction, moreover, can only mean that materials which ought to be used for housing will be diverted to the more lucrative business of building juke-joints and movie palaces. There is no reason to doubt Wyatt's prediction that the scrapping of his program will make it impossible to meet the government's goal of 1,500,000 housing units in 1947.

Homeless America

I. Illusions About Housing

LIVING in a garage or slum is bad; living in a fool's paradise is worse. We had better realize that the housing needs of two-thirds of the population are not going to be met, even if materials and labor become plentiful. No adequate federal, state, or city program has been devised. A solution of the problem is barred by certain illusions which have confused Congressional thinking, have shaped federal policy into a mass of contradictions, and have now become the principal weapon in the propaganda arsenal of a real-estate lobby blocking a realistic approach to housing reform. Unless we dispel these illusions, the housing problem will persist, and each succeeding crisis be worse than the one before.

CHARLES ABRAMS, former counsel to the New York City Housing Authority, is author of "The Future of Housing," which was published last week. This is the first in a series of three articles in which he will discuss the housing problem in America. The second will appear next week.

Illusion 1: The housing shortage has been caused by the war. Actually, there was already a serious deficit of homes in 1936, and the housing famine was clearly foreseen. It was known that at least 7,000,000 homes would be required ten years later, that the building industry was not producing enough houses to meet that need, and that it was doing absolutely nothing for the low-income family. Our present veterans would have reached marriageable age and needed homes, war or no war. Housing shortages have occurred time and again during the last fifty years. With building costs steadily mounting, millions of families have been periodically denied the benefit of new dwellings. Two-fifths of our non-farm homes were known to be below civilized standards before the war began; two-thirds of our farm families were improperly sheltered. No private houses have been built for low-income families for decades. None will be.

Illusion 2: The bottleneck in housing production is due to the war. Yet we emerged from the war with a production capacity greater than ever before in our history. During the war we built one and one-half million houses and were set to put up many times that number if necessary. It was when the war ended that house production struck a snag. Our vast stores of building materials have been siphoned off to commercial construction; war-housing agencies have been scuttled when most needed; local housing authorities who could be building for veterans today are without funds.

The cancelation of "Order L-41," which rationed materials for construction, is the outstanding post-war scandal. Hugh Potter, brain-truster of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, was made inter-agency housing factotum just long enough to cancel the rationing of materials and create the bottleneck that still plagues building today. When, months later, rationing was reinstated, the storehouse was empty; there was no longer anything to ration. With thousands of factories and millions of workers released for civilian production, with the demand for homes keen, and with mortgage money plentiful, only 286,000 new permanent homes could be built in the first nine months of 1946.

Illusion 3: Private enterprise will solve the housing problem the moment building materials are available. As a matter of fact, the building industry has failed for decades to meet both housing needs and demands. It has functioned not at all for low-income families, only erratically for the top third. In a highly industrialized society that is an absurdity. Twenty-five per cent of all non-farm families had incomes under $1,000 in 1941 and could afford a house costing no more than $2,000. Yet only 1 per cent of Federal Housing Administration homes were available at that figure. Forty-one per cent of non-farm families earned under $1,500. Only 3 per cent of FHA homes were produced at a price such families could afford. Today, with building costs up 60 to 100 per cent, only the well-to-do can live in any houses produced by the private builder. No houses can be built for rental in New York at prices within the reach of 96 per cent of the city's employed veterans.

Illusion 4: Housing is an emergency problem and will respond to emergency treatment. We have had four separate emergency housing programs in twelve years—to meet the "unemployment emergency" in 1933, the "defense emergency" in 1940, the "war emergency" in 1941, and now the "veterans' housing emergency." So long as the building industry fails to provide houses within the means of the rank and file, such emergencies are unavoidable: in consequence, slums will continue to take their toll in death, disease, and crime, and home owners will repeatedly face foreclosure when houses bought at inflated prices fail to be paid for out of reduced family earnings. Discontent, disillusionment, and lawlessness are by-products of our defunct home-building enterprise and our failure to evolve a long-range program to rationalize it.

Illusion 5: The housing problem can be met by reducing labor costs. While the building trades can be blamed for jurisdictional disputes and other disorders in house production, they are hardly responsible for all its snags and snarls; certainly not for the lag in building or the present high costs. The average annual earnings of skilled construction workers before the war were under a thousand dollars. The labor cost is only 30 per cent of the total cost of building a home. If wages of building workers were cut in half, the price of a new home would be reduced by only about 15 per cent, which is but a fraction of the recent rise in building costs.

Who, then, is at fault? The main stumbling-block to production is the home builder. The average builder puts up no more than four houses a year; 65 per cent of the builders of single-family homes produced only one house a year before the war. Most have their offices in their hats. The industry remains in the hands of small operators, undercapitalized, wastefully putting together thousands of separate parts in hundreds of separate processes. The petty operator is unable to plan ahead or anticipate housing demand; he lacks the benefit of organization, is unequipped for assembly-line techniques. His limitations have been solidified in a pattern of incompetence, trade restraints, excessive costs, and vested interests unparalleled in any other American enterprise.

Labor costs, excessive charges for materials, and high interest rates are all hinged to the home builders' ineptitude. Building-trades unions, fearful of glutting the labor market, train only as many apprentices as are employable over the long run. When housing demand is intense, a labor shortage is inevitable. When building volume subsides, unemployment follows. Since home building influences general activity, the consequences to the economy may be disastrous. The lack of organization in the industry causes workers, even in boom periods, to lose 30 per cent of their working time. If the industry were well organized, labor could be more efficiently used and work more evenly distributed.

The hundreds of participants in the building of a house are removed from the builder and the home buyer by a wall of middlemen who charge what the traffic will bear. Thirty thousand parts go into a small house; twelve trades are called upon to put them together in five hundred operations. The builder, contractor, and subcontractor add mark-ups to each item; so that a pyramid of cost-plus charges pushes up the price beyond the reach of the average purse. A dollar's worth of plaster going into the house is increased in price 300 per cent in passing from the factory to the trowel. If the final cost of a home is excessive, the builder is not concerned; he produces only for those who can pay the price. Shelter, one of life's essentials, has become a luxury.

Price-pegging in building materials is almost routine; competition is restricted. There is little incentive to reduce costs, since a cut in one or even a dozen items would not reduce the final cost appreciably or widen the market of consumers. More than half the contracts for fabricated steel are booked by two companies; four leading corporations control 82 per cent of prepared finished plaster and 90 per cent of molding and gauging plaster; more than three-fourths of important plumbing articles are made by four producers. Two corporations control 95 per cent of all plate-glass production; four companies, 80 per cent of copper products.

Bigness alone should not mean high prices. But concentration of power in an industry where the final product is unstandardized and the purchaser too small to be able to bargain effectively provides a field day for the manufacturer. Thus prices on steel and gypsum are often quoted from a distant basing point, though delivery may come from a nearby mill. Prices on mill lumber are rigged; base prices are maintained for window frames, stairs, banisters, door frames, cabinets, ornamental woodwork. Dealers and jobbers in plumbing supplies are forbidden to sell directly to the job on penalty of being disciplined, and jobbers' trade discounts are canceled when they sell directly to the consumer or builder. Local ordinances often specify patented products though others might be used more economically. A Pennsylvania housing authority found that brick walls leaked when the mortar mix required by a local code was used. By violating the ordinance it was able to build walls that were waterproof.

The mortgage lender, too, has been able to pursue his exactions unchecked. The mortgage system masks the speculative nature of the home-buying transaction. One no longer owns a home but an equity in a home; a mortgage debt, once shunned as a first step to ruin, has become a casual routine. Open competition in mortgages is restrained by associations of institutional lenders who oppose an open market for insured mortgage paper. The system does not allow for possible unemployment of the home buyer during the mortgage term or for any other misfortune which may bring default and cancelation of his whole investment. With each mortgage loan a separate transaction, interest—even on government-insured mortgages—is almost twice the rate of government bonds. The pressing need of the builder for money, his inability to bargain effectively with the mortgage lender, and above all his indifference are responsible for the home owners paying a tribute in excess interest of more than $40,000,000 a year on FHA houses alone.

The only solution is the public agency. The housing problem can only be met by recasting the role of the home builder, by replacing him with an entrepreneur large enough and strong enough to rationalize building along twentieth-century lines, able to produce homes in the quantity and quality needed. Only the public agency qualifies for this role in America today. There is no other way out of the housing morass.

But such a solution is being blocked by a sixth illusion: housing has become involved in a semantic war in which terms like "socialism" and "government competition" are being loosely thrown about to the terror of the uninformed public. Government building during a war emergency is permissible, but government building in the post-war emergency is taboo, paradoxical as this may seem.

A small lobby of builders and lenders has nurtured these illusions in the public mind. Its success in capitalizing on the deception is unique in the history of pressure politics.

The People's Front

THE principal reason for the decline of the European Socialists has been their failure to perceive the magnitude of the social revolution that swept Europe after World War I and, following a period of ebb in the thirties, received a fresh, powerful impetus from World War II. The present situation of the French Socialist Party illustrates the consequences of this failure.

The outbreak of World War II found the French party divided and paralyzed by the conflict, in progress everywhere, between the Communist and Socialist wings of the working-class movement. Hatred of the Communists so obsessed many Socialists as to drive them into an anti-Socialist position, even to the extent of support of the policy of appeasement, before 1939, and later of the Vichy regime. Had the party, in the first year of the war, purged itself of the right-wing revisionist elements, it could easily have assumed leadership of the French nation; the Communists offered little challenge, for their opposition to the "imperialist war" had made them thoroughly unpopular throughout France.

The Socialists failed to do so, and by 1942 the situation had completely changed. The Communists became the spearhead of the resistance from the moment they entered the struggle against Hitler and Vichy. The Socialists, on the other hand, appeared unable to counteract the poison spread by the Munichеers within their ranks; while thousands of them fought magnificently in the underground, others gathered around Paul Faure and obediently served Pétain and his cabal. True, the first clandestine conference of the party expelled these renegades, but the damage was already done. At the same time, there were good Socialists, especially among the exiles, who, in a doctrinaire mood, refused to recognize the necessity of rallying around De Gaulle. All this increased division and confusion. As a consequence, in the decisive years from 1942 until the liberation, the Communists rather than the Socialists became, in the eyes of the average Frenchman, the symbol of unity and resistance, standing not for a class but for the nation. That explains why large numbers of Frenchmen, particularly in the provinces, who had always voted Radical Socialist, because Herriot's party was for them both the patriotic and the anti-clerical party of France, voted in 1946 for the Communists.

Soon after the war the French Socialists were offered a new opportunity to assume leadership. When De Gaulle abandoned his role of first resistant to become the spokesman for reaction, he could no longer serve as balance-wheel among the conflicting forces of post-war France. At that moment the reins should logically have passed to the Socialists. Here was a challenge to their capacity for dynamic leadership. Unfortunately, they failed to meet it.

Not realizing that Europe is in another period of revolutionary upsurge, the Socialists have become dominated, once more, by the fear of Communist hegemony. In the Constituent Assembly, and in the successive election campaigns this year, they attempted to restore the political equilibrium by aligning themselves alongside the center parties. The result was a marked loss of labor support and the party's growing dependence on the unpredictable middle-class vote: many working-class Socialists, dissatisfied with the direction of the party but not ready to leave it, voted Communist. But many middle-class members, sensing the swing to the left among the rank and file, voted M. R. P. or Radical Socialist. The party lost votes on both sides.

The fundamental weakness of its position became evident in Léon Blum's famous analysis of the results of the June elections. Refusing to admit that the party's failure to provide leadership in a revolutionary period had alienated a large part of its following, he insisted that the Socialists had been too ready to assume the responsibility of governing. Instead of laying down a strong domestic and foreign policy which would help restore the confidence of the membership, he argued that the party should accept as little power and as few posts as possible in the new ministerial coalition.

Blum's recent acceptance of the premiership, even for the limited period between now and January, when the new government will be chosen, may eliminate one of the party's chief weaknesses. The Socialists could not have continued much longer in the impossible situation of having their outstanding leader refuse a post in the government or even a seat in the Assembly. No doubt the idea of rounding out his long and admirable career as a kind of Holy Spirit of Western socialism appeals to a man of Blum's temperament. But such a role would have little meaning for the cold, hungry workers of France; they want men who will lead the fight against the old privileged interests and against the danger of a fascist revival. They know that the problem of rebuilding the industrial strength of France can only be solved along socialist lines. The Communist slogan, "Produce and Build," has meaning only when it is linked with a broad program of collective control of industry and finance. This, above all, is the task the Socialist Party must assume under Blum if it is to regain its fading power and prestige.

To counteract the process of decline, the party in France, as elsewhere in Europe, must also find a way to work with the Communists without being swallowed up or dominated by them. It is a difficult problem, but one that must be faced. The masses cannot understand why it is all right to collaborate with the M. R. P. or the Christian Democrats, but not with the Communists. They want working-class unity.

Nor will the masses accept a foreign policy oriented toward a Western bloc under capitalist America's guidance. Rank-and-file Socialists are, no doubt, irritated by the frequent zigzags of the Communist Party line and even more by the Communist habit of setting up bourgeois mediocrities as temporary idols when it serves their purpose. The French masses dislike many aspects of Soviet foreign policy. But they will not be pushed into an anti-Communist or an anti-Russian position—as their leaders have at last learned, at great cost.

DEL VAYO

Students and Politics

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, December 10

A STUDENTS' organization has one of two fairly well-defined purposes. It exists either to make the path of learning an easier one, or to promote a body of specific political doctrine in which its members are interested. The first type, of which the International Student Service is a good example, is necessarily unconcerned with doctrine. Its purpose is to provide relief, to pool information, to arrange the exchange of visits. It pays no attention to the student's nationality, religious creed, political outlook, or economic views—with one exception. That exception is its insistence upon conditions which make for academic freedom. For the more open the atmosphere in which students live together and the wider the experience to which they are given access, the more creative is likely to be the intellectual adventure upon which they are engaged.

A body of this kind has no relation to a student society which promotes political doctrine. It is not Republican or Democratic, Liberal or Conservative, Communist or Socialist. It does not exist to reform the world. It has no view of the universe which it must promulgate to the exclusion of other views. It has no attitude toward the atomic bomb, or the problem of Palestine, or the future of Trieste. Its business, quite simply, is to make it easier for students to get the best out of their training and to help them meet as many students of other countries as possible. If American students meet French students or English students or Czech students, what is important is that all of them are students, and not, on this level, that they are concerned to give the world this shape rather than that, to make one set of principles more acceptable than another. Toleration and neutrality are the main pillars of the policy that a student society of this type must try to promote. The alternative is a dangerous one: it may become the instrument of purposes interested not in easing the path to learning but in narrowing it so that only those tread it who share a particular outlook.

Few people doubt that a university may well develop student societies of every political sort. It is an admirable thing for the undergraduate to have a political outlook which he can examine either in conjunction with those who share it or in organized discussion with those who believe his political views to be wholly wrong. And there is everything to be said for putting the political context of student life on the widest possible international basis. What is important here is that everyone should be aware precisely what is being done. An international of Conservative students should present itself as what it is. It should be clear to all who watch it in operation that its activities are intended for the central purpose of promoting the spread of Conservative doctrine. It has only indirect relevance to student life. Its members are of student age; they belong to organizations of the university type. But it is not because they are students in such organizations that they form Conservative bodies or meet as a Conservative international. The essential thing about members of such bodies is that they are Conservatives. If they attack Russia, or regret the policy of the Socialist government of Great Britain, or insist that nothing be done to enlarge the scope of the TVA, the important thing is to realize that they are speaking not as students but as Conservatives. What they must refrain from claiming is the right to speak in the name of a student body which has no rigidities of doctrine and no formulas to push forward save its faith in the freest possible interchange of ideas.

It is far from certain that the importance of these distinctions is being made clear by those who are spending so much energy and money in the promotion of student conferences and exchanges since the end of the war. This lack of clarity has no single source. In part, it is due to the natural anxiety of youth to express its views about the reshaping of the world. And there is a sense of frustration from the fact that the major controls of action are in the hands of what youth regards as a gerontocracy—a term which covers almost everyone more than thirty-five years old. Something is due, also, to a muddle-mindedness in youth. The group or conference passes a political resolution without having the slightest idea that it is political; or it links itself to some other group, or agrees to send delegates to some conference, without any awareness that it is lending itself to the support of a political policy.

A good example of this kind of lack of clarity was provided by the International Youth Congress which was held in London in the winter of 1945. It was attended by delegates from many countries, including the United States. The striking thing about most of the national delegations was the fact that though they were supposed to represent all sorts of youth groups in each country, delegates from the Communist youth constituted, if not a majority, at least a proportion in each national delegation far greater than any number to which Communist strength in that country would have entitled it. The sponsors of the conference did not invite the British Labor Party to be represented; its Executive Committee, indeed, was unaware that the conference was to be held. When delegates from the Socialist youth of Italy, Greece, Bulgaria, and France looked for the representatives of British Socialist youth, they could not be found, and contacts had to be organized outside the conference. During its progress, it became clear, in fact, that the conference was dominated by the Communist youth, who had so arranged its program and procedure that the strategic control of the conference's policy was almost wholly in their hands. It is not, therefore, surprising that the permanent organization which has emerged from the London conference should be, to all intents and purposes, a body which is destined to play variations upon the Communist theme.

HAROLD J. LASKI is well known as one of the leaders of the British Labor Party and as the author of many stimulating books on political and economic problems.

This is the source, I suggest, of the third factor which makes for lack of clarity once the original distinction I have drawn is absent. All sorts of youth groups meet together; alternatively, some youth group from one country goes to another. In the first case, the Communist group is the one delegation which has made up its mind about (a) the policy it will propose and (b) the nominations it will make. It dominates the conference partly because it has this clear sense of direction and partly because, during the conference, its representatives devote their energies to this and to no other task. They have their way because their strategy makes opposition to them futile. The opposition is hesitant, divided, uncertain. The Communist attitude cuts across all national boundaries; it elicits support from parts of other youth groups, on all kinds of grounds; and, as a rule, its delegates have been carefully chosen and have the means of being lavish in their hospitality. They create the impression that a refusal to "go along" with them would deprive the conference of value. It seems evident that if they are supported, something, even something important—though no one quite knows what—is likely to be accomplished. At the end, a permanent secretariat is pretty certain to be created of which the main positions either fall into Communist hands or into the hands of people on whom they feel they can count. The delegates then return to their respective countries unaware, or only half aware, that they have become the instruments of a purpose quite different from any they had intended to espouse.

Nor is the alternative case less interesting. A national youth delegation goes from, say, the United States to Europe. It visits London and Paris and Prague. In London it finds considerable difficulty in making any left contacts save with the Communist Party, for the British Labor Party does not have a central youth organization. It finds in Paris an uneasy but official collaboration between Socialist and Communist youth; naturally enough, the strength rather than the weakness of the collaboration is emphasized to the visitors from overseas. In Prague it finds a Communist youth which proudly introduces its American guests to a Communist Prime Minister. In each country the delegates learn of Communist enthusiasm for freedom, for experiment in social welfare, of Communist willingness to collaborate with any group which is anti-fascist and eager to make a better world. Their experience in Prague is of a government which, despite its Communist Prime Minister, seems tolerant, open-minded, enthusiastic about large-scale reconstruction. They find there a good deal of the atmosphere characteristic of Washington in the early months of the New Deal; they see the chains of servitude being thrown off by men and women who feel that they have a world to win. It is not altogether surprising that they become enthusiastic converts to the principle of all-in collaboration with the left.

The Communists, let me add, deserve the collaboration they secure. They work for it every day and all day. They adjust their attitude with extraordinary skill to the people with whom they have to deal. They give the young delegates the heady conviction of immense possibilities being open and of great achievement being possible. They give them, even more, the sense of being able to move from the position of spectators to that of actors in the great world drama that is being played. They satisfy the anxiety of youth to be accepted as mature, experienced, even significant. And the young American delegates meet each day with other young people whose work seems exhilarating, even important. They see changes occurring before their eyes. To return to an America where the political situation gives youth its opportunity only by accident and, even then, excludes it from opportunity where it is unconventional, seems a dull and drab routine.

Yet the lesson of the last twenty years is unmistakable. A students' organization which, like the International Student Service, has no direct political objectives will only destroy itself if it becomes the instrument of others. It becomes changed from a forum into an arena. Intrigue deforms every aspect of its life. Each group has to jockey for position; each purpose is set in the context of some ulterior motive which one group seeks to conceal from another. It is transformed from a cooperative adventure into a wasps' nest of party bickering in which what is important is not the general enrichment of student life but its subordination to some triumphant dogmatism which has the energy and the resolution to triumph over its rivals. The real lesson of these years is the supreme danger of premature dogmatism. The implication of that lesson is that the best a college can give is a way of thought. If it teaches what must be thought and, still more, teaches it upon what is made a battleground, respect for freedom is lost in the glitter of a false victory.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

New Blow for Consumers

IN THE schedule of freight-rate increases granted by the Interstate Commerce Commission to the railroads I find the following item: "Handling charges on all commodities except milk and cream in baggage or passenger train service, including excess baggage but not including corpses—25 per cent" (my emphasis).

We must, I suppose, be grateful to the ICC for not increasing the cost of dying, but most of us are more immediately concerned with the effect of higher transportation charges on the cost of living. According to the Journal of Commerce, the effect on prices will be "only moderate," and this is no doubt true if we consider the immediate impact of increased rates on any single commodity or manufactured article. But the total addition to our transportation bill will be about a billion dollars, the bulk of which will be passed on to ultimate consumers, usually on a cost-plus basis.

For instance, the charge for moving flour from Buffalo to New York is expected to rise by 3 cents per 100-pound sack. That amount will be paid by the wholesalers, who will pass it on to the bakers and grocery jobbers, probably with some small addition. By the time the flour reaches the retailers, the extra freight expense may be 5 cents per 100 pounds or one-half cent per 10-pound bag; and since retail prices are not usually expressed in such fractions, that could mean that the housewife would be asked for another cent a bag.

I am not saying that this will happen in this particular case. I cite it as an example of what could happen, for it is a law of economic physics that, in a sellers' market, any cost added at one end of the pipeline of distribution will expand at each stage until it reaches the other end. That is the result of what is known, in business parlance, as "maintaining one's margin."

The following examples of higher freight charges must, therefore, be regarded as basic minima, rather than the actual increases which will be shouldered by ultimate consumers:

Cement, delivered New York: 3 to 4 cents a barrel.

Lumber, from N. E. states to East Coast: $1.25 to $1.50 per 1,000 board feet.

Coal, delivered New York: 17 to 22 cents a ton.

Grains, at chief terminal points: 1 to 1¼ cents a bushel.

In certain cases where prices have recently risen very steeply, it is suggested that added freight costs may be absorbed by the producers. Certainly, in the case of metals and paper, two commodities mentioned in this connection, the producers could well afford to do so; but in view of the tremendous unsatisfied demand for their products, it will probably be hard for them to resist the temptation to make the buyers pay.

The department stores, which are making unprecedented profits, could also well afford to absorb their higher freight bill. However, except in the case of a few items in which competition is becoming keen, the customer is likely to pay as usual. "Added cost," according to the Journal of Commerce, "will probably have to be passed on to consumers in toto on refrigerators, radios, household furniture, linoleum, napery, and numerous other household goods and furnishings." The increase can be expected to average about 1 per cent of the retail price. This won't seem like an alarming extra in many cases, but it is the accumulation of such petty additions to the cost of living that threatens to break consumers' backs and undermine the post-war boom.

Why did the ICC ignore the protests of the OPA, the Department of Commerce, and representatives of the shippers, and give the railroads practically the whole of their demands? Its report declares that the rate boost is intended "to offset, partially at least, increased wages and costs of materials and supplies to which they [the carriers] have been subjected." The commissioners appear to have accepted the companies' own projection of traffics for 1947, on the basis of which a net deficit for the Class I roads was forecast. But, curiously enough, they do not directly pass on the accuracy of this estimate, though if anybody is in a position to make an educated guess at future traffic developments, it is surely the ICC. Only obliquely does the report hint at the possibility that events will prove the increases unjustified, by quoting a 1920 opinion of the late Commissioner Joseph Eastman, who declared: "If the rates prove unduly high, they may later be reduced. The present proceeding has nothing of finality about it."

It will be remembered that, early in 1942, the ICC authorized an increase in freight rates, only to rescind it a few months later (over the bitter protests of the carriers) when the tremendous surge of war traffics showed that railroad earnings had not the least need of such assistance. In that year net profits reached an all-time high of $902,000,000, and in 1943 they were not much below that figure. I am not suggesting that such bonanzas will be repeated in 1947, even with the aid of the billion-dollar hand-out just received. But the development of traffics in the past few months, in line, as always, with the curve of industrial activity, which is moving steadily upward, suggests that the railroaders' forecasts of 1947 earnings may prove far too pessimistic.

Of course, if the much prophesied slump comes along, the picture will change. If industrial production falls off sharply, and the price level breaks, railroad business would be hard hit. But, in such an eventuality, higher freight rates will not prevent many of the companies from running into the red: in fact, higher freight rates may help to worsen the position, for they will certainly encourage the kind of competition from other forms of transport which hit railroads in the thirties. Railroads can very easily "price themselves out of the market," to use the financial catch-phrase of the moment. Their crying need, on any long-term view, is not so much more revenue as more managerial imagination, brains, and energy. As the bad boy of the industry, Robert R. Young, told a Senate committee last March, railroading is suffering from "dry rot," thanks to a banker control concerned with commissions and underwriting profits rather than efficiency.

BY LOU FRANKEL

TO MOST critics of radio, the prime example of public-service programming is the "forum" type of broadcast. Yet forums differ in technique and quality to a great degree.

And, interestingly enough, the forums you hear on the networks bear, in both style and approach, a remarkable relationship to the philosophy of the network involved.

Thus, NBC's "University of Chicago Round Table," on Sunday afternoon, is meticulously stilted, in so far as argument is concerned. Each side of the topic under discussion is presented with scrupulous fairness. The program suffers from over-intellectualism and often verges on the pedantic. Although it has a high Hooperating—4.8 as of the last report—it is outdistanced by the Sammy Kaye orchestra on ABC with a 7.7 rating.

Columbia's "People's Platform," also broadcast early Sunday afternoon, similarly reflects the philosophy of its network. Here, the moderators, Lyman Bryson and Dwight Cooke, exhibit a deft flair for keeping the participants to the subject at hand, despite an ad lib style. There is considerable leeway in the discussion; yet rarely do the speakers drift off the topic or indulge in personalities or acrimonious crossfire. And, invariably, the moderator remains in the background, coming to the mike only to keep the debate on target or to sum up at the closing. It is adult, easy to listen to, and lively without becoming rambunctious. "People's Platform" has a 4.3 Hooper.

ABC's "America's Town Meeting," heard on Thursday evening, is a carry-over from the days when ABC was the Blue network and owned and operated by NBC. Here, for the first time, the studio audience came into the picture to fire questions at the speakers. The major changes in the program, of late, are reducing the speakers from two to one for each side of the debate, and adding an interrogator for each position. With this technique, Moderator George V. Denny, Jr., has managed to spruce up both the debate and the question-and-answer session. Under the old format the show had a tendency to get windy, and opened the way for claques in the audience to gang up on one of the speakers in the question-and-answer period. Now the program is much more stable. The interrogators pick up the slack each speaker may have left, set the pace for the audience questioning, and keep the program from becoming a massacre, as it has been at times in the past.

"America's Town Meeting" has a wider appeal than other radio forums, since there's less restraint on the speakers and studio quizzers; yet, because it is up against some of the top network programs, its rating in the last Hooper report was only 3.9. To the American Broadcasting Company, this program (chiefly because of moderator Denny) has been a godsend. It has kept the network in the news, thanks to Denny's ability to handle speakers and studio audiences and to select stimulating topics, without once putting the network on the spot.

Ted Granik's "American Forum of the Air," Tuesdays on Mutual, is a perfect example of a forum gone wrong. Here, the moderator tries so hard to make the newspapers that the program, as often as not, winds up as a soapbox for much that is not on the agenda. Granik's approach is to invite a brace of speakers for each side and let them get into a free-for-all. He sits back, watches the clock, and lets the invective fall where it may. There is little, if any, attempt to guide the proceedings. The tendency has been to let emotion set the pace for both the discussion period and the session of studio-audience questions.

The "American Forum of the Air" is a blatant attempt to grab listeners by lowering the standards of public debate. Yet its last Hooperating is 2.2 for the 45 minutes, though the low figure is due, no doubt, partly to the competition of Fibber McGee and Molly and Bob Hope on NBC, a Hollywood drama and Arthur Godfrey on CBS, and the Boston Symphony on ABC. Recently, this program has taken to asking listeners to phone in a vote to stations for tabulations, presumably, of a public decision on the topics discussed.

Locally, there are a number of good forum programs that I know about. WQXR, in New York, for example, has a pip called "What's on Your Mind" that they put on before a different women's club each week. It uses two New York Times staff writers, plus guest speakers for each viewpoint. WMCA, another New York independent station, has a weekly debate program which uses the Commerce and Industry Association—a kind of Chamber of Commerce—as the participating organization. Another group, less identified with the business interests of the community, might have served better.

The League for Industrial Democracy and the Union for Democratic Action have less frequent programs over New York's WEVD.

One of the best local forum programs is on WSYR, the NBC affiliate, in Syracuse. This station uses the local unit of the League of Women Voters as the participating organization, thus giving the program a standard of impartiality to which it adheres, and permitting the selection of a wide variety of local, national, and international topics. And, in addition, this program does not make the mistake of overreaching itself by scheduling topics which the available speakers cannot handle without faking.

Does your local station have a forum show?

WORTH HEARING

HOAGY CARMICHAEL SINGS (CBS, Sundays). A grand quarter-hour of excellent popular music and good piano. The commercials don't measure up to the talent.

THEATER GUILD ON THE AIR (ABC, Sundays). Dramatization of great plays. Far above the usual radio dramatic fare. Commercials are quiet and institutional. And the script usually resembles the original.

BROADWAY TALKS BACK (MBS, Mondays). In which the playwrights defend their offspring with the theatrical critics of the New York dailies in opposition.

Listen, the hay-bells tinkle as the cart
Wavers on rubber tires along the tar
And cindered ice below the burlap mill
And ale-wife run. The oxen drool and start
In wonder at the fenders of a car,
And blunder hugely up St. Peter's hill.
These are the undefiled by woman—their Sorrow is not the sorrow of this world:
King Herod shrieking vengeance at the curled
Up knees of Jesus choking in the air,

A king of speechless clods and infants. Still
The world out-Herods Herod; and the year,
The nineteen-hundred forty-fifth of grace,
Lumbers with losses up the clinkered hill
Of our purgation; and the oxen near
The worn foundations of their resting-place,
The holy manger where their bed is corn
And holly torn from Christmas. If they die,
As Jesus, in the harness, who will mourn?
Lamb of the shepherds, Child, how still you lie.

ROBERT LOWELL

The New Eumenides

THE GREAT WALL OF CHINA: STORIES AND REFLECTIONS. by Franz Kafka, translated by Willa and Edwin Muir. Schocken Books. $3.

THE fullest meaning of classical tragedy is that man learns through suffering. Thus when Oedipus appears sightless and bleeding or when Achilles yields to Priam the mutilated corpse of Hector, we achieve a catharsis of pity and fear. Orestes, murderer of his mother, can at last be absolved from the literal, bloody exactions of the Old Law; expiation is no longer by eye and tooth, and under the dispensation of the younger gods the Furies are appeased. By a tragic plight entirely his own Kafka under the New Law attains an attitude of infinite resignation called by Kierkegaard the last stage prior to faith; yet the exaction of the Old Law is not remitted, and his very surrender assumes the guise of despair. Since the present collection of allegories and reflections, explicit and demonstrative, is a commentary on the earlier fictions—The Castle, The Trial, Metamorphosis—it invites us to define the nature of the Kafka tragedy.

If the usual Kafka narratives develop themselves within the "half-awake fantasies" in which, as Camus says, it would be wrong to interpret everything, these late, naked allegories with animals behaving as neurotically as men are a direct challenge to the intellect rather than the sensibility. We speculate on the symbolism of the dog that fasts or the creature that takes sanctuary in his complicated burrow, and we discover the relation of the giant mole to the faith of Kierkegaard, but at a sacrifice of the familiar "atmosphere" in Kafka's implausible, confused foregrounds. The themes are typical: the inscrutability of the will of God and its inescapable operation (Investigations of a Dog and The Great Wall of China), the involutions of anxiety far within the isolated self and the futility of either intellect or retreat before the Unknown (The Burrow), and the necessity of accepting the divine as absurd or even repulsive (The Giant Mole). At the last, evidently, Kafka was able to abbreviate the paradox of his living, his enormous fatigues, into a formal thesis instead of recording how incongruously it was revealed, perpetually astonishing as though to the eye of an amateur, within experience itself. Yet if the tone is meditative, the defensive strategy, the ruses, the eventual frustrations of these animals are those of the Kafka tragedy. Kafka's humilities and revulsions at last expressed themselves in the perplexities of the beast.

Kafka suffers, but his pain does not assure his being in the right way. Thus his little maladjustments, his acceptance of life as an interrogation chamber, amount to a distinctive tragedy—or, perhaps, a comedy—of error. The comedy issues from his belief, affirmed by Kierkegaard, that living is a wisdom whose secret is foolishness and a hope whose form is madness. Unlike Kierkegaard, he is never able to make the "leap" of faith to God. Consequently his tragedy—or his comedy—is not ultimately religious; it remains secular and ethical, but without catharsis, without purgation of pity and fear, and thus either a parody of tragedy or a parody of religion.

In this drama the very laws of probability are in abeyance; tragedy occurs by whimsy. Kafka's intimation is that "inadequate, even childish, measures may serve to rescue one from peril," an intimation due to his incorrigible naivete, the impossibility of learning through suffering or any other way. His helplessness appears as wonder: he writes of himself, "All that he does seems to him, it is true, extraordinarily new." His heroes are all amateurs to whom each triviality is a crisis. He explains in My Neighbor how advantageous it is to exaggerate often "so as to make things clear in one's mind." The paradox of living is so utter that experience is leveled off to a continuous tension by exaggerating the insignificant, somewhat as in the distortions of Dostoevski. Karl in Amerika cannot get off the boat; K. in The Castle cannot manage to telephone; Joseph in The Trial cannot speak with his clients at the bank. Each, like the animal in The Burrow, is isolated by his own crises until he resembles Kierkegaard's individual without connections or pretensions, and with all the terrible responsibilities of solitude. The insecurity of the Kafka hero is desperate, for he is without benefit of either the resignation of faith or the retribution of tragedy. No propitiation can be made. "Our generation is lost," the dog considers, "but it is more blameless than those earlier ones." In The Trial before Joseph dies, bestially, under the knife, he explains, "My innocence doesn't make the matter any simpler." And by the Old Law the Enemy will demolish the burrow and, presumably, destroy its helpless recluse.

The paradox within the Kafka tragedy, the sustained pity and fear, its half-ethical, half-religious directions, are phrased with rich variations in the aphorisms and reflections: "Our relation to our fellow-men is that of prayer, our relation to ourselves, that of effort." In the notes on himself Kafka admits that "he has no conception of freedom" (the occupant of the burrow similarly confesses, "I have reached the stage where I no longer wish to have certainty"). His wishes are not wishes "but only a vindication of nothingness, a justification of non-entity, a touch of animation which he wanted to lend to non-entity." It will be difficult, however, to claim Kafka for existentialism after one reads Reflection 104: "One simply cannot not live. In that very 'simply cannot' lies the insane power of faith; in that denial it embodies itself." Kafka can also implicate the paradox itself, as he does in The Silence of the Sirens, where Ulysses's artifice to evade his peril raises questions of the pride of will so ulterior that "the human understanding is beyond its depths."

Then after we have read the allegories and all these subtle propositions we return to the handful of brief stories and fables printed here—The Married Couple, My Neighbor, The Knock at the Manor Gate—as we shall return to the novels, for the astonishing fantastic comi-tragedy of anxieties; in them we hasten, fatigued, "in almost guiltless silence towards death in a world darkened by others." Under a suspension of probability and the exaggeration that clarifies we revisit the psychological landscapes where a chance knock at the castle gate beneath the glare of noonday brings one, inexplicably, to the sudden and gross examinations of that perpetual court—a stone cell with bare walls and iron rings, and "in the middle something that looked half a pallet, half an operation table." When the exemption from probability is complete and the absurd is reduced to matter-of-fact, we have those vignettes of the paradox seen vividly by an amateur who is never ready for any contingency but who notwithstanding takes it for granted. In The Married Couple, for example, the implausible becomes dramatic and the comic becomes pathos: "Every now and then he would suddenly and quite unexpectedly clap his hat on his head; he had been holding it on his knee until then, slowly pushing it up and down there. True, he took it off again immediately, as if he had made a blunder, but he had had it on his head nevertheless for a second or two, and besides he repeated this performance again and again every few minutes." The crazy, intense drama of A Common Confusion cannot be played in the animal allegories, for in them Kafka capitulates to the answers that steal round the questions. His anguished "little investigations" must be followed through the strange vocations of K., of Joseph, of Gregor, of the nameless agents of these plain fables.

The Kafka malaise, it has been argued, is a symptom of the galuth mind, the mind of the Diaspora. In this collection Kafka's dread is not alone that of the Jew, or his trembling that of the Christian. An original sin has been committed upon man and, he concludes, "The state in which we find ourselves is sinful, quite independent of guilt." "A cage," goes another Kafka aphorism, "went in search of a bird." From this tragedy of gigantic anxiety there is no catharsis, no purification by the New Law. The expulsion from paradise is final, and the Furies still pursue.

Behind America's "Iron Curtain"

BETRAYAL IN THE PHILIPPINES. By Hernando Abaya. A. A. Wyn, $3.

MR. ABAYA has here presented the first uncensored account of events in the Philippines since Pearl Harbor, with particular emphasis on what has happened there since the liberation in 1944-45. He has presented a carefully documented, damning indictment of United States policy in the Philippines since the liberation. He has presented a picture of a Philippine Republic free in name only, completely subservient to American economic interests, of a colonial state with a fascist President who collaborated with the Japanese against the United States and was placed in power after the liberation not only with the approval of the United States but with our assistance. He has presented a picture of a people who suffered unbelievably during the war years in the name of democracy and who now see their hopes, their aspirations, their ideals being stolen from them by fascist collaborators who fought them during the war years as allies of the Japanese. He has presented a picture of a Filipino people who for the first time are becoming aware of the political and economic factors that have resulted in their oppression for so many years, of the birth of a genuine Filipino progressive movement that in the past election threatened for the first time the power of the oligarchy which has ruled the Philippines for forty years under the United States and for four hundred under Spain.

In his introduction to this book Harold Ickes refers to the American "iron curtain" which has kept from the American people the truth about the political and economic situation in the Philippines. Ickes, of course, is in a position to know the facts, since as Secretary of Interior he held the powers of the American High Commissioner from 1942 until the appointment of McNutt some months after the liberation in 1945. There can be no doubt that Mr. Abaya's assertions are true. The facts are so overwhelmingly damning that the situation can no longer be glossed over or ignored.

The book begins with the first acts of collaboration committed by the leading Filipinos just after Pearl Harbor and ends with the election of Manuel Roxas to the Presidency of the new Philippine Republic last April. The Roxas record is clearly and coldly exposed, as are the records of the other collaborators now in power. A history of the much-maligned peasant army, the Hukbalahap, gives the lie to the many charges which have been hurled against them. The part played by General MacArthur in clearing Roxas of collaboration, the highly questionable tactics of High Commissioner Paul McNutt in behalf of Roxas during the campaign, the characteristic indecisiveness of President Truman on the collaboration question are all revealed.

It must be stated in all fairness that the book is in spots not well written, particularly in the earlier chapters. Some of the material is not well organized; there are some minor inaccuracies of date. These are faults which could be serious if the book dealt with a less important subject. But the book is in many spots really fine reporting; the author's analysis of the crime of collaboration, for example, is particularly good.

Mr. Abaya has been a newspaperman for a number of years. He served the late President Quezon as confidential secretary before the war. He was a member of the Free Philippines guerrilla organization during the Japanese occupation. The picture he has presented I know to be a true and factual one. His book should be read by all Americans who are not aware of the existence of this American imperialist "iron curtain" in the Philippines or of what lies behind it. For those Americans who are less naive, or better informed, "Betrayal in the Philippines" is an excellent and absorbing sourcebook, in fact the only sourcebook.

Nor should it be thought from this that the issues presented are dead ones. They are still very much alive and quite explosive. Conditions can still be remedied. The maladorous Trade Act should be revised. American troops should be withdrawn. Mr. Abaya's book is not only factual; it is timely.

A Scholarly History

A CRITICAL STUDY OF ENGLISH POETRY. By Herbert J. Grierson and J. C. Smith. Oxford University Press. $5.

THE Oxford editors of Donne's poems and "The Faerie Queene," works antithetically dominant in the chief age of England's poetry, would appear to be the right men for an attempt to survey in 600 pages the whole achievement from Anglo-Saxon verse to 1939; and their book, for which we must be grateful, is conscientious and instructive. That it stands quite up to its title or its subject is less clear. I propose to take its virtues for granted and confine the review to an examination of some defects.

Probably the authors wish, with their word "critical," to disclaim comparison with the much fuller narratives of Warton and Courthope. But the word is misleading. Apart from a warm and just appreciation of Spenser I observe no real attempt to modify received opinion anywhere but in the chapter on Crabbe, who receives as much discussion as Dryden and Arnold taken together. Crabbe is more vigorous certainly than his reputation, though a frightening bore in most of the endless works he preserved from the more endless works he wrote; "The Village" and "Sir Eustace Grey" will define his talent. He looks like a meager harvest from a fresh survey of the bulk of English verse. One might have expected more from critics with qualities adequate to an attempt like this. The general paucity of technical criticism and philosophical criticism suggests further that one reason Crabbe occupies, thinly, twenty pages is that it is easy to describe him at length without reference to technic or principles. With the immensely superior Herbert this is difficult, and he gets one page. His exquisite brother is missing altogether; a loss to which one is easily reconciled on realizing that if mentioned at all he would have had only a sentence, like Golding, Greville, and Churchill. These are poets of some moment. On Golding, Pound's serious and pardonably exaggerated judgment is that his "Metamorphoses" "form possibly the most beautiful book in our language" (long inaccessible, one-third of the work, or 5,000 lines, can be had now in the Everyman "Ovid"); Greville, whose stature is beginning to be recognized, figures impressively in both the sixteenth-and-seventeenth-century Oxford anthologies (the second being coedited by Professor Grierson); Charles Churchill was after Pope, Johnson, Swift his century's most gifted satirist. Merely to mention them as existing can hardly pass for "critical," nor will the authors' sole remark about Greville, that he "made poetry of statecraft," whatever that means. Now a history of this sort, short or long, lacking freshness may yet possess authority, in judicious reliance upon other critics—as a serviceable anthology might be assembled by a man who couldn't tell Purney from Pope. But equally through inattention and defective sympathy I am afraid the present work can lay small claim to authority.

It is damaging, for instance, that the authors are evidently unfamiliar with Yvor Winters's revaluation of sixteenth-century lyric (Hound and Horn, 1933, Poetry, 1939); so that Googe and Turbervile are absent as always, and Gascoigne is said to be "by no means the worst poet" in the period of which he is the striking glory. Less predictable is their scanting of two magnificent poets, Wyatt and Raleigh, who have had much serious attention in recent years. Only a stanza and line, also quoted by Leguis, are given from Wyatt; the author of "The Ocean to Cynthia" is huddled into six lines as "highly individual." Their chilly treatment of Dryden continues more or less through the eighteenth-century chapters until Cowper is reached, and it is imperfectly balanced by an extreme partiality for matters Scottish. The perfunctory character of the authors' sympathy with metaphysical poetry is astonishing, considering the debt that modern study of it owes to Professor Grierson. Whether dramatic poetry should have been included in a book this size is doubtful, but if included it ought to have been discussed. Thus the whole description of Chapman's verse, dramatic or non-dramatic, runs: "His full and heightened style, often full to bombast and heightened beyond comprehension, impedes his utterance; but when he gets his throat clear he can speak out loud and bold," a banal cento of Webster and Keats. The book is enthusiastic and best about Shakespeare and the nineteenth century, though it patronizes Hood ("No poet need be altogether ashamed of his work who . . .") and traduces in my opinion the poet of "Amours de Voyage" ("Clough had no lyric gift"). In a prefatory note the authors express some diffidence as to their capacity for dealing with post-Victorian verse. But since this diffidence has not affected their dogmatic, and fantastic, account of what has taken place since 1900, it must be said with emphasis that they simply do not know in the final chapters what they are talking about. One wonders why they ventured. A history faces ridicule that closes its roll of the English poets, some women aside, with the statement that "Mr. Rostrevor Hamilton, Mr. Frank Kendon, Mr. Laurence Whistler, to name no others, carry on the English tradition."

What audience was imagined for it I don't readily see. It seems not to be designed for reference (there is a useful bibliography, but the index is casual and notes rare, even when urgently needed); if so, it is generally inferior to Legouis and Cazamian, which has the advantages of size and prose reference besides a European perspective. For the serious student it is neither detailed enough nor full enough. Yet as a narrative for the general reader—that mysterious and probably non-existent person—it is not selective enough, and often dull. Not uniformly but in large part it has to be described also as diffuse, repetitious, uneven, superficial, and ill-written. This muddle is depressingly representative: "But to enjoy Pope's Satires you must to some extent be able to share Saintsbury's conviction that in poetry the form is everything, for even he has to admit a number of qualifications to the enjoyment if, like most of us, one is interested in the matter as well as the form." The authors' wit ("Mr. Spender wore his red with a difference. . . . Mr. Spender's heart bleeds . . .") can be as embarrassing as their diction ("these lovely pictures of the dear English landscape have not faded and will not fade") and their logic ("Dryden is the first English poet who lived mainly or wholly by his pen. No Elizabethan poet did so unless he was also a dramatist. . . . Dryden too had to live mainly by plays").

"Mr. Eliot can scarcely be counted the pioneer of English modernism. That honor may fairly be claimed by Miss Edith Sitwell." This is chronologically false as it is critically ridiculous. The crucial poem, "The Love Song of Alfred J. Prufrock" (so called twice here), was printed in June, 1915, the year Miss Sitwell's negligible first book came out, and Eliot has recently written, "I had kept my early poems (including "Prufrock") in my desk from 1911 to 1915"; his book appeared in 1917, Miss Sitwell's first characteristic book in 1918. So much for a point of scholarship that should not have come up. On page 546 occurs the following sentence: "The Imagists owed their name, we believe, to Mr. Ezra Pound; but we shall excuse ourselves from discussing that person, who was never to our knowledge a British national" —as if modern English verse were intelligible without Pound. So much for the ideals of scholarship. A demon of misquotation pursues the authors, twisting even Shakespeare (for examples pp. 120, 125, 164, 191); it is now known (1931), and the fact rescues his early verse from contempt, that Middleton was born in 1580 not "1570?"; Yeats has no poem, I believe, well-known or otherwise, called "Gyrations," but can a posthumous piece "The Gyres" be meant? "Bowles certainly revived the sonnet, wholly neglected since Milton's day"; but this is the second injustice to that eccentric Thomas Warton the younger, who not only published in 1777 sonnets still modestly current, but wrote a celebrated "History of English Poetry" which was better worth mentioning, surely, than his study of Spenser. It is strange that Professors Grierson and Smith have no word for their predecessors as predecessors, nor for the poets who planned histories without writing them. Pope and Gray are familiar among these, but the spectacular loss is as usual that of Coleridge, who left characteristic memoranda, first printed in 1933, "for a History of English Poetry, biographical, bibliographical, critical, and philosophical, in distinct Essays." It has still to be written.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

HERE, first of all, are the reactions of two children—four and a half and six and a half years old—to some of the children's records that are being issued in great numbers.

I need hardly say that they were delighted by "Tubby the Tuba," an inspired job of integration of music (George Kleinsinger) with story (Paul Tripp), and an excellent job of relaxed narration (Victor Jory), finished musical performance (Leon Barzin), and clear recording (Cosmo Records). The same authors' 'Pee Wee the Piccolo," issued by Victor, and "Pancho Goes to a Fiesta," issued by Jupiter, I haven't yet played for the children.

They also loved the songs sung by Frank Luther in Decca's "Children's Corner." And I might add that Luther's pleasantly relaxed singing is something children like in his other Decca recordings; and that his informal room-sized narration makes the Decca recording of "Peter and the Wolf" better and preferable to the Victor recording with Richard Hale's declamation into the vast reverberant space of the empty concert hall. (Also—since I mention "Peter and the Wolf"—that Columbia's Stokowski performance and Victor's new Walt Disney version with its horrible narration by Sterling Holloway are things to avoid.)

Columbia's "King Who Couldn't Dance" told by Gene Kelly turned out to be another favorite; and I expect the recently arrived Kelly recordings of "Peter Rabbit" and "The Little Red Hen" to have the same success. On the other hand Victor's "Little Black Sambo and the Twins" and "The Unsuccessful Elf" told by Paul Wing were listened to attentively but not asked for again.

Most recently, the first releases of the Young People's Record Club have made a great hit. Both children love the account of all the sounds a little dog heard on the way to the country and when he got there, on the record of "But Muffin Could Hear" for the pre-school-age group. And both love the songs on the record "Going West" for the school-age group. The bonus record of Haydn's "Toy Symphony" they listened to attentively but did not ask for again.

Columbia's recordings of the Mila Mack presentations of "Jack and the Beanstalk" and "Cinderella" on the C. B. S. "Let's Pretend" program were frightening, and were not played again. As for Vox's "Mozart, His Story and His Music" and "Schubert, His Story and His Music"—with the bits of music that one hardly has begun to hear when they are interrupted by false anecdotes, with the rushed narration and musical performance and generally hectic atmosphere, and with the atrocious female voice that is heard in the Schubert volume—I don't consider them suitable for anyone, old or young.

That is all I have space for, on this subject, until next Christmas.

Recently a young student wrote me some interesting things about the record lending library at Princeton University. It is quite large—over 7,000 records; and "undergraduate interest is terrific, the circulation for the month of October approaching 3,500 records." Not only that, but through the listening which the library has made it possible for the students to do they have developed their taste remarkably: "the most popular works around 1940 were things like the Rachmaninov Second Concerto and the Ravel Bolero, whereas the recent favorites have been things like Beethoven's Ninth, Schubert's 'Schöne Müllerin,' and Mozart's Piano Concerto K. 595." One would suppose that all this would impress the high officials of the University; but actually my correspondent mentioned it in the course of informing me sadly that the library "had to close last

The FUTURE of HOUSING

Author of "Revolution in Land"

The most comprehensive study of the entire housing problem currently available, covering an analysis of the housing problem in general, home ownership and home building, the operation of real estate and construction industries, and offering a program for public and private housing reform in the immediate future. "I found this—for the layman—the most interesting analysis of all the factors involved, social, economic, political, and humanitarian—of any book on the subject I have read . . . practical, challenging, and striking a sound middle of the road approach between planned housing and private enterprise."—Virginia Kirkus week because of lack of funds. It has been subsisting on the generosity of one alumnus since its foundation in 1938"; and "the University is apparently unwilling to support it in any way." This was confirmed shortly afterward by a Princeton alumnus who had attended a music symposium at the University, where he had learned that the sum which this great and rich institution refused to spend to keep the library going was—believe it or not—$600.

Drama

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MOSS HART'S "Christopher Blake" (Music Box Theater) concerns itself with the story of a twelve-year-old boy who is compelled to chose between a mother and a father in the process of getting a divorce. The eight scenes alternate between the courthouse itself and the inside of the boy's head, where elaborate phantasies act themselves out. Obviously, therefore, it suggests Mr. Hart's extravaganza, "Lady in the Dark," but it is actually a much more sinister phenomenon. Before the curtain had been up five minutes, I found myself puzzled by something at once familiar and strange, and before many more had passed I realized what it was. "Christopher Blake" is not really a play at all, but a class A motion picture—the very first I think ever produced on Broadway frankly for what it is.

The influence of the movies is, of course, an old story. Plays written and acted with an eye to Hollywood, as well as financed from there, are familiar enough. In the past, however, they have always pretended, at least, to be plays in the first instance and the assumption has always been that they would be "adapted" to the screen. But in "Christopher Blake" the Thing, as Mr. Shaw would say, Has Happened. Here is a movie transferred to the stage as directly as the movies once tried to transfer plays to celluloid. All the stigmata of the big-budget picture are there and the assembly of stigmata constitutes the whole.

That naturally implies many things—more, indeed, than could be analyzed in less than a volume—but it also implies one thing more important than all the others: a monstrous, deliberate disproportion between the means employed and the ends achieved. Since an A picture is technically distinguished from a B by nothing except cost, and since an anecdote which has been dramatized to the tune of $2,000,000 automatically becomes an epic, the effort is to find more and more elaborate ways of saying what could be said simply and of realizing in greater and greater physical detail what could be implied or suggested. Mr. Hart seems to have been the first to dare to undertake a play conceived in accordance with precisely these aesthetic principles, and the result is that little Christopher's dreams are Colossal in the real Hollywood way and are, indeed, dreams such as only a movie tycoon could afford to have. If, as in the first scene, for instance, young Christopher imagines that he is receiving national recognition for his infallible peace plan, then President Truman and Generals Eisenhower and MacArthur are actually there, represented by the most reasonable facsimiles which the biggest casting agency could dig up. But that is by no means all. The flashbulbs really flash, the movie cameras grind, and the mob is no trio of awkward supers but a real mob filling the stage like a subway car during the rush hour. And so it goes. This is such stuff as only Hollywood dreams are made on and anyone who doubts that the result is a genuine Special Epic Super-feature (marketed separately on a percentage basis) need only to look at the cost sheets to be convinced.

Even Shakespeare, as the Victorians discovered, can be smothered in scenery, but, like most A pictures, "Christopher Blake" is less than Shakespearian in fable, characterization, and language, and it can readily be shaken down to as neat a little collection of moral and dramatic clichés as was ever assembled by a harried script-writer for either the movies or the radio. By conscious intention, apparently, the court scenes are stripped as bare as the dream scenes are overstuffed, but the effect is only to create in the former the effect of Drama's other illegitimate sister, so that the whole is exactly what a man who had never seen a play on the stage (but was perfectly familiar with the soap opera as well as the cinema) would expect a theatrical performance to be like. In real life, Christopher's parents "discuss their problem" by alternating hysterical outbursts with moments of sweet reasonableness, and as the curtain goes down on one of their big scenes it is impossible not to hear in the mind's ear the announcer unctuously repeating the question, "Which will little Christopher choose?" before going into his spiel about pink pills or crispy cereals. In the past, Mr. Hart has known how to write shrewd, knowing satire. That he has not entirely lost his gift is proved by one of the very few brief moments during which something genuine suddenly puts in an unexpected appearance; during, that is to say, the brief scene given to a typist from the lawyer's office who is delighted to meet a character from the story she has been chronicling in legal documents. But, nine-tenths of the time, Mr. Hart prefers to be merely elaborate.

Richard Tyler does give the title role a rather remarkable bravura performance, in the course of which he hams as expertly as any old stager, but quite so juicy a part is probably a doubtful boon to a beginning actor and, if he were ten times as good as he actually is, "Christopher Blake" would still be something to depress anyone really concerned with the future of the theater. As an institution, the stage has managed to survive until now because it has had a certain faith in itself. Once it accepts not only Hollywood money but Hollywood ideals as well, it is lost. Once it resigns itself to the necessarily clumsy imitations of Hollywood techniques and Hollywood effects, there will be no reason left why anyone should see a play budgeted at $200,000 when he could see a movie which cost $3,000,000. Two boards and a passion may be a bit too little for the best kind of theatrical performance. The machinery of "Christopher Blake" is far too much.

"Years Past," Ruth Gordon's life with her father now current at the Mansfield, is a pleasant enough little comedy probably destined to considerable popularity in spite of the fact that it is not exactly original. All the "nostalgic" touches are by now pretty familiar and the parallels with another very successful play are a bit uncomfortable. Suffice it to say that Gordon père was a manly, irascible man with a heart of gold and that the action concerns itself with the successful efforts of his wife to maneuver him around to the acceptance of a proposal which horrified him when he first heard it. He was a good deal less prosperous than father Day, and no one wanted him to be baptized, but his daughter did want to go on the stage and after much ado she did set out for New York. Fredric March and Florence Eldridge give sturdy performances. Patricia Kirkland exhibits considerable charm as the daughter.

Letters to the Editors

Achievement vs. Ineptitude

Dear Sirs: Realizing the space limits of The Nation's book reviews, it is still my opinion that G. R. Walker's review (November 16) of C. E. Ayres's "The Divine Right of Capital" overlooks the original contribution Ayres has made: a theory of economic inquiry reflecting value in terms of the demands of technology and scientific method (cf. his chapter on "The End: Achievement").

In January, 1939, Ayres wrote that our civilization has become a contrast of "achievement and ineptitude." By "achievement," he meant the products of scientific method; his own theory of value demonstrates this process by having successfully combined the inquiries of Veblen and Dewey (who had previously carved their theories out of the rough of other evolutionary studies). Ayres admits this of himself and of all others who invent things, whether the res be ideational or technological. Both are elements of the same process of making objective judgments based on factual knowledge. All human progress, then, has been in terms of evaluating objects in a matter-of-fact sequence resulting in values which are "real, certain, permanent, and progressive . . . the real achievements of mankind."

The trouble, though, Ayres relates, is that human nature has two sides——the other (ineptitude) being discernible in resistance to change, the fanciful, visionary, and mystical side of life. Such values are relative, often nihilistic—the essence of habits, customs, and the deeply ingrained mores of the community—the values derived from revelation and authority, the antithesis of scientific inquiry. These relative values (thus far in history) eventually succumb to scientific values, but only after long and bitter struggles, wars, or revolutions. Nevertheless, all calculable human achievement is the product of the "cumulative skill of hand and eye and brain." We don't achieve more rapidly because of our general failure to comprehend technological progress in such terms. In economics, the idea of full production is the total sum of the reality of freedom, but its application is inhibited by mystical conceptuologies concerning pecuniary capital. In law, the ideal is justice, but mystical ideas as to private property, the state, the family, etc., often resist logical analysis.

The development of technical equipment is a democratizing process, and it cannot be stopped unless we kill all the inventors; that no one desires to do, and the obdurate facts must be faced. Man's supreme scientific effort must then be directed toward the organization of his institutions in light of this technological continuum. Ours is a mass-production economy which is falling apart at the seams because it is still organized in terms of a totally outmoded, nonscientific, "natural"-rights Eighteenth Century philosophy concocted prior to the Industrial Revolution. Thus, the only possible way to save any sort of "free enterprise" is in terms of a limited capitalism based upon Twentieth Century philosophy à la Dewey and Ayres. Ayres's solution involves shuffling only a few blocks at the top of the institutional pile (increased higher-bracket income taxes devoted to complete social security); if he is not heeded, the whole pile comes tumbling down on our heads as in the days of Jericho. It is fervently hoped that advocates of "absolute capitalism" learn from Ayres in time.

Christmas in Seville

Dear Sirs: Have you ever seen Seville in December? It is a friendly, charming and beautiful city. Yes, in spite of the suffering of the people under the Franco dictatorship. Yes, in spite of the tension that exists when soldiers and Civil Guards line the streets, watching, watching. . . . It was 1945. The orange trees which grace the streets, the parks and the gardens were full of fruit. The flowers in the gardens of the old Alcazar were still in bloom. In the Cathedral, the Seises danced, sang and played the castanets before the High Altar in honor of the Immaculate Conception, in one of the most beautiful and ancient of Catholic rituals. It was a sublime ceremony in a sublime cathedral. In the streets, gorgeous looking girls passed by, appearing not to hear the piropos (flatteries) some of the young men made. "Your eyes are darker than Franco's future," I heard a young man say in a soft voice to a beautiful señorita.

I visited the American Consulate. "See those two men leaving the consul's office?" one of the clerks told me. "They are guerrilleros. They've been fighting in the Sierra Morena mountains since the end of the Spanish Civil War. They represent 24,000 men who are up in the mountains still fighting against Franco. They were selected to come here and hand the consul the guerrillas' Christmas greetings to the American people." I wondered how many Americans would ever receive these greetings. No publicity would be given to the incident except somebody's short dispatch to the State Department in Washington.

I followed the two guerrilleros in their shabby clothes and old alpargatas. They had sad, proud eyes and the indomitable spirit that so many Spaniards have. I walked up the Parque Maria Luisa which leads to the outskirts of the city. I said, "I am an American and I love freedom. I was told about your mission. Thank you. May you all have a Felices Pascuas too! Millions of Americans wish you the same. They have not forgotten you." The older of the two said, "Y por que no hacen nada entonces? (Why don't they do something then?). For us there can be no Merry Christmas as long as Franco is in power." I wanted to give them some hope, but I could not. During eight months in the Iberian Peninsula I had seen how we worked hand in glove with the British in keeping Franco in power. "I wish you luck." That is all I could say. As the two guerrilleros walked in the direction of Sierra Morena, I thought how the world had let them down and yet how full of the spirit of good will to men they still were.

With their spirit, they would have to win, in time.

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · DECEMBER 28, 1946 NUMBER 26

The Shape of Things

WE APPROACH THE NEW YEAR WITH HOPE—a tenuous hope—in man's ability to devise means to prevent his self-destruction. In much less time than it took to perfect the atom bomb, an international commission of scientists and policy-makers has come close to agreement on a system of atomic-energy control. It is against this background that one must view what transpired in the Atomic Energy Commission late last week. Taking little account of the six-months' labor of the commission, Mr. Baruch, head of the U. S. delegation, called for a showdown on a resolution embodying the essentials of the American plan with a specific demand for abolition of the veto in matters of punishment for treaty violations. The effect of such a resolution would have been to bypass the detailed reports the commission has been preparing. It would have made the commission a tail to Mr. Baruch's kite and flagrantly disregarded the disarmament resolution adopted after much debate by the U. N. Assembly. The Canadian representative, General Andrew McNaughton, who has played a consistently constructive role on the commission, saved the day by an amendment which, while accepting "the principles on which the findings and recommendations proposed by the representatives of the United States are based," referred the whole matter back to the working committee of the commission for redrafting, with instructions to take into account the U. N. disarmament resolution. The important result of the crisis is that the commission has asserted its authority over an attempt at godlike intervention by one of its members. It now has a chance to bring the first stage of its work to a satisfactory conclusion. We do not expect that its report will in itself provide the ramparts the world needs against atomic doom. But at least we have reason to hope that it will have laid the foundation.

THE COMPARATIVE ACCORD WITH WHICH the Security Council has accepted the United States resolution on Greece is more than welcome, though there should be no pretense that the terms of reference are broad enough to enable the United Nations to reach a solution of the real problem of Greece. Accepting the situation in that country as it is now, without reference to original responsibilities, it is certain that the present government is unrepresentative, tyrannical, and incompetent to lead Greece toward a prosperous and democratic way of life. Whatever may be the truth in Mr. Tsaldaris's charges against his Balkan neighbors, there can be no doubt that social discontent in Greece is deep and justified. Partisan submission, unaccompanied by governmental reform and the acceptance of a vigorous liberal program, will settle nothing but a diplomatic issue. We feel, therefore, that the Russians were right in insisting that the commission be empowered to probe into strife-provoking conditions within Greece. If the commission is to make proposals for averting a continuance of the present troubles, then to define them as merely border violations is sure to lead to Soviet dissent and possibly a resort to the veto. In any case, the Security Council's present decision does not exempt London and Washington from their duty of making the strongest recommendations to Athens. The Greek partisan movement has announced its conditions for a cessation of civil war. Some of them may be inacceptable to a broad middle-of-the-way government. Yet the basis for settlement exists. Even without direct negotiations between Athens and the partisans, a prompt and thorough liberalization of the government would put an end to the tragic waste of life and resources which threatens Greece with ruin.

JUAN PERON, THE ARGENTINE DICTATOR, has scored a major triumph by negotiating a commercial pact with Chile that should do much to advance his political, military, and industrial ambitions. The agreement goes far beyond the usual commercial treaty; so far, writes Frank Kluckhorn in New York Times, "that few here doubt it implies the closest political ties as well." President Gonzalez Videla of Chile, it is true, has declared that the pact is devoid of political significance but the terms tell their own story. Henceforth, the two countries will comprise a virtual customs union; they will use each others' ports freely, give mutual preferences to each others' aviation, shipping, and marine insurance. Chile is to receive a $150 million credit from Argentina to be used for the purchase of food, for public works such as the reconstruction of the trans-Andean railroad, and for the development of raw material and other resources required by Argentina to carry out its five-year industrial plan. Argentina, in turn, will enjoy priority in purchasing Chilean products and a preferred place in the Chilean market for its manufactures. All "concessions and advantages reciprocally granted remain excluded from the effects of most-favored-nation treaties" —even those with neighboring states. Such provisions are a direct blow at the ideal of non-discriminatory trade which the United States has been busily promoting and a strong protest from the State Department seems to be indicated. Nevertheless, we must recognize our own responsibility in driving Chile into Perón's arms. Our capitalists have alternately exploited and neglected that country, drawing fortunes from its natural wealth but doing little to establish a stable and progressive economy. A land without capital, it has turned to Argentina for aid in developing industry because it could obtain no adequate help from us.

PERON'S SUCCESS WITH THE CHILEANS IS ONE more indication that Ambassador Messersmith has been getting nowhere at all with his policy of honeyed indulgence. The pattern of Argentine statism becomes plainer by the week: a drastic military expansion, with compulsory training for all Argentines between twelve and fifty, a five-year plan of industrialization that is clearly geared to the needs of war, a program of aggressive economic expansion abroad and one-man rule at home. Messersmith has been called to Washington for discussions, and while the State Department is coy about details, it no longer pretends that the Ambassador is returning "for his health"—unless that term includes political well-being. Secretary Byrnes now indicates that the talks will center around a departmental matter. In view of the sharp note which he is known to have sent Messersmith only a month ago, it is not far-fetched to assume that this refers to the matter of the department's having one policy on Argentina and the Ambassador another. Senator Brewster of Maine, returning from a tour of South America, asks that this "schizophrenic" policy be clarified. It should be, of course, but the tenor of the Senator's remarks suggests the kind of "clarification" that goes with umbrellas.

A YEAR AGO, WE PRAISED MR. TRUMAN'S directive on China as bold and constructive. It is impossible to be similarly enthusiastic about the 1946 version of that statement, issued last week. While it shows that Washington has not weakened in its desire to promote a democratic solution in China, nothing in it is calculated to hasten such a solution. Some dramatic gesture was needed to break the logjam at Nanking, but the President's statement offers little except a long-winded defense of American policy. Only one new fact is disclosed: the Chinese government has not been permitted to avail itself of the $500,000,000 credit granted some months ago—presumably because of its failure to set up a unified government. The beneficial effect of withholding financial support is offset, however, by the admission that other kinds of assistance, amounting to some $1,466,000,000, have been given since V-J Day. The President fails to recognize the stubborn fact that our policy of friendly mediation, however soundly conceived, has failed. While some satisfaction may be derived from Chiang Kai-shek's dramatic intervention at the National Assembly to prevent the right wing from reinstating the totalitarian 1936 draft of the constitution, the chance of ending civil strife through one-power mediation is slight. Because of the scale of American assistance to the Kuomintang, General Marshall has forfeited the confidence of the Communists and the Democratic League and convinced right-wing Kuomintang leaders that distrust of Russia will force the United States to support Nanking at all hazards. A modest reason for hope is provided in a suggestion which has just been advanced by Senators Murray and Flanders with the backing of a number of Far Eastern experts. They propose mediation in the Chinese struggle by the United States, Great Britain, and the Soviet Union. While Nanking is understandably cool to the idea, the present moment would seem to be especially propitious for pressing it.

EXCEPT FOR NEWSPAPERMEN, THERE IS NO class of wage-earner so wretched that its strikes go unnoticed in the press. Striking coal-miners, teachers, gravediggers, and pearl-divers all have their day in the papers, even if it isn't a good day; but let the men who make the papers walk out and a blanket of silence envelops them that would send a press agent to an early grave. A case in point is the strike of Newspaper Guildsmen against J. David Stern, publisher of the Philadelphia Record and the Camden Courier-Post. Soon after the strike was called, the publisher stated his case not only in his own papers, put out by a skeleton staff of executives, but through paid advertisements in the Philadelphia Inquirer and the Evening Bulletin. Both these journals have refused to accept advertisements setting forth the Guild's reply. The strike has been marked by violence and police brutality that are normally page-one copy for any paper, and in the Stern papers fuel for trenchant and crusading editorials as well. But in the case of the Guild strike such incidents have been ignored by the Philadelphia press or given a stick on page six. Local radio stations, controlled by the papers, have flatly refused to match the time given to management with free time to the strikers. Aside from the merits of the Guild's demands—and they are moderate enough—Mr. Stern's conduct in the strike comes as a shock to those who have long thought of him as a friend of labor and a champion of civil liberties. He has repeatedly rejected compromises and refuses to hear of any wage increase greater than 12 per cent—in contrast to the 20 per cent raise given by the non-Guild Chicago Tribune, among others. And the man who has so often damned the ruthlessness of the "barons of industry" has had no word to say about the slugging of his own employees by Philadelphia police.

EUGENE TALMADGE WAS PROBABLY A GOOD husband, a kind father, and a lover of animals. But politically he was sheer poison, and it would be hypocritical for us to pretend to feel anything but relief at the intervention of death to prevent his taking office as Governor of Georgia for the fourth time. The platform on which he stood was the reestablishment of "white supremacy" in the state by legislation designed to circumvent the Supreme Court's ruling that Negroes could not be barred from the primaries. In addition, he had promised to drop the prosecution of the Klan, which Governor Arnall has been vigorously pressing, and no doubt he would have made Georgia safe for its newest purveyors of intolerance—the Columbians. Talmadge is reported to have expressed a dying wish that his successor would keep his campaign promises. His followers are apparently backing his son Herman, the recipient of a large write-in vote at last month's general election, for selection by the General Assembly. The fact that the son sought such a vote in nominal competition with his father suggests that an attempt was being made to provide for the contingency which has now arisen. However, the constitutional position is extremely obscure, with every Georgian faction pressing its own interpretation. Fred Hand, speaker-designate of the General Assembly, says that a new election must be held as soon as possible, and that would certainly seem to be the most democratic method of settling the issue. It would at least give the people of Georgia a chance to retrieve the backward step which they took last summer.

REPUBLICANS WHO WOULD BE PRESIDENT are forgetting that it may be as fatal for a candidate to grab for the nomination prematurely as it is for a starving man to rush food down his gullet. With the G. O. P. convention eighteen months away, we already have one avowed hopeful, three who do not choose to run but can't be pried out of their track suits, and any number of others who betray no sign of eagerness except that their tongues are hanging out. Harold Stassen, with a Willkie-like scorn for tradition, has honestly declared himself a candidate and opened a campaign office. What is more, he has told labor not to ask for more money now, advised management not to press for restrictive labor legislation, and urged consumers to refuse to buy at inflated prices. Without minimizing the refreshing quality of this performance, it is fair to point out that Stassen has nothing to lose by boldness. Poison to the party leaders, his only chance is to make a daring appeal to the rank and file. Dewey, Taft, and Vandenberg are now on record with coy disavowals of an ambition that all three are plainly straining to realize. Taft forces, strong in the National Committee, have eased a pro-Dewey official out of her job as director of the women's division. John W. Bricker, whom Taft nominated for the Senate in the hope that he would sooner or later display his ineptitude, is already living up to expectations. Still to be sworn in, he has Washington buzzing with reports of his gauche performance at the Gridiron Dinner. Vandenberg has abandoned his post as adviser to Secretary Byrnes, a position that was compromising him with the McCormick faction of the party, and is consolidating his power in the Senate for a last fling at the nomination. Dewey, counted on for New York's forty-seven electoral votes, has been lining up the G. O. P. Congressmen of that state to support Charles Halleck, a Dewey man, as majority leader of the House, in order to offset Taft's advantage as majority leader of the Senate. And in California sits Governor Warren, happily convinced that all this throat-cutting can only leave more oats for a quiet dark horse.

Is There a Middle Way?

WHETHER the members of the President's Council of Economic Advisers have the drive and intellectual capacity to perform successfully the formidable tasks assigned to them, is a still unanswered question. Their first report shows they are at least excellent diplomats. It is full of seasonal cheer and good humor and includes a little something for everybody.

To the nation at large the report offers fair hope for some years of prosperity, subject to a possible minor recession in 1947. The Wall Street Journal school of thought gets a present of a caricature of Keynsian economics in which exclusive reliance on government fiscal measures to prevent unemployment is condemned as akin to the Roman formula of "bread and circuses." To balance the account, however, planners are comforted by an able analysis of the "Spartan" folly of believing that cyclical depressions are not only inevitable but morally valuable. And "management and labor, farmers, and financiers" are collectively wooed with the flattery of an appeal to "their practical wisdom."

A large part of the report is devoted to a defense of the Employment Act of 1946, to which the council owes its being, and to a discussion of the political and economic philosophies that measure embodies. The claim is made that the act reflects the general American inclination toward a middle way which avoids exclusive reliance in economic affairs on either private enterprise or government. Rejecting the view that the measure which finally emerged from Congress was a much-diluted version of the original, the report asserts that "it is in fact a broad enabling act of great flexibility as well as vigor." True, it does not "legislate any specific remedy into use," but it does clearly establish the "responsibility of the federal government to use all practical means consistent with its needs and obligations and other essential considerations of national policy . . . to coordinate and utilize all its plans, functions, and resources for the stated purposes of the act—maximum production, employment, and purchasing power."

We agree with the council that the act, for all its weaknesses and omissions, is sufficiently broad and flexible to cover whatever actions are necessary to implement its goals. We are sure that if a new mass-unemployment crisis arises, public opinion will regard it as authorizing government intervention in the national economy on a scale that will dwarf the New Deal experiments of the thirties. But, as we see it, the value of the act must be judged not by the emergency use which may be made of it, but by the extent to which it helps to prevent emergencies from occurring. On this point the first report of the economic advisers is unhelpfully vague. They tell us that in the years immediately ahead the stimuli to production should be sufficiently powerful to obviate the need for "heroic measures"; they suggest that this period can be employed for planning a "gradual shift in expenditure and resource use" so that "more of those semi-luxuries, those welfare and culture goods," can be placed within reach of all. This sounds fine, but we would life to see the program spelled out more specifically in terms of education, housing, health, and so forth.

It must be recognized that the political climate just now is unfavorable to long-term planning of this kind. A spokesman for the National Association of Manufacturers may hail the council's report as "an excellent document," but his pleasure is due to the fact that it appears to place no obstacles in the way of the "Operation Capitalism" on which Robert Lynd reports on page 748. The N. A. M., knowing full well that the current comeback of private enterprise will prove but fleeting unless a high level of employment can be sustained, is offering "practical leadership" for "the resumption of economic progress." In short, it is proposing to relieve the President and Congress of the responsibilities placed on them by the Employment Act. The present mood of both suggest that they will be only too happy to surrender their burdens.

It is probable, therefore, that despite the obvious good intentions of the Council of Economic Advisers it will not be permitted to work seriously on preventive measures; it will be called in for serious consultation only when "the sickness of an acquisitive society" forces itself very disagreeably on public attention. That is why we find ourselves sharing Mr. Lynd's doubts about the practicality of a middle way or, as he puts it, of "a liberal compromise between modern monopoly capitalism and socialism."

Moscow and Iran

THE sudden collapse of the Azerbaijan Autonomous Republic, set up last year with Russian backing, has apparently confirmed those who have always maintained that the Tabriz regime lacked popular support. Others have seen in Moscow's seeming indifference a proof of weakness in the Soviet Union itself, and in some quarters there has been a too ready assumption that the Red Army is the only real mainstay of governments friendly to Russia. The Turkish leaders have regarded the downfall as a signal that they may now safely counter Russian pressure and have promptly suppressed opposition newspapers—Communist and liberal alike—and a number of trade unions.

Undoubtedly, events have proved that the Democratic Party of Azerbaijan was politically weak. Azerbaijan, which took a prominent part in the establishment of constitutional government in Persia in 1906, has long nourished the desire for autonomy. In a region where land rents often amount to two-thirds of the annual crops a demand for agrarian reform has also been strong. All this undoubtedly provided a basis for political action against the government at Teheran, dominated as it is by reactionary parties and individuals. Similarities of language and culture with the neighboring regions of Russia might have been expected to do something to offset the natural dislike of foreign intervention. And Russian strong-arm methods seem not to have been resented at first, for reports from Tabriz agree that in the early months of its existence the autonomous regime was welcomed by a great majority of the peasantry.

The same sources attribute its loss of popularity since then to abuses committed by the Democrats. The regime began "to take too much for itself." The peasants, willing enough to expropriate the landlords, apparently resented contributions to the government, as peasants have often done in other places. Again, in the backward mountain valleys where the warrior spirit is strong and whence support might have been drawn, the regime was compelled to rely on persons little adapted to organized political life. There may have been rural resentment of the urban Tudeh, virtually a Communist party, which enjoyed special privileges in Tabriz and other towns. As a total result, the hard-core troops on which the regime could depend were few in number, and the loosely organized militia had no will to resist the heavily armored columns of Teheran.

The regime has vanished, and the diplomatic picture in the Near East is somewhat clearer than it was. But the political result may be less desirable. Conservative gains in the general elections last Sunday, indicated by returns which are still incomplete, will mean a definite setback in Persia's political development. But the country has so long needed drastic reform that neither repression nor constitutional reaction can silence popular demands for change or guarantee a stable government in Teheran.

It remains to account for Russia's hands-off attitude toward its late protégé. Is this a sign of recently developed weakness? We do not doubt that opposition within the U. N., a decision to concentrate upon the central problems of Europe, and even the obvious economic difficulties in the Soviet Union may have been contributing factors. Yet, even assuming that Azerbaijan's resistance might have been stiffened by Russian pressure, the events of the past week have only pointed up the logic of a situation that has not changed. If Russia's primary intention was to serve its economic and strategic aims by seating Azerbaijan deputies in the Teheran parliament, then outright secession was never its aim. On the contrary, Russian interests require an early validation by the Teheran parliament of the oil deals in northern Iran. Qavam's refusal to call the necessary elections as long as Azerbaijan was cut off from the rest of Persia had already made an alternative Russian policy inevitable. The question now is, what course will the Soviet government follow in the future?

Before the First World War, British and Russian relations were regulated by a two-power agreement dividing Iran into exclusive "spheres of influence." It is known that Mr. Bevin proposed to Mr. Stalin that the old arrangement be revived in an amended form. Russia was invited to join with Britain and Iran in developing the Persian oil fields. The suggestion was turned down. If Mr. Stalin now reverts to this proposal he may find London in a different mood, for British influence is now much stronger in Teheran. Nevertheless, if renewed conversations on Iran do take place, the Russian government will have arguments to which Mr. Bevin might be wise to listen. Within the Soviet Union there is considerable support for a policy of reconciliation with Britain; the world situation, as well as the prospects for socialism in Europe and Labor control in England, will certainly profit by a rapprochement between Britain and the Soviet Union. Moscow's bargaining power is still great.

IN THE RUSSIAN ZONE

Nation correspondent Joel Carmichael, just back in Paris from the Russian zone of Germany, has written an exciting series of articles, the first of which will appear next week.

Mission to Madrid

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

OVER the past weekend, the British government, complying with the decision of the General Assembly, recalled its Ambassador from Madrid. In the present situation, with the Franco regime overwhelmed by internal difficulties, the news of Britain's prompt action surely created a profound impression in Spain. And in other countries many people may have jumped to the conclusion that the restoration of Spanish democracy was now well on the way. But unfortunately, during the same week, a contrary indication was given in an Associated Press dispatch from London, quoting a "government source" as saying that "members of the British diplomatic mission to Spain had been examining the possibility of whether a coalition government could be established . . . to replace the Franco regime and carry on until elections could be held." And lest there be any illusion that this meant a democratic coalition, the British spokesman said that the so-called interim government would be composed of representatives of Spanish groups ranging from "the right-wing centrists to the left-wing centrists." Americans may be somewhat confused by these terms, but Spaniards know that "right-wing centrists" mean monarchists and generals, while "left-wing centrists" are a handful of deserters from the Republic.

Britain's conspiracy began to take shape many months ago, as my article in the July 6 issue of The Nation revealed. The idea behind it was simply this: in the event British-American support of Franco finally proved inadequate to maintain him in power, the Caudillo was to be replaced by a military-clerical regime, leavened by a few nominal Republicans, which would hold "free elections." This was also the essence of the American, Colombian, and Cuban proposals which were voted down by the United Nations. A careful reading of those resolutions shows that the original Anglo-American strategy at the United Nations was to prevent a showdown with Franco; when that failed, the Big Two withdrew to their second line of attack—the British maneuver in Madrid.

A Spanish "Munich" was defeated in the Assembly when the nations voted not only to call back their heads of missions but to instruct the Security Council to continue to exercise vigilance over Spanish developments. The British and Americans supported the resolution à contre-coeur, the former because of the revolt against Bevin's Spanish policy inside the Labor Party, the latter because they too were faced with a revolt by many of the Latin American countries which were aligned against the Franco regime. But one of the characteristics of Anglo-American "democratic" foreign policy seems to be contempt for the decisions of the United Nations. At one point in the debate on Spain, Senator Connally warned the subcommittee considering the question that the United States would "not be bound by any resolution passed by the General Assembly." Later, under pressure, he modified this astonishing statement. The British were more cautious, but they wasted no time in putting in motion their second-string strategy. For it is a race against time. Popular pressure in England is increasing: the other day a delegation of the Trades Union Congress waited upon Mr. Bevin, just home from the Assembly meeting, to demand again a complete break with Franco. Inside Spain the U. N. resolution has created an explosive situation: on the one hand, it has driven Franco to abandon his democratic pretenses and emerge in full fascist regalia; on the other, it has given a tremendous push to the Spanish resistance movement. London cannot afford to wait. Before very long, the Security Council will be called upon to reexamine the entire issue; it must be confronted with a fait accompli in Spain.

The British plan depends upon the collaboration of Spanish capitulards. By an odd coincidence, at the very moment the A. P. dispatch came over the wires, Indalecio Prieto, the right-wing-Socialist leader and author of the "plebiscite" scheme frequently discussed in these pages, delivered a speech in Mexico calling for the withdrawal of his two ministers from the Giral Cabinet, characterizing the government in exile as a "corpse," and declaring that, despite the Republican tradition of Spanish socialism, the kind of political or economic regime set up in Spain was of secondary importance. Though it contained a few demagogic attacks on British and American policy toward Spain, his speech was a clear summons not for reorganization but for outright dissolution of the Republican government in exile.

But all these clever manipulations have overlooked one key factor—the Spanish people. Prieto's statement has caused a storm of resentment in Mexico among even his own followers. Several resolutions have been passed by different groups condemning his stand; one correctly points out that the proposal to dissolve the government in exile is an insult to Mexico, which engaged its diplomatic prestige in the establishment of that regime on Mexican soil, and to the countries that have recognized Giral. The reaction of Spanish refugees in France is equally bitter, and there is no doubt that Prieto's influence among Republicans in Spain, which has been considerable, is fast evaporating.

Until now, the Anglo-American policy of supporting reaction has failed everywhere in Europe. It will meet defeat in Spain as well—defeat that will be paid for in blood. And when the new civil war, for which Western diplomacy has opened the way, breaks over Spain in all its fury, British gentlemen inside and outside the Labor Party and American humanitarians like Senator Connally will no doubt once more express their "profound regrets."

An Old Southern Custom

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, December 20

THE grimy and somewhat incoherent story of Mississippi politics drawled into microphones propped up on a desk in the Senate caucus room is a clear warning of how easily democracy can degenerate into a sordid racket. These hearings before the Senate War Investigating Committee were described by one awed Congressional secretary as "a postgraduate course in how to make politics pay." I counted ten different ways in which the shrunken little Mississippi Senator is alleged to have collected funds or other things of value without, apparently, running afoul of federal law. Violations of Mississippi law were shrugged off by witnesses as of no importance.

The various donors, according to statements made to the committee, were war contractors, who put up the "heavy sugar," patronage appointees, business men who had been assisted in priorities, and even an elderly drug addict. Bilbo's former secretary, Ed Terry, testified that the Senator had him draw up a list of 100 names from whom they might solicit funds. The trail of that mysterious quality, "influence," wandered over Washington, through the War Department, Justice Department, Bureau of Narcotics, and War Production Board. According to Terry, Senator Bilbo tried to get the Department of Justice to call off its prosecution of Abe Shushan, Huey Long lieutenant, and appealed to the Commissioner of Narcotics to give a Natchez dope fiend a permit for two grains of morphine a day. The Shushan deal had a highly legal flavor. Abe "lent" Bilbo $3,000, and the Senator gave him his note for it. When Bilbo was unsuccessful in his efforts with the Justice Department, Shushan is alleged to have threatened to "sell" the note to Bilbo's political opponents. In the narcotics case Terry accused Bilbo of accepting $1,500 to arrange for the addict to get his morphine.

The Bilbo operations were conducted vaguely, and without incriminating records, by a few cronies. It was not until one of them, Ed Terry, had a falling out with the gang that the facts came into the open.

Senator Bilbo's role in the combine was that of vote-getter. Bilbo has stayed in office, election after election, despite frequent charges of corruption, through his rabble-rousing talents and the indifference of the so-called "respectable" element in his state. The legal brains of the outfit was Forrest Jackson, the sharp and personable Bilbo protégé. Ed Terry and Bob Gandy were the confidential operatives. They solicited, collected, and paid money and made backroom arrangements. One reporter at the hearing described Terry's day of testimony as "Terry and the pirates." The promoter and organizer was A. B. Friend, the husky and bluff war contractor and Bilbo campaign manager. Architects interested in the proposed Washington municipal stadium went to Friend for a cooperative deal. Bilbo was chairman of the Senate District of Columbia Committee.

This small group composed the informal committee which was set up in 1942 allegedly to support the candidacy of Wall Doxey for reelection to the United States Senate. The committee was so informal that it kept no records and had no bank account or treasurer. Bilbo kept thousands of dollars given him by war contractors, supposedly for the Doxey campaign, under his pillow. The largest donor was the war contractor "Big Boy" Newton, who tossed in $25,000. (Doxey testified that he knew nothing about this alleged contribution to his campaign.) Bilbo, Jackson, and Gandy have all been vague about how this money was distributed—when, where, and how much. The informal committee offered a way for Senator Bilbo to receive thousands of dollars which cannot now be pinned down as illegal payments by a war contractor to a politician in return for his "influence."

Another of the Senator's schemes for raising money was to solicit contributions for the Juniper Creek Baptist Church, which is located on his property. He was the custodian of the church funds and the church's actual owner. He also solicited funds for the parsonage, a house with five bathrooms and eight bedrooms. The current pastor, "Brother" Smith, has built his own home near the church, thus raising the question whether he ever hoped to live in the gorgeous parsonage.

Another Bilbo project was setting up a fund to pay his alimony. It was for this purpose that the Shushan "loan" was arranged. The Senator's former private secretary testified she was fired when her father refused to share in this "charity."

One war contractor, Mike Morrissey, had his own little way of expressing his appreciation for services rendered him by Bilbo. Morrissey took over the operation of the Senator's farms for four years at a loss of $48,000. He gave his friend a Cadillac for a Christmas present and constructed a lake for him. Other easy-spending benefactors gave Bilbo furniture for his "dream house no. 2." The boys also chipped in to defray extra expenses in Bilbo's Washington office. They often lent him money with no intention of trying to collect it.

A politician setting about deliberately to shake down persons for whom he might do favors could get many pointers from these hearings on Capitol Hill. In each case presented to the Senate committee some element is missing to prove conclusively that Bilbo or his associates wrung money out of war contractors or others. The Internal Revenue Department has been trying for almost a year to build up a case against the Bilbo gang on income-tax evasion. But, at least in the hearing, it has been extremely difficult to figure out how much money was received, how it was spent, and for what purpose. It is also difficult to determine which of the different sets of witnesses is lying and which is telling the truth.

The most damning testimony against Bilbo the man was given by the Senator himself. It was no proof of corruption or crookedness, but it showed a strange indifference to moral issues. Senator Ferguson was questioning Bilbo about money Terry collected from a Louisiana gambler. He said, "You knew he [Terry] had the money, and where he got it—from a gambler." Bilbo answered, "Well, he got the money. I didn't care who it was he got it from." At another point Ferguson compared the $25,000 Bilbo obtained from Newton with a small sum collected by Terry. Bilbo commented proudly, "Ah'm a good collector. Ah'm a better collector than Terry." About the gift of the Cadillac, the Mississippi Senator instructed Ferguson condescendingly: "It's just an old Southern custom. Let him that is without sin cast the first stone." Of the charge that he worked energetically to obtain lucrative contracts of the cost-plus, fixed-fee variety for members of his gang, Bilbo said virtuously, "I have done no more than has been done by practically all my colleagues in the Senate." In his written statement he said blandly of a contractor, "Bernie Friend is a great organizer, an excellent engineer, and a high-toned Christian gentleman. I ought to know his ability because he has successfully managed two of my campaigns for United States Senator."

The rest of his defense, which both Ferguson and Mead said had no bearing on the hearing, was that Negroes and Communists were trying to persecute him. He also claimed that payments to him were "loans" which he will repay.

Every day Senators not on the committee have been sitting back in the corners of the large chamber. Some are frankly awed by this testament. One freshman from a state long noted for its clean politics murmured, "This certainly is educational."

The final showdown will take place on the Senate floor in three weeks. There are many signs that both Republicans and Democrats, including some from the South, will vote to unseat the gentleman from Mississippi.

Capitalism's Happy New Year

BY ROBERT S. LYND

CRITICS of capitalism have long maintained that its acquisitive anarchy has proved too inefficient and too socially reckless to serve as a stable base on which to build a democratic nation's welfare. They claim, moreover, that these elements of instability are becoming rapidly more destructive with the growth of giant technology and the resulting need for coordination of the entire economic system.

But a reigning system of power sits heavily upon men's imaginations and creates its own defenses against the assaults of fact. Critics of capitalism therefore have been faced with the difficulty: Granted that there is "a deal of ruin" in a deeply rooted system like capitalism, how much evidence of its failure is necessary to refute its pretensions to permanence and superiority? And in this undefined situation how can those who dominate the system be compelled to assume unequivocal responsibility for delivering or failing to deliver specified results? That is, how can they be made to accept the conditions of a crucial test?

Such a test has now been publicly and collectively accepted by the American business system. When organized big business, led by its top strategy board, the National Association of Manufacturers, killed the OPA, it inaugurated Operation Capitalism. Acting and speaking through the N. A. M., big business shouldered aside the efforts of democratic government to control the economy and announced that it would itself do whatever was necessary for the public good and do it better than could any other system—particularly any kind of government planning or control. The November elections confirmed the power of big business to do the job in its own way, free from government interference.

The N. A. M.'s fifty-first annual Congress of Amer-

ROBERT S. LYND, professor of sociology at Columbia University, is coauthor, with his wife, of "Middletown —A Study in Contemporary American Culture" and "Middletown in Transition."

ican Industry held in New York earlier this month was a prolonged roar of triumph. The congress told the world that American organized business "knows what it wants to do, where it is going, and how to get there," and that its broad, closely articulated program is "designed to carry heavy loads in the days to come." Having learned that a policy of "mere opposition" is inadequate to prevent the New Deal type of legislation, business says that it is now going to "stick its neck out" and provide the necessary "practical leadership." Brandishing the big stick of its power, it herds all of us into the fold. Even labor, it says, "is hungry for truth, hungry for leadership—so hungry it will follow anybody who comes along, in the absence of the honest leadership industry should provide."

The program business offers holds "the individual free-enterprise system" and "the welfare of the nation" to be indivisible. It proposes the restoration of a "voluntary economy" and, thereby, "the resumption of economic progress in America." We are promised "A Better Tomorrow for Everybody." For the N. A. M. pledges that "the great majority of American manufacturers are determined to produce as much as they can, as fast as they can, to sell at the lowest possible prices, and [as the result] America will enter the period of prosperity that everyone has been hoping for."

These are broad promises to a desperately insecure nation at a time when, as Anne O'Hare McCormick has said, "the tensions in this country are greater than they were in the depths of the depression of the last decade." They are intended to persuade the public to trust private business rather than a democratic government to take whatever measures may be necessary to secure our economic future. Any plan to insure a decent economic future for all Americans necessarily engages to bring about an immediate end of inflation; avoidance of a postwar depression; full employment, a stabilized high-level national income, and inclusive social security; more democracy not less; peace—not a balance-of-power, spheres-of-influence truce, but peace.

Why has business let itself be collectively committed to this thumping test? Large promises have often been made in the past by individual capitalists. Today it is the "party line" of the whole dominant front of American industry to which we are listening. The reason business has let itself in for Operation Capitalism is that the power struggle has reached the stage of in-fighting in which options are curtailed and the effort must be all-out. Business's hand is being forced by damage both to its prestige and to its ideological defenses. The depression of 1929 hurt capitalism as nothing ever had before in this country, hurt it in a way that is crucial in a democracy, by undermining public esteem for its capacity and for the reliability of its promises. The helplessness of business at that time and the enforced extensive participation of government in making our economy work built up a lively popular awareness that the government can do things about people's needs that business can't do.

The outer ring of business's ideological defenses has been breached by the emergence in full, successful operation elsewhere in the world of national planning, and particularly of socialist planning on a continental basis. This makes it impossible for business men any longer to scorn all criticism on the ground that there exists no competitor to capitalism outside the heads of utopian reformers. The inner citadel, too, is threatened by the logic of modern technology and managerial skills, which points away from the small separate operating unit characteristic of the private-enterprise system; in an economy dominated by diversified corporate giants like du Pont, the distinction between "private" and "public" diminishes. To the extent that big private business must look to government for secured profits, subsidies, and relief for its unemployed, its position is further weakened.

Pressures like these have forced big business into a continuous offensive. The results are seen in the growth of the N. A. M.-type of organization and policy-making since 1933 and the recent collective assumption of responsibility for Operation Capitalism.

Where does the intellectual "left" stand as regards all this? It has good grounds for suspecting that business cannot make good on its promises. What is called for is a broad, coherent policy dominated by the public interest as democratically defined, and this is precisely what capitalism has not been able to achieve; it did not even achieve it in a national emergency program like the NRA. The trouble is not that business men as a class are "wicked," "greedy," or "irresponsible," but that the dynamic system in which their lives are enmeshed and which determines their actions is not set up to serve collective democratic ends. It "works" only when men act as if they were greedy and socially irresponsible, engaged in a Hobbesian warfare of each against all.

The task business has taken upon itself is being pictured as a holy crusade. The "private-enterprise system" is identified in this campaign with democracy and all other convenient values. It is because the intellectual left does not confuse capitalism with democracy or planning with dictatorship that it must not allow itself to be drawn into this crusade. Nor must it simply sit it out, ticking off the score of capitalism's failure. The left has a two-fold task: (1) to identify and publicize the obligations American capitalism has undertaken and the tactics to which it will resort as it fails to achieve the promised stability; (2) to chart an alternative course, for lack of which the failure of business's plans may land us in fascism by default.

Because American capitalism has powerful ideological and material tools with which to manipulate the American people if its business-as-usual strategy should fail, it is likely to adopt the following tactics:

1. Deny that it ever committed itself to certain objectives recently announced. From this it will be easy to slip over into implying that these objectives are unobtainable anyway, and that capitalism will bring us closer to them than we could get in any other way. A prime example of this tactic was business's precipitate abandonment of the concept of "full employment" on discovering that it depended on greater concessions than business was prepared to make. First the Committee for Economic Development turned thumbs down on "full employment" and set up a vaguer target, and then business saw to it that the United States led the successful fight in the United Nations to eliminate this dangerous goal as a commitment on the signatory nations.

2. Shift the responsibility for failure to others. This device is already in use in the drive to blame organized labor and the Soviet Union, respectively, for our domestic and international muddling in these first post-war years. Responsibility for the failure of veterans' housing is being shifted from the housing industry to the Democratic Administration; inflation is attributed to labor's wage demands; and we shall shortly hear that the drive for expanded world trade failed because the Soviet Union and countries in its sphere of influence refused to join the international trade agencies.

3. Cut beneath the whole level of concrete failures and redefine the issues. Instead of the pursuit of specific objectives—such as low prices, no depression, full employment, and peace—emphasis will be placed on the "vastly more fundamental" struggle for democracy against some inclusive bogy variously called collectivism, totalitarianism, or communism. The groundwork has already been laid for this by the current propaganda identifying the free-enterprise system with democracy, national planning with dictatorship, and so on.

4. Suspend specific democratic procedures because of the need to "restore law and order" and "save the American way of life." Such action has already been noted at the local grass-roots level in the methods of the Associated Farmers, the Mohawk Valley Formula, and similar drives to enlist local sympathies in support of anti-democratic power tactics. The logical next step is to mount such programs on a national scale.

5. Move into that amalgamation of big business and the state which we call fascism. This will be the pay-off on the present business clamor for the cessation of all government interference and the restoration of our freedoms. Nobody knows better than business the "freedoms" obtainable through government controls—of the right sort. One of the things to watch is the use of emergency powers on a national scale. An example of this is the increasingly anomalous prolongation of the Selective Service Act and the Smith-Connally Act, as convenient weapons for the control of labor. And it is but a step from these war powers to equally convenient peace-time powers, if an economic emergency is declared to exist. We shall probably see an intensification of present hindrances to the organization of third parties. In short, in fascism big economic power gains unchallenged authority to use public powers to achieve its own private version of what the nation needs. This is where the N. A. M.'s knowledge of "what it wants to do, where it is going, and how to get there" comes in.

6. Launch, if necessary, another world war to obliterate capitalism's failures. At present big business does not want another war and will settle for controls over labor and over any future New Deal tendencies. War hurts capitalism as a system by introducing government participation in financing, production, and marketing, by speeding up the monopoly tendency, and by encouraging big capital to diversify into the established commodity lines of smaller enterprisers. But war does not affect all sections of capitalist society equally; and as Brailsford pointed out a generation ago and as the balance sheet of this last war reveals, war can be vastly profitable to those powerful enough to be on the inside in the running of it.

To identify these tactics as they occur and to point out their common origin is the responsibility of the left. Also, now that business has accepted, on the barrel, the obligation to provide permanent and stable prosperity, the left must keep the score. And when the score shows—as it almost certainly will—failures heaping up into disaster, the left must be ready with an alternative program. If, as I expect, a liberal compromise between modern monopoly capitalism and socialism is found to be no longer possible, the program must point the way to American socialism.

The American intellectual left is ill organized for such a staggering responsibility. The grip of business and of conservative research foundations all but strangles independent critical thought in the social sciences in the United States. The British Labor Party has evolved from fifty years of organization, public discussion, and research on the left. In this country we have no such continuous tradition of Socialist dissent and inquiry as a basis for left programs. Brookings Institutions and Rockefeller Foundations do not do Fabian Society thinking. Our intellectuals generally are afraid to be thought "radical." Even labor in our as yet timid trade-union research departments is immersed almost entirely in immediate "service research." But no one in touch with American university graduate students can be unaware of the restless demand in this younger generation of social scientists for a chance to think without a bit in their teeth. It is labor and this younger intellectual group that must build a democratic program for America.

Winter Season in Moscow

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Moscow, December 19

WINTER has set in—with a severe frost but so far with little snow. If the snow continues light, winter crops may suffer. Christmas trees, or rather New Year's trees, have begun to arrive in the markets, also large boxes of tangerines from the south for the school children's New Year parties.

With the General Assembly and the Foreign Ministers' Conference ended, the average Russian feels that the international atmosphere is a good deal better than it was six or even three months ago. He is convinced that even if there are a few more very sticky patches ahead, especially during the discussion of the German problem, some compromise will be reached. In two years, perhaps sooner, the world will have settled down to some sort of reasonable modus vivendi.

The Russians have stated clearly their minimum security demands, by which they will stand, but no people are in a less belligerent mood. This accounts for Russia's decision to treat the Teheran-Azerbaijan conflict for the present as though it were a purely internal Iranian matter. No vital Soviet interests—such as the ratification by the Majlis of the Russian oil-concession agreement—are thought to be endangered. The terror against the Azerbaijanis is reported briefly in the Soviet press, but it is not made a major issue.

Unquestionably Moscow is gratified by the successful conclusion of the Foreign Ministers' discussions on the five peace treaties. Throughout these laborious talks the Russians were never willing to admit the possibility of a complete deadlock or breakdown; it was really, they say, a case of all parties concerned trying to get the best possible terms. Finally everybody consented to make certain concessions compatible with his fundamental interests, and so agreement was reached. In Paris there were moments of real danger because the Russians were convinced that a very unfair system of ganging up against them was being organized. At the subsequent meeting of the Foreign Ministers the Soviet delegation showed a willingness to make concessions in a spirit of give and take, but refused to be bullied into anything by "voting tricks." The agreements reached, it is hoped, will prepare the way for settlement of the admittedly more difficult problems of Germany and Austria.

ALEXANDER WERTH is special correspondent in Moscow for The Nation, the Manchester Guardian, and the British Broadcasting Corporation. His dispatches appear fortnightly in this magazine.

It is also hoped that not too many faits accomplis will have been recognized in western Germany before the Foreign Ministers meet in Moscow on March 10. Prominence was given in yesterday's press to the statement by Premier Friedrichs of Saxony to the effect that "German unity" and the preservation of the bloc of anti-fascist parties must be the people's two principal aims. Excessive autonomy is considered dangerous, since a more or less independent state like Bavaria might shelter a budding Nazi movement, as Thuringia did before 1933.

About the work of the United Nations proper, feelings are rather more mixed. An altogether exceptional amount of space was given to the U. N. deliberations in the Soviet press; sometimes almost three-quarters of the newspapers were devoted to reports from New York—three closely packed pages out of four. All this was read, and read thoroughly, by millions of people. The impression in Russia is very strong that the Soviet delegation was able to leave New York with a completely clear conscience and that Russia is by far the staunchest supporter of the U. N. and of all good causes. The Soviet delegation appears as the main champion of world opinion against Franco Spain, as the leader in the struggle against racial discrimination—witness South Africa's defeat—as the strongest supporter of a continuation of UNRRA in some form, and above all as the most sincere advocate of disarmament.

It is clear to the Russian reader that it was not the Soviet delegation's fault if the question of the troop census, raised by the Russians and enlarged by the Americans, has been buried for the present. With respect to the veto, the Russians are satisfied that the U. N. meeting clearly demonstrated that none of the big powers want it scrapped; the "nebulous" recommendation to the Security Council on its future use they regard as only a minor concession to its critics. This enormous buildup of the United Nations by the Russians is an extremely significant development.

Concerning relations with Britain and America a number of little things may be mentioned. There has been some criticism about Egypt, some annoyance over the merging of the British and American zones in Germany, a ferocious Zaslavsky article on Schumacher's visit to England, annoyance over "the campaign in the British press against the Potsdam agreements," which, in the words of one commentator, "would, if scrapped, lead to the rebirth of German nationalism, as Schumacher and his Nazi cronies want." And, finally, Zilliacus is prominently quoted as denouncing the "secret Anglo-American union" and arms standardization. The pooling of food reserves in Austria is considered by many a promising sign that something similar may be agreed upon for Germany. The desire to create better relations with America is also evident—for example, in the references in Vishinsky's recent speech to the desirability of developing Soviet-American trade and his remark that credits to Russia are a good investment. Regarding trade with Britain, the prospects are still very uncertain. The Amalgamated Engineering Union's delegation, during its three weeks' visit to Russia, hoped to have conversations on the subject with the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Trade, but the meetings did not materialize.

Internally there are no startling developments. The stimulation of retail trade by the new functions given to the cooperatives under the November 9 decree has so far made little progress: only two shops and fifteen stalls have been opened in Moscow during the past month. The press declares that such results are totally unsatisfactory and assures the cooperatives that their new role in retail trade is not a temporary expedient, that they can confidently go ahead. It declares that they have "an immense role to play."

The tightening up of discipline is proceeding everywhere. The other day Mihailov, general secretary of the All-Union Komsomol, made an eloquent speech at Kiev on the duty of the Ukrainian Komsomols to increase production and efficiency. He said that in liberated Ukraine 70 per cent of the Komsomol members were of less than two years' standing, which naturally explains the ineffectiveness of many of them.

The labor shortage is indisputable, as was observed by the British union delegation, which last week visited the Donbas. Restoration is proceeding, but the destruction was so great that progress appears slow. The other day it was reported that the immense agricultural-machinery plant, Rostselmach, at Rostov had been repaired only 46 per cent. Some industrial sectors are certainly lagging. When I visited Rostselmach last summer I found that much of the work still consisted in clearing away rubble, and for lack of Russian workers the somewhat unproductive and ca-canny labor of German prisoners was used. However, Jack Tanner, leader of the visiting trade-union delegation, spoke very highly of the training schemes for apprentices in all plants, and he was certain that in a few years the difficulties caused by the shortage of labor would be overcome.

To fight crime heavier sentences are being passed on bandits and burglars. In Moscow a man named Gromov was sentenced to death for robbing passersby at night in the street, after threatening and in some cases wounding them with a knife.

On the "literary" front," there is little new. The indiscriminate ragging of writers by critics is being frowned upon. Writers are now told that they need not fear being bothered by petty criticisms. Occasionally some sharp remarks appear, however. The most popular writer of children's verse, Kornei Chukovsky, was attacked in the Central Committee's paper, Culture and Life, for his story "The Kingdom of Dogs." It is the story of an imaginary dogs' kingdom in which the canine king, wearing a golden crown, passes judgment on naughty boys who torment dogs. The critic objected to such "zoological morality" being preached to Soviet children.

A play which has just been announced and which has created some excitement is Simonov's "The Russian Question," the result of his recent visit to America. It dramatizes the conflict between a democratic, fair-minded young American journalist and a villainous newspaper proprietor. The whole thing is represented as a struggle between two sharply defined sets of ideas: peace lovers against warmongers; democracy, anti-fascism, fairness to the Soviet Union against the plans for an anti-Soviet crusade; the democratic spirit against the vicious warmongering press monopolies. The attitude toward the Soviet Union becomes in Simonov's play a sort of ultimate test of human decency and the "true democratic spirit in the present-day world." Simonov may not be a great or even a good writer, but he is important because what he writes nearly always reflects the thing foremost in the minds of most Russians. There is no doubt that the question of future Soviet-American relations is now of great concern.

Russian music remains one of the most fruitful creative fields. Here one has the sensation of living in something approaching a great creative epoch. One waits with excitement for outstanding and lasting works to appear. In the past few weeks alone Moscow has heard the first performance of works some of which may be put in that category, as Shostakovich's new quartet, whose finale has more purely musical loveliness than almost anything he has written, and loveliness is not a word usually applied to him. No less important is Prokofiev's new violin sonata, with exquisite strings and inexhaustible inventiveness of melody and rhythm. Most typical of Prokofiev's work is the scherzo with its touch of "hooligan swagger," reminiscent of the remarkable scherzo of the Fifth Symphony. On a different level is Khachaturian's new cello concerto, which suffers from an excess of old tricks of string concertos. If Khachaturian's music is almost too consistently "Armenian," the well-known Georgian composer, Balanchevadze, is apt to go to the other extreme. His new piano concerto is, with the exception of rare passages, disappointingly un-Georgian.

But with Prokofiev and Shostakovich intensely active, Moscow remains musically one of the most exciting places in the world.

Homeless America

BY CHARLES ABRAMS

II. Bailing Out the Builders

THE fight against the emergency housing program threatens to become the greatest assault upon government resources since the dissipation of the federal domain. A powerful lobby stands mobilized to rewrite the formula for house building so that builders and lenders will get the profits without taking the risks while the government will take the risks without getting the profits. If the lobby succeeds, housing may become the opening wedge for the socialization of losses in business.

The implications of the present fight will be better understood if its background is briefly reviewed. Up to the turn of the century a home owner would have welcomed a mortgage on his house no more warmly than a swarm of termites into its beams. The early movies depicting the mortgagee as a mustachioed villain threatening to foreclose unless he received the hand of the owner's daughter in marriage represented the prevailing view. But building costs rose, curtailing home buying; whereupon the mortgage lending institutions, perceiving a new outlet for their mounting reserves at lucrative interest rates, provided the additional means needed. Between 1922 and 1929, though the total value of urban real estate rose only 14 per cent and national wealth 20 per cent, urban mortgage debt increased 208 per cent.

Until the depression the mortgage system continued unchanged, the builder taking the risks in home building and the mortgage company putting up about two-thirds of the cost. When the crash came, foreclosures wiped out home equities at the rate of a thousand a day. Mortgage financing stopped; building fell off to a trickle. The Roosevelt Administration saw recovery held back by the lag in home building and set out to resuscitate it with the federal pulmotor. Housing agencies fanned out in all directions. A Federal Housing Administration insured mortgage loans to lending institutions up to 90 per cent of purchase price. A Home Owners' Loan Corporation lifted three billion dollars in mortgages from the bulging portfolios of the depression-shocked lending companies. A Home Loan Bank System, designed to "bring out hoarded savings," insured mortgage loans to building and loan associations, guaranteed their shareholders, authorized the government to buy their stock. A small appropriation was made for an experimental housing program for slum dwellers, and in 1937 an act authorizing the building of about 160,000 low-rent homes passed Congress without objection from real-estate or business interests.

Soon, however, builders and mortgage lenders awoke to the potentialities of government aid. The home builder had been the neglected little brother in the entrepreneurial family. He now saw that the 90 per cent insured mortgage allowed him to bail out with his investment while at the same time the small down payment enticed thousands of new recruits into home ownership. The mortgage lending institutions had formerly been obliged to take the risks of over-appraisal and devaluation. Now the government provided them with a method of absorbing their risks without affecting their gains. The builders and lenders rose to the occasion with all the lobbying strength they could muster. Adopting the prevailing idiom of social reform, they advocated more federal intervention than housing idealists ever dreamed of.

But while favoring social reforms noble enough on the surface, the lobby revealed its more practical ideas. Its plans called for (a) underwriting by government of the security of speculative investment in real estate; (b) the assurance of continuing profits to the nominal owners of rented property by rent-relief payments to low-income workers, which would then be handed over as rent to private owners; (c) the continuance and expansion of the FHA and the Home Loan Bank, under which preferred institutions could continue to exact exorbitant interest from home buyers without restraint; (d) the unleashing of another home-purchasing boom from which builders might profit without risk, while veterans and others were impressed into purchasing precarious equities without check by the government; (e) the cancelation of all priorities on materials, construction, sales prices, and rents of new housing. In short, the New Deal was to be reshuffled, with the cards stacked against the taxpayer and home owner.

The reasons why an important sector of business abandoned its traditional opposition to government intervention will become clear if we examine the operations of the mortgage-insuring agencies. FHA insurance of mortgage loans has not forced the lenders to make any appreciable cut in the interest rate; in fact, uninsured mortgage loans often carry a lower interest rate than those insured by the government. On government-insured repair loans interest is 9 per cent! Insured loans are parceled out to preferred lending institutions only. Competition that might stimulate interest reduction is stifled with the government's blessing. Practices which in other enterprises would be clamped down on as brazen violations of the anti-trust act are openly countenanced. Even the practice of excluding persons of unwelcome color or ancestry has been approved in FHA publications.

The Home Loan Bank System, too, was balm to the ailing building-and-loan associations. Posing as "cooperatives," these were little more than mortgage-lending banking institutions with self-perpetuating directorates. Before 1933 they had to take normal business risks in their mortgage loans. Now they could not only buy government-insured mortgages, but the government underwrote the investments of their depositors and shareholders. It discounted their mortgages for a premium of about 1½ per cent, while the associations were free to charge 5½ per cent and up. The resources of these institutions more than doubled in a few years.

When the war ended and the need for veterans' housing became pressing, Congress again rushed through a law designed to induce veterans to buy whether they could afford to carry the property or not. The need for any down payment was now eliminated. Again the government simply insured the lenders and underwrote their risks, without providing any security for the home-hungry veterans. The program was merely fresh evidence of the desire to get more deeds into the hands of citizens without regard for the aftermath. Low costs, ability to pay, decent standards, reasonable interest rates, sound city planning—all these were thrust into the background.

"The housing shortage will take care of itself as soon as materials get back on the market."

It is plain, therefore, that the benefits reaped by private building interests from government aid are the source of the present intense opposition to public housing. The prospect that the vast credits and funds of the government may be used for publicly sponsored undertakings is a powerful threat to the subsidization of private enterprise. Public housing agencies build as economically as the private builder. Instead of bailing out slum owners they have often bought vacant land for their projects. Bonds of local housing authorities, to the distaste of the mortgage lenders, have been sold competitively to underwriting houses at one-third the rate of yield the institutional lenders exact on FHA mortgages.

It is not surprising that in the line-up against the public-housing provisions of the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill are the home builders, the American Bankers' Association, the United States Savings and Loan League, 208 life-insurance companies, the Mortgage Bankers' Association of America, and the National Savings and Loan League. Herbert U. Nelson, arch-deacon of the lobby, put the issue plainly: "In our country we prefer that government activity shall take the form of assisting and aiding private business rather than undertaking great public projects of a governmental character." A Republican bloc in the House Banking and Currency Committee kept this bill from coming on the floor for a vote. President Truman's recent announcement of more mortgage insurance and less restriction on the home builder, and his appointment of the FHA administrator as boss of the government's housing program suggest that the Administration is now ready to capitulate to the lobby.

The only real opposition to the attempted raid on the federal treasury comes from the 800 housing authorities set up in forty of the forty-eight states. The members of these authorities are unpaid citizens, 75 per cent of them from business, banking, and the professions. They are backed by labor, civic organizations, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the American Veterans' Committee.

The main issue is not whether there shall be public or private housing but whether the public or the private entrepreneur shall receive the benefit of government moneys and credit. The Washington real-estate lobby is fighting to divert the funds required for social undertakings into private hands and to obtain government credit resources for private use. The struggle is not between those favoring socialization and those opposing it —Senator Robert A. Taft, who is sponsoring the housing bill, can hardly be called a socialist. The struggle is between those who favor the traditional role of government under a private-enterprise system and those who see in federal intercession an opportunity to make government the handmaiden of business.

Once the raid on the public funds has been carried out, the next move may be the appropriation of government powers—in fact, that has already begun. In states that have enacted "urban redevelopment laws" not only have government funds been put at the disposal of big private institutions but government powers have been surrendered to them on the pretext that slums are being cleared. The Stuyvesant Town project of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company in New York City has been given the benefit of a special power of eminent domain which authorizes the compulsory purchase of land as a "superior public use." Several public streets in the heart of the metropolis have been turned over to the company forever. Only one official, the city's Comptroller, is permitted access to these streets—and that only for the period of tax exemption. Handing out public moneys and public powers to private companies is now authorized in eleven states.

If the lobby wins its fight, the way may be paved for a remarkable innovation in government. For if business is to be freed of the responsibility, restrictions, and safeguards to which the government agency is subject, the "ism" describing the new era will be of a type more menacing than socialism. Already ominous signs of race discrimination have appeared in Stuyvesant Town.

Why is the public not awake to the danger? Because the housing issue is so complex that the average citizen is not able to distinguish the true substance of housing laws from the nobly worded but meaningless pronouncements of their preambles. Since the recognition of the federal government's welfare power by the Supreme Court the principles governing the use of federal subsidies have never been adequately defined, and each innovation is permitted to serve as a precedent for further raids upon the federal credit. Organizations fighting against the lobby, such as the National Public Housing Conference, are hampered by poverty and public apathy.

Much more than houses is involved in the housing question. The solution may provide the precedents for the type of economy in which we are to live. Housing is no longer an emotional issue to be fought out between those who are against slums and those who are for them. It will be seen in its true focus only when all the essential if wearisome details of a program have been laid before the public.

The Last Skyscraper

BY FREDERICK GUTHEIM

Here first the duties of today, the lessons of the concrete,
Wealth, order, travel, shelter, products, plenty;
As of the building of some varied, vast, perpetual edifice,
Whence to arise inevitable in time, the towering roofs, the lamps,
The solid-planted spires tall shooting to the stars.

SO WALT WHITMAN. But this original lover of Mannahatta does not translate too well. Else he might have made some things clear to the delegates to the United Nations Assembly who recently decided to build their headquarters in a derelict area along the East River. He gives sounder advice than the delegates received from their technical commission of expert planners. Or from the daily papers.

The best thing an editorial writer in the New York Times could find to say about this site was that it had plenty of rock under it. On the first page of the Times a more objective account noted the abattoirs, warehouses, parking lots, and Dead End kids. But clearly the United Nations are not interested in what they find on the site today. All that can be scraped clean. They are interested in getting down to the virgin rock and deciding what can be built there.

Having accepted, on the recommendation of the United States government and with the cooperation of the city of New York, the East River site offered by John D. Rockefeller, where does the U. N. go from here? The headquarters building must now be planned to accommodate all the U. N.'s many and varied activities. Only a Radio City type of development can fill the bill, a city of skyscrapers. But the U. N. city will stand within a city that already exists, and in one of the worst parts of the city.

What limitations does this impose? The site offers no possibility of expansion; and the U. N., we hope, is to be a growing organization. The site is too small to give much opportunity for an architectural setting, and space for many of the supporting services must be provided in the vicinity. But perhaps most important is the lack of what the French call ambiance—the lack of a suitable atmosphere, a congenial environment. In our language we have neither the word nor the idea.

The previous owners of this site, who assembled it with the idea of creating another and larger Radio City, appear to have relinquished their plan because the cooperation of the city was necessary not only to enable them to acquire some remaining small segments of property and to preempt space intended for a municipal park but to assure the construction of a loop subway line to the area. Quite a lot more will be expected of the city by the new owners.

In the highly professional report of the Headquarters Commission we find an analysis of the U. N.'s requirements. The housing needs of the U. N. community are set off against a bleak and cheerless summary of New York's housing situation. With 7,000 employees and their dependents, 4,000 transient visitors, and the necessary service population, this community is estimated to total 52,530 persons. On the five and one-half city blocks of the East River site, of course, no such numbers can be accommodated. The employees of the U. N., 40 per cent of whom earn less than $2,500 per year, will be fortunate if any housing is provided for them on or off the site, and the U. N. must begin to count on a permanent upward revision of the quota of American nationals it employs. The eighteen acres of land along the East River will meet only the barest requirements of the United Nations.

The General Assembly must have a hall seating 1,000 persons with space for 3,000 more in balconies; it must also have seven large committee rooms accommodating 400 persons, and ten smaller rooms for 30 to 100 persons. The Security Council will need its own chamber for 200, with space for 2,000 in balconies, and with seven large and two or more small committee rooms. The Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council will share a third hall seating 175, with 500 in the balconies, two large committee rooms, and five small ones. Nine specialized international agencies working closely with the U. N. will have staffs totaling 2,500, for which room must be provided. An estimated seventy permanent missions will have staffs totaling 1,875 persons.

Offices for the secretariat itself form of course the largest item. These will require 1,675,000 square feet. Two small halls for lectures, films, and so on will require 15,000 square feet each. A library of a million volumes, various restaurants, bars, and lounges, and radio and communication facilities complete the main features of the plan.

With Radio City in mind one need not doubt that this array of buildings can be erected on the chosen site. Some may even find encouragement in the fact that buildings so like their model will have a high degree of convertibility and a good resale value. Should the U. N. disintegrate, or be replaced by another and more effective form of world government, no embarrassing monument like that at Geneva need stand empty to remind us of our failure to create the Parliament of Man.

Whether New York City can bring about a sufficient measure of urban redevelopment to justify the U. N.'s gamble with this site is an open question. Few city planners will take a cheerful view of the possibility. New York real estate, particularly in Manhattan, is very sick. Despite the current false health of post-war conditions, it suffers from a chronic disease caused by the widespread movement toward metropolitan decentralization and over-inflated realty values. U. N. delegates, most of whom come from cities a good deal smaller than Buffalo, whose administrations have a large measure of control over land, may be forgiven for miscalculating the importance of this factor. But our own representatives have a heavy responsibility. It is too early to say that we have sold the U. N. a gold brick. But it is beginning to look that way.

Robert Moses apparently believes the U. N. will be satisfied if he rezones a fringe a block wide around the site. He can also be prevailed on, as a disciple of Baron Haussmann, to plan some monumental approaches to the U. N. headquarters. But corridor streets and pretty façades are not enough. More comprehensive planning, more municipal land ownership, and more directly controlled building plans are called for.

Fifteen years have passed since the last skyscraper of any consequence was built. The U. N. skyscrapers will undoubtedly be the last we shall erect.

In what now seems an ironic proposal Lewis Mumford, our most distinguished student of architecture and city planning, recommended last summer that the United Nations select some portion of a great metropolis and redevelop it as an example for war-shattered cities. The distinguished French technical representative on the Headquarters Commission, M. Le Corbusier, has boldly championed the idea of the "vertical garden city"—a skyscraper solution to the U. N.'s site problem. Are these brave conceptions to be mocked?

In constructing the thousand-foot skyscrapers of U. N. the technical abilities of American architects and engineers will be put to the test. Building technicians of other nations cannot seriously compete in manipulating this essentially American building form. No other engineers are qualified by training or experience to deal with the complex questions of heating, ventilating, air conditioning, elevators, escalators, and the myriad mechanical devices that make the skyscraper possible. The only architectural expression admissible will be a tight and economical functionalism not materially different from the rent barracks of Manhattan. The possibility of an international architectural competition is an absurdity.

Since American architects will inevitably determine the form of the buildings, the U. N. Headquarters Commission might be well advised to place the design problem in the hands of the Public Buildings Administration. The recently retired supervising architect of the PBA, George Howe of Philadelphia, is admirably qualified for this task by his experience in designing for the Philadelphia Savings Fund Society a skyscraper more modern than any in New York. Or the PBA might make use of the experience of New York's outstanding exponent of skyscraper design, Wallace K. Harrison, codesigner of Radio City, who has for months been at work on the development of this very East River area for Webb and Knapp. With such designers, and a determined effort on the part of the New York City Planning Commission, it may yet be possible to erect on this most difficult and unpromising site a building that can speak to the world.

"The Republic of India"

BY SHIVA RAO

New Delhi, December 17

IN MANY ways it has been a memorable fortnight, crowded with big events—the opening of the Constituent Assembly in New Delhi, Nehru's magnificent speech outlining its objectives, and the parliamentary debate on India in London.

Nehru returned from his dramatic flight to London disappointed but not embittered. "We hungered for a message of cheer and cooperation from Britain," he said, addressing the Constituent Assembly, "and it has been a blow to me that obstructions and new limitations not mentioned previously have been placed before us." "It hurts," he added simply. America, Australia, and China sent messages of good-will which the chairman read out on the opening day, but none came from Britain.

Nehru touched a deep chord when he spoke of the five thousand years of India's past that seemed to be crowding round him. "I feel overwhelmed by the mightiness of the task," he said in a voice shaken with emotion. The absence of the Moslem League's seventy-five representatives he noted with regret and expressed the hope they would take their places soon, because India's future, as he visualized it, was not confined to any group or party: "The welfare of four hundred million people is our common concern." In a passionate appeal "for imaginative daring" on the part of the British government, he declared that he challenged no one's bona fides and would continue to seek Britain's cooperation.

He repeated these sentiments yesterday and today in addresses before Benares University and the annual gathering of British business men at Calcutta. Let's forget Britain's past misdeeds, he pleaded; India cannot afford to cut all its visible and invisible connections with Britain of the past 150 years. He warned, however, that future Indo-British relations would depend on Britain's policy and conduct toward India.

The Constituent Assembly is considering as its first real item of business Nehru's resolution outlining what should be the basic features of the permanent constitution. India, according to this conception, will become an independent sovereign republic comprising all British India, the Indian princes' territories, scattered possessions under French or Portuguese administration, and possibly, if they desire it, regions like Burma and Ceylon. The constitution will guarantee social, economic, and political justice to all citizens and provide adequate safeguards for minorities, backward classes, and the untouchables. Certain definite powers and functions will be assigned to the central government by federated autonomous units which will exercise all residual authority.

The present deliberations of the Constituent Assembly are held in an atmosphere of great uncertainty. Until Jinnah returns from London and summons the executive of the Moslem League to reconsider its boycott, one cannot say whether or not the League's representatives will participate in the Assembly. Jinnah wants definite assurance from the Congress leaders that they accept without reservations the British Cabinet's long-term plans. The Congress leaders will recommend that certain disputed passages be referred to the federal court.

Equally unpredictable is the attitude of the princes. Many among them seem frightened by the term "independent sovereign republic" and the assertion that sovereignty even in constituent units is derived from the people. The British Cabinet has urged a negotiating committee of the princes or their prime ministers.

Thus at the moment the Constituent Assembly represents only British India, not the princes' territories—and not even the whole of British India, since the Moslem League is not participating. Churchill, in the course of the parliamentary debate, offensively raised the question whether such an Assembly was competent to make decisions affecting the whole of India. The Labor Cabinet would not answer the question directly. It indorsed Jinnah's interpretation of its long-term plan and asked the Congress leaders to accept it, adding the important reservation that the British government cannot impose on unwilling parts of the country a constitution framed by an Assembly from which a section of the people has held aloof.

This statement has set many minds thinking. The Moslems believe it implies that provinces with Moslem majorities need not accept a constitution framed in their absence. The princes find the principle applicable to their territories unless they reach an agreement with the Constituent Assembly with regard to representation. By the simple process of abstention the Moslems and the princes believe they can compel the present Constituent Assembly to limit its attention to six provinces. Congress leaders will make every reasonable concession to obtain the cooperation of the Moslem League and the princes.

One cannot say at this stage how far their efforts will prove successful. Up to now Jinnah has been able to get the support of all members of his party. A section, however, remains critical of his barren and uncompromising policy. Forming a minority of the population in several provinces, the Moslems cannot accept his suggestion to exchange populations as a preliminary to the establishment of Pakistan. They realize they must learn to live on terms of friendliness with their Hindu neighbors. The recent terrible riots have taught both Hindus and Moslems that violence settles no problem.

There is a similar lack of unanimity among the princes. The Hindu and Sikh princes, with some exceptions, would welcome a general settlement with the Congress leaders.

All reactionary elements in India are likely to take heart from Churchill's mischievous utterance predicting widespread strife and chaos. Nehru has promptly answered his point about whether the British troops are to be used to put down Moslems and untouchables. The demand for their immediate withdrawal will be all the more insistent in the future.

The Congress Party has an enormous social program beginning with the abolition of the landlord system and the emancipation of the peasantry. It favors a considerable measure of state control of industry. It seeks the introduction of popular government in the princes' territories. The question is: Does the British Labor government genuinely desire to help the Congress leaders to achieve these great reforms? Parliamentary debates in London a week ago have been most disappointing in this respect. Sir Stafford Cripps and Mr. Alexander, among the Labor ministers, were apologetic. They seemed to say to the Tories, "We are not doing anything very different from your party's policy." Men like Nehru expected a bold and clear-cut departure from the Churchillian conception of imperialism.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

"From Portal to Portal"

WE SHALL be hearing this sonorous phrase very frequently during the next few months, for the problem it represents is going to engage the attention of both Congress and the courts and, in addition, is certain to figure in collective bargaining. Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Supreme Court has ruled, the forty-hour statutory week must be measured "from portal to portal"—that is to say, from the time a worker enters his employer's premises to the time he leaves. This decision has opened the door to millions of claims for unpaid time worked aggregating billions of dollars.

The act, passed in 1938, provided that hours worked in excess of forty a week must be paid for at time-and-a-half rates. Unfortunately it did not define "compensable time," and most employers assumed that they need not include in the pay period time spent by the worker in getting to his working place after punching the clock, in changing clothes when special garments were required, in cleaning up after work, in returning to the entry at the end of the shift, and in waiting his turn to clock out. In small workshops and factories this span of unproductive time may be of little consequence, but in large modern plants, covering a huge acreage, it can add appreciably to the length of the working day. Moreover, since it is difficult to keep individual records of the exact time when employees actually start work, many employers deduct an arbitrary allowance from the hours clocked. In the Mount Clemens Pottery Company case the Supreme Court noted that the firm calculated compensable time from the succeeding quarter-hour after employees punched a time-clock when going in and from the preceding quarter-hour when going out. "Thus an employee who punches in at 6.46 a. m., punches out at 12.14 p. m., then punches in again at 12.46 p. m., and finally punches out at 4.14 p. m., is credited," said the court, "with having worked the eight hours between 7 a. m. and 12 noon and between 1 p. m. and 4 p. m.—a total of 56 minutes less than the time recorded by the time clocks."

This problem first came before the courts some years ago when a claim was made against the Tennessee Coal Company for payment of time spent in underground travel in iron-ore mines. In 1942 the Supreme Court found for the workers, and three years later, in the Jewell Ridge Coal Corporation case, it concluded that there was no substantial difference between underground travel in iron mines and coal mines. Finally, on June 10, 1946, the court, reversing the decision of a district judge in the Mount Clemens Pottery Company case, held that the "portal to portal" principle applied to industry in general.

This decision has been criticized for the broadness with which it interpreted the intentions of Congress, but it is certainly one that appeals to both equity and common sense. For once a man enters his employer's premises, his time, obviously, is not his own. He cannot control the location of his working place, and if assigned to one ten or fifteen minutes distant from the gate he should be compensated for the time spent in reaching it. Equally, if the nature of his work requires the wearing of special clothing, he should be paid for the minutes spent changing. To a considerable extent the amount of non-productive time in a factory is under the control of employers. They can arrange in a big plant for more entries so that internal walking is minimized, can instal more time-clocks and reduce waiting to punch in and out. According to Business Action, organ of the United States Chamber of Commerce, many firms are planning just such improvements now that the Mount Clemens decision has given them an incentive to do so. When unproductive time represented merely a loss to workers, the additional investment involved was not, it seems, justified.

Employers are now looking to Congress for some relief from the burden of retroactive claims which the court's findings threaten to place upon them. In the years since 1939 a great many industrial workers have been putting in more than forty hours a week and so are entitled to payment at overtime rates for any uncompensated time worked; moreover, the act provides for additional damages equal to the amount due. It is alleged that many small firms would be bankrupted and even the strongest would find their financial position seriously damaged. The government also would probably be called upon to make very large reimbursements to cost-plus war contractors—an estimate of five billion dollars has been published—and would be deluged with claims for tax refunds. Possibly the extent of the Treasury's liability has been exaggerated for propaganda purposes, but the scale of the sums involved is illustrated by suits against two of United States Steel's many subsidiaries asking for $120,000,000.

The situation is further complicated by the fact that state statutes of limitations vary in their incidence. Thus in Wyoming a worker can seek recovery of sums due over an eight-year period, while in Colorado there is retroactive liability for only one year. Such variations in standards confer competitive advantages on violators of the law in many states.

Yet another problem is created by the fact that the courts have held waivers of individual claims under the Fair Labor Standards Act to be inadmissible. Consequently a settlement of retroactive claims negotiated between an employer and a union cannot be regarded as binding. Yet the filing of millions of individual claims could choke the courts for years.

Clearly, some kind of legislation to tidy up the whole situation is required. But a bill which was introduced last session by Representative Gwynne of Iowa and is likely to be revived early next year certainly goes too far. It provides for a maximum of two years' liability for back pay, not only in the case of "portal to portal" claims, but in other damage suits under the Fair Labor Standards Act. Thus it would benefit employers who had deliberately cheated their workers as well as those who may fairly claim to have sinned inadvertently by continuing customary practices. Labor organizations will have to be vigilant lest, under cover of meeting an extraordinary situation, an effort is made to weaken the Fair Labor Standards Act.

BY LOU FRANKEL

THAT American radio is a powerful sales force no one can deny in the face of its continuing successes. Yet United States broadcasters have never got around to selling America to the rest of the world.

Before the war the networks and a handful of the larger stations took some steps toward developing short-wave transmitters, planning eventually to have these programs sponsored. The war stopped all that, and about the best thing accomplished was the loose affiliation of American networks with similar though inferior organizations in Latin America. Today the short-wave transmitters are leased by the government, the hookups between networks here and those south of the border are dormant, the only radio word from the United States comes through the recently inaugurated short-wave broadcasts of the State Department, and the best job of selling these United States is being done by the British Broadcasting Corporation.

BBC broadcasts are fitted for this job by a basic difference in approach. The primary purpose of the American broadcaster is to get more listeners for the advertiser; he feels no obligation to extol the virtues of his country to the world. The BBC's overseas service, which was organized in 1935 to combat the short-wave radio propaganda of Germany and Italy, started with this premise: "There's no use trying to sell England to the world unless England understands the world." To help England to understand the United States the BBC has from the very beginning had a production staff here to feed what it calls "the eastbound service," from the United States to England. And always it has tried to produce shows that would tell each country about the other.

In the beginning the BBC sent its programs over here by short wave. Then surveys showed that it was reaching less than half of one per cent of the available listeners and that most of these were either short-wave addicts or Englishmen away from home. So it changed its methods and got American stations to rebroadcast its programs. The war played into its hands, for most of the non-network radio correspondents who went to Europe found the army transmission facilities inadequate and turned to the BBC to get their broadcasts home. Moreover, rebroadcasts of the BBC's short-waved newscasts, documentaries, and features enabled many a non-network station to cover the war.

Today, because it is short of dollars, the BBC has had to curtail its eastbound production staff, but it has come up with a technique of exchange programs that has actually increased the number of programs being sent out. Of the "eastbound shows" the following are typical:

"American Commentary," a weekly commentary on the United States by an American. Raymond Gram Swing started the series in 1935. He was succeeded by Elmer Davis and Alastair Cooke. Currently Joe Harsch of CBS and Clifton Utley of WMAQ are performing.

"American Letter," a weekly broadcast by Alastair Cooke on anything interesting or significant in American life or thought. Mr. Cooke has described life in a New England town, discussed the economic problems of the South, and attempted to explain the average American.

"Transatlantic Quiz," a weekly ad-lib show in which questions are asked on one side of the Atlantic and answered on the other. It tries to find out which panel knows most about the other's country. On this side the speakers have been Christopher Morley and John Mason Brown; in London, Denis Brogan, a professor of political science, and David Niven, the actor.

Among the "exchange" programs, the following have been heard recently:

"Birmingham to Birmingham," in which the people of the two cities learned about each other. WAPI in Birmingham, Alabama, put together a program that included interviews with typical residents, descriptions of the town, on-the-spot accounts of a steel mill and coal mine, and the like.

"Columbus to Manchester." In this the underlying theme was cotton. WDAK in Columbus, Georgia, did a program about the growing, ginning, and selling of cotton. Manchester presented a show about its cotton mills.

WLW-BBC compared a Welsh settlement in Ohio with the town in Wales that the settlers originally came from.

WGY-BBC have a monthly program on farming. A topic is chosen, and questions are submitted by farmers within range of WGY in Schenectady, New York, and the BBC Scottish service; then each side brings farmers and experts to the mike to answer the questions.

KDKA-BBC offers a monthly exchange between youngsters in Pittsburgh and their counterparts in the Midlands.

In all these exchanges each side gives the other a detailed blueprint of what is required. Last summer WHCU, Ithaca, had a one-shot exchange program about county fairs that tied-in with a big local fair. But it won't send across its part of the fair program until next spring when the big fairs are held in England. The beauty of the exchange deals is that time is not of the essence.

Of course these are just samples. The BBC uses some two hours a week of programs about America, not including special talks and documentary bits for BBC programs.

Finally, the BBC has some fifty-odd stations in this country that regularly carry some BBC feature or special program. One network has an exchange program. The BBC, however, has two American programs that go to their full network, in addition to a host of others that are broadcast locally. Whereas a minority of American stations carry the BBC programs, every BBC outlet on the network carries ours.

For American broadcasters the BBC shows are usually an opportunity to grab some publicity or to get a good special feature at little cost. For the BBC and the British listener American material is part and parcel of a good program service, letting people know what is going on in the world.

Are his dreams death's forethoughtfulness,

Or will the bridge bring out of mists
The lofty land, the cloudy sweet
Fields of the old land, old kingdom?
He dreams he never knew those lawns

SHINING TRUMPETS; A HISTORY OF JAZZ. By Rudi Blesh. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

MR. BLESH, who used to lecture on jazz at the San Francisco Museum of Art, has now written a big, useful, but grandiose book on the subject. He is an articulate enthusiast, and he has a good deal of fascinating scholarship to impart. He works earnestly at the major job that faces anyone who would address the tyro on jazz—constantly leading him away from the desolate commercial music that dominates the radio and phonograph, and toward the really gifted, ardent playing. Mr. Blesh demonstrates with more detail than I have seen before that the influence of West African tribal music is central in jazz, and that sacred and secular Afro-American song led directly to the jazz band. He writes clearly about musical forms and assists his text with all manner of scholarly apparatus—including a wonderfully evocative photograph of a colored funeral procession, with brass, in Gretna, Louisiana.

This reviewer is further pleased to find that Mr. Blesh's taste in jazz often closely approaches his own. Mr. Blesh belongs among those aficionados who especially admire the improvised polyphony developed by New Orleans Negroes in the first two decades of the century: the great names include Jelly Roll Morton, King Oliver, Louis Armstrong, Johnny Dodds, etc. This tradition has recently been represented by New Orleans veterans of the period, including the sixty-five-year-old Bunk Johnson and Kid Ory. But any such heartful, spirited playing today is all but drowned in the din of music commercially geared or desperate for novelty, or both. The big "swing" bands deal very largely in mechanical formulas, such as the "riff." The little "salon swing" combinations deal in cold ingenuity. The newest fad, which somewhere or other acquired the perfectly appropriate name "re-bop," deals in "screwiness"—it is "salon swing" freaked up with dissonantal harmony (Mr. Blesh does not deign to mention it, or else he went to press before its tortuous inventions reached his ears). I will take a stand with Mr. Blesh in favor of lyric spontaneity—genuine song. The old New Orleans jazz masters had it. It was essential to jazz in its capital city, and still seems so to many "reactionaries" today.

Unfortunately, Mr. Blesh is rather wooden about all this. His critical tack reminds one of the German methodologists. He has a system. Thus, having set the old New Orleans heroes up as his criteria, he declares, in effect, that anything outside the New Orleans style is not "real jazz." There are many of us who feel that the lively and various art of music will always mock such pigeonholing. Mr. Blesh, for instance, has unkind things to say about the famous Bix Beiderbecke, who did not play like a New Orleans Negro (he was a Davenport, Iowa, white man): "Objectively considered, Beiderbecke's playing is weak. . . ." Having no notion how to reach Mr. Blesh in his objectivity, I can only assure him that, subjectively, many people quite devoted to New Orleans music have also found Beiderbecke a choice musician indeed. If his is not "real jazz" they will reject Mr. Blesh's category rather than Bix.

In short, Mr. Blesh often gives the impression of paying more attention to his system than to specific musical performances. But those who will concentrate on specific performances rather than on formulas may hear remarkable playing, in various accents of the jazz language, not only from the New Orleans Negroes and from Beiderbecke, but from Joe Smith, J. C. Higginbotham, Fats Waller, Bud Freeman, Earl Hines, Floyd O'Brien, Red Nichols, Miff Mole, and many others. The improvisatory, fugitive art of jazz has many kinds of musical pleasure to offer, depending on what talent is present and their spirit of the moment; when conditions are favorable in this regard, striking music may even be heard from such unlikely groups as big "swing" bands, "salon swing" ensembles, or "re-bop" combinations.

Mr. Blesh has not only a system. He also has a purpose. He talks repeatedly of musical "progress." He admires jazz, among other reasons, because it is "modern" or even farther along than that: ". . . jazz, in the New Orleans sense, is still far in advance of the times." He will not rest with jazz as a musical language which may be used intensely and poetically; he must have it conquer all. And like most critics who are not content to illumine an art, but must also pound the drum for it, his style is sometimes deafening:

> Jazz music relates . . . to the concepts, the discoveries, the motivations of our time. For one thing, its ceaseless movement and its free melodies in combined variation are analogous to pure movement in time and space. Like natural process, jazz has no real beginning, no real end.

Our modern "serious" music is not contemporary in any such sense. Even in its most radical form it is conditioned by earlier and outmoded concepts of form and energy, of time and space. Looked at objectively [sic], it has no direction to take, implicit in its own past development, which will make it contemporary with the vast speculation, the uneasy, ceaseless, and portentous movements of our time. To achieve meaning it must place a forever incipient rhythmic and melodic movement into the pathway of polyphony. This movement is improvisation; with it, Western music as we know it disappears and its composers, too.

This kind of pompous semantic tangle does not, fortunately, occur very often in the book—on page after page Mr. Blesh is a lucid instructor. But if his ruminations have persuaded him to hope for a future without the composer, I can only say that I hope to continue enjoying both Ma Rainey's blues and the written works of architectonic musical minds. I daresay there will be interesting future activity in both traditions.

WILDER HOBSON

The Unmoved Mover

LABOR AND THE LAW. By Charles O. Gregory. W. W. Norton and Company. $5.

THIS book exhibits a kind of legal ambivalence characteristic only of the more astute constitutional lawyer. On the one hand, Professor Gregory recognizes that law, especially in labor cases, is what the judges say it is; on the other, he advocates the thesis that our legal system is a supra-human referee unaffected by the emotional and class interests of men. This viewpoint might be acceptable if justices and lawmakers were platonic philosophers capable of separating themselves from the tumult of organized pressures. That this is not so has been recently emphasized by the furor over coal in Judge Goldsborough's chambers.

Professor Gregory's perspective is clear and sure when he deals with cases at least fifty years old. His discussion of the theory of criminal conspiracy and the common law reveals an enviable comprehension of the class basis of legal doctrine. Industry had to be encouraged in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries; if there was a choice to be made between the civil rights of the factory owner and of the worker, the courts were bound to protect the former. This, as the author says, was the only sensible course to take. Only when workingmen began to secure for themselves the privilege of voting were the political scales upset and the right of labor to seek its own economic destiny grudgingly acknowledged.

The chapter on the injunction bears rereading today. It is a workmanlike survey of the use to which this pernicious instrument has been put, and it emphasizes the fact that many courts were only too anxious to issue injunctive orders on the basis of some personal distaste for a union's program. In fact, most of Professor Gregory's treatment of pre-New Deal experience is sound. He recognizes the severe and often unfair limitations placed on labor unions and takes a keen delight in excoriating the pettifogging opinions of the judiciary.

But this conception of the law absolute does not allow for any bias. Thus, the exclusion of unions from the Sherman act is said to be a dangerous precedent, for some of labor's activities have become harmful to both consumers and the national economy. In actuality, says the author, the Supreme Court has done unionism a disservice by allowing it too much economic power. The only way out for a court "mired so deeply in its own complicated circuity of words" is by the infusion of new members or by Congressional legislation directed at the "market restraints of labor."

Continuing in the same vein, Professor Gregory discovers that peaceful picketing is a dubious kind of social conduct which ought to be regulated by the individual states. If that is not done, he warns, we shall live in a climate of economic absolutism dominated by organized labor. That, of course, is something to be feared.

The central thesis of this book is not at all obscured by the author's philosophy of state above all. His own bias seems obvious. He would have us accept the belief that government mediates between labor, management, farmers, and consumers. Government, however, is of these groups, not over them. And law and judicial opinion almost always depend on which one exerts the strongest pressure.

Chopping a Teakettle

THE WILD FLAG. By E. B. White. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

THE flowers of the earth are the wild flag, the true banner of internationalism. There is a better phrase for it in Yiddish: hacken a tcheinik, which means to chop a teakettle, or in American idiom, to talk up a breeze—of nonsense. E. B. White, in these paragraphs testifying to the New Yorker's conscience, proves himself a master-craftsman; not only does he chop away with an unfailing stroke, but he manages to keep a cloud of steam issuing from the spout as he works.

There is no such thing as urbanity without partisanship. Appearances to the contrary, the New Yorker has always upheld a set of values—the values, to be sure, which are sacred to its own bourgeois sophistication. Until recently, cuteness has been this magazine's only form of prayer; it has worshiped its own tone with the cute, the coy, the cunning remark. The scheme of its prayer has been not to call forth but to conceal the god. The New Yorker did not believe in committing itself bluntly, and it made cute fun of those who do. But with the advent of the war, conscience, which where the middle class is concerned is best defined as the fear of dispossession, demanded that it justify the ways of its god to man. Then behold, the Lord of Park Avenue and suburbia, the Supreme Profile, revealed His full face and declared Himself in favor of world government.

But He has need of His cloud, which is where Mr. White's services come in; for if it is His own fear and trembling that the cloud hides, still it will appear that it hides His wrath. ("These editorials . . . were written sometimes in anger," says Mr. White.) "A Chinese farmer in a rice paddy would have to feel, between his toes, not only the immediate wetness of his own field but the vast wetness of the fertile world," saith the Teakettle, apropos of the obligation that world government would put on each man to take "the entire globe to his bosom." "The special feeling of an Englishman for a stream in Devonshire or a lane in Kent would have to run parallel to his pride in Athens and his insane love of Jersey City." Note well this last parable. A false god would have said Brooklyn; but only the true Teakettle, than Whom there is none more uptown, would have known when to say Jersey City.

The New Yorker's task is to convert its own apostates: they whom it sustained in archness and in coyness and in the bon ton of small talk, on whose middle brows it laid its blessing, exalting their emptiness—they shall now receive the Word. Thus it is that we have world government praised and national sovereignty denounced on every page, but nothing about actual politics. It is bon ton to mention fascism and racism and come out against them. But capitalism, imperialism, world markets, the profit system, exploitation, revolution, socialism—these words have a sweaty air; they suggest crowded downtown East Side meeting halls with their folding chairs and smoke in the dingy room, the stain in the armpits of the excited speaker. (And if these images are clichés—for which reason, among others, the New Yorker avoids the reality for which they stand—they are no triter than the more aseptic middle-class images that the New Yorker does employ: politics must keep abreast of science, our ideas must be as long-range as the latest bomber.) The limits of tone are the limits of class. There is a good reason why the New Yorker liberal must simper as he does. What his sense of urbanity allows him to say corresponds exactly with the limits of what his sense of politics—if he had any—would allow him to do. A fundamental revision of society, a practical consideration of the revolutionary measures necessary to the establishment of world government are in bad taste—and small wonder. The bourgeoisie will never give up its tone without a struggle.

But Mr. White asks very little. "If these topical paragraphs add an ounce to the long-continuing discussion of nationalism and throw even as much as a flashlight gleam on the wild flag which our children, and their children, must learn to know and love, I am content."

Block that metaphor! ISAAC ROSENFELD

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Amiable Past

GOVERNOR COX'S "Journey Through My Years" (Simon and Schuster, $4.50) is a pleasantly old-fashioned volume of political reminiscence. It has somewhat the tone of the late nineteenth century, when politicians could still put their own pens to paper but the results tended to dissolve into anecdotes and affability. Governor Cox's memories both of people and of events are sensible and undiscriminatingly good-tempered rather than incisive or penetrating. Only occasionally, as in his account of his fight for the League of Nations or his fight against Gene Talmadge in Georgia, do ancient emotions disturb the even tenor of his prose.

The portrait of Roosevelt suffers from the prevailing amiability. Cox picked him sight unseen as vice-presidential candidate in 1920, and they remained in friendly if intermittent contact till Roosevelt's death. Cox was broadly sympathetic with the New Deal, though he disapproved of its labor policies and of the FEPC and used to urge the President to "cast a smile on business." His account of the London Economic Conference betrays a certain asperity and differs from Professor Moley's version; but on the whole the Governor has handled Roosevelt, and everyone else, with the same genial discretion which prevents him, for example, from disclosing his final conversation with Wendell Willkie. He thereby indulges admirable personal traits with callous disregard for the future historian. An unregenerate Yankee must further regret that an ex-governor of Ohio, evidently corrupted by the fact that he runs an excellent newspaper in Atlanta, Georgia—or by the fact that he once represented Vallandigham's district in Congress—sees fit to refer twice to something he calls the War Between the States.

A Stock Life

IN SPITE of its stately format Herbert Weinstock's new life of Handel (Knopf, $5) is neither an important nor a particularly interesting biography. It is a chronicle account of Handel's career, rewritten from secondary sources in a pedestrian term-paper prose style, and adds nothing to our rather scrappy knowledge of Handel as man or musician, while omitting a good deal available elsewhere. Its principal merits are that Mr. Weinstock prints entire the small correspondence that is extant, and quotes in extenso many contemporary press notices, where Flower and others content themselves with excerpts. About Handel's personality Mr. Weinstock appears to have formed no opinion—at least he ventures none, either by statement or by organization of material—while he handicaps the reader's attempt to form one by omitting any mention of such important data as the interesting inventory of Handel's house. The short discussions of the music give no particular evidence of personal reaction or insight, and Mr. Weinstock's method of dealing with its few controversial aspects—such as the origins of the "Water Music" and the question of plagiarism—is to straddle the nearest fence. Except "Jeptha," none of Handel's musical autographs, most of which are extant, are discussed, and there is not even a complete catalogue of Handel's works. In fact, aside from the bare account of the events of Handel's existence, Mr. Weinstock appears to suffer from the belief that modern readers of biography are afraid of a straightforward presentation of the known data, and so he falls back either on simplification, as in mentioning Handel's astrological dating of scores, or on silence. The extra features claimed by the blurb—among them "many entertaining vignettes" of Handel's time, its mores, and his associates—are, unfortunately, meager and dull; Flower's pompous biography is superior in this respect. Finally, the presence of trivial but elementary errors—Handel's first use of the double bassoon is misdated, and Dr. Pepusch's share in the "Beggar's Opera" is exaggerated, on the strength of an unfortunate quotation from Burney—suggests that Mr. Weinstock is none too well grounded in the period.

CHARLES B. FARRELL

Sex and Authority

WILHELM REICH approaches a central intellectual problem—the relationship between our two most seminal and revolutionary systems, Marxism and Freudianism—by rejecting much of both. But he retains their essential revolutionary spirit, and unlike many recent psychiatrists trying their hand at sociology, he does not evade difficulties with facile phrases about "adjustment" and "progress."

His main contribution, "The Mass Psychology of Fascism" (Orgone Institute Press, $4.50), is a detailed demonstration of the correlation between political authoritarianism and sexual suppression. Acceptance of the Führer principle in politics he sees as an outward aspect of a character structure cowed by the father image and fearful of its orgastic potentiality. "The goal of sexual suppression is that of producing an individual who is adjusted to the authoritarian order and will submit to it in spite of all misery and degradation." Especially brilliant is Reich's historical account of the parallel development of political totalitarianism and sexual irrationality under the Hitler and Stalin dictatorships.

Reich's power as social analyst is not sustained in his programmatic sections. He sees nature as an intrinsic good, accessible if the authoritarian clamps on natural sexuality are removed, and succumbs to that characteristically self-condemnatory and self-compensatory theory of distraught intellectuals, that the proletariat has greater sexual health than other classes. He is thereby led to regard orgastic potency as the major prerequisite for social reconstruction. His elevation of the sexual factor to historical primacy leads him to abandon Marxian categories for sexually evaluative categories. Since he now rejects all political activity, Reich can propose nothing but the attempt to live according to his principles—which means either individual self-improvement or utopian communities that are necessarily futile.

Reich's picture of the orgastically potent man as the true revolutionary ignores class status and interests, and ends in sexual utopianism. But his analysis of the relationhip between society and sexual norms is valuable and brilliant.

JAMES AGEE

STUFF the following with sage and serve hot, with soda-mints, to men of sufficiently good will:

"It's a Wonderful Life," Frank Capra's first film since those he made for the army, is one of the most efficient sentimental pieces since "A Christmas Carol." Often, in its pile-driving emotional exuberance, it outrages, insults, or at least accosts without introduction, the cooler and more responsible parts of the mind; it is nevertheless recommended, and will be reviewed at length as soon as the paralyzing joys of the season permit.

"Wanted for Murder," an English melodrama, stars Eric Portman as a middle-class mother's boy who can't keep his hands off the throats of working girls, of whom he strangles several before Scotland Yard catches up with him. To have held out so long, he is remarkably careless at his work, dropping a marked handkerchief near one corpse, a shard of cigar near another, and the balance of the cigar in Inspector Conway's ash-tray. He even knocks the head off his late, mad uncle, "The Happy Hangman," who is on exhibit at Madame Tussaud's and under whose influence the hero does his killing. Neck-deep as he stands in a blizzard of such manna, Roland Culver manages to make the Inspector seem capable and subtle as well as likable. Mr. Portman, who suggests a cross between Paul Henreid and Louis Calhern, gives the maniac a dangerous, melancholic grace. Both men seem to me considerably more persuasive than most of the bench-dogs who are paid to charm women in American films; but not being a woman—not even an American woman—I am ill-qualified to judge. This is a pleasant, unpretentious thriller of the second or third grade, with oddly contradictory streaks of good and crude directing, and some beautifully exciting shots of Hyde Park as a police cordon clears away the rattled crowds and closes, through the twilight, for the kill.

"Till the Clouds Roll By" is a little like sitting down to a soda-fountain de luxe atomic special of maple walnut on vanilla on burnt almond on strawberry on butter pecan on coffee on raspberry sherbet on tutti frutti with hot fudge, butterscotch, marshmallow, filberts, pistachios, shredded pineapple, and rainbow sprills on top, go double on the whipped cream. Some of the nuts, it turns out, are a little stale, and wandering throughout the confection is a long bleached-golden hair, probably all right in its place but, here, just a little more than you can swallow. This hair, in the difficult technical language of certain members of the Screen Writers' Guild who exult in my non-professionalism—political as well as cinematic—would, I suppose, be called the "story-line." The story is enough of the life and not very hard times of the late Jerome Kern to make you want either not to hear any of it at all or to get the real story instead. Besides the story, however, the picture contains something over twenty stars and featured players, many of them nice people, and they sing no less than twenty-two of Kern's songs. If, as I do, you like a good deal of his graceful, nacreous music, the picture is pleasantly, if rather stupefyingly, worth all the bother. The songs are nearly all sung with care and affection, though not one that I have heard before is done here quite as well as I have heard it elsewhere. The most surprising defection is the failure, twice around, to give "Old Man River" any of the pulse and momentum which go so far toward making it Kern's best song. Both Sinatra and a colored singer do it, instead, with all misplaced reverence, as if they were retranslating at sight, out of Tacitus, the Emancipation Proclamation. This I realize is called feeling the music; for that kind of feeling I prefer W. C. Fields's cadenza on the zither, which was rendered in sparring-gloves.

B. H. HAGGIN

IN A conversation, a few weeks ago, which began with Balanchine's latest ballet and eventually got to Toscanini's recent performances, Carl Van Vechten remarked that he spoke as one who knew Toscanini's great period at the Metropolitan. "The first year there were both Mahler and Toscanini dividing almost the entire repertory between them. In those days Toscanini would conduct a 'Tristan' or a 'Götterdämmerung' that was overwhelming; but the thing to hear was his performance of early Verdi—of 'La Traviata.'" As it happened, only a few days after this conversation Toscanini conducted a performance of "La Traviata" for N. B. C., and millions of us got an idea of what Mr. Van Vechten had talked about.

Millions of us, that is, for whom this opera had been a discontinuous series of sections pulled out of shape by the vocal exhibitionism of competing stars, heard for the first time phrases in which even the tenor's and soprano's high notes were part of the plastically modeled contours—heard whole acts which by such plastic continuity in pace and sonority from phrase to phrase and section to section were made into organically coherent entities. I have a strong suspicion—having not yet checked with Mr. Van Vechten—that this performance was in some ways different from the ones he heard Toscanini conduct at the Metropolitan. I suspect that, although basically the same in style, in those days the performance was slower and had an operatic rhetorical expansiveness, and that now it is swifter, tenser, and—after Toscanini's long preoccupation with symphonic music—closer knit and more compressed. The style, then, is the same, but refined, clarified, and—as a friend observed of the wonderful performance of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony earlier in the year—"apotheosized." As for the effect, there were moments which I thought would have gained by the earlier expansiveness, but others which unquestionably gained by the new urgency.

The performance of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 3 in which Toscanini invited Dame Myra Hess to play brought surprises. He is fanatical about tempo—about setting the right tempo, about maintaining it unchanged once it has been set; and his strong convictions make him inflexible: years ago they caused him to cancel the performance of a concerto in which a greater pianist than Dame Hess was to play. It was amazing, therefore, to have him, this time, allow her to slow down the first movement after the orchestral introduction, which he had taken even faster than in the performance with Rubinstein two years ago; and to have him also accept in the second movement a tempo much slower than that of the Rubinstein performance, and slower, I am certain, than he liked.

As for her performance of the solo part, I recall being charmed by the lovely sounds and phrases she produced from the piano when she first came here; but in later years her playing became sentimental and affected (as in the recorded performance of the Schumann Concerto), and even pompous (in concert performances of the F minor Sonata and—if I remember correctly—B flat Concerto of Brahms, the G major Concerto of Beethoven). In her Telephone Hour broadcast this year, after a spirited performance of a Bach Gigue, she went through the first movement of Mozart's Piano Concerto K. 488 with the sensitive-fingered placidity of a talented conservatory pupil, only to shock one in the cadenza with some of the archly prettifying phrasing of the matured Myra Hess. And in the performance of the Beethoven concerto with Toscanini she produced the necessary vigor—and little else—in the fast movements, but surprised one with inflection of the cantilena of the slow movement that imparted to it no tensile strength, and no firmness or sharpness of contour.

Mention of the Telephone Hour reminds me that having been paying considerable attention to this program in recent months I wondered at Mr. Lou Frankel's recommendation of it on his "worth hearing" list several weeks ago: "Week in and week out this is one of the finest musical programs in radio." Having in fact been paying attention to all such programs I wondered again at his later recommendation of Harvest of Stars: "Good music by Frank Black and good singing by James Melton. . . ." (As an ordinary citizen I have ventured to wonder at some of Mr. Frankel's non-musical recommendations—for example, of Arthur Godfrey, or of even the best Mr. and Mrs. team.) Harvest of Stars on December 1 offered Ruiz's "Amor," "Home on the Range," Gershwin's "Strike up the Band," Kern's "Why Do I Love You?," and Grofé's "On the Trail." And without meaning that Gershwin and Kern are bad, I would point out that they are not what music-lovers usually mean when they say "good music." The music they mean is not offered on the countless network studio programs like Harvest of Stars, which feature big-name performers in popular and semi-classical music.

Only the Telephone Hour occasionally varies the formula with a little "good music"—like the two Bach pieces and the movement of Mozart's K. 488 played by Dame Hess, the movements from a Bach sonata for unaccompanied violin played by Heifetz. It is, then, the best of the programs of this kind; but it is not "week in and week out . . . one of the finest musical programs of radio"; it is not even good week in and week out. Trading in eminences, it repeatedly presents Kreisler and Hofmann, whose eminence no longer rests on ability to play well. Moreover it presents Kreisler playing things like "Stars in My Eyes" and "The Rosary," and on the other hand Hofmann in a first movement of Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto with exposition and development sections sliced out. And if Dame Hess plays Bach and Mozart it is after a movement from Glazunov's "Scenes de Ballet"; if Traubel sings the finale of "Tristan" it is after the ballet music from Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba."

Outside of the Metropolitan Opera and the Philadelphia Orchestra on Saturdays, the New York Philharmonic and the N. B. C. Symphony on Sundays, the Boston Symphony on Tuesdays, the networks offer very little "good music"—a few half-hours, most of them late at night or early Sunday morning. C. B. S. offers Invitation to Music at 11:30 Wednesday nights, a program from the Juilliard School at 11:30 Thursday nights, a Biggs organ recital at 9:15 Sunday mornings; N. B. C. an operatic program at 11:30 Thursday nights; A. B. C. a string quartet at 11:00 Sunday mornings (not on WJZ New York); M. B. S. the Pro Arte Quartet at 2:00 Saturdays (not on WOR New York), and the Cleveland Symphony that Mr. Frankel mentioned, for all of an hour on Saturdays at 6:00 (so that one can't use it to "relax . . . after dinner").

CLEMENT GREENBERG

THIS year's Whitney Annual (through January 16) is no worse than last year's—which amounts almost to an improvement, since each of the Annuals in the three or four years previous had been worse than the one before it. That, apparently, is what American painting, sampled wholesale, has been like. But this is not a new discovery.

Of course, the fault lies chiefly with the artists themselves, and I am sure that not even the notorious egoism of painters has prevented some of them from recognizing that. Yet in view of the evenness with which the Whitney shows have been bad, the suspicion grows that a more considerable part of the blame than one used to think is assignable to those who run the place. Their lack of strong-mindedness, of serious bias, of any intense and constant perception of the tasks of modern art and of the direction in which it solves them best, their eclectic conformism, their eagerness to receive and their dread of finding, their affable timidity—all this creates something in its own image, and that image is any Whitney Annual as a whole. The same goes, with some modifications, for the people who run the Museum of Modern Art, the Carnegie Annual, the Pepsi-Cola shows, and so on. Obviously, American art is in the wrong hands.

However, the responsibility has to be placed even deeper. Primary is the fact that the selection of our museum directors and curators is not susceptible to the pressure of any real opinion from outside the academic world. There exists in this country no self-assured, self-intelligible class of connoisseurs and amateurs of art with defined and independent tastes. Collectors, critics, and simple enthusiasts depend on slogans, worded and unworded, that they cull from everything except their own experience.

Perhaps the fact that we have been the pupils of France in art for the last thirty years helps account for this. But even more important, I think, is the absence of a stable leisured or a self-confident intellectual class in this country, prepared to rally to each other's help against the attrition of journalism, fashion, publicity, and kitsch. As it is, the "art world" in America remains a parody the object of which varies—now the fashion world, now the literary world, now the night-club world, now Miss Dickinson's garden. And when it comes closest to the reality of that with which it deals, it parodies the stock market.

As for the paintings at the Whitney, their shortcomings lie not so much in their execution as in their conception. Everybody knows more or less how to paint. Examine any picture, and you will see a good amount of knowledge and manual competence in it, if not sensitivity. And you will even see enough of that. Everybody knows what has already made painting great. But very few know, feel, or suspect what makes painting great anywhere and at any time—that it is necessary to register what the artist makes of himself and his experience in the world, not merely to record his intentions, foibles, and predilections. The same tastes that lead one to prefer scrambled eggs to fried are not enough to furnish the content of a picture. The trouble with American art is that it substitutes pretension for ambition.

The best painting at the present show is Jackson Pollock's "Two." Those who think that I exaggerate Pollock's merit are invited to compare this large vertical canvas with everything else in the Annual. Mark Tobey, too, is represented by a strong picture, but in the presence of the Pollock the minor quality of his achievement, original as it is, becomes even more pronounced than before.

I also liked Edward Hopper's landscape despite the crudeness of its greens and the academic superficiality of its facture. A special category of art should be devised for the kind of thing Hopper does. He is not a painter in the full sense; his means are second-hand, shabby, and impersonal. But his rudimentary sense of composition is sufficient for a message that conveys an insight into the present nature of American life for which there is no parallel in our literature, though that insight itself is literary. Hopper's painting is essentially photography, and it is literary in the way that the best photography is. Like Walker Evans's and Weegee's art, it triumphs over inadequacies of the physical medium; and the main difference between them is that while Evans's and Weegee's subjects do not give them time enough to calculate focus and exposure, Hopper simply happens to be a bad painter. But if he were a better painter, he would, most likely, not be so superior an artist.
